DOJ Suspends Antitrust Probe Of Entercom. The AP (11/1, Yao) reports, "The Justice Department said Tuesday it has suspended an antitrust investigation into Entercom Communications Corp.'s purchase of several New York radio stations because the company said it would sell three stations to comply with media ownership rules." The AP continues, "The Justice Department had been looking into Entercom's $262 million purchase of 15 radio stations from CBS Corp. in Austin, Texas; Cincinnati; Memphis, Tenn.; and Rochester, N.Y. … The investigation centered on Rochester, where Bala Cynwyd-based Entercom already owns four radio stations, one AM and three FM. The acquisition would hand over four more FM stations in the area." The AP adds, "With eight radio stations, Entercom would control more than 57 percent of the radio advertising market, and the Justice Department was investigating whether its dominant market share would lead to reduced competition and higher prices for radio advertising. … Federal Communications Commission's rules on local ownership would prohibit Entercom from owning more than five FM stations in an area, requiring it to sell two. … Entercom said it's planning to sell three stations — the CBS-owned WRMM-FM and WZNE-FM and Entercom's WFKL-FM — to comply with FCC rules. The stations are expected to be sold within three months to a buyer approved by the Justice Department, according to a news release issued by the department Tuesday."

Donnelley To Acquire Banta In $1.3 Billion Deal. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, B3) reports, "R.R. Donnelley & Sons Co. said late yesterday it has agreed to acquire Banta Corp., a Menasha, Wis., provider of printing and digital-imaging solutions, in a $1.3 billion deal. The agreement comes as printing-services provider Cenveo Inc. said it has withdrawn its $50-a-share acquisition offer for Banta. Cenveo, Stamford, Conn., in August offered to buy rival Banta for $46 a share, or about $1.12 billion. Banta rejected the offer, opting instead to announce a restructuring that would cut as many as 500 jobs and close five printing plants.:

Widening Memory-Chip Probe Targets Sony. The AP (11/1, Robertson) reports, "An obscure corner of the semiconductor industry became an international battleground Tuesday as Sony Corp. became the fifth company ensnared in a U.S. Department of Justice antitrust probe into the sales of a particular type of memory chip." The AP continues, "The same day, European Union regulators said they raided several unnamed semiconductor companies in Germany on Oct. 11 as part of a probe into possible price fixing for the same type of chip." The AP adds, "Both investigations center on the sale of static random access memory, or SRAM, a kind of computer memory found in relatively small quantities in PCs and used in disk drives, communications equipment and networking gear." The AP notes, "European regulators were explicit that the companies targeted in the cartel raid were suspected of breaking price-fixing laws. … However, the European Commission never names the companies suspected of operating a cartel and said that the surprise inspections were a preliminary step in its probe. … Under EU law, businesses found guilty of taking part in a cartel can be fined up to 10 percent of their annual revenue. … In Washington, Justice Department officials declined to discuss details of the probe. Spokeswoman Gina Talamona would only say that antitrust prosecutors are 'investigating the possibility of anticompetitive practices in the SRAM industry.'"

DOJ_NMG_0089761

The New York Times (11/1, Fackler) reports, "An earlier investigation by the Justice Department into price fixing in the market for another type of memory chip, dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, led to $731 million in fines imposed on four companies and several individuals." The Times adds, "Sony's sales last year of SRAM chips totaled $28 million, a fraction of the company's $64 billion in global sales. The bigger potential damage will probably be to Sony's once-sterling reputation, which has already been tarnished by the recent recall of 9.6 million laptop batteries and delays to its widely awaited next-generation game console, PlayStation 3. … The recent problems have come just as Sony appeared headed to recovery under its first non-Japanese chief executive, Sir Howard Stringer. … Under Mr. Stringer, who took Sony's helm last year, the company had appeared to be bouncing back from blunders like losing the market in global portable music players to the iPod from Apple and being late to produce flat-panel televisions."

Bloomberg (11/1, Newman) reports, "European Union regulators are investigating potential price-fixing of memory chips used in computers and mobile phones, working with U.S. authorities." Bloomberg continues, "A Sony Corp. chip-making unit, Sony Electronics Inc., received a U.S. Justice Department subpoena seeking information about its business, the company said in a statement today. U.S. regulators are conducting a criminal price-fixing investigation into the market for static random-access memory chips. … The EU is probing makers of SRAM chips, coordinating with U.S. authorities. The commission conducted unannounced inspections at offices in Germany on Oct. 11 along with national antitrust officials, commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said. He didn't identify the companies involved. The U.S. inquiry follows a three-year probe of price-fixing in the DRAM chip market." Bloomberg adds, "Samsung Electronics Co., Cypress Semiconductor Corp. and Micron Technology Inc., among the biggest makers of the chips, said Oct. 12 that the Justice Department had contacted them about SRAMs. In the probe of the dynamic random-access memory chip probe, the Justice Department has collected $731 million in criminal fines, including $300 million from Samsung."

Former Head Of Tulsa Firm Fined For Bid-Rigging. The Durango (CO) Herald (11/1, Hanel) reports, "A Tulsa company was fined $150,000 for rigging bids for the construction of BP natural-gas pipelines in Southwest Colorado. … Flint Energy Services received the sentence on Monday from U.S. District Court Judge Phillip Figa." The Herald continues, "The company and the former head of its Farmington office, Kenneth L. Rains, pleaded guilty in August to conspiring with other unnamed people to defraud BP by submitting high bids for pipeline construction. Bid-rigging is a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act. … Rains has been transferred to the company's Oklahoma headquarters, but he hasn't been fired. Figa questioned why not. … 'Why does the company keep on someone who has committed a felony?' Figa asked." The Herald adds, "Flint's attorney, Ryan Stoll, said the company isolated Rains from his old post but decided not to fire him because of 'personal circumstances' that might become clear at Rains' sentencing in January. Stoll said he expects Rains to be sent to prison. … Flint and lawyers for the Justice Department's antitrust division had asked for a fine of $100,000, citing the prompt cooperation of Flint executives. Federal sentencing guidelines call for a fine of $161,000 to $322,000. … Carla Stern, a Justice Department attorney, said there's no evidence the conspiracy went any higher than Rains. She praised Flint executives for cooperating and speeding up the case."

AMD Seeks Intel Documents In Antitrust Suit. The AP (11/1) reports, "Advanced Micro Devices Inc., the No. 2 computer chip maker behind Intel Corp., asked the court overseeing its antitrust lawsuit against Intel to force the company to produce documents related to its conduct outside of the United States." The AP continues, "The judge had previously ruled AMD cannot sue in the U.S. for Intel's alleged monopolistic tactics overseas. .. .But AMD argued in the motion filed Monday in a Delaware federal court that the order only applies to damages sought in the U.S. for Intel's alleged strong-arm tactics abroad. AMD maintains it should be allowed to use documentation of those actions to pursue domestic commerce claims." The AP adds, "Sunnyvale-based AMD, which filed its lawsuit in June 2005, accuses Santa Clara-based Intel of bullying major customers into exclusive deals and offering secret rebates to undercut AMD in the market for microprocessors, which act as the brains of computers. .. .The lawsuit alleges anticompetitive practices in several countries including Britain, Germany and Japan."

DOJ_NMG_0089762

Donnelley To Buy Banta In $1.3 Billion Deal. The AP (11/1) reports, "R.R. Donnelley & Sons Co. will acquire Banta Corp. in a $1.3 billion deal combining two Midwestern printing firms with histories dating back more than a century, the companies announced Tuesday." The AP continues, "Chicago-based R.R. Donnelley, which prints the Yellow Pages, said the acquisition will allow it to expand its range of products and services for customers and also enhance its services in magazine, catalog and book printing and in direct marketing." The AP adds, "Donnelley also said in a press release that while it expected its 2006 earnings from continuing operations to be at the high end of earlier guidance of $2.45 to $2.50, anticipated restructuring charges made it impossible to estimate net income for the full year. … Banta, based in Menasha, Wis., has operations in Europe and Asia, in addition to the United States. … The cash deal is valued at about $1.3 billion, or $36.50 per share after a special dividend of $16.00 per share already declared by Banta. The offer, equal to $52.50 per share, represents a premium of 18.6 percent over Banta's closing share price Tuesday on the New York Stock Exchange of $44.28."

Stratex-Harris Deal Gets Antitrust Nod. The AP (11/1) reports, "Stratex Networks Inc., a maker of digital microwave radios used in wireless communications, said Tuesday the required waiting period for its merger into Harris Corp.'s microwave communications unit has ended." The AP continues, "The deal, announced in September, would give Harris a majority stake in the new company." The AP adds, "Melbourne, Fla.-based Harris, which sells communications products to government and commercial customers, will contribute its microwave division and $25 million in cash and get a 56 percent ownership stake in the combined company. Shareholders of Stratex will own 44 percent. … The waiting period was required by the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976. … The deal still requires approval by other regulators and Stratex shareholders."

Music Publishers Strike Anti-Piracy Deal With Kazaa. The AP (11/1) reports, "The music publishing industry reached a tentative deal with operators of the Kazaa file-sharing network over claims of copyright infringement, an industry group said." The AP continues, "Publishers pursuing a class-action suit against Kazaa informed U.S. District Court on Monday that the peer-to-peer network had agreed to pay "a substantial sum" under the agreement, the National Music Publishers' Association said in a statement. … The amount of the settlement was not disclosed. It is subject to final approval by the association board." The AP adds, "The settlement 'will be another key milestone of the ongoing transformation of the digital music marketplace to one that will allow legal services to thrive,' NMPA president and chief executive David Israelite said in the statement. … Sharman Networks announced in July that it had settled copyright infringement lawsuits with music labels and movie studios, agreeing to redesign its software to block customers from downloading protected music and movies and to pay more than $115 million in penalties."

Two Real Estate Firms Merge. The Washington Post (11/1, Hedgpeth) reports, "CB Richard Ellis Group Inc., the world's largest commercial real estate broker and one of the most prominent real estate firms in Washington, agreed yesterday to buy rival Trammell Crow Co. in a deal worth $2.2 billion that will more than double its property management business. Although neither company is based here, both are considered major local players. CB Richard Ellis, which manages 22 million square feet of space in the Washington area, is handling the leasing of one of the Watergate office buildings and has done leasing for Northrop Grumman Corp., Verizon Communications Inc. and General Dynamics Corp." The Post adds, "The deal is one of several mergers that have occurred in the past few years as clients seek more efficient ways of buying, selling and leasing office space, industry experts said."

The Wall Street Journal (11/1, B4, Chittum, Herrick) reports, "The deal, by far the biggest in the commercial real-estate services sector, hastens consolidation that began in earnest a decade ago and has transformed what were once regional businesses focused on lease and sales brokerage into a handful of multiservice behemoths catering to multinational corporations increasingly looking to outsource their global real-estate functions. … Much of the industry's consolidation has been driven by geographic considerations, including the last major deal in 2003 when CB Richard Ellis swallowed Insignia/ESG to boost its New York presence."

DOJ_NMG_0089763

Google Acquires Document Management Firm. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, A15, Delaney) reports, "Google Inc. said it acquired closely held start-up JotSpot for an undisclosed sum, a move that could strengthen Google's expanding services for users to create and share documents online. JotSpot, exploiting a technology called wikis, provides free and paid services that allow individuals to jointly work on Web-based information such as spreadsheets, photo albums, calendars and contact lists. Google, Mountain View, Calif., has assembled free online word-processing, spreadsheet, email and calendar services that have some similarities with JotSpot's offerings. Such services could win away some of the consumers Microsoft Corp. is targeting with its Office software."

ENVIRONMENT:

Boulder Set To Vote On Whether To Impose Nation's First Carbon Tax. USA Today (11/1, 6A, Kenworthy, 2.27M) reports, "Voters in Boulder, Colo., will decide Tuesday whether the city will become the first in the nation to impose a 'carbon tax' on homeowners and businesses to fund efforts to reduce emissions that cause global warming. If approved, the ballot measure would tax electricity usage and add about $16-$20 a year to the average residential electric bill." Boulder's "City Council authorized the ballot measure to fund a city plan to reduce greenhouse emissions 7% below 1990 levels. ... Four years ago, the city adopted emission targets set by the 1997 Kyoto Protocol, an international agreement the United States has not ratified... ." USA Today notes, "No group has organized in the city to oppose the tax measure, and even the Boulder Chamber of Commerce has endorsed it."

Venture Capitalist's Promotion Of Prop 87 Criticized. In his Wall Street Journal (11/1, 2.03M) column, Holman W. Jenkins, Jr., criticizes venture capitalist Vinod Khosla, "an avid investor in ethanol ventures," for his promotion of California's Proposition 87 ballot measure, under which "California-produced oil would be taxed to fund alternative energy projects." Jenkins says, "there's been no shortage of capital for alternative energy ventures. ... This year's boom was sparked by a sudden shift in federal policy and a short-lived gasoline spike. The price of ethanol is expected to fall dramatically." Khosla's "real concern, to the extent that he has offered a coherent one, is global warming. Now this at least could be the subject of an intelligent debate -- about whether climate concerns justify putting a heavy government finger on the scale to help biofuel investors in their competition with gasoline. But the public would have to be told that part of the plan is higher gas prices." The "proposition is expected to lose handily, but for his modest contribution (a reported $1 million), Mr. Khosla has reaped an untold bonanza of propaganda for his energy investments. Already Congress is hurriedly putting together an expansion of the ethanol mandate in last year's energy bill in hopes of soaking up the excess supply stimulated by previous government actions. Earth's atmosphere might not notice the difference, but Mr. Khosla's portfolio certainly will."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Person Of Interest In California Wildfire Arrested As Fifth Firefighter Dies. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/1, Glazer) reports, "Authorities on Tuesday arrested a 37-year-old man suspected of igniting two wildfires this summer and who is considered a 'person of interest' in the Esperanza blaze, which killed five firefighters. Word of the arrest came an hour after a somber news conference at which officials announced the death of a horribly burned firefighter," Pablo Cerda, "who survived five days on life support. Raymond Lee Oyler of Beaumont was arrested…on two counts of arson related to wildfires in June, the Riverside County Sheriff's Department said in a statement posted on its Web site late Tuesday." The AP notes, "As part of the investigation, authorities said they sifted through hundreds of tips and interviewed previously convicted arsonists who live in the Cabazon area. Assisting in the investigation were the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The reward for information leading to an arrest had topped $500,000."

The Los Angeles Times (11/1, Reston, Lin, Abrams, 918K) reports, "Investigators continued working with more than 300 tips called in to an arson hotline since the fire began early Thursday. … Although authorities didn't indicate which fires Oyler was charged with setting, Riverside and San Bernardino counties were hit with a rash of more than 40 small, suspicious fires in May and the first half of June. One such fire in mid-June broke out in Cabazon, burning 10 acres near the intersection of Esperanza Avenue and Broadway, not far from the Esperanza blaze.

DOJ_NMG_0089764

17 Indicted After FBI, Wisconsin Police Raid Drug Gang. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (11/1, Barton, 259K) reports, "Seventeen people affiliated with a gang that authorities say has been distributing cocaine, crack cocaine and marijuana on Milwaukee's north side for about 15 years have been charged with conspiracy and other drug offenses in federal court in Milwaukee, according to an indictment made public Tuesday." The Journal Sentinel notes, "Two hundred law enforcement officers from the FBI, Milwaukee Police Department, state Department of Justice and other state and local agencies rounded up the defendants in the culmination of a two-year investigation, said Linda Krieg, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Milwaukee office. Swat teams from the FBI's Milwaukee and Chicago offices both were involved in the arrests because the suspects were considered armed and dangerous, Krieg said. The 10 arrests were made without incident, she said. Five other defendants already were in state custody," and "two remained at large Tuesday evening."

Protest Of Utah Pot Sale Sentence Grows. The Salt Lake Tribune (11/1, Neff) reports, "Former top Justice Department officials and several judges have asked the U.S. Supreme Court to hear the appeal of a Utah man sentenced to serve 55 years in prison for selling pot - a sentence decried by a judge who said the law forced his hand." The Tribune continues, "The 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver in January rejected an argument that the sentence handed down to record producer Weldon Angelos was cruel and unusual punishment that was disproportionate to his crime. … But a friend of the court brief filed with the high court by 145 people -including former U.S. Attorneys General Griffin Bell, Benjamin Civiletti, Nicholas Katzenbach and Janet Reno; other former high ranking Justice Department officials and former federal judges - urges the high court to take the case." The Tribune adds, "Angelos, 26, the founder of Extravagant Records, was accused of selling 8 ounces of marijuana to a police informant three times in May and June 2002. At one sale, he had a gun strapped to his ankle, according to court records. At the other drug buys, there were firearms in the vicinity. … A federal grand jury originally indicted Angelos in November 2002 on one gun possession count, three counts of marijuana distribution and two lesser charges. After Angelos rejected a plea bargain that would have sent him to prison for 16 years, authorities obtained a new indictment with 20 charges. … . When Angelos asked to reopen negotiations, prosecutors said it was too late. In December 2001, a jury convicted him of 16 counts."

Maryland Man Convicted Of Drug Distribution Gets 20-Year Sentence. The Frederick (MD) News Post (10/31) reports a Frederick man "caught in an undercover operation headed by the Drug Enforcement Administration was sentenced Monday to 20 years in federal prison. Winfred Gregg Travis' sentence stems from his conviction for distributing crack cocaine and possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. … Since 1991, Travis has been charged in Frederick and Montgomery counties 10 times, primarily with drug crimes, but also with breaking and entering, battery and disorderly conduct, according to court records."

Eighth Member Of Hawaiian Drug Ring Sentenced. The Maui News (11/1) reports, "The eighth member of a methamphetamine trafficking ring was sentenced Monday by U.S. District Court Judge J. Michael Seabright to nearly 24 years in prison, according to the U.S. Department of Justice." The News continues, "Leandro Gomez III, 30, of Las Vegas, was one of 10 defendants to plead guilty to charges of taking part in a large-scale organization that imported methamphetamine from Las Vegas to Maui. .. .'Gomez was the Las Vegas supplier of the methamphetamine, which was transported to Maui either by couriers or mail shipment,' a Justice Department news release says." The News adds, "In Las Vegas, he had been assisted by co-defendants Timothy James Sullivan and Gilbert Gomez Jr., federal officials said. And, on Maui, 'Nathaniel Russell and Pamela Mahealani Newton (husband and wife) oversaw an extensive distribution network involving co-defendants John Corniel Jr., Charles R.K. Farren, Roger Manu Bates, Cyrinah L. Aken and Reed Kaleookalani Aken.' … The investigation of the drug ring resulted in the recovery of 616.8 grams (1.4 pounds) of methamphetamine from Bates in early May 2005 on Maui, according to Justice Department officials."

The Honolulu Star-Bulletin (10/31) reports, "The 30-year-old Las Vegas supplier of a large-scale trafficking

DOJ_NMG_0089765

organization bringing 'ice' to Maui in 2005 was sentenced in federal court yesterday to 23 years and eight months in prison. U.S. District Judge J. Michael Seabright sentenced Leandro Gomez III, who pleaded guilty to methamphetamine-trafficking charges along with nine others. … U.S. Attorney Michael Kawahara "said efforts by Maui police, the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and other law enforcement agencies in this and other cases have 'stemmed the flow of drugs to Hawaii.'" The Maui News (10/31) and Honolulu Advertiser (10/31) also report on the sentencing.

Court Ruling Could Reduce Michigan Man's Sentence In Heroin Case. Grand Rapids (MI) Press (10/31, Agar) reports a federal appeals court ruling "could shorten the 25-year prison term for a man who provided heroin to a friend and failed to call 911 as she was dying in his Grandville home. Kevin Obi, 23, pleaded guilty to providing heroin that killed Nora Lares, 21, in 2004." The Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals "said recently the prosecution failed to show Obi's false statements [to investigators] significantly hurt the investigation. The court ordered the case returned to U.S. District Court for resentencing." The government "argued Obi's false statements led police to initially consider the crime scene to be the vehicle, rather than his basement, which resulted in a loss of possible evidence."

San Diego Chargers Linebacker Drops Appeal Of Drug-Related Suspension. There are nearly 300 media references to San Diego Chargers linebacker Shawne Merriman dropping an appeal of his drug-related suspension imposed by the NFL. For example, the New York Times (11/1, Schmidt) reports Merriman yesterday "dropped his appeal of a four-game suspension for violating the National Football League's policy on banned substances, and he blamed his positive drug test on a supplement he took before the season to boost his energy for workouts. Merriman said his lawyer, David Cornwell, was considering legal action against the supplement maker because its product contained a precursor to the steroid nandrolone. Dietary supplement makers are prohibited from including nandrolone's precursors in their products."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (10/31) reports Merriman "had been leaning toward this decision for days, weighing the likelihood he could win a reversal of his suspension versus the desire to clear his name along with the question of what would be best for his team. In the end, he decided Tuesday to drop the appeal of his four-game suspension for a positive drug test."

The Washington Post (11/1) reports Merriman "is scheduled to begin serving his suspension immediately and will miss the Chargers' next four games, beginning Sunday against the Cleveland Browns."

The AP (11/1) reports the suspension "won't officially begin until after Merriman addresses teammates today. After that, he will be barred from the team's headquarters until he is eligible to return Nov. 27."

Reputed Member Of Colombia Drug Cartel Arrested In Spain. The AP (11/1) reports police in Spain "said Tuesday they arrested a leading member of one of Colombia's most feared drug-trafficking cartels. Orlando Sabogal Zuluaga, 40, was arrested last Thursday in a shopping center on the outskirts of Madrid, the Civil Guard police force said in a statement posted on the Interior Ministry's Web site. Police said Sabogal Zuluaga was a right-hand man to the former head of the Norte del Valle cartel, Luis Hernando Gomez Bustamente, who himself was captured in Cuba in 2004." According to Colombian anti-narcotics police, Sabogal "is wanted for extradition to the U.S. to face charges of drug-trafficking and money-laundering."

Colombia's Vice President Says Celebrities Are Financing "Drug-Fueled" Conflict. In Bogota, the AP (11/1, Goodman) reports Colombia's vice president "is taking a hard-hitting anti-drug message to Europe, complaining about cocaine-snorting celebrities who he says are financing the drug-fueled civil conflict bleeding this South American nation. Vice President Francisco Santos spoke of supermodel Kate Moss, although she doesn't appear in the ads that he planned to unveil Wednesday in London along with 13 European anti-drug czars. Santos called Moss a perfect example of liberal European attitudes toward drug use because she is enjoying a career comeback after a British tabloid last year published photos of her apparently snorting cocaine." The European Monitoring Center for Drugs and Drug Addiction "says surveys in Denmark, Italy, Hungary, the Netherlands and Austria also show a rise in cocaine use among young adults. Santos noted findings by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy that cocaine consumption has declined 50 percent in the United States over the past two decades."

DOJ_NMG_0089766

Barr Says NRA Not To Blame For Violent Crime. In an op-ed for the Atlanta Journal-Constitution (11/1), former Rep. Bob Barr writes, "Atlanta suffers from a rate of violent crime about four times the national average; murders take place in the city at a rate about five times the nation's average. The reasons Atlanta's crime statistics remain stubbornly high are many and persistent, but criminologists and law enforcement experts know that none of them is the fault of the National Rifle Association. .. .Yet last week, Atlanta police Chief Richard Pennington was at the National Press Club in Washington offering sound bites and photo ops with the anti-gun lobby organization, the Brady Center to Prevent Gun Violence, blaming the city's sorry crime statistics on the NRA." Barr continues, "Taking potshots at the NRA has become a time-worn practice of big city mayors such as New York's Michael Bloomberg. While one expects liberal politicians in northeastern cities to curry favor by leveling broadsides at the NRA, it is surprising to find their ranks joined by a police chief from Atlanta, the capital of a state with a long and positive relationship with the NRA." Barr adds that "the material Pennington's new-found friends at the Brady Center are pushing is simply political pap of the sort the center has been espousing every election cycle for more than a decade." Barr argues that "while the evidence clearly shows that broader civilian ownership of firearms translates into less, not more, violent crime in America, and even as members of Congress of both political parties support efforts to reform and streamline federal firearms regulatory efforts, the anti-firearms crowd that apparently now includes Atlanta's police chief prefers hollow rhetoric to cooperative action."

Los Angeles ATF Office Uses Statistics To Prove Success. The Federal Times (11/1, Curl) reports, "Convictions — also up 23 percent. … Gang cases referred for prosecution — up 86 percent. … John Torres, special agent in charge of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives' Los Angeles field division, said these numbers, a comparison between fiscal 2005 and fiscal 2006, are proof positive that its performance measurement process is working. COMPSTAT, short for comparative statistics, is a public event where arrest, conviction and other statistics are reviewed and dissected. Officials in charge are held accountable for meeting goals and the numbers help determine where funds are allocated. … 'We saw that the system works and if we're paying attention to where we're dedicating our resources we're going to have an impact on violent crime,' Torres said. 'That's the bottom line.'" The Times continues, "COMPSTAT began in the 1990s in New York City where the police department would hold regular meetings to set goals for law enforcement and publicly hold officers accountable for their results. Torres began holding COMPSTAT meetings for the Los Angeles ATF on a quarterly basis in October 2005. … The most recent COMPSTAT was held Oct. 24. The event is open to the public and often attended by representatives from other law enforcement agencies. Agents are asked to report their statistics. Depending on how these numbers match goals from the previous COMPSTAT, they're asked on the spot to explain what went wrong or what went right." The Times adds, "Torres said his interest in COMPSTAT has its roots in the administration's overall push to measure results governmentwide. He recommends other federal law enforcement agencies and other agencies in generalconsider adopting the process, though he said different approaches would be necessary depending on the outcome they're trying to achieve."

Leader Of Prison Gang Resentenced To 19 Years. The Arizona Republic (11/1, Wagner) reports, "A leader of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang with an extensive criminal record was resentenced to more than 19 years behind bars Monday for a weapons violation, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office." The Republic continues, "Bruce Foy Lowry, 52, was convicted by a jury after his 2003 arrest by federal marshals who tracked him down on a fugitive warrant. At the time, Lowry was wanted for failure to appear in a drive-by shooting case where he was accused of firing a gun at a mother, father and child who followed him from the scene of a hit-and-run accident." The Republic adds, "According to a recorded conversation played during the sentencing, Lowry told a friend that he would have gotten into a gun battle with marshals if he'd had the opportunity. 'If I could have drawn I would have,' he said. 'I couldn't even draw.' … Lowry, known as 'Boss Hog,' appealed his case in 2004 to the Ninth Circuit Court, which remanded it back to the U.S. District Court in Arizona. On Monday, Judge David Campbell ordered Lowery to serve 235 months in prison for possessing ammunition in violation of the Armed Career Criminal Act." The Republic notes, "Prosecutors stressed Lowry's extensive history of violent crimes, including seven felony convictions dating to 1974. The list of offenses includes armed robberies and two Aryan Brotherhood knife attack on an inmate. Lowry and a half-dozen other assailants left the knife in their victim's heart, prosecutors said, but surgeons managed to remove the weapon and save the inmate's life."

DOJ_NMG_0089767

IMMIGRATION:

Five Indicted In Ballplayer-Smuggling Investigation. USA Today (11/1, Leinwand) reports that Gustavo "Gus" Dominguez, Totoal Sports International vice president, was "indicted by a Miami grand jury on Tuesday for allegedly smuggling ballplayers and other Cuban nationals into the USA." He "is charged as part of a 53-count indictment related to two operations in 2004." USA Today adds, "Geoffrey Rodrigues, Robert Yosvany Hernandez, Ramon Batista and Guillermo Valdez, allegedly hired by Dominguez to transport the Cubans by speedboat to the USA, also were indicted."

The AP (11/1, Sedensky) reports, "Prosecutors say Rodrigues and Dominguez traveled by boat to Cuba on July 28, 2004, and loaded 22 Cubans aboard, but were intercepted by U.S. authorities at sea. Less than a month later, on Aug. 22, 2004, authorities say the two men successfully brought 19 Cubans into the country."

Suit Challenges Illegal Immigrant Crackdown In Allentown, PA. The AP (11/1, Rubinkam) reports, "Hispanic groups and the American Civil Liberties Union filed a lawsuit against a small U.S. city that has sparked national attention over its immigration policies, setting the stage for a legal battle over its crackdown on illegal immigrants." The AP continues, "The ordinance, approved by the Hazleton City Council last month, imposes fines on landlords who rent to illegal immigrants and denies business permits to companies that give them jobs. The law empowers the city to investigate written complaints about a person's immigration status, using a database operated by the federal government." The AP adds, "Lawyers for the ACLU and other groups planned to ask a federal judge for a temporary restraining order to prevent enforcement of the law, set to begin Wednesday. … 'Immigration reform is an important issue but if every little town like Hazleton across the 50 states makes up their own rules about immigration, we're going to be left with an even bigger mess,' Witold J. Walczak, legal director of the ACLU of Pennsylvania, said Monday. … Hazleton's ordinance has spurred dozens of copycat versions in small towns around the United States, as the illegal immigration issue has become a key campaign debate as the country heads into congressional elections next week. Some states and communities are accusing the government of inaction."

TAX:

Churches Reevaluate Their Political Activities In Light Of IRS Crackdown. McClatchy (11/1, Douglas) reports, "Scores of houses of worship nationwide are re-examining how they conduct get-out-the-vote programs and other election activities as the Internal Revenue Service investigates religious institutions for illegal campaign activity. Churches grew more nervous when the IRS launched an investigation of the liberal All Saints Episcopal Church in Pasadena, Calif. after a former rector delivered a sermon that was critical of the Bush administration and the Iraq war shortly before the 2004 presidential election. … Several religious and voting rights groups are schooling churches, synagogues, and other religious institutions about what they can and cannot do politically under IRS regulations.

GAO Urges IRS To Tighten Oversight Of Private Collection Agencies. The Washington Post/AP (11/1, D2, Abrams) reports the GAO is recommending that the IRS "improve oversight of a new program that uses private agencies to collect back taxes before it expands the effort." A GAO report "commended the IRS for addressing some important factors for the success of the program, such as proper training of collection-agency employees, ensuring that taxpayers are treated properly and that taxpayer information is secure. But it said the agency has not completed critical work on setting goals and determining costs. The IRS lacks criteria to assess 'whether the program performance warrants expanding the number of private collection agencies and turning over more cases to them,' the report says."

IRS Could Lose Money In First Year Of Using Private Bill Collectors. USA Today (11/1, Mccoy) reports, "The IRS could lose money or break even in the first phase of its program to turn some tax debts over to private collection agencies, newly released agency data show." The GAO's fiscal projects show "show the IRS expects to collect $55.8 million to $92 million in the recently started first phase of the private collection effort." The data "offer one of the first fiscal looks at this year's selection of three private firms to collect taxes from taxpayers who owe less than $25,000 and have not contested the debts. The firms began contacting an initial group of 12,500 taxpayers in September. They are eventually scheduled to handle about 158,000 cases, according to the IRS. The IRS cost data include the companies' fees; up to 24% of what they collect in overdue taxes."

DOJ_NMG_0089768

IRS Steps Up Checks On Partnerships, Trusts, S Corps. In his "Tax Report" column in the Wall Street Journal (11/1), Tom Herman writes, "The IRS has improved efforts to check up on taxpayers in partnerships, trusts and S corporations, a report says." Herman continues, "That's a significant change from just a few years ago, when the IRS drew heavy criticism from a congressional investigative agency and some lawmakers for embarrassing blunders in its efforts to combat tax evasion in this area. Since then, the IRS has done a better job but still needs to do more, says a report by the Treasury Inspector General for Tax Administration. … The IRS program involves 'document-matching,' which means comparing information that people report on their tax returns against what is reported separately to the agency on 'Schedule K-1.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Propose New Spending On Defense, Homeland Security And Education. The Washington Post (11/1, A07, Birnbaum, Weisman, 748K) reports, "As part of their midterm election push, House Democrats are promoting a wide-ranging legislative agenda that would add tens of billions of dollars a year to the federal budget for the military, homeland security and education yet still impose a new budget restraint that would make it harder to widen the annual deficit. … Critics say the Democrats will be forced to choose between keeping their pledge of fiscal rectitude and their promises of federal largess." The Democrats' proposal "would allocate billions of dollars to build up the military, subsidize student loans and bolster port security. It would raise the minimum wage, make college tuition payments tax-deductible, repeal oil-company tax breaks and expand incentives for personal savings accounts, among many other provisions. The program would prohibit the House from approving new spending or tax measures that widen the budget deficit. It would do that by restoring budget rules requiring that all future spending increases and tax cuts be offset by equivalent tax hikes or spending cuts."

Democrats Dispute Bush's Charge That They Will Raise Taxes. The Washington Times (11/1, Lambro, 88K) reports, "Repealing President Bush's tax cuts and boosting social-welfare spending have been the meat and potatoes of the Democrats' campaigns since the 2002 election, and they would be in a position to attempt both if they win control of Congress next week. Mr. Bush has been warning in campaign speeches across the country that the Democrats 'will raise your taxes' if voters put them in power, and Republican leaders have been making similar charges as Election Day draws closer. … Recent polls show that most Americans expect Democrats to raise their taxes and increase spending for new big-ticket programs such as health care for the uninsured." The Times notes, "Senior Democratic advisers say…major tax and spending changes are unlikely to happen because of a number of institutional obstacles that would be extremely hard for the Democrats to overcome, especially in what is likely to remain a narrowly divided Congress."

Rangel Says He Has No Animosity Towards Cheney Despite Cursing Him. The AP (11/1, Barrett) reports Rep. Charles Rangel "feels bad — but not too bad — about directing a curse word at Vice President Dick Cheney." Rangel "called Cheney a 'son of a b....' on Monday when asked by the New York Post about comments Cheney made about him in a television interview. He repeated his comments in an interview with The Associated Press on Tuesday, but added, 'I shouldn't have said it.' 'I thought that he should be flattered, there's certainly no animosity in it,' said Rangel, saying he had been making an observation about Cheney."

Appeals Court Hears New Arguments In McDermott-Boehner Tape Case. The AP (11/1, Daly) reports Christopher Landau, a lawyer for Rep. Jim McDermott, "told a federal appeals court Tuesday that McDermott should not be punished for giving reporters access to an illegally taped telephone call involving House Republican leaders. In arguments that evoked the Pentagon Papers and other press freedom cases…Landau said McDermott had merely received the tape from a Florida couple and therefore had done nothing wrong. … A three-judge panel of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled against McDermott in March. The 2-1 opinion upheld a lower court ruling that McDermott had violated the rights of Rep. John Boehner who was heard on the 1996 call."

DOJ_NMG_0089769

Commission For Labor Cooperation Director Resigns Over Outside Lobbying. The Washington Post's Al Kamen (11/1), in his "In The Loop" column, writes, "Mark Knouse , a Pittsburgh-based lobbyist who was appointed in 2004 by Labor Secretary Elaine Chao to a three-year term as executive director of the Commission for Labor Cooperation, has called it quits after an investigation raised questions about his use of government money to pay for lobbying for his old clients, the National Journal reports. Knouse, whose wife is Chao's executive assistant, told the magazine he'd done nothing wrong and thought he could take on outside work, despite a commission requirement that such work must be approved. The investigation also noted that, in 18 months, he charged the commission for more than a dozen trips to meet with Pennsylvania officials but met just twice with officials who were not from his home state."

GAO Warns Administration Could Miss Deadline On Expedited Background Checks. The Washington Post's Stephen Barr (11/1), in his "Federal Diary" column, writes, "The Bush administration appears at risk of missing a deadline set by Congress aimed at shortening the time it takes to investigate federal employees and contractors for security clearances and determine whether they can be trusted with classified information. The 2004 Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act requires that 80 percent of all security clearances be completed in an average of 120 days. … But a report issued by the Government Accountability Office, the congressional watchdog agency, suggests that the administration could miss the Dec. 17 deadline for timely processing of security clearances stipulated in the 2004 law." Clay Johnson, deputy director for management at the Office of Management and Budget, "said in a letter to the GAO that he will convene a working group to study the issue."

Pelosi Urged To Choose Harman Over Hastings For Intelligence Committee Chair. The Washington Post's Ruth Marcus (11/1, A21) writes, "If Democrats win control of the House next week, Nancy Pelosi's first test as speaker will arrive long before the 110th Congress convenes. Her choice to head the House intelligence committee…will speak volumes about whether a Speaker Pelosi will be able to resist a return to paint-by-numbers Democratic Party interest-group politics as usual. … The panel's ranking Democrat is her fellow Californian Jane Harman -- smart and hardworking but also abrasive, ambitious and, in Pelosi's estimation, insufficiently partisan on the committee. So Pelosi, once the intelligence panel's ranking Democrat herself, has made clear that she doesn't intend to name Harman to the chairmanship. The wrong decision, in my view, but one that's magnified by the unfortunate fact that next in line is Florida Rep. Alcee Hastings. In 1989, after being acquitted in a criminal trial, Hastings was stripped of his position as a federal judge -- impeached by the House in which he now serves and convicted by the Senate -- for conspiring to extort a $150,000 bribe in a case before him, repeatedly lying about it under oath and manufacturing evidence at his trial.'

NYTimes Criticizes Administration's Actions On Pell Grants. The New York Times (11/1, 1.21M) writes in an editorial that "Pell Grants are one of the largest sources of federal help for low-income college students, and the most valuable form of aid" but "the level of aid is increasingly out of sync with the level of need." The Times describes "cuts" of "about $100 a year per recipient" as "miserliness" and adds that though "it's been four years since Congress last increased the maximum annual Pell Grant … college costs are up 35 percent from five years ago." It continues, "Bush administration officials have said repeatedly that the solution to the nation's growing income inequality is more education." Yet "if they really believed it -- and cared about a remedy -- would federal college aid be declining?" Instead "as government aid has declined, loans from banks and other private lenders have soared" and "the result is towering debt."

Newspapers Call Hubble Mission A Worthy Risk. An editorial by the New York Times (11/1, 1.21M) called the decision by NASA administrator Michael Griffin to approve a mission to repair the Hubble telescope "a brave call, since repairing the Hubble will put the shuttle at greater risk than a typical mission to the International Space Station. It was also a welcome sign that NASA is willing to go the extra orbital mile to support superb science, even while it squanders large sums on completing the space station to perform research that can't begin to compare with the Hubble's in importance."

DOJ_NMG_0089770

USA Today (11/1, 2.27M) editorializes, "Griffin made the right call. This mission poses more risks than most, but preserving one of NASA's most successful programs warrants it. The shuttle, moreover, has no other major duties besides completing the International Space Station, a program that faces an iffy future."

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Slightly Down Yesterday. NBC Nightly News (10/31, story 6, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported "the Dow fell almost six points [to close at 12,080.73]. NASDAQ was up nearly three points [to close at 2,366.71] on the days trading." USA Today (11/1, Krantz, 2.27M) says "a weaker-than-expected Conference Board report on consumer confidence prompted some investors to lose their gusto for the October stock market rally. … Even so, the Dow is still up 12.7% for the year." The Wall Street Journal (11/1, C1, Browning, 2.03M) notes that "amid continued hopes for low interest rates and moderate economic growth, the Dow Jones Industrial Average ended with a monthly gain of 3.4% -- the best monthly gain since November 2005."

Employment Costs Up. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, A2, Blackstone, Conkey, 2.03M) reports, "Employment costs gained in the third quarter at their fastest pace in more than two years, a development likely to keep Federal Reserve officials on edge about inflationary risks to the economy." The employment-cost index "rose 1% during the quarter after gaining 0.9% in the second quarter, the Labor Department reported. Employment costs were 3.3% higher than a year earlier, up from a 3% increase the previous quarter."

Bush Calls Kerry Comment "Insulting and Shameful" To US Soldiers. A remark by Sen. John Kerry to students at Pasadena City College on Monday triggered furious debate on the campaign trail yesterday. Kerry, whose comments aired on all three network newscasts last night, told his audience: "You know education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq." The President, Tony Snow and a number of GOP officials, including Sen. John McCain, yesterday termed Kerry's remark an insult to US servicemen. Bush, in remarks that were also featured on all three network shows, said while campaigning in Georgia, "The Senator's suggestion that the men and women of our military are somehow uneducated is insulting and it is shameful. And the Senator from Massachusetts owes them an apology."

The story led all three evening newscasts and is being extensively reported on in major newspapers today. Political commentators are suggesting the controversy may help the GOP in the final weeks of the campaign. Fox News' Special Report (10/31, Hume) opened its broadcast last night with a report on Kerry comments, saying, "Republicans who felt that John Kerry gave the gift that kept on giving in 2004 suddenly had reason to hope that he'd done it again."

On NBC Nightly News (10/31, story 2, 2:50, 9.87M), Tim Russert said Democrats "are not very pleased because the last thing they want a week before the election are the evening newscasts leading with this story. They want the story to be the management of the war by George W. Bush, not comments about the caliber of the troops, fairly or unfairly, no matter what John Kerry meant, they think this is unfortunate, they hope it ends." ABC World News (10/31, lead story, 3:25, Gibson, 8.78M) asked, "Will Kerry's comments help rally Republican voters? Will it help Republicans portray Democrats as against the troops" One Democratic Congressman tells me, 'I guess Kerry wasn't content blowing 2004. Now he wants to blow 2006, too.'" ABC also said this is "a fight the White House wants, one it is relishing." In fact, says this morning's New York Times (11/1, Nagourney, Rutenberg, 1.21M), "the White House took the unusual step of releasing advance excerpts of Mr. Bush's attacks."

Also on ABC World News (10/31, story 2, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said that "even in the best case," Kerry "was calling the President dumb. This gives them an opening to do to fit in the strategy of the week, rile up the conservative base voters. They spent almost $200 million in 2004 getting that base to hate John Kerry. They're happy to run that race again." The CBS Evening News (10/31, lead story, 2:30, Axelrod, 7.66M), in a similar report, said Kerry "may have energized Republicans to vote who might otherwise have stayed home. You can bet we'll be hearing a lot more about this tomorrow when President Bush does a radio interview. Whose broadcast? Rush Limbaugh's."

Chuck Todd, Editor in Chief of The Hotline, said on MSNBC's Hardball (10/31, Matthews), "I think it was clear that he was probably trying to go after the President, but he did it from that place that Northeast liberal Democrats do to much – even though it was an attack on President Bush's intellect…it is that stuff that makes the right wing crazy. They hate the elitism, intellectualism attacks on them." And US News & World Report's Michael Barone, on Fox News' Special Report (10/31, Hume) predicted "the effect of this is that it's going to increase the Republican base because they're seeing a figure there that they deeply dislike and they're seeing him make what are on their face inaccurate charges that are slanderous of the military and he's slandered them in the past. … It's a fair question to ask Democratic candidates if they agree with this statement by their party's nominee for president in 2004 -- not a peripheral figure but a central figure."

DOJ_NMG_0089771

Former House majority leader Tom DeLay, on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (10/31), said, "I don't think he intended to insult the troops at a campaign event, but he did. I don't think he intended to call them stupid, but he did. … I think what John Kerry was done has put a face on what we have been talking about all along. The left has a disdain for the military."

Some of the media coverage, however, portrays the debate as an example of the "Republican PR machine…moving into high gear," as ABC World News (10/31, lead story, 3:25, Gibson, 8.78M) put it, describing "what happened" as "an object lesson in how in this day and age, an idle political remark gets seized upon, becomes fodder for the talk shows and obscures discussion of all other issues." ABC (Tapper) added that "the war in Iraq has generally been a subject helping Democrats this election season. But today, that debate took an unpredictable turn, with President Bush accusing John Kerry of insulting US troops." Kerry "said he was addressing the President, not the troops," but "early this morning after those remarks appeared in local newspapers and the video popped up on YouTube, conservative blogs and talk radio had a field day." Rush Limbaugh, radio host: "It tells us what John Kerry, himself and the Democratic Party, think about the troops and think about the US military." Tony Snow, White House Press Secretary, was shown saying, "This is an absolute insult." Tapper: "Shortly before noon, Kerry in a paper statement insisted he had not belittled the intelligence of soldiers serving in Iraq, but rather that of 'the President who got us stuck there.' He lashed out at White House spokesman Tony Snow whom he called a 'stuffed suit mouthpiece' and 'doughy Rush Limbaugh.' But by then the Republicans were already piling on." Sen. John McCain was shown saying, "I believe Senator Kerry owes an apology to many thousands of Americans serving in Iraq, who answered their country's call."

During an appearance on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (10/31), McCain restated his point, "I hope that Senator Kerry will apologize quickly so that we can get this issue behind us. … I hope that there are some Democrats who are contacting Senator Kerry and telling him to do the right thing. … I have misspoken and I have made bad jokes, but I have apologized and Americans are very forgiving, I'm happy to say, and I have been able to move on. … I hope he apologizes, if he does I will accept his apology." Later in the interview McCain noted, "After [Kerry] got out of the Navy in the Vietnam War he repeated some terrible allegations before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee about beheadings and rapes and disembowelments and things like that that were very harmful to the men and women who were then serving in the military."

The AP (11/1, Loven) quotes House Speaker Dennis Hastert saying, "Our soldiers risk their lives in the face of grave dangers on the battlefield, and no one who chooses to courageously and selflessly defend our country can be considered 'uneducated.'" The Boston Globe (11/1, Ryan, 425K) notes GOP Gov. Mitt Romney also called on Kerry to apologize. Said Romney, "Senator Kerry owes an apology to the thousands of men and women serving in Iraq, particularly the many patriotic soldiers from Massachusetts who come from all backgrounds to defend our freedoms."

NBC Nightly News (10/31, lead story, 3:40, O'Donnell, 9.87M) reported, "Kerry's first response blamed assorted right-wing nut-jobs for distorting his intent. Followed by a defense on camera." Kerry was shown saying, "My statement yesterday and the White House knows this full well was a botched joke about the President." NBC added, "Stressing his pride as commander in chief, the President used his former opponent's words as a new political tool in an already divisive party battle over Iraq." Bush was shown saying, "The members of the United States military are plenty smart and they are plenty brave and the Senator from Massachusetts owes them an apology."

The CBS Evening News (10/31, lead story, 2:30, Axelrod, 7.66M), in a similar report, said Kerry "signaled Republicans would not 'swift boat' him again." Kerry was shown saying, "I'm not going to give them one ounce of daylight to spread one of their lies and to play this game ever, ever again. That is a lesson I learned deep and hard." The CBS Evening News (10/31, story 6, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) later interviewed Nicolle Wallace, former communications director for the current Bush Administration. Asked why "the White House would love to have John Kerry on TV every day from now until election day," Wallace said, "First of all, he didn't apologize, which is inexplicable. Second, he embodies everything the Democrats have been trying to erase about what voters think about them and national security. So for him to have popped back up and reminded voters that he is someone who really doesn't stand with the military, in their view, and who can't apologize when he says something that is so obviously a gaff is a reminder the Republicans welcome."

DOJ_NMG_0089772

The Financial Times (11/1, Luce, Daniel) says the GOP "gained a late burst of energy in its flagging midterm election campaign" following Kerry's remarks. Republican "strategists, who have been watching helplessly as opinion polls have turned against them in the last six weeks, on Tuesday drew renewed purpose from a gaffe that many believe could help motivate the party's demoralised supporters to turn out to vote at the polls next Tuesday." But Democrats are predicting the controversy will have no lingering political effects. The Washington Post (11/1, A8, VandeHei, Cillizza, 748K) reports, "The unusual back-and-forth that has little to do with the 2006 midterm elections comes as Democrats are planning to end the campaign by bashing Bush and GOP candidates for supporting the US war policy. A senior Democratic strategist said the party will run Iraq-focused ads in at least 15 of the most competitive House races between now and Election Day." The strategist, "who would not discuss internal strategy on the record, said the Kerry comments are an unnecessary distraction but would soon be forgotten."

USA Today (11/1, Jackson, 2.27M) notes "the dust-up came a day after Rep. Charles Rangel called Vice President Dick Cheney 'a son of a bitch' for saying the New York Democrat doesn't know how the economy works. Stephen Wayne, a government professor at Georgetown University, said the barbs foreshadow 'two years of strident, partisan rhetoric' regardless of who controls Congress after Nov. 7." USA Today adds, "Polls show Democrats are in a position to win control of the House of Representatives and possibly even the Senate." The Los Angeles Times (11/1, Brownstein, Gerstenzang, 918K) says Democrats "remain confident that they are on track to win the 15 seats they need to control the House. But again, Republicans -- while expecting to lose seats -- predict their organizational prowess will help them hang onto a majority in the chamber."

The Wall Street Journal (11/1, A4, Dreazen, 2.03M) says Iraq "is a vexing issue for both parties, and Democrats are struggling with the war. Leading figures within the party have failed to coalesce around a single strategy for reducing the violence there, and Democratic leaders have offered diverging strategies for Iraq that range from beginning a troop withdrawal before the end of the year to splitting the country into three ethnic regions." Democrats also "are struggling to find a way of criticizing the administration's handling of Iraq without appearing to denigrate the U.S. military personnel serving there." But Republicans "are facing the bigger problem, as Iraq dominates the public mood before Election Day. The latest Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll found 37% of registered voters believe the war has been worth its financial and human cost, the lowest level recorded to date in the survey. The poll found that anger over the war in Iraq continues to be the biggest single issue bringing voters to the polls."

Bush's Light Schedule Today Reportedly Making Democrats Uneasy. The Wall Street Journal web-exclusive "Washington Wire" column (10/1, Dreazen) reports President Bush "will hold no public events of any kind on Wednesday, an exceptionally light schedule this close to next Tuesday's midterm elections. That sparked questions about whether Bush has a 'November surprise' in store. This is, after all, a president who has twice managed to sneak away to Iraq. At the White House morning briefing, a reporter observed that the light schedule made it sound 'like something is cooking there.' Spokesman Tony Snow replied, 'No, not really.' That left some Democratic political operatives wondering just what Bush and his political guru, Karl Rove, might be up to." However, "Snow is keeping on his poker face. Bush has 'some meetings with senior advisers and a Rush Limbaugh interview,' Snow said in an email. 'No blockbusters.'"

Kerry Withdraws From Minnesota Event, Is Asked Not To Campaign In Iowa. The Mankato (MN) Free Press (11/1) reports, "The dueling rallies scheduled for Mankato today on behalf of Republican congressman Gil Gutknecht" featuring Sen. John McCain, "and Democratic challenger Tim Walz lost some of their pizzaz Tuesday night when Sen. John Kerry pulled out of the Democratic rally." Kerry withdrew from the rally, "which will still be held, as the result of a controversy over comments he made Monday in California." The Free Press adds, "Walz communication director Meredith Salsbery said Kerry canceled his visit to keep the focus on the issues and away from Kerry's comments and McCain's response."

DOJ_NMG_0089773

Meanwhile, the Quad City Times (10/11) reports "Democratic congressional candidate Bruce Braley has asked…Kerry not to campaign with him Thursday in the Quad-Cities as planned, citing the flap between the White House and the senator over his remarks concerning Iraq." Jeff Giertz, a campaign spokesman, "said Braley cancelled their appearance Tuesday afternoon. 'He's not condoning the partisan bickering,' Giertz said of Braley, a lawyer from Waterloo who is running against Bettendorf businessman Mike Whalen for Iowa's 1st District Congressional seat. "

Moreover, says the Financial Times (11/1, Luce, Daniel), "some Democrats suggested Mr Kerry's remarks would almost certainly damage his presidential hopes."

O'Reilly Defends Kerry. Bill O'Reilly, host of Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/31) said, "I don't believe that John Kerry meant to demean any American military member, I just don't, and I think that fair-minded people know that would be political suicide for the senator and he wouldn't do it. But his choice of words and his delivery of that statement has now…given the Republicans a huge, huge campaign club." O'Reilly added, "This is a huge, huge development in an election that is just one week away, because the Republicans by all of the polls were on the ropes. And now by his statement, and, again, I don't think that John Kerry had any idea what was going to happen, he's basically pulled the GOP off of the defensive, and given them momentum."

More Commentary On Kerry. Editorial pages generally considered conservative this morning criticized Kerry. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, 2.03M) editorializes on Kerry, "whose cultural condescension keeps on giving. … We didn't always do our homework, but it's hard to come to any conclusion other than that Mr. Kerry was saying that only fools and knaves, not patriots, end up fighting in Iraq." The Journal adds, "For reasons clear only to himself, Mr. Kerry has been acting as if he intends to run for the White House again in 2008. Apparently he thinks he can win. We've long thought that Democratic donors would soon enough convince him otherwise, but his behavior this week may speed up the reckoning. Congratulations, Senator Clinton; another competitor bites the dust."

The Washington Times (11/1, 88K) says in its editorial, "We understand that Mr. Kerry's primary aim on Monday was to bomb the White House to get at the commander in chief. The troops were an afterthought. Which, come to think of it, is the point -- just as it was in the 1970s, when Mr. Kerry made a career of smearing American troops as killers on his return from Vietnam."

Democrats Confidently Predicting House Majority. The AP (11/1, Espo) reports Democrats are "beginning to predict confidently if quietly that they will win control of the House in next week's elections, and possibly emerge with a relatively robust majority." Democratic fundraising is "running significantly stronger than two years ago, $104.5 million through Oct. 18. That represents an increase of more than 30 percent, and has allowed Democrats to launch late-campaign television advertising in several districts in recent days in an attempt to maximize their gains on Election Day." Still, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm "have told aides to avoid predictions of victory before the votes are counted." Republicans, too, "say that with a week of campaigning to go, Democrats are ill-advised to celebrate. They note than an extraordinary number of races remain very close, and that their GOP get-out-the-vote operation will help pull enough of their candidates to victory to preserve their majority." Karin Johanson, executive director of the DCCC, "told one group last week that Democrats felt confident they had locked up 10 of the 15 seats they need to prevail, according to participants in the meeting who spoke on condition of anonymity." But "other officials and strategists with long experience in congressional campaigns have turned far more bullish about Democratic chances, and party strategists say no more than two of the party's incumbents who are seeking new terms are in jeopardy of defeat."

House Republicans Scale Back Ads In Three Key Races As Democrats Expand Field. The AP (11/1, Espo) reports, "Signaling retreat, House Republicans are scaling back television advertising in three highly contested races, officials said Tuesday, including Rep. Curt Weldon's scandal-tinged bid for re-election in Pennsylvania and open seats in Colorado and Ohio." Some of the funds "will be spent to help other Republicans in races that remain competitive." In contrast "to the Republican strategic retreat, House Democrats are expanding the number of districts where they are advertising, an indication of growing confidence as Election Day approaches. In recent days, the party's campaign committee has moved into districts in New Hampshire, New York, Kansas and Nebraska that have long been in GOP hands." Meanwhile, in the campaign for the Senate, "Republicans moved during the day to fortify their position. The National Republican Senatorial Committee reported it would spend an additional $1 million in the campaign's final days to help Virginia Sen. George Allen in a re-election race that has become far tougher than originally expected." Senate Republicans also "decided to advertise on behalf of embattled Sen. Conrad Burns in Montana for the first time since August, and beefed up its support for Sen. Lincoln Chafee, trailing in the polls in Rhode Island."

DOJ_NMG_0089774

"Security Moms" Seen As Defecting From GOP. The CBS Evening News (10/31, story 7, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Talk about political power. Two years ago, soccer moms morphed into security moms, the threat of terrorism driving them to the polls, and they helped swing election for President Bush and the Republicans. Well, what about this year?" CBS (Cowan) added, "In 2004 it was women like April Thacker who helped give Republicans the edge. They voted for Bush over Kerry by a 20-point margin. But if Republicans were hoping to get that kind of turnout for women voters this time around, they may be going against the current. According to a new CBS News/New York Times poll, over a third of women voters here say they plan to vote Republican in the state's tough Senate race this year. Half of them say they'll vote Democrat instead." Almost "half the women voters surveyed here don't like the way the President has handled terrorism. As for the war in Iraq, 57% think the troops should start coming home."

Liberal Activists Contributing To Moderate Democrats In Hopes Of Boosting Majority. USA Today (11/1, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports Democratic candidates "who oppose abortion, gun control and gay rights have some unusual allies this year: liberal online activists desperate for their party to win control of Congress." Putting aside "their own preferences, the Internet activists are promoting and raising money for moderates in swing districts across the country. Many of the candidates have military, business or law enforcement backgrounds. Some, such as Virginia Senate candidate Jim Webb and House hopeful Eric Massa of New York, are former Republicans." As of Tuesday, "online activists had contributed some $826,000 to Webb, a former Navy secretary, via ActBlue.com, a clearinghouse that has raised $16 million for scores of Democrats. Massa had $377,000." President Bush's "unpopularity, the Iraq war and congressional scandals are making it easier than usual for Democrats to bury their differences for now. The moderate makeup of contested states and congressional districts also helps."

WSJournal/NBC Poll Shows Democrats With 15-Point Generic Advantage. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, A1, 2.03M) reports, "A week before Election Day, a new poll shows President Bush getting better marks for his handling of the economy -- an issue Republicans are emphasizing in the run-up to Tuesday's vote -- but voters' anxieties about Iraq continue to dominate their concerns. The latest Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll shows Mr. Bush, buoyed by a rising stock market and falling gasoline prices, essentially breaking even on the economy, with 46% of voters approving his stewardship and 48% disapproving. That's a gain from 39% approval and 56% disapproval in June." But "as Mr. Bush's party fights to retain control of both houses of Congress, the violence in Baghdad in recent weeks has further darkened Americans' mood about Iraq -- the issue voters say is most important in their election decision-making. The result: Voters want Democrats, rather than Republicans, to control Congress by 52% to 37%, a 15-point margin. The spread matches the widest ever recorded on this question in a Journal/NBC poll."

Morris Says GOP Turnout Can Stem Democratic Tide. Dick Morris writes in The Hill (11/1), "Can the Republicans win control of Congress? They can if they want to. It is up to the vaunted GOP base. According to the Zogby poll, Republican fortunes, while improving in early October, have fallen since. On Sept. 22, Democrats led in the generic vote poll (Do you plan to vote for the Democratic or the Republican candidate in your district?) by nine points, 42-33. But by Oct. 11, their margin was only three -- 37-34. But by Oct. 24 it was back up to 11 points -- 44-33 -- enough for the Democrats to take control of the House and probably the Senate." But "if you dig deep into the Zogby poll, you find an astonishing fact -- independents are turning to the Republican Party while Republican base voters are leaving it!" Morris adds "voters in swing states are saying: 'I want the Democrats to win, just not the guy running in my district.' It is still too early to tell if the national Democratic trend will assert itself in the end or whether the Republicans can pull out the swing districts. But the key will be whether the GOP base itself genuinely wants a Republican Congress or not."

Bush Seen As A "Liability" To Republicans In Many Parts Of Country. The Washington Post

DOJ_NMG_0089775

(11/1, A1, Balz, 748K) reports, "His name is not on any ballot this fall, but George W. Bush is the central issue of campaign 2006. Tuesday's vote will deliver a referendum on six years of Bush's leadership -- bold and principled or radically divisive, depending on one's political ideology -- and the wartime policies he has championed." Other issues "may come into play, congressional scandals and performance among them, but in the end, next week's verdict will be remembered for what it says about this president. With Bush's approval ratings hovering just below 40 percent, Republicans are braced for big losses." GOP strategists "know well that no political party has successfully weathered a midterm election with such an unpopular president in office. Bush's challenge as he campaigns in the final days of the election is to find a way to excite and mobilize a fractured Republican base without triggering an even bigger turnout among Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents that could cost his party the House or Senate." The "politician who has done more than anyone else over the past decade to build and expand the Republican Party has become a liability to Republicans in many parts of the country." In "strongly Republican areas, he said, the president can still rally the party's base, but in more marginal districts, Bush is a drag on GOP candidates."

GOP Outreach Notwithstanding, Bush Approval Among Black Voters Lags. The AP (11/1, Benac) reports, "So much for the Republican charm offensive toward minorities. Black voters are far less likely to approve of the way President Bush is doing his job than voters generally and they are more likely to feel that the country is on the wrong track, disheartening news for a Republican Party that has been trying to curry favor with minority voters in recent years." In what "could be a particularly bad sign for Republicans in next week's midterm elections, black voters also are more likely to say that the Iraq war was a mistake and that recent disclosures of scandal and corruption in Congress will be very important to their vote, according to an Associated Press-AOL Black Voices poll conducted Oct. 23 through Monday." But while black voters "say Republicans have done a poor job of representing their interests, they also have misgivings about the Democratic Party. Almost half of black voters said the Democratic Party takes their vote for granted; about a third said the party has done a poor job of representing their interests." The AP-AOL Black Voices poll "of 900 black adults, 361 of whom are likely voters, was conducted by Ipsos. The margin of error for the full sample is plus or minus 3.5 percentage points, 5 percentage points for the black likely voters." Blacks are "disproportionately unhappy with Bush, 89 percent of likely voters disapprove, compared with 61 percent of all likely voters." But blacks' "approval ratings for Congress — disapproval ratings, actually — are roughly similar to those for all likely voters. Some 83 percent of likely black voters disapprove of the way Congress is doing its job, compared with 75 percent of all likely voters."

LATimes Accuses Bush Of Resorting To "Fear-Mongering." The Los Angeles Times (11/1, 918K) editorializes, "As the 2006 campaign draws to a merciful close, the only idea national Republicans seem to have left is that, when in doubt, accuse Democrats of being a bunch of terrorist-loving wimps. But as the boy who cried wolf learned the hard way, fear-mongering has its diminishing returns. … President Bush, meanwhile, is also getting into the fear-mongering. 'The Democrat approach,' he said this week on the stump in Georgia, 'comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses. And that's what's at stake in this election.' This is why much of the world considers our president a caricature figure — because on occasion he acts like one."

PAC Contributions Flowing To Ranking House Democrats, Not Challengers. The Hill (11/1, Bolton) reports political action committees "representing business interests have boosted their donations to House Democrats in recent weeks, but a significant chunk of that money has not gone to Democratic candidates." Instead, the money "has languished in the accounts of safe incumbents who have given little, or nothing at all, to Democratic candidates in the months leading up to Election Day." The "behind-the-scenes financial maneuvers have come to light in recent days with the filing of reports at the Federal Election Commission (FEC) disclosing fundraising activities through Oct. 18." The new reports "show that Democrats who are poised to become influential committee chairmen if they win control of the House have reaped hundreds of thousands of dollars in political action committee (PAC) contributions over the past several weeks." The "flow of funds, most of it from business interests, who tend to give most of their contributions though PACs, is significantly higher than two years ago when Democrats were viewed as having a slim chance of capturing the House."

Democratic Lobbyists Enjoy Revival In Washington. The Hill (11/1, Snyder) reports while the "election is still six days away, the strength Democratic candidates have shown has already produced one shift in Washington: Democratic lobbyists, once marginalized, are seeing a resurgence in their popularity." Patrick Murphy, a lobbyist who has been an active supporter of Democrats, said, "We've had more detailed conversations in the last month than we have had all year." Murphy "joined Capitol Management in July and has been aggressively marketing his ties to Democrats ever since." The Hill adds lobbyists "close to House Democrats in particular are stressing their ties. Not many lobbyists bothered with House Democrats, they say, because the caucus faced a disciplined Republican majority and had little ability to affect the course of House votes. Now those ties could produce new business." But as they "work to market themselves by stressing those ties, Democrats on K Street are also careful to strike a cautionary tone."

DOJ_NMG_0089776

Republican Lawmakers Face Pressure To Change Leadership After Midterms. The Hill (11/1, Crabtree) reports, "Win or lose next week, the GOP needs some serious soul-searching, according to several rank-and-file House Republicans who already are arguing in favor of a post-Election Day leadership shake-up." Some GOP lawmakers "believe that change — be it in policy, process, or leadership matters — as soon as possible is the only way House Republicans can climb out of the rut they've been stuck in this cycle." Rep. Jeff Flake said, "If we lose the majority, I think it ought to be a clean sweep — a fresh start." Flake "worries that if the GOP keeps even a fragile hold on its majority, the conference will stick with the same leadership course with only minor changes. This, in turn, will mean continuing to put too much emphasis on trying to keep the majority by handing out earmarks to vulnerable members and special favors to certain groups instead of standing for principles such as fiscal restraint." The Hill adds that even "GOP lawmakers reluctant to discuss anything past Nov. 7 are preparing for a leadership scramble next week."

Democrats Hope To Beat Northup In Kentucky's Third CD. The AP (11/1, Lovan) reports Democrats have "been targeting Republican Rep. Anne Northup for a decade to no avail, but that hasn't stopped them from betting once again that her political luck is about to run out." Northup, "a five-term incumbent, has a lot of advantages, including a prized seat on the House Appropriations Committee. She has raised twice as much money as her Democratic opponent." But her "ties to President Bush, mounting casualties in Iraq and her district's penchant for leaning Democrat has made the race against Louisville businessman John Yarmuth a virtual toss-up." A "recent Bluegrass Poll by The Courier-Journal of Louisville showed Northup was favored 48 percent to 42 percent for Yarmuth, but that falls within the poll's margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points." The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee "began running a television ad critical of Northup on Monday night in the district. The 30-second spot is the first ad the DCCC has run in the district during the campaign, said DCCC spokeswoman Adrienne Elrod."

Parties Have Lavished Resources On Unexpectedly Competitive WA8 Race. USA Today (11/1, Ritter, 2.27M) reports, "By all rights, Republican Rep. Dave Reichert shouldn't be having such a tough time winning a second term. … He represents a district that has never elected a Democrat. His opponent has never held public office, while he's a 30-year public servant." However, "Reichert's race against Democrat Darcy Burner, a former Microsoft manager, is rated a tossup and considered a key race if Democrats are to regain control of the House. A poll Oct 24-26 by Constituent Dynamics, an independent research firm, had Burner leading 49% to 47%. Heavy hitters from both parties — including President Bush, Vice President Cheney and Democratic Sens. John Kerry and Barack Obama — have stumped this fast-growing, affluent suburban region. … The national parties have funneled in gobs of money: $1.5 million from the Republicans and nearly $900,000 from the Democrats has been spent so far. The candidates themselves have raised a combined $5.1 million."

Democrat In NE3 Getting Support From National Party. The New York Times (11/1, Zeleny, 1.21M) reports, "This year, open seats have become dangerous territory for Republicans. Only months ago, Scott Kleeb, left, a 31-year-old cattle rancher who is running in Nebraska's Third Congressional District, where voters have not sent a Democrat to the House since 1958, could barely get an audience with Democratic leaders. This week, after a poll showed Mr. Kleeb with a slight edge, the party sent $100,000 his way."

Wilson Hopeful Duck Prop Heralds Revival. The Hill (11/1, Hearn) reports it is "a sign of the times for Republicans that the political survival of Rep. Heather Wilson

DOJ_NMG_0089777

(R-N.M.), a five-term incumbent and straight-laced U.S. Naval Academy graduate, may now depend on a woman in a duck suit." Wilson "trotted out this campaign prop last week to bring attention to her Democratic rival Patricia Madrid's 'ducking' of debates. The unabashed tactic was a page from a challenger's playbook — an easy ploy to draw media attention to a flagging campaign — and it underscored Wilson's position as the underdog in the polls." New Mexican blogger Joe Monahan said, "You don't need to know the latest insider tracking polls to know that … Heather Wilson is having trouble closing out her race with rival Patricia Madrid. You just have to know about the duck." The Hill adds that by Saturday, "however, the duck was earning its keep in media stardom. A Madrid supporter had allegedly stomped on its webbed foot in a tussle outside a Democratic rally, prompting a call to police." The Wilson campaign "speedily distributed the video to news organizations, drawing attention away from the rally with House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa (D). The duck appeared on crutches with mock bandages a day later." The Hill ads the "avian performance, coupled with ads highlighting Madrid's gaffe in the candidates' one televised debate, are the incumbent's last-ditch maneuvers to stave off an impending Democratic wave." The "last six independent polls in the race have shown Wilson tied with and then trailing Madrid, the state attorney general, marking the first time the perennially vulnerable incumbent has been behind her challenger."

GOP Candidates Not Touting Medicare Prescription Drug Program. The Hill (11/1, Young) reports Republican lawmakers "looking to change the subject from unfavorable issues such as the war in Iraq have by and large avoided claiming credit for what the White House views as one of the GOP majority's signature domestic-policy accomplishments: the Medicare prescription-drug benefit." President Bush "and congressional leaders such as House Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) have urged GOP incumbents to shift the electoral debate toward matters that they say demonstrate the effectiveness of Republican-controlled government." But few GOP candidates "have actively highlighted their support for Part D, which has been under constant Democratic fire. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) has vowed to begin the process of altering the program within the first 100 hours of the next Congress if her party takes control of the House." Democrats have "maintained their drumbeat of criticism of Part D — frequently referring to it as a 'disaster' — even as the program appears to have stabilized from significant logistical problems during its rollout in January." The program "has proved popular with those beneficiaries who have joined the Part D program, according to numerous opinion polls. J.D. Power and Associates released survey findings in September showing 75 percent of Part D enrollees were satisfied with their benefits."

Democrats Find Fertile Ground In Mountain West. The New York Times (11/1, Hulse, 1.21M) reports that in Colorado's 7th CD, Democrat Ed Perlmutter "is probably unlikely to relax in the final days of his closely watched race with Rick O'Donnell, his Republican opponent, as the two kick their sophisticated get-out-the-vote machines into high gear. But Mr. Perlmutter and fellow Democrats in Colorado and neighboring states believe that unaffiliated voters" are "the key to what could be a turnaround in the party's political fortunes in the region." Despite a "Republican edge in registration, Democrats are discovering the Mountain West — and Colorado in particular — to be a new political frontier as the party benefits from a potent mix of changing demographics, anger over the war in Iraq, resentment toward conservative social initiatives and millions of dollars' worth of advocacy advertising." Republicans "acknowledge that the political terrain is shifting along the Continental Divide but argue that any realignment will be temporary and due to the Iraq war more than any other factor." If the "trend holds, Democrats could be in for a big day next Tuesday. The Democratic candidate for governor, Bill Ritter, is leading in his race against Bob Beauprez, a Republican congressman. If Democrats can retain control of the State House and Senate, which they gained in the 2004 elections, they would have total control of the state government for the first time since the early 1960s."

Democrats Expected To Make Gains In Former GOP Strongholds. In his Washington Post column (11/1), Harold Meyerson says, "Most of the House seats that the Democrats are expected to take from Republicans are in the Northeast and industrial Midwest, heartland of the old Republican Party of Lincoln, McKinley and Eisenhower. Many of the Republicans holding these seats are a distinct minority in a party now dominated by Southerners who are more supportive of executive branch authoritarianism and yet also more government-phobic. And the Republican moderates, judging by their own comments, are boiling mad that the Democrats are going after them." But "we all remember how moderate Republicans stopped the conservatives who control their party from going after moderate Democrats in previous elections, right?" It was "precisely the Republicans' success at defeating the centrist and center-right Democrats in the South over the past two decades that has driven the GOP steadily rightward. And for all their protestations of moderation, the northern Republicans -- from Susan Collins to Lincoln Chafee to Rep. Chris Shays -- abetted that transformation."

DOJ_NMG_0089778

GOP Will Not Commit To Power-Sharing Agreement In The Event Of A 50-50 Senate. The New York Times (11/1, Zernike, 1.21M) reports, "With polls nail-bitingly close, one possible result is that the Senate will divide 50-50 between the two parties. For a hint of how that may work, consider the only time that has happened, for six months in 2001…when the two parties worked out a collegial power-sharing agreement. Republicans maintained control of the Senate because Vice President Dick Cheney had the power to break tie votes. … Could it happen again? Democrats admit they have considered the possibility, 'What was done in 2001 should serve as a useful framework,' said Jim Manley, a spokesman for the Democratic leader, Senator Harry Reid. Not so fast, the Republicans say. They do not want to be seen even considering the idea of losing control, so much so that a senior Republican aide would speak only anonymously. 'If the Senate were ever to return to that ratio,' the aide said, 'the previous agreement is not precedent.'

Senate Republicans Reportedly Pleased With New Polling Data. The Washington Times (11/1, Hallow, 88K) reports, "Race-by-race surveys of Senate contests by pollster Scott Rasmussen show that Republican-leaning voters may be 'coming home' in closely watched states like Tennessee and Missouri, while the GOP is poised for a potential upset in Maryland. … Republicans have also hoped to pick up a Democratic seat in New Jersey. However, six different major polls since Oct. 10 show Republican Tom Kean Jr. trailing Sen. Robert Menendez by as many as 6 percentage points in a state where institutional advantages favor the Democratic incumbent." The Times adds, "Perhaps the most encouraging recent development for Senate Republicans has been the comeback by Missouri Sen. Jim Talent, who some polls had shown trailing by as much as 9 percentage points to Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill just three weeks ago. The most recent polls indicate the Missouri contest is a dead heat. … However, Republicans have become concerned as recent polls show Sen. George Allen losing ground in Virginia. A Rasmussen poll released yesterday showed Mr. Allen with 46 percent to 51 percent for Democrat James H. Webb Jr."

Poll Shows Corker Leading Ford 52%-44%. USA Today (11/1, 2.27M) reports, "Tennessee Republican Senate nominee Bob Corker led Democrat Harold Ford by 8 percentage points in a race that could determine who controls the Senate, according to a poll released Tuesday. The survey of 541 likely voters conducted by Opinion Research for CNN showed former Chattanooga mayor Corker favored by 52%, compared with 44% for U.S. Rep. Ford. The error margin is +/-4 percentage points." Previous polls "had them neck-and-neck for Sen. Bill Frist's seat."

Santorum Down 15 Points In New Poll. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (11/1, Brown, Burnstead) reports, "Democrat Bob Casey has opened up a 15-point lead over Republican U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum -- more than double the lead the challenger held in September -- according to a Pittsburgh Tribune-Review/WTAE-TV Keystone poll released today." Casey "leads Santorum 53 percent to 38 percent, with 9 percent undecided, according to the telephone poll of 626 registered voters conducted over five days ending Sunday. The poll has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.9 percentage points."

Santorum Calls Casey's Grasp Of National Defense Issues "Laughable." Santorum, during an appearance on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/31), said, "I've been giving speeches all over the state talking about the gathering storm of the 21st century and I believe that the threats that I've talked about from North Korea and Iran and the fascists there and Venezuela and others are the serious threats of our time. … I've even been critical of the administration for not being forthright and tough about these issues." Santorum said his opponent Bob Casey is "absolutely clueless as to what's facing this country. … It's almost laughable to look at the reaction that he has on these very complex and serious issues." Santorum added that if candidates like Casey are elected "we'll be in a world of hurt in a very short period of time"

DOJ_NMG_0089779

Liberal Blogger Heckles Allen, Accuses Him Of Spitting On His Ex-Wife. The AP (11/1, Lewis) reports a "heckler who confronted Sen. George Allen at a campaign appearance Tuesday was put in a chokehold and slammed to the floor by three of the Republican's supporters in an incident captured on video." Mike Stark, "a liberal blogger and first-year University of Virginia law student, approached Allen at an event in Charlottesville, loudly asking, 'Why did you spit at your first wife, George?' according to witnesses." Three men, "all wearing blue Allen lapel stickers, immediately grabbed Stark, dragged him backward and slung him to the carpet outside a hotel meeting room, according to video captured by WVIR-TV in Charlottesville."

Fox News' Special Report (10/31, Hume) reported, "In Virginia, an Opinion Research poll puts Democrat Jim Webb now in the lead by four points over republican incumbent Senator George Allen, that's in the margin of error, but barely. And speaking of that Virginia race, in Charlottesville, a heckler loudly accused Senator Allen of spitting at his former wife, three supporters not with the Allen campaign dragged out the man, a liberal blogger named Mike Stark and then wrestled him to the floor." Fox News' footage of the incident can be accessed by clicking on the link at the top of this story.

The Washington Post (11/1, Shear, Craig, 748K) reports the "widely disseminated video of the incident" shows the "Democratic activist who verbally confronted U.S. Sen. George Allen at a campaign rally in Charlottesville…shoved, put into a headlock and thrown against a window by three men wearing Allen stickers." Stark "yelled a question at Allen (R) about whether he had ever spit on his first wife, an unsubstantiated charge that has been circulating on liberal blogs on the Internet. Allen supporters hauled him away from the senator as television cameras rolled." In an email, Stark said, "I demand that Senator Allen fire the staffers who beat up a constituent attempting to use his constitutional right to petition his government." The Post adds Charlottesville Police Lt. Gary Pleasants "said Stark reported the incident yesterday and indicated that he wanted to press assault charges against the men. Pleasants said police are investigating and trying to determine the names of the Allen staffers involved." Allen aides "accused Democrats and the Webb campaign of orchestrating the event as a way of getting news organizations to write about the Internet rumor."

The Charlottesville Daily Progress (11/1, Gibson) reports Allen "ignored the question and shrugged off the incident." Allen said, "That guy's typical of the Webb campaign, and that's just their negativity." The Daily Progress added Stark, "a liberal blogger who confronted Allen two months ago at a Staunton hotel with questions about racial insensitivity, said he is not associated with any campaign." One of the men "who pushed Stark away from Allen, former Albemarle County GOP Chairman John Darden, said he was simply trying to protect Allen and Dole and stood between the law student and the senators not knowing what Stark's intentions might be." Allen's former wife, Anne Waddell, "later issued a statement calling Stark's question 'a baseless, cheap shot.' She said that she and Allen divorced more than 22 years ago and sealed the divorce records because it was a personal matter."

Marriage Amendment May Backfire On Allen, Bring Black Webb Supporters To Polls. The Washington Times (11/1, Bellantoni, 88K) reports the Virginia state constitutional marriage amendment "designed to motivate conservative voters and help Virginia Sen. George Allen's re-election campaign appears to be backfiring, at least among black voters." Allen "probably will benefit from evangelical Christians voting for the amendment. But, the amendment also will drive turnout among the state's black voters, many of whom are questioning whether Mr. Allen is racially insensitive and deserves a second term." Virginia's black voters "support the amendment, which defines marriage as the union of one man and one woman, by more than 60 percent, according to most polls. They also overwhelmingly favor Mr. Allen's Democratic challenger James H. Webb Jr."

Black Vote Seen As Key For Webb. The Washington Post (11/1, B1, Jenkins, 748K) reports whether Webb, "a former Republican and Navy secretary in the Reagan administration, will be able to energize loyal Democratic voters…will be critical in determining who wins one of the tightest Senate races in the country." African Americans, "who make up about 20 percent of Virginia's electorate, vote reliably for Democrats and are key to their success in the Republican-dominated state. But Webb has struggled to gain their support because of questions about whether he used a racial epithet to describe blacks when he was younger and because of his stance on affirmative action, which he once called 'state-sponsored racism.'" Allen has "had his own problems with black voters, dating to his days as a state delegate." But he has "tried to mend fences with the state's black community, highlighting his support of black colleges and appearing at several important political events." A Washington Post poll "conducted last month showed that blacks were overwhelmingly supporting Webb: 81 percent of African Americans said they would vote for the Democrat, compared with 11 percent who said they'd vote for Allen. But the determining factor, political experts said, will be how many of those voters go to the polls on Election Day, given concerns about both candidates."

DOJ_NMG_0089780

Virginia Senate Race Said To Remain Allen's To Lose. The Christian Science Monitor (11/1, Dillin, 58K) reports that although he was expected to easily win reelection in Virginia, Republican Sen. George Allen is "fighting for his survival. Political polls have seesawed. The latest Bloomberg/Los Angeles Times survey found Webb slightly ahead, 47 percent to 44 percent." But it "remains Allen's race to lose, however. Larry Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia, explains that in federal elections in Virginia, 'Republicans almost always win the close races.'" The Monitor adds Republicans "hope so. Otherwise, this election could become part of a major shift in Washington. A Democratic victory here, combined with other states where Republicans are in deep trouble, could tip the balance in the Senate to the Democrats, and give President Bush a rough finish to his second term."

Allen's Campaign Travels Documented. The Washington Post (11/1, C1, Leahy, 748K) reports, "If tense campaigns demand that imperiled candidates, like card players, learn the art of the bluff, Allen has mastered the technique." While Presidents "have travel perks: Air Force One, helicopters, bulletproof limos that ride along cleared-out interstates," Allen "like any other senator in a reelection campaign, cruises like a road-weary salesman. There is nothing more instructive about the unglamorous nature of the midterm election process than to ride for a day in chase of the candidate's vehicle, which on this day would be racing south through Virginia, trying to put some space between the candidate and an increasingly formidable foe."

WPost Criticizes Allen For Trying To Make Issue Of Sex Scenes In Webb Books. In an editorial, the Washington Post (11/1, 748K) criticizes the Allen campaign for raising the fictional sex scenes in Webb's books, saying, "Now there's a pressing concern for Americans in 2006. Mr. Allen, a Republican whose campaign professes profound moral shock that actual sex should occur in fiction, has spent months trying to extract himself from his own 'macaca'-inspired tailspin. When all else failed -- including an Allen ad in which a woman accused Mr. Webb of misquoting her, although he never quoted her at all -- Mr. Allen apparently decided that what he needed was a sex scandal crafted to smear his rival and timed for the campaign's fourth quarter. Lacking such material in real life, he turned to Mr. Webb's novels, most of which concern the wartime experiences of soldiers and international intrigue."

Allen's Midterm Woes Likely To Boost Romney In 2008. In his Washington Post column (11/1), George Will says, "One Republican, who is not running for anything this year, will emerge from this bruising season with enlarged prospects. Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's hopes for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination have been enhanced by Virginia Sen. George Allen's difficulties." Romney's "most formidable rival for the Republican nomination is John McCain, who needs a crowded field of Republican aspirants to prevent the conservative majority of the party's nominating electorate from quickly coalescing around a single candidate. Allen once seemed likely to compete with Romney for conservatives' support." But Allen, "who makes no secret of finding life as a senator tedious, is fighting ferociously for another term, a fate from which his Democratic opponent, Jim Webb, is close to rescuing him." Allen's "ragged campaign has made him seem accident-prone, and by Tuesday he probably will have burned through all the money he could raise. But to be competitive in the nomination contests that begin with the Iowa caucuses in January 2008, a candidate probably needs to have at least $60 million by December 2007. Allen would have to raise that amount in 60 weeks. A million dollars a week is a daunting challenge."

Cardin, Steele Focus On Prince George's County In Maryland Senate Race. The Washington Times (11/1, Miller, Ward, 88K) reports the "battle for Prince George's County voters is intensifying in the final days of Maryland's U.S. Senate race." Democrat Benjamin L. Cardin "will team up a second time with Sen. Barack Obama, the Senate's only black member, to woo voters in the mostly black and heavily Democratic county." Cardin is also "lining up last-minute endorsements in the county, including from Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson, a black Democrat who could announce his support for Mr. Cardin as early as today, county officials said." Prominent black Democrats "in the county broke party ranks this week to support Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the Republican nominee and the first black elected statewide in Maryland. The Democratic crossovers have accused party officials of repeatedly snubbing the black community and their county. " Steele, "who lives in Prince George's, will be campaigning alongside his crossover supporters, which include all five black members of the County Council and former county Executive Wayne K. Curry." The election "could hinge on how Prince George's 320,000 registered Democrats vote Tuesday."

DOJ_NMG_0089781

Steele Seen As Gaining Momentum. The Los Angeles Times (11/1, Reynolds, 918K) reports that although the "political momentum appears to be with Democrats around the country, the trend is going the other way in one solidly blue state, where a Republican candidate is gaining on the favored Democrat in a contest with an unexpected racial twist." Once "trailing by more than 10 points, Steele narrowed the margin to where the race is now considered by some to be nearly a tossup. His recent gains reflect growing dissatisfaction among some blacks toward the state Democratic Party." On Monday, "a group of prominent African American Democrats from Prince George's County in the Washington suburbs crossed party lines to endorse the Republican." Racial tensions "in Maryland's Democratic Party have been brewing since earlier this year, when Cardin beat back a primary challenge from former congressman and NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume by a margin of 44% to 41%." Democratic leaders "say that Cardin won because he raised more money than Mfume. But Ronald Walters, a professor at the University of Maryland who studies African American politics, said the party leadership rallied early around Cardin, which hampered Mfume's ability to raise cash." Jennifer Duffy of the Cook Political Report "says that Steele's strong performance has been a surprise." Duffy said, "Steele is a lot better than expected. It's not that Cardin is a bad candidate; he's just a little dull."

National Parties Inundate Virginia, Maryland With Senate Ads. The Washington Post (11/1, A1, Shear, Mosk, 748K) reports TV viewers "in Virginia and Maryland are being inundated by a last-minute deluge of commercials from the U.S. Senate candidates and their national political party benefactors, who are pouring millions of dollars into the two states as the bitter fall campaign draws to a close." The "flood of money into the two states means that hardly anyone who watches TV in the next six days will be able to avoid seeing the candidates or their surrogates make a final plea for votes before Tuesday's election. In the Washington area media market, for example, even a casual TV viewer will see 42 campaign commercials for Republican George Allen or Democrat James Webb between now and Election Day, advertising specialists said." Political analyst Charlie Cook said, "Each side is dishing it out." Cook added that the "money pouring into Maryland and Virginia, especially from Democrats, is staggering. 'It's almost as though Chuck Schumer has a printing press in his basement.'" The Post adds that in Virginia, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee "has bought $2.6 million worth of TV and radio spots that began airing yesterday, bringing its contributions on behalf of Webb to about $6 million. The GOP counterpart has spent $1 million on ads for Allen." In Maryland, the National Republican Senatorial Committee "contributed $400,000 yesterday to air 93 TV spots on behalf of Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele (R) on stations in Baltimore and the Eastern Shore. Democrats have pumped $1.7 million into Maryland for U.S. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D-Md.)." The "money from Washington, combined with the substantial cash raised by the Senate candidates, reflects how critical Virginia and Maryland are to the national political parties. A Steele victory in Maryland could doom hopes for Democratic control of the Senate. A victory by Webb in Virginia could be a disaster for the GOP."

Talent, McCaskill Work To Rally Base Supporters. The Hill (11/1, Kaplan) reports Sen. Jim Talent "has a studious, bookish reputation but his fight against state auditor Claire McCaskill (D) has been as down-and-dirty as others across the country." McCaskill's ads, "particularly her most recent and controversial one, have thrown Talent off-stride. Last Saturday during the first game of the World Series, the Democrat aired an advertisement on embryonic stem cell research with actor Michael J. Fox. With his symptoms of Parkinson's disease front and center, Fox endorsed McCaskill and criticized Talent, accusing him of opposing stem cell research." While sources "from both campaigns said the race would remain close in this traditional swing state, they acknowledged the negative attacks had driven up the candidates' disapproval and unfavorability ratings. A St. Louis Post-Dispatch poll showed the race tied with each candidate pulling in 47 percent of the vote." With "six days to go, both campaigns are ginning up support among their base voters. McCaskill began a campaign swing yesterday that will take her from St. Louis to Springfield to Kansas City. She plans to campaign for 24 hours straight starting Friday." On Monday, "Talent, Bond and Rep. Jo Ann Emerson (R-Mo.) made stops in five cities in southeastern Missouri. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) campaigned yesterday for Talent and President Bush will visit Springfield on Friday."

DOJ_NMG_0089782

Snow Campaigns For Talent. Fox News' Special Report (10/31, Hume) reported Sen. Jim Talent "is getting help from the big guns, White House spokesman Tony Snow." Snow was shown saying, "Jim, you said you think you will win, but the difference between and you the president is that he knows you'll win."

Chafee Takes Shot At Reid's Ethics During Debate. The Hill (11/1, Schor) reports Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), "whose collegial personality has bolstered his appeal in an otherwise blue state, took an indirect shot at Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) during a debate Monday night with his Democratic opponent, state Attorney General Sheldon Whitehouse." When Whitehouse "blasted Chafee for failing to push for Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's resignation in the wake of escalating chaos in Iraq, the incumbent — trailing his foe by as many as eight points in recent polls — asked Whitehouse why he has failed to question Reid's amended reports to the Senate ethics committee clarifying the details of a $1.1 million land deal." Whitehouse spokeswoman Alex Swartsel "did not address the Chafee camp's question directly, instead continuing to hammer the centrist Republican as a reliable vote for GOP leadership."

Swift Boat Contributor Behind Ad Tying Menendez To The Mafia. The New York Times (11/1, Mansnerus, 1.21M) reports a "much-criticized television advertisement that uses a mob character to impugn Senator Robert Menendez was financed by a Republican donor who has given more than $6 million this year to start ad campaigns attacking Democrats." Bob J. Perry, "a Houston home builder, gave $4.45 million in 2004 to the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, an independent organization that attacked Senator John Kerry's Vietnam War record, damaging his presidential campaign and leading to protests about the tactics used by such outside groups." The "anti-Menendez ad was produced by one such group, the Free Enterprise Fund Committee, which said it received about $1 million from Mr. Perry. His role in the ad was reported on Tuesday in The Star-Ledger." In the "anti-Menendez ad, titled 'Politicos,' a stocky character with a leather jacket and a 'Sopranos' accent rasps into a cellphone: 'We got a problem. Our boy down in Washington, Bob Menendez, he's caught in a federal investigation. The feds start looking at these fixed contracts, and bada-bing, we're in it deep. … We need to get the bosses to fix this thing, like they did for Torricelli,' he says at the end of the ad."

Senate Democrats Give More To Party Committee Than GOP Counterparts. The Hill (11/1, Schor) reports more than "half of the members of the Senate Democratic caucus have tapped into campaign coffers for six-figure donations to their party committee, while only 15 Senate Republicans have given similar sums with only one week remaining and control of the chamber up for grabs." Democrats "digging deep to transfer unused campaign dollars stand to reap huge gains if they can net the six seats needed to take over the Senate. But even Democratic senators up for reelection and out of chairmanship contention made unrestricted transfers to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) in October, leaving Republicans at a $6 million disadvantage in the hunt for member money." Senate Republicans "maintain that their majority will survive despite members' reluctance to give directly to the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) and some strategists' anxiety over spending shortfalls in key races. The NRSC made a million-dollar negative-ad buy yesterday in Virginia, where the DSCC reportedly is planning to double that number in a bid to vault Democrat Jim Webb over Sen. George Allen (R-Va.)." Only "one Democratic senator who is in line to chair a committee if the Senate changes hands, Appropriations ranking member Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.), has not given directly from his campaign to the DSCC." Despite the NRSC's "nearly $1 million deficit in cash on hand entering the final stretch of one of the most hard-fought midterms in years, some GOP senators have boosted their giving since the 2004 season."

Obama Drawing Huge Crowds As He Campaigns For Fellow Democrats. The New York Times (11/1, Kornblut, 1.21M) reports Sen. Barack Obama "has become the prize catch of the midterm campaign. More sought after than virtually every other Democrat, Mr. Obama was fully booked, long ago, on a schedule to take him across a large swath of the country to help his party try to win control of Congress. … Other prominent African-Americans are summoned to the Midwest to campaign in black churches (and that is on Mr. Obama's schedule, too, before the week is out). But Mr. Obama also traveled to Rochester, Minn., in a Congressional district that is more than 93 percent white, to campaign on Monday in front of a nearly all-white crowd." The Times notes, "The war in Iraq, which he opposed from the outset, is among the areas where he sounds most like the liberal wing of his party. In other ways, especially in tone and with regard to politics, he insists that neither party has a monopoly on good ideas and frequently declines to criticize President Bush as unfit.

DOJ_NMG_0089783

Dowd Notes Conservatives' Comments Regarding Obama's Inexperience. The New York Times' Maureen Dowd (11/1) writes, "Many Republicans have been tut-tutting about the author of 'The Audacity of Hope' having the audacity to hope. 'I think people might want a little more experience than that, given the nature of the times we live in,' Dick Cheney told Sean Hannity. Charles Krauthammer wrote that, despite Senator Barack Obama's charms, he could not win in '08: 'The reason is Sept. 11, 2001. The country will simply not elect a novice in wartime.' But if there's one thing W.'s reign proves beyond a shadow of a doubt, it is this: Experience, like affectations, can be dangerous. Those who declaim on the need for Senator Obama to have more experience must forget who's running the country. It often seems that the most inexperienced person alive is George W. Bush — even after six years in office."

Clinton Endorses Plan For Withdrawal Of US Troops From Iraq. Fox News' Special Report (10/31, Hume) reported Sen. Hillary Clinton "firmly endorsed a plan, first introduced by Democrat congressman and war critic Jack Murtha, calling for US troops to start pulling out over the next two months." Clinton "said that the start of a US withdrawal would force Iraqi leaders to step up to the plate for their own security."

The AP (11/1) reports Clinton said Bush had pursued "a foreign policy that had produced 'a landscape of failure and disorder,' and she urged a return to diplomacy and negotiation in tackling the world's challenges." The New York Times (11/1, Santora, 1.21M) says Clinton "outlined a foreign policy that she said tried to blend 'realism' and 'idealism,' as opposed to what she said was the Bush administration's 'simplistic division of the world into good and evil.'"

Clinton Said To Be Rehearsing 2008 Themes During Campaign Stops. The Washington Post's David Ignatius (11/1) writes, "A day spent with" Sen. Hillary Clinton "on the campaign trail…illustrates the broad, bipartisan themes that have helped rebuild the party in Upstate New York. Her comments also signal the legislative strategy that Clinton hopes to pursue next year, when…Clinton herself will be the instant front-runner in the 2008 presidential race. … The issues Clinton stresses through the day are classic 'bridge to the future' themes articulated by Bill Clinton when he was president, but with a Hillary twist. She starts the morning brainstorming with local leaders on how to make Rochester a hub for 'green' alternative-energy technologies, building around a plant that makes fuel cells. Next, she meets with a health-care network and pitches a revival of her failed 1993 campaign to lower health costs and insure the uninsured. T hen it's a tour of a poor urban neighborhood being redeveloped with public-private partnerships of the sort the Clintons have long championed. Her last stop is a steel company where she talks about reviving American manufacturing."

Patrick Set To Become Only The Second Black Governor In US History. USA Today (11/1, Page, 2.27M) reports Massachusetts Democratic gubernatorial nominee Deval Patrick, "who is African-American…insist[s] color isn't a factor in this campaign. … Colorblind electorate or not, Patrick is likely to make history next week. The political neophyte, who led Republican Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey by 25 percentage points in a Boston Globe poll taken Oct. 22-25, is poised to become the first black governor of Massachusetts and only the second black ever elected governor in any state. He is one of a new generation of African-American politicians who are changing old assumptions about what offices black candidates can win."

Study Finds Networks' Stories Have Pronounced Pro-Democratic Slant. The Washington Times (11/1, Harper, 88K) reports, "The Big Three television networks have used unprecedented midterm election coverage to bash the Republican Party with negative stories, and plenty of them, a study says. Only 12 percent of election stories that aired on NBC, ABC or CBS were favorable toward Republican candidates, according to a study released yesterday by the District-based Center for Media and Public Affairs (CMPA). … The study found that 77 percent of the news accounts between Sept. 5 and Oct. 22 offered favorable evaluations of Democratic candidates and lawmakers."

DOJ_NMG_0089784

"Rookie" Anchors Prepare For Election Night Coverage. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, B1, Barnes, 2.03M) reports, "While NBC's Brian Williams, ABC's Charles Gibson and CBS's Katie Couric have all settled into their new roles as evening news anchors, Tuesday's midterm elections mark their inaugural efforts at presiding over prime-time election results. The stakes are high. Live coverage of national elections is a defining event for news organizations."

WSJournal Says AARP Position On Taxes Hurting Democrats. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, 2.03M) editorializes, "Social Security was supposed to be a killer issue for Democrats this election year after they defeated President Bush's reform plans in 2005. But suddenly the tables are turning on several Democratic candidates because of their endorsement of the tax-increase agenda of the American Association of Retired Persons, or AARP. The liberal entitlement lobby has asked candidates around the country to fill out a questionnaire asking, 'Will you support a balanced Social Security plan to continue the program's guaranteed benefits for future generations?' That may sound innocuous, but here's how AARP defines its balanced plan on its Web site near the above question: 'AARP believes that a bipartisan plan that balances additional contributions from high income workers with modest adjustments in future benefits can maintain guaranteed Social Security benefits for future generations.' … In Washington 'additional contributions' means a tax increase." Rep. Melissa Bean "now claims she never supported the tax increase she plainly endorsed in answering AARP's questionnaire. And AARP is helping her disavow her pledge by sending a letter to her district's AARP members."

Schumer, Bloomberg Say NYC Must Improve Corporate Climate. Sen. Charles E. Schumer and Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (11/1, A18, 2.03M) write that although recent "media chatter about the possibility of London taking over New York's position as the world's financial capital" have been "overblown," the city does run the risk of losing "its pre-eminence in the global financial-services sector" if its corporate climate is not improved. In spite of New York's advantages, the US has "been losing ground as the leader in capital formation," registering only one of the top 24 IPOs of 2005 to London's four. In light of these and other "warning signs," the city "has hired a consulting firm, which will issue a report in November identifying the specific variables that are negatively impacting our financial-services industry and recommending an action plan to correct them." Schumer and Bloomberg state that the firm's early work indicates that specific attention must be paid to "overregulation, frivolous litigation and incompatible accounting standards."

North Korea Agrees To Return To Six-Party Talks. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, A6, Ramstad, Baston, King, 2.03M) reports Pyongyang "agreed to return to nuclear-disarmament talks with its four neighbors and the US in a deal brokered by China. As part of the deal, the U.S. agreed to discuss its financial restrictions on the Pyongyang regime." The deal "relieves some of the tension that North Korea created after" its nuclear test, and "comes as countries around the world prepare to enforce sanctions imposed on North Korea by the [UNSC] following the test. President Bush said he was 'pleased' by the breakthrough and thanked the Chinese for their efforts in making it happen. Yet other U.S. officials expressed concern over whether North Korea plans to actually engage in talks and isn't simply trying to dodge U.N. sanctions." The Times adds the agreement "is a significant diplomatic accomplishment for China, North Korea's neighbor and closest ally. Relations between the two have been strained by Pyongyang's drive to demonstrate its nuclear capability." Assistant Secretary Chris Hill "who represented the U.S. in the discussions, said China's role validated the Bush administration's longstanding decision to negotiate with North Korea only when other countries are involved."

Secretary Rice was asked, during an interview with Larry Kudlow, host of CNBC's Kudlow & Company (10/31), to explain what led to yesterday's move. "The international community spoke with one voice with resolution 1718 after the North Koreans tested a nuclear weapon. China has been an effective member, effective important member of this coalition of states that is, dealing with the North Korean issue. And, the Chinese asked if we would be prepared to attend a meeting that the North Koreans had suggested. An informal meeting in Beijing, we did. The North Koreans, agreed to come back to the talks. Now we have to make certain that we really prepare the talks well so we can have a good outcome and, can get some implementation of the agreement that was actually signed in September of 2005."

All three major networks noted the announcement. ABC World News (10/31, story 5, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There has been a breakthrough in the standoff with North Korea. North Korea has returned to return to the six-party disarmament talks. It is quite a reversal. The North has been talking about war and threatening more tests. China played a key role in convincing the North to return to negotiations. But the US says sanctions against North Korea will remain until the North takes concrete steps to abandon its nuclear ambitions." NBC Nightly News (10/31, story 5, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There was surprising news for the Administration today in another foreign policy crisis. Word that North Korea has agreed to restart those so-called six-nation talks on dismantling its atomic weapons program. The talks collapsed a year ago. It's now been three weeks since the north conducted that nuclear test. The US says China made the difference in getting them back to the table."

DOJ_NMG_0089785

On its front page, the Washington Post (11/1, A1, Kessler, 748K) notes Pyongyang's "unexpected" move "will end" its "year-long boycott of the talks, which have dragged on intermittently for more than three years. Fourteen months ago, North Korea agreed in principle to dismantle its nuclear programs, but hard bargaining is still necessary to determine the sequence and timing of the incentives it expects in return." Hill "emerged from the meetings to say that there was the potential for 'substantial progress' in resolving an issue that has raised tensions throughout the region… U.S. officials were privately puzzled by the mercurial government's change of heart, though they said they hope the universal condemnation of North Korea's nuclear test and the swift imposition of U.N. sanctions had played a role."

The New York Times (11/1, Kahn, Cooper, 1.21M) calls the move "a first sign of easing tensions since" the nuclear test, but notes "the chances for rolling back the country's now-proven nuclear capability remained uncertain." The deal is "a procedural victory for Beijing, which scrambled to reopen a diplomatic channel even as it joined the United States and other international powers in supporting" post-test sanctions. "While North Korea's decision to restart the talks is being heralded as a diplomatic breakthrough, American envoys will be returning to the negotiating table to face an adversary that now has a demonstrated nuclear capability — a fact that America will try to minimize even as North Korea tries to exploit it, Bush administration officials and analysts said." Secretary Rice "played down suggestions that America's negotiating task would be made more difficult by the North's nuclear test." Rice "said the United States would work with the other participants of the talks to force the North to take a concrete step toward ending its nuclear program."

The Financial Times (11/1, Dickie, Pilling, Fifield) says analysts believe Pyongyang "probably bowed to growing pressure from China, its largest benefactor and closest political ally." While "the world's big powers work through the details of how to punish Kim Jong-il's regime for" its nuclear test, Hill "said on Tuesday that the negotiations – which had been stalled for a year – could resume as soon as this month. However, with North Korea remaining defiant and the US and Japan still lobbying for tough sanctions, hopes remain dim that Pyongyang will agree to abandon its nuclear capability."

In an analysis piece entitled, "N. Korea, U.S. Both Flexible," the AP (11/1, Herman) notes Washington and Pyongyang "took a step back from the nuclear brink after both sides showed they could be willing to bend under the calm guidance of Beijing." Both "had previously stuck to ironclad positions that seemed totally at odds, leaving little apparent room for a breakthrough. Neither side wanted to cave, despite calls from other nations for flexibility." Beijing "appears to have held the key in getting both sides to compromise and allow all to save 'face.'"

The AP (11/1, Raum) calls the move "a surprise turnabout," and says the "breakthrough came after pressure from China and a U.S. offer to discuss financial penalties already in place." Bush "cautiously welcomed the deal and thanked the Chinese for brokering it. But he said the agreement wouldn't sidetrack U.S. efforts to enforce sanctions… He said there was still 'a lot of work to do' and the U.S. would send teams to the region 'to make sure that the current United Nations Security Council resolution is enforced.'" The deal "represented a step back from the nuclear crisis and was widely applauded, if with some reservations. North Korea has a history of walking away from the six-nation talks, only to rejoin them, then to bolt again." Assistant Secretary McCormack "said he was sure there would be 'an opportunity for us to have direct talks' with North Korean negotiators in the context of the six-party framework."

Similar stories appear in this morning's Los Angeles Times (11/1, Magnier, 918K), USA Today (11/1, Slavin, Macleod, 2.27M) and Washington Times (11/1, Kralev, 88K), among other sources. In its analysis, the Christian Science Monitor (11/1, Marquand, 58K) says the "surprise" deal "has likely headed off the possibility of a second nuclear test" and "has also restored six-nation talks aimed at denuclearizing the Korean peninsula, bringing a modicum of stability to a region rocked" by the first test. "Given the bristling anger in northeast Asia after the nuclear blast, analysts say it is salutary that Mr. Kim is returning to the table to talk with his immediate neighbors." However, experts "doubt that the North, having spent 40 years on its atomic program, is likely to give it up without dramatic achievement." When talks resume, "there seems little doubt Pyongyang expects to think of itself as a bona fide nuclear-status nation as talks resume - and is likely to push others to do so as well. Such a position is leagues from the kind of dismantlement the six-party talks are based on."

DOJ_NMG_0089786

Bush Says US Allies In Asia Should Not Seek Nuclear Weapons. During the second-half of an interview he did with Sean Hannity of Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (10/31) President Bush was asked if he supports helping Japan, Taiwan and South Korea to arm themselves with nuclear weapons in order to confront the threat from North Korea. President Bush responded, "I would not support them for having nuclear weapons, although I notice the Japanese official said 'if we have to, we will.' And then of course the government stepped it back. I think the less nuclear armament in the far-east the better-off the world will be. I do believe we need to work very closely with our allies on missile defense. Our missile defense systems are getting better and better because of the money that we have been spending over the past five years. The key to success there in North Korea is to convince all the parties that it's not in their interest that North Korea have a nuclear weapon, which we have successfully done."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (11/1, 748K) editorializes that the move "is, first and foremost, a victory for China and its strategy of preserving Kim Jong Il's totalitarian regime. Whether it will contribute to the cause of dismantling the North's atomic arsenal remains to be seen."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (11/1, 918K) calls the development "a big diplomatic victory for Washington, and a bigger one for Beijing. Yet there are good reasons to be skeptical about Pyongyang's motives." Kim Jong Il "is a master at the art of weakening the resolve of diplomatic coalitions, and his decision to engage in talks once again may be nothing more than an attempt to stave off aggressive enforcement of U.N. Security Council sanctions."

Rice Urges UN To Speed Up Sanctions On Iran. AFP (11/1) reports Secretary Rice "called her major power counterparts in a bid to spur tough negotiations at the United Nations over a sanctions resolution against Iran," according to Undersecretary Burns. Rice "urged the foreign ministers from the other permanent" UNSC members "to overcome the differences that have prevented agreement on the sanctions package," Burns said. "She put forward the proposal that we should try to work extremely hard to get that resolution passed as quickly as possible," he added. Separately, Assistant Secretary McCormack said Monday that North Korea's "sudden decision Tuesday to give up its nuclear arsenal in the face of UN sanctions had provided a model for confronting Iran," whom he said is "certainly are watching whether or not the world was going to react to what North Korea did."

Moscow May Back UN Sanctions On Iran. The AP (11/1, Isachenkov) reports two senior Russian officials "indicated Tuesday that Moscow could back a draft UN Security Council resolution imposing sanctions on Iran, in an apparent sign of the Islamic Republic's growing isolation over its nuclear program." Yuri Volkov, a deputy speaker of the lower house of parliament, said Russia "will apparently have to join a new resolution on Iran proposed by Britain, Germany and France that envisages limited economic sanctions." And Igor Ivanov, the head of Russia's presidential Security Council, "made comments later that also suggested Moscow could support the draft European resolution." Meanwhile, Undersecretary Hughes told the AP while traveling in Dubai, "We're working with our international partners to send a message to Iran that the international community is opposed to Iran obtaining nuclear weapons." Although "sanctions against Iran are being discussed," Hughes noted that "there is a path for negotiations and we hope they choose that path." Separately, China "issued muted criticism" of Iran Tuesday, the AP notes. Asked about the Iranian president's declaration that Tehran would oppose any sanctions, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said "the relevant parties should not take any measures that may lead to the escalation of the situation."

Lebanese Leader Says Syria Still Arming Hezbollah. The Washington Times (11/1, Sands, 88K) reports, "Syria has continued to funnel arms to the Shi'ite Hezbollah militia in defiance of international demands, thus undermining hopes for peace and stability in Lebanon, a Lebanese political leader said yesterday. Walid Jumblatt, longtime leader of the minority Druze community, is the most senior Lebanese politician to visit Washington since Israel's inconclusive monthlong war with Hezbollah in southern Lebanon." The Times adds, "The complaint from Mr. Jumblatt, a key figure in the anti-Syrian coalition that dominates Lebanon's parliament, came a day after John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said at a Security Council meeting that Syria and Iran -- Hezbollah's two main sponsors -- were 'actively trying to destabilize the democratically elected government of Lebanon' by re-arming Hezbollah."

DOJ_NMG_0089787

Israeli Jets Stage Mock Raids On Hezbollah Strongholds. The AP (11/1, Johnson) reports, "Israel's fighter jets roared over Hezbollah strongholds Tuesday, staging mock raids in its strongest show of force since its war with the guerrilla group ended more than two months ago. The flyovers, which startled many Lebanese with fresh memories of the war, highlight the unsettled tensions between Israel and its northern neighbor, whose political situation has grown increasingly more uncertain." The Israeli fighter jets "swooped low over south Beirut at least six times in the morning before soaring back into the sky, Lebanese security officials said."

In Departure From US Policy, Blair Reaches Out To Syria. The Financial Times (11/1, Khalaf, Blitz) reports, "Tony Blair, Britain's prime minister, has launched a secret diplomatic move to prise Syria away from its support for radical Middle East groups and policies. In an initiative that departs from the US policy of isolating Syria, Mr Blair this week sent Sir Nigel Sheinwald, his most senior foreign policy adviser, to Damascus where he met Bashar al-Assad, the president, and other senior figures in the regime." The Times adds, "Downing Street and the Syrian government confirmed on Tuesday night that Sir Nigel, one of Mr Blair's closest aides, met Mr Assad on Monday."

Israeli Defense Minister Says Saudi Plan Could Be Basis For Talks With Palestinians. The AP (11/1, Heller) reports, "Israel's defense minister said Tuesday that a dormant Saudi initiative for Mideast peace could be a 'basis for negotiation,' indicating a new possibility for talks with the Palestinians after years of stalemate." The Saudi plan "calls for a comprehensive peace between Israel and the Arab world, based on a complete Israeli withdrawal from lands it captured in the 1967 Mideast war -- the West Bank, Gaza Strip, east Jerusalem and Golan Heights." Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz "said he was not endorsing the plan. But he was the most senior Israeli official even to publicly consider it."

Palestinian Adviser Says Hamas Will Honor Truce. In a New York Times (11/1, 1.21M) op-ed, Ahmed Yousef, a senior adviser to Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, says Hamas has proposed "a long-term truce" so "the Israeli and Palestinian peoples can try to negotiate a lasting peace." Yousef argues that "when Hamas gives its word to an international agreement, it does so in the name of God and will therefore keep its word." Hamas, he notes, "has honored its previous cease-fires, as Israelis grudgingly note," and its truce offer is "no ruse, as some assert, to strengthen our military machine, to buy time to organize better or to consolidate our hold on the Palestinian Authority." Instead, he says "Palestinians are prepared to enter into a [truce] to bring about an immediate end to the occupation and to initiate a period of peaceful coexistence during which both sides would refrain from any form of military aggression or provocation."

Bush Launches Review Of Darfur Policy. AFP (11/1) reports President Bush Tuesday announced a review of US policy on the Darfur crisis. Meeting with his personal envoy for Darfur, Andrew Natsios at the White House, Bush "said the diplomat had delivered a 'grim report' about the humanitarian situation" in Darfur. "The United States is going to work with the international community to come up with a single plan on how to address this issue and save lives," Bush said. AFP notes that Bush "provided few details, other than to insist that the plan would include deployment of a 'credible and effective international force to go into Darfur to save lives.'" Separately, Assistant Secretary McCormack said the Bush administration was mulling "what new or different policy proposals we might make" to end the deadlock. Although he "declined to provide details," McCormack stressed that "what all that does is underscore the fact that we want to try to get something done on this issue."

Westerners' Arrests In Yemen Renew Terrorism Concerns. The Washington Times (11/1, Waterman, 88K) reports the arrests in Yemen of six Westerners said to be members of al Qaeda has "highlighted concerns that the region remains a 'transmission belt' for Islamic converts looking for a way to join jihadi terrorist groups." However, analysts "caution that the facts of the case remain murky and warned that Yemenis had many reasons to try to burnish their counterterrorism credentials by exaggerating the importance of the arrests." Over the weekend, authorities in Yemen announced they arrested "three Australians, a Dane, a German, a Briton and two other foreigners Oct. 16 and charged them with trying to smuggle weapons to Islamic militias in neighboring Somalia." An unidentified US intelligence official speaking about the arrests was quoted as saying, "This was a pretty good wrap-up of a group of bad guys."

DOJ_NMG_0089788

Sadat's Nephew Sentenced To Prison For Defaming Egyptian Military. The New York Times (11/1, A8, Charbel, Slackman, 1.21M) reports Talaat el-Sadat, the nephew of President Anwar el-Sadat and an opposition member of Parliament, was sentenced by a military court Tuesday to one year in prison "on charges that he defamed the military by essentially blaming it for having a hand in his uncle's death." The Post notes that move comes "as Egyptian authorities have shown less and less tolerance for critical opposition." It also notes that "with increasing frequency," members of the banned Muslim Brotherhood organization "have been arrested and held without charge under a law intended to fight terrorism."

Studies Find Security Council Seats Tied To US Aid. The Washington Post (11/1, A19, Lynch, 748K) reports that although "Republican and Democratic administrations have insisted for decades they do not engage in the grubby vote-buying practices that are common in elections for key UN posts," recent academic studies have found that "poor countries that serve on the influential Security Council typically receive substantially more US aid dollars and find it easier to obtain loans or grants from financial institutions that are strongly influenced by the United States and other economic powerhouses." While officials from the US and "several international agencies questioned the findings," the Post says they "underscore the importance the United States places on cultivating even the weakest members of the Security Council" and "suggest a possible price tag." For example, a study by two Harvard University scholars that tracked US economic and military assistance from 1946 to 2001 found that a "two-year seat on the Security Council…can generate a 59 percent spike in US assistance." While "in times of crisis, US aid to some member countries has increased by as much as 170 percent," the Post notes.

China Adopts Rules Aimed At Reducing Executions. The New York Times (11/1, A3, Lague, 1.21M) reports that in response to "domestic and international criticism of its extensive use of capital punishment," China Tuesday adopted new rules "requiring review of all death sentences by the Supreme People's Court." The Times notes that the move, which "restores a power that was stripped from the Supreme Court in 1983 and given to provincial courts as part of a major crackdown on crime," comes as authorities "are facing mounting criticism from human rights groups and Chinese legal scholars for what they say is the widespread and arbitrary use of the death penalty."

Former South African Leader Botha, Dies. The death of former South African leader, P.W. Botha, Tuesday was heavily noted in lengthy obituaries in today's dailies. For example, the New York Times (11/1, B9, Gregory, 1.21M) runs a 2,100-word recount of Botha's personal history, noting that he "struggled vainly to preserve apartheid rule in a tide of domestic racial violence and global condemnation."

Similarly, in a 1,100-word obit, the Washington Post (11/1, B7, Bernstein, 748K) calls Botha an "unapologetic leader…who led his country into deepening political crisis and racial violence." The Financial Times (11/1, Mallet) notes in its piece that the former president "never understood the forces that he had unleashed" nor did he ever apologize "for the torture, the killings and the poverty inflicted on South Africans and on the inhabitants of neighboring states by his regime."

The AP (11/1, Nullis) notes that "there has been no decision on funeral arrangements."

Migrants' Remittances Seen As Imperfect Cure For Poor Nations. In a 2,350-word front page article, the Wall Street Journal (11/1, A1, Davis, 2.03M) examines the economic impact of money sent from Salvadoran immigrants in the US to relatives at home. The Journal says "many development economists believe" the funds "could transform some of the world's most impoverished regions, by putting cash directly in the pockets of the poor." At the same time it warns that "reliance on remittances may turn out to be the latest development fad that fails to live up to its hype." For countries to "reduce poverty on a sustained basis and to create a middle class," the Journal says they "need to grow rapidly over years," and "though remittances fuel some spending, there isn't much evidence they have added to sustained growth. Instead, the infusions of outside cash often distort the local economy and may diminish the long-term prospects for gains."

DOJ_NMG_0089789

NYTimes Welcomes Germany's Decision To Play Greater Role In Global Security. In an editorial, the New York Times (11/1, 1.21M) welcomes Germany's "move out of its postwar pacifist mode and undertake a greater role in global security." The Times says, "There has been no good reason for some time why Germany should not do its share of global peacekeeping and peacemaking," especially at a time "when the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and multiple peacekeeping missions in Africa have strained the military resources of America and its leading NATO allies." The Times concludes, "There's a lot of work to be done, and it's time the Germans joined in."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Affordable Housing Bond Asks Voters For Their Vision Of L.A.."
"A Violent Month Hits Home."
"Campaign Fireworks Fly As Polls Put Senate In Play."
"Hubble Tune-Up Is A Go."
"More Than Ever, Insurgents Are Targeting U.S. Forces."

USA Today:
"Previous Hubble Upgrades."
"Hubble Repair Flight Ok'd, But First NASA Needs $900M."
"Election Tests How Much Race Matters."
"Many Eyes Will Watch The Polls."
"On Lookout For Trouble."
"Study Shows Depression's Scope."

New York Times:
"Iraqi Demands Pullback; U.S. Lifts Baghdad Cordon."
"As Vote Nears, Stances On War Set Off Sparks."
"North Korea Will Resume Nuclear Talks."
"After The Storm, Students Left Alone And Angry."
"Battle Over Abortion Focuses On South Dakota Vote."
"Working Mothers Find Some Peace On The Road."

Washington Post:
"N. Korea Agrees To Return To Nuclear Talks."
"Iraq Tells U.S. to Quit Sadr City Checkpoints."
"Va., Md. Senate Camps Dig Deep."
"Campaigner in Chief Has Limited Reach."
"Hubble Repair Mission Is A Go."
"Molded By Faith And Persistence."

Washington Times:
"N. Korea Agrees To Six-Party Talks."
"Marriage Measure May Turn On Allen."
"Baby Boom Echoes In Iraq."
"Specter Of Tax man Haunts Democrats."
"Cardin, Steele Put Focus On PG."
"Obsolete Legion Faces Uncertainly."
"Holiday Revelers Can Give Thanks For $2 Gas."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"MegaFest Off Atlanta's '07 Calendar."
"Dekalb Cops Ignore Rules In Shootings."
"Bush Skewers Kerry Over Iraq Comment."
"Vegetables To Suspect In Salmonella Outbreak."

Houston Chronicle:
"New Safety Measures Urged For BP, Others."
"NASA To repair Hubble Despite Potential Risk."
"Texas May See Its Star Wane On Capitol Hill."
"DNA Clears Inmate 25 Years After Conviction For Rape."
"Getting A Nutty Idea To take Root."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Kerry's Statements; Kerry's Statements Analysis; No More US Blockade –Iraq; US Response To Maliki; North Korea-Six Party Talks; New Medical Finding-SIDS; Airlines Making Money; Repairing Hubble; PW Botha Obit; Tag Team Parents; Elephants & Mirrors; Halloween Costumes.
CBS: Kerry's Statement; No More US Blockade-Iraq; Troops Staying Longer-Iraq; North Korea-Six Party Talks; New Medical Finding-SIDS; Kerry's Statement Analysis; Security Moms-Campaign 2006; Halloween Holiday Of The Year.
NBC: Kerry's Statement; Kerry's Statement Analysis; No More US Check Points-Iraq; Troops Staying longer-Iraq; North Korea-Six Party Talks; Stock Market; New Medical Finding-SIDS; PW Botha Obit; Repairing Hubble; Halloween Business.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: CA Wildfire-Another Firefighter Dies; CA Wildfire Investigation; San Francisco-Gunshots During Halloween

DOJ_NMG_0089790

Street Party; Kerry-Iraq Comments; Iraq-US Forces Leave Sadr City Blockade; Iraq-Brother's Reunion; Britain-Sexual Activity Study.

CBS: CA Wildfire-Another Firefighter Dies; San Francisco-Gunshots During Halloween Street Party; Republicans-Kerry's Iraq Comments; Iraq-Fallujah Insurgents Making Comeback; Botha Obit; Stock Markets.

NPR: CA Wildfire-Another Firefighter Dies; CA Wildfire Investigation; San Francisco-Gunshots During Halloween Street Party; Bush-Kerry's Iraq Comments; Bush-Afghanistan; Iraq-US Forces Leave Sadr City Blockade; Fiji-Coup Fears; North Korea's Decision To Rejoin Six Party Talks; Tokyo Stock Market.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY —Speaks at a Montana Victory Rally, Majestic Valley Arena, Kalispell, Mont.

LAURA BUSH — Speaks at a Ron Lewis for Congress and Kentucky Victory 2006 Rally, Colvin Community Center, Radcliff, Ky. Speaks at an Ohio Victory 2006 Rally. Emerald Room at the Makoy Center, Hilliard, Ohio.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: FINANCIAL CONFERENCE _ The Opportunity Finance Network hosts a four day conference on bringing Americans on the economic margins into the mainstream and opening emerging domestic markets. Highlights: 12:30 p.m. - 1:45 p.m. Keynote address by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave, NW.

TREASURY REFUNDING _ 10 a.m. Deputy Assistant Treasury Secretary James Clouse holds the Quarterly Refunding news conference. Location: Room 4121, main Treasury.

COMMON ACCESS CARD _ 10:30 a.m. David S. Chu, Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, will brief on the Next Generation Common Access Card. Location: DOD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

DRUG COVERAGE _ 11 a.m. Families USA holds a telephone briefing to discuss prescription drug coverage through the ``doughnut hole." Contacts: Dave Lemmon, 202-628-3030. Notes: Callin number: 800-662-5508; passcode: 4649350.

POLITICS-YOUTH POLL _ 11 a.m. - 12 p.m. Harvard University's Institute of Politics releases a new national poll on the political views of 18-24 year olds. With Jean Shaheen, director, Harvard's IOP and former governor of New Hampshire; and Christopher Aterton, dean, George Washington University's Graduate School of Political Management. Location: Morton Auditorium, GWU, 805 21st St. NW.

PANDEMIC FLU _ 12 p.m. The Financial Services Roundtable's Blue Ribbon Commission on Mega Catastrophes sponsors a panel discussion, ``Preparing for Pandemic Flu: A Call to Action," with Harvey Rubin of the Institute for Strategic Threat Analysis and Response, Tara O'Toole of University of Pittsburgh Medical Center; Annie Searle of Washington Mutual Enterprise Risk Services. Location: National Press Club.

REAGAN-COMMUNISM _ 12 p.m. The Heritage Foundation holds a program on ``Ronald Reagan and the Fall of Communism, with author Paul Kengor. Location: Lehrman Auditorium, Heritage Foundation, 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

CLEAN AIR _ 12:15 p.m. Georgetown Environmental Law and Policy Institute, others, hold a panel discussion on the Duke Energy case which will have been heard that morning before the Supreme Court, with Sean Donahue of Environmental Defense, Holly Gordon of Stanford Law School, F. William Brownell of Hunton and Williams, and Scott Segal of Bracewell and Giuliani. Location: Room 201, Georgetown University Law Center, 600 New Jersey Ave. NW.

INDIA-US _ 12:30 p.m. The School of Advanced International Studies holds a program with former Indian External Affairs Minister Jaswant Singh and former Deputy Secretary of State Strobe Talbott discussing their meetings held in the wake of India's 1998 nuclear tests. Location: Kenney Auditorium, 1740 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

IRAN OPTIONS _ 12:30 p.m. The Council on Foreign Relations hosts ``Axis of Anxiety: US Options on Iran." Participants: ``Kenneth M. Pollack, Senior Fellow and Director of Research, Saban Center for Middle East Policy, The Brookings Institution; Ray Takeyh, Senior Fellow for Middle Eastern Studies, Council on Foreign Relations; Author, ``Hidden Iran: Paradox and Power in the Islamic Republic;" and Barbara Slavin, Senior Diplomatic Reporter,

DOJ_NMG_0089791

USA Today. Location: Council on Foreign Relations, 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

PURPLE HEART _ 12:30 p.m. VA Secretary Jim Nicholson presents Purple Heart Medals to four recently wounded combat veterans. Tom Poulter, national commander of Military Order of the Purple Heart, discusses groups new ``Hall of Honor in New Windsor, N.Y. Location: National Press Club, First Amendment Lounge.

SADDAM TRIAL _ 1 p.m. Attorney Ramsey Clark holds a news conference to report on the progress of the Saddam Hussein trial. Location: National Press Club.

GREENHOUSE GASES _ 2 p.m. - 3:30 p.m. The Environmental and Energy Study Institute (EESI) hosts a congressional briefing on the active role small business has taken in supporting California's recently enacted first-of-a-kind greenhouse gas legislation, AB 32, and why this can have significant implications for climate legislation nationally. Speakers: Byron Kennard, Executive Director, Center for Small Business and the Environment; Scott Hauge, Founder and President, Small Business California; and Hank Ryan, Executive Director, Small Business California. Location: Room 428-A, Russell Senate Office Building.

EXIT POLL _ 3 p.m. Rev. Jim Wallis, author of Gods Politics, and Rabbi David Saperstein, Director of the Religious Action Center, hold a telephone press conference calling on the media outlets that commissioned and prepared the 2004 ``moral values exit poll question to change the question, both in their 2006 election polling and news coverage. Contacts: Katie Barge, 202-544-7921.

RYAN LECTURE _ 4 p.m. Professor William Eskridge Jr. delivers the Thomas F. Ryan Lecture, ``Supreme Court Deference to Agencies, 1981-2006: An Empirical and Normative Examination." Location: Georgetown University Law Center Gewirz Student Center, 12th Floor 120 F St. NW.

MINUTEMAN-IMMIGRATION _ 7:30 p.m. Chris Simcox, founder and President of the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps, speaks at Georgetown University. Location: Copley Formal Lounge, Copley Hall, Georgetown University.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Perle Slams Administration Over Nuclear Terror Attack Precautions 3
72 Muslim Workers At Paris Airport Lose Access Badges 3

Homeland Response:

Washington State Inmate To Face Federal Charges Over Bomb Threat 3
Alleged Utah Library Bomber May Have Written Letter About Plot 3
Defense Lawyer Says LANL Contractor Planned No Espionage .. 4
"Intellipedia" Allows US Intelligence Officials To Air Views On Sensitive Topics 4
Markey Says TSA Should Alter Procedures In Response To Fake Boarding Pass Site 4
Katrina Evacuees From New Orleans Create Problems For Schools 4

War News:

Rumsfeld Supports Allocation Of Additional $1 Billion For Iraq's Military 4
CentCom Briefing Reportedly Describes Iraq As "Edging Toward Chaos." 5
Iraqi PM Ends Some Joint Checkpoints In Shiite Enclaves 5
Former US Advisor Describes Iraqi Troops' Deficiencies 6
Syrian Foreign Minister May Visit Iraq This Month 6
Blair Ekes Out Win On Iraq War Inquiry Vote 6
Iraq Has Experienced Post-Saddam Baby Boom 7
Pro-US Iraqi Legislator Profiled 7
NATO Forces Continue To Engage Taliban 7
Musharraf Defends Strike Against Religious School 7
Pentagon Seeks Translation Devices To Remedy Shortage Of Arabic Interpreters 7

DOJ:

Gonzales Takes Surprise Teaching Stint At George Washington Law School 8
California Federal Prosecutor Ready For Iraq Duty 8

Corporate Scandals:

Jury Finds Former Cendant Chairman Guilty Of Conspiracy To Commit Securities Fraud, Making False Statements 8
SEC Regulators Investigate Triparty Repurchase Agreements 9
Former McAfee Treasurer Agrees To Fine In Fraud Case 9
Professors Call For Greater Shareholder Empowerment 9
SEC Closes Intuit Options Probe 9

Criminal Law:

Rising Florida Violent Crime Reflects National Trend 10
Libby's Lawyers Ask Judge To Bar Testimony Regarding Miller 10
Influential Lobbyist Major Figure In Palm Beach Corruption Probe 10
FBI Sting Snares 35 In Philadelphia Medical Insurance Scam ... 11
Federal Investigators Find Big Dig Tunnel Design Had Minimal Safety Margin 11
High Court Considers Florida Death Row Appeal 11
US Gets More Time To Make Kansas Death Penalty Decision .. 11
Bockting Appeal Could Potentially Re-Open "Thousands" Of Criminal Cases 12
Two Found Guilty In D.C. Witness Killing 12
DNA Evidence Clears Man Of Rape Charges 12
Duke Rape Case Overshadows Durham, NC, Prosecutor Election 12
Teen Student Arrested After Homemade Bomb Explodes 12
California Commission Overpaid For Services, Failed To Follow State Contract Rules 13
Former Security Firm Chief Sentenced To Home Detention, Probation For Diverting Funds 13

Civil Law:

Supreme Court Hears Tobacco Company's Appeal Of 1999 Penalty 13
DC Circuit Blocks "Light" Cigarettes Ruling 14
Former McAfee Treasurer To Settle Civil Fraud Charges For $758,000 14
Canadian Sentenced To 10 Years In Prison For Defrauding Merrill-Lynch 15
California Man Sentenced To Four Years In Prison For Investment Scam 15
Texas Woman Sentenced To Probation For Katrina Relief Fraud15
Kansas Women Plead Guilty To Health Care Fraud 15
3rd Circuit Revives Suit Against Asbestos Class Action Attorneys 15
Center For Digital Democracy Asks FTC To Investigate Online Advertisers 16

Civil Rights:

DOJ To Send Election Monitors To At Least 20 States..... 16
US Settles Racial Bias Complaint Against Milwaukee Nightclub 17
DOJ Will Not Probe Death Of Virginia Man In Police Custody.... 18
Legal Challenge To Mississippi Judicial Election Withdrawn 18
Illinois Teen Shot By Police Stun Gun Dies..... 18
DOJ May Reopen Probe Of California Redistricting Plan 18
Officials Investigate Man's Death After Scuffle With Deputies 19
South Dakota Abortion Vote Likely To Influence National Debate19
NYTimes Accuses New York GOP Of Attempting To Suppress Minority Vote 19

Antitrust:

DOJ Suspends Antitrust Probe Of Entercom 19
Donnelley To Acquire Banta In $1.3 Billion Deal 19
Widening Memory-Chip Probe Targets Sony 20
Former Head Of Tulsa Firm Fined For Bid-Rigging..... 20
AMD Seeks Intel Documents In Antitrust Suit 20
Donnelley To Buy Banta In $1.3 Billion Deal 21
Stratex-Harris Deal Gets Antitrust Nod..... 21
Music Publishers Strike Anti-Piracy Deal With Kazaa 21
Two Real Estate Firms Merge 21
Google Acquires Document Management Firm 21

Environment:

Boulder Set To Vote On Whether To Impose Nation's First Carbon Tax 22
Venture Capitalist's Promotion Of Prop 87 Criticized 22

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Person Of Interest In California Wildfire Arrested As Fifth Firefighter Dies..... 22
17 Indicted After FBI, Wisconsin Police Raid Drug Gang..... 22
Protest Of Utah Pot Sale Sentence Grows..... 23
Maryland Man Convicted Of Drug Distribution Gets 20-Year Sentence 23
Eighth Member Of Hawaiian Drug Ring Sentenced 23
Court Ruling Could Reduce Michigan Man's Sentence In Heroin Case..... 23
San Diego Chargers Linebacker Drops Appeal Of Drug-Related Suspension 23
Reputed Member Of Colombia Drug Cartel Arrested In Spain ... 24
Colombia's Vice President Says Celebrities Are Financing "Drug-Fueled" Conflict..... 24
Barr Says NRA Not To Blame For Violent Crime 24
Los Angeles ATF Office Uses Statistics To Prove Success..... 24
Leader Of Prison Gang Resentenced To 19 Years..... 25

Immigration:

Five Indicted In Ballplayer-Smuggling Investigation 25
Suit Challenges Illegal Immigrant Crackdown In Allentown, PA.. 25

Tax:

Churches Reevaluate Their Political Activities In Light Of IRS Crackdown 25
GAO Urges IRS To Tighten Oversight Of Private Collection Agencies 26
IRS Could Lose Money In First Year Of Using Private Bill Collectors 26
IRS Steps Up Checks On Partnerships, Trusts, S Corps..... 26

Congress-Administration:

Democrats Propose New Spending On Defense, Homeland Security And Education 26
Appeals Court Hears New Arguments In McDermott-Boehner Tape Case 27
Commission For Labor Cooperation Director Resigns Over Outside Lobbying 27
GAO Warns Administration Could Miss Deadline On Expedited Background Checks..... 27
Pelosi Urged To Choose Harman Over Hastings For Intelligence Committee Chair 27
NYTimes Criticizes Administration's Actions On Pell Grants 27
Newspapers Call Hubble Mission A Worthy Risk 28

Other News:

Stocks Slightly Down Yesterday 28
Bush Calls Kerry Comment "Insulting and Shameful" To US Soldiers 28
Democrats Confidently Predicting House Majority 31
WSJournal/NBC Poll Shows Democrats With 15-Point Generic Advantage 32
Bush Seen As A "Liability" To Republicans In Many Parts Of Country 32
PAC Contributions Flowing To Ranking House Democrats, Not Challengers..... 33
Democratic Lobbyists Enjoy Revival In Washington 33
Republican Lawmakers Face Pressure To Change Leadership After Midterms..... 33
Democrats Hope To Beat Northup In Kentucky's Third CD 33
Parties Have Lavished Resources On Unexpectedly Competitive WA8 Race..... 33
Democrat In NE3 Getting Support From National Party..... 34
Wilson Hopeful Duck Prop Heralds Revival..... 34
GOP Candidates Not Touting Medicare Prescription Drug Program 34
Democrats Find Fertile Ground In Mountain West 34
Democrats Expected To Make Gains In Former GOP Strongholds..... 35
GOP Will Not Commit To Power-Sharing Agreement In The Event Of A 50-50 Senate..... 35
Senate Republicans Reportedly Pleased With New Polling Data35
Poll Shows Corker Leading Ford 52%-44% 35
Santorum Down 15 Points In New Poll..... 35
Liberal Blogger Heckles Allen, Accuses Him Of Spitting On His Ex-Wife 36
Cardin, Steele Focus On Prince George's County In Maryland Senate Race 37
National Parties Inundate Virginia, Maryland With Senate Ads... 38
Talent, McCaskill Work To Rally Base Supporters..... 38
Chafee Takes Shot At Reid's Ethics During Debate 38
Swift Boat Contributor Behind Ad Tying Menendez To The Mafia38

DOJ_NMG_0089794

Senate Democrats Give More To Party Committee Than GOP Counterparts 39
Obama Drawing Huge Crowds As He Campaigns For Fellow Democrats..... 39
Clinton Endorses Plan For Withdrawal Of US Troops From Iraq 39
Patrick Set To Become Only The Second Black Governor In US History 40
Study Finds Networks' Stories Have Pronounced Pro-Democratic Slant..... 40
WSJournal Says AARP Position On Taxes Hurting Democrats . 40
Schumer, Bloomberg Say NYC Must Improve Corporate Climate40
North Korea Agrees To Return To Six-Party Talks 40
Rice Urges UN To Speed Up Sanctions On Iran..... 42
Lebanese Leader Says Syria Still Arming Hezbollah 42
Israeli Defense Minister Says Saudi Plan Could Be Basis For Talks With Palestinians..... 43
Bush Launches Review Of Darfur Policy..... 43
Westerners' Arrests In Yemen Renew Terrorism Concerns 43
Sadat's Nephew Sentenced To Prison For Defaming Egyptian Military..... 44
Studies Find Security Council Seats Tied To US Aid 44
China Adopts Rules Aimed At Reducing Executions 44
Former South African Leader Botha, Dies..... 44
Migrants' Remittances Seen As Imperfect Cure For Poor Nations 44
NYTimes Welcomes Germany's Decision To Play Greater Role In Global Security..... 44

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 45

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 45

TERRORISM NEWS:

Perle Slams Administration Over Nuclear Terror Attack Precautions. The Washington Post's Al Kamen (11/1), in his "In The Loop" column, writes, "Eyebrows popped up last week when none other than Richard Perle , former Reagan assistant secretary of defense, former Bush brain-truster on the Defense Policy Board, and a key promoter of the war to find Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, blistered the administration as 'dysfunctional' when it comes to stopping someone from bringing 'a nuclear weapon or even nuclear material into the United States.' … But President Bush , Perle emphasized, is not to blame for this sorry state of affairs. 'I haven't the slightest doubt that if one could…put this proposition to the president, he would first be shocked to learn that we don't have the capability. Secondly, [he] would immediately order that we develop it.'"

72 Muslim Workers At Paris Airport Lose Access Badges. The New York Times (11/1, Bennhold, 1.21M) reports, "The French authorities charged with assessing security risks at Charles de Gaulle airport have stripped 72 Muslim workers of their access badges because they had traveled to Pakistan or Afghanistan, or were suspected of having links to extremists," according to Jacques Lebrot, who oversees the airport. Lebrot, who said a number of the workers "are suspected of having trained in terrorist camps," added that one of the workers "was a friend of Richard Reid, the so-called shoe bomber." Joanna Gonzalez, a spokeswoman for the US Department of Homeland Security, declined to comment on the incident, stating that it is "the government of France's jurisdiction."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Washington State Inmate To Face Federal Charges Over Bomb Threat. KXLY-TV Spokane (10/31) reported on its Web site, "A man who threatened to blow up a Spokane DSHS facility earlier this summer will face federal charges, an FBI sgent confirmed Tuesday afternoon. Anthony Garver will face federal charges for possession or receipt of firearms or ammunition by a person adjudicated as mentally defective, according to FBI Special Agent Norm Brown. The charges stem from the relevation earlier this summer after Garver told a fellow inmate at the Spokane County Jail about his plan to blow up the DSHS office." The inmate "tipped off authorities who later found during their investigation that Garver had a variety of items including ammunition, knives, a GPS unit, police scanner and bomb-making recipes saved on a computer, which was enough for the FBI to launch an investigation into Garver."

Alleged Utah Library Bomber May Have Written Letter About Plot. KTVX-TV Salt Lake City (10/31, Jones) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "The man accused of bombing the Salt Lake City Library in September may have also written a letter to police claiming responsibility for the crime. The author also promises more attacks in the future according to the FBI. The letter was addressed to Chief of Police Chris Burbank one week ago." Thomas Zajac "is behind bars in Illinois awaiting extradition to Salt Lake City to face bombing charges here, police are trying to find out if he was the one who wrote the letter. In the letter, the author gives details about the materials used to construct the bomb. The letter writer also tells police someone close to him was a victim of police brutality in Salt Lake City, he or she goes on to say if they see more cases of police brutality they will return and bomb again."

DOJ_NMG_0089795

Zajac Possible Suspect In Chicago Bombing. The Salt Lake Tribune (11/1, Carlisle) reports, "Investigators are probing whether the suspect in a Salt Lake City library bombing is linked to an explosion at a train station in suburban Chicago, a federal agent said Tuesday." Salt Lake City ATF Agent in Charge Lori Dyer "said Thomas Zajac's fingerprints are being tested against evidence connected to a bomb that detonated in Hinsdale, Ill. That bomb exploded Sept. 1 -- the same month as the library bomb -- in a trash can at a commuter train station, according to the Daily Herald in suburban Chicago. No one was injured." The Tribune notes, "The FBI arrested Zajac Friday at his home in Oakbrook Terrace, Ill. He is awaiting extradition to Utah."

Defense Lawyer Says LANL Contractor Planned No Espionage. The AP (11/1, Baker) reports, "The woman who lived in a home where classified material from Los Alamos National Laboratory was seized by authorities wasn't a spy -- she was just trying to do her job for the lab, her lawyer said Tuesday. The FBI began investigating a security breach at the nuclear weapons laboratory after police seized three portable computer storage drives during a drug bust at Jessica Quintana's home on Oct. 17." Attorney Stephen Aarons said, "It's not espionage. It's a 22-year-old ... that mishandled documents, and it doesn't appear that third parties got hold of them. Her only intent was to work with these documents herself, and to get them indexed in a timely fashion. ... She was working with these documents and she shouldn't have left the facility with them, but apparently she did."

"Intellipedia" Allows US Intelligence Officials To Air Views On Sensitive Topics. The Los Angeles Times (11/1, Miller, 918K) reports a new computer system being used by US intelligence agencies, referred to as Intellipedia "because it is built on open-source software from the Wikipedia Web site," was discussed "in detail" for the first time yesterday by US officials. "After being criticized for downplaying dissenting views on Iraq's alleged weapons programs, 'we're trying to transform the way we do business,' said Michele Weslander, a senior official overseeing the initiative for the director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte. The system allows analysts from all 16 US intelligence agencies to weigh in on debates on North Korea's nuclear program and other sensitive topics, creating internal Web sites that are constantly updated with new information and analysis, officials said."

Markey Says TSA Should Alter Procedures In Response To Fake Boarding Pass Site. The Washington Post (11/1, D1, Krebs, 748K) reports Christopher Soghoian, whose Web site allowing users to create fake boarding passes prompted a visit from the FBI over the weekend, "has stirred a national tempest and renewed concerns about passenger screening procedures." Wendy Osborne, a special agent with the FBI's Indianapolis field office, said the bureau "would investigate jointly with the Transportation Security Administration and then decide whether charges would be filed." Meanwhile, "Amy Kudwa, a spokeswoman for the TSA, declined to say whether the agency was considering changing check-in procedures because of the incident." Rep. Edward J. Markey, who praised Soghoian's actions Sunday for calling "attention to a security weakness," indicated Tuesday that "Congress might have to act if the TSA doesn't."

Katrina Evacuees From New Orleans Create Problems For Schools. The New York Times (11/1, Nossiter, 1.21M) reports students at John McDonogh High School have "in the last six weeks…assaulted guards, a teacher and a police officer." The attacks are presented as part of "a far-reaching phenomenon after Hurricane Katrina" wherein "teenagers in the city are living alone or with older siblings or relatives, separated by hundreds of miles from their displaced parents" and "they are angry." Principal Donald Jackson "estimated that up to a fifth of the 775 students live without parents."

WAR NEWS:

Rumsfeld Supports Allocation Of Additional $1 Billion For Iraq's Military. The AP (11/1, Burns) reports Defense Secretary Rumsfeld "endorsed a proposal to spend at least $1 billion to expand the size and accelerate the training and equipping of Iraqi security forces." According to the AP, "Rumsfeld's support underscores the Bush administration's effort to shift more of the burden of Iraq's security to that country's forces." Rumsfeld is quoted as saying, "I'm very comfortable with the increases they've proposed and the accelerations in achievement of some of their targets. … Now it's simply a matter of our pressing forward and getting our portion of the funding from the Congress and working to see that it's executed."

The CBS Evening News (10/31, story 3, 1:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Now more about that story David Martin broke here last night that US troops may have to stay in Iraq a lot longer to train 100,000 more Iraqi security forces. Today…Rumsfeld conceded it's true." CBS added, "Today…Rumsfeld confirmed the mission is about to get bigger and take longer. Saying he expects to approve a recommendation from General George Casey, the American commander in Iraq, to increase the size of the Iraqi security forces." CBS noted Rumsfeld "refused to say exactly how big an increase. But other Pentagon officials predict the current goal of fielding 325,000 Iraqi soldiers and police will be increased by a minimum of 30,000 and a maximum of 100,000. Rumsfeld said that while American trainers and advisers will have to stay longer, combat troops could start coming home before then." NBC Nightly News (10/31, story 4, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Many people believe this now means Americans will have to stay in Iraq longer than first expected. NBC added, "Rumsfeld also confirmed to what many was already obvious. Iraq needs a bigger army. Pentagon officials say with a deadly rise in sectarian violence, there was no other choice but to increase the number of Iraqi security forces. … The Pentagon has already spent $10 billion training and equipping Iraqi forces and now expects to ask Congress for even more. But simply increasing the number of Iraqi forces is still no guarantee that they'll soon be able to take on the fight, the enemy, all by themselves and that substantial numbers of American troops can start coming home."

DOJ_NMG_0089796

Election Outcome Could Influence Timing Of Rumsfeld Departure. The Financial Times (11/1, Sevastopulo, Dinmore) reports The midterm elections next week could help decide the fate of" Rumsfeld. According to the Times, "A former senior administration official said Mr Rumsfeld might leave if the Iraq Study Group…comes up with radical policy suggestions for Iraq. Another influential Republican with close ties to the White House said the consensus among Republican insiders was that Mr Rumsfeld would remain only until next summer. That would provide enough time after the elections to avoid the impression he was going because of the war, and also allow time for the situation on the ground to improve."

CentCom Briefing Reportedly Describes Iraq As "Edging Toward Chaos." The New York Times (11/1, Gordon, 1.21M) reports, "A classified briefing prepared two weeks ago by the United States Central Command portrays Iraq as edging toward chaos, in a chart that the military is using as a barometer of civil conflict. A one-page slide shown at the Oct. 18 briefing" shows "a color-coded bar chart that is used to illustrate an 'Index of Civil Conflict.' It shows a sharp escalation in sectarian violence since the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra in February. … In fashioning the index, the military is weighing factors like the ineffectual Iraqi police and the dwindling influence of moderate religious and political figures, rather than more traditional military measures such as the enemy's fighting strength and the control of territory. The conclusions the Central Command has drawn from these trends are not encouraging, according to a copy of the slide that was obtained by The New York Times. The slide shows Iraq as moving sharply away from 'peace,' an ideal on the far left side of the chart, to a point much closer to the right side of the spectrum, a red zone marked 'chaos.'"

Most US Soldiers Killed This Month Were Killed Outside Of Baghdad. The New York Times (11/1, Shanker, Cloud, 1.21M) reports, "About two-thirds of the deaths among American troops in Iraq in October occurred outside Baghdad, even with a sharp increase in combat deaths in the capital. … Forty American soldiers were killed in and around Baghdad in October, double the number there just two months ago, a review of casualty reports shows. Military officers and civilian analysts said the rise in October resulted in part from more aggressive American security operations in Baghdad, which exposed larger numbers of troops to danger. The security operation in the capital put American troops on the streets not only in greater numbers, but more often on foot patrols outside their armored vehicles, where they were more vulnerable to improvised bombs and a growing threat of snipers. The spike in violence in the capital was accompanied by higher tolls in other parts of the country, notably in Anbar Province, where 37 Americans died and deaths have climbed steadily since this summer."

Level Of Attacks On US Forces In October Called "Unprecedented." The Los Angeles Times (11/1, Daragahi, 918K) reports, "October's death toll, the highest for American forces in nearly two years, came during a period without conventional battles or catastrophic helicopter crashes. Rather, the 103 troops killed in Baghdad and across Iraq were victims of a steady onslaught of assaults, primarily by their longtime nemeses, Sunni Arab insurgents. The number of attacks on American forces increased in October to unprecedented levels, U.S. military officials said.

Iraqi PM Ends Some Joint Checkpoints In Shiite Enclaves. The AP (11/1, Bodeen) reports, "Exploiting GOP vulnerability in the Nov. 7 elections, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki flexed his political muscle Tuesday and won US agreement to lift military blockades on Sadr City and another Shiite enclave where an American soldier was abducted. … The prime minister's challenge to US conduct of the war was the latest in a series of acts designed to force the American hand and test Washington's readiness to give him a greater say in securing the world's most violent capital."

ABC World News (10/31, story 3, 2:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported Malaki's decision "has put new strains on the Iraq government and the Bush Administration. The Prime Minister bowed to a request from Iraq's most powerful militia leader and lifted a blockade on a Shiite militia stronghold in Baghdad. And it raises questions about just how much influence the US now has over the Iraqi government."

DOJ_NMG_0089797

ABC World News (10/31, story 4, 1:50, Gibson, 8.78M) also reported, "Bush Administration officials stress the US has to work with the Iraqi government. But the Prime Minister's action today puts the White House in something of a predicament." ABC (Raddatz) added, "The White House will say publicly there is no rift between the Prime Minister and the White House. But privately, many officials are saying they were taken completely by surprise by this move by Prime Minister Maliki. The United States wants him to succeed. But they are not seeing the progress they want to see. They are deeply troubled by what happened today."

The CBS Evening News (10/31, story 2, 1:15, Couric, 7.66M) also portrayed the move as a sign "of growing tension between Washington and an Iraqi government." The Iraqi government, added ABC, seem "to be taking more of its clues these days or cues, rather, from a radical cleric." CBS (Logan) added, "This was an order US soldiers manning checkpoints in parts of Baghdad were not expecting -- pack up and go. And this was the Iraqi reaction: Celebrations on the streets of Sadr City, home to the powerful Mehdi Army militia. Through their leader, al-Sadr, they have been pushing hard to get rid of the US security barriers set up around their area to search for an American soldier abducted last Monday. Today, Sadr, perhaps the most powerful man in Iraq, got exactly what he wanted." NBC Nightly News (10/31, story 3, 2:05, Engel, 9.87M) said, "Al-Sadr rattled his cage to get the Americans out of his neighborhood and won."

The New York Times (11/1, Semple, 1.21M) reports, "Late Tuesday night, after hours of silence, a senior American Embassy official who had been delegated to return reporters' phone calls said the prime minister's order was 'the result of a meeting' between Mr. Maliki, Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq. 'It was essentially something that Maliki wanted to do and Casey agreed to it,' the official said." But "Maliki's announcement may have been a foregone conclusion: the meeting was at 1 p.m., officials said, and the prime minister's office issued his press release at about 1:20 p.m."

USA Today (11/1, Jervis, 2.27M) notes "Al-Maliki's government, nominally a coalition of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds, is dominated by a Shiite majority bloc. Al-Sadr's political organization is among the most powerful groups within that bloc. … Al-Sadr had warned on Monday that his forces might retaliate in response to the security ring around Sadr City. 'If this siege continues for long, we will resort to action,' he said."

The Los Angeles Times (11/1, Ellingwood, 918K) reports, "Maliki's order to take down the roadblocks could help boost his political standing among Iraqis who have grown disappointed in his leadership and irritated over what they view as American meddling."

The Washington Times/AP (11/1, Bodeen) reports Democratic Sen. Jack Reed, "a member of the Armed Services Committee, said al-Maliki was yielding to sectarian pressure and undermining US efforts to curb attacks." Said Reed, "Today, the critical issue in Iraq is whether the Maliki government can muster the political will to confront those who use violence to destabilize Iraq."

Former US Advisor Describes Iraqi Troops' Deficiencies. The Washington Post (11/1, A12, Pincus, 748K) reports, "U.S. military advisers are confronting difficult behavior from Iraqi soldiers, who tend to fire all their ammunition in response to a single sniper shot or go on rampages even against civilians upon witnessing the death of a colleague, according to Lt. Col. Carl D. Grunow, a former adviser to an Iraqi army armored brigade." Grunow. in an article in the U.S. Army's Combined Arms Center's Military Review, "attributes that reaction to the Iraqi army's experience in the 'high-intensity Iran-Iraq war of the 1980s, a war with clear battle lines fought with mass military formations.' At that time, Grunow writes, 'Iranian human-wave assaults presented Iraqi soldiers with a target rich environment' and 'battlefields covered with bodies following huge expenditures of ammunition.' His article, based on his year in Iraq, which ended in June, is in the July-August Military Review and is one of several in recent issues that have dealt forthrightly with concerns of military participants with the U.S. effort to rebuild Iraq's army during the ongoing war."

Syrian Foreign Minister May Visit Iraq This Month. The AP (11/1, Aji) reports Syrian Foreign Minister Walid al-Moallem "is considering a visit to Baghdad in November — the first by a top Syrian official since the fall of Saddam Hussein and a major step toward restoring diplomatic relations, Iraqi and Syrian officials said Tuesday. President Bush has called on Syria to help quell sectarian violence in Iraq, and some in the U.S., including former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, have urged the White House to make overtures to Syria to enlist its help." An Iraqi Foreign Ministry official, "who spoke on condition of anonymity…said the ministries agreed 'in principal' that al-Moallem would visit Iraq in November."

Blair Ekes Out Win On Iraq War Inquiry Vote. AFP (11/1, Millard) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair's government "survived a potentially damaging vote in parliament on whether he should order an inquiry into how Britain joined the war in Iraq. Opposition parties had demanded an immediate investigation by a committee of senior members of parliament into the government's handling of the build-up to the US-led March 2003 invasion. However, the motion, proposed by the small Scottish and Welsh nationalist parties in the lower House of Commons, was defeated by 298 votes to 273, with Blair's 62-seat working majority cut to 25. The government later promised an inquiry once the situation permitted." The Los Angeles Times (11/1, Murphy, 918K) reports, "government ministers warned that launching an inquiry now would send a message of weakness to Britain's adversaries, threaten the morale of the troops and undermine support for Iraqi attempts to build a unified and democratic nation. … In a Guardian/ICM poll published Thursday, 61% of respondents said they wanted British forces to leave Iraq this year, even if they have not completed their mission, and even if the U.S. wants them to stay."

DOJ_NMG_0089798

Iraq Has Experienced Post-Saddam Baby Boom. The Washington Times (11/1, Palmer, 88K) reports, "Iraq's maternity wards are experiencing an unlikely baby boom. … The birthrate in Iraq actually has increased since the U.S.-led invasion 43 months ago, according to the country's Health Ministry. The rate of births in the country has jumped from 29 births per 1,000 people in 2003 to 37 per 1,000 last year, according to government figures. In neighboring Iran, the birthrate is half that -- 21 per 1,000 population, while the average birthrate in the Middle East is 25, according to the World Bank."

Pro-US Iraqi Legislator Profiled. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/1, A18, 2.03M) "independent journalist" Heather Robinson profiles Mithal al-Alusi, "a 53-year-old Sunni Arab who won a seat in parliament last December after having served as director general of the National Commission on de-Baathification. Mr. al-Alusi ran on a platform of religious pluralism, human rights, free markets and a free press. He calls for an alliance among democracies -- including the U.S., Iraq, Israel and Turkey -- to fight terrorism." In February 2005 "assassins opened fire on Mr. al-Alusi's car as it approached his Baghdad home. He wasn't in the vehicle, but his sons, 30-year-old Ayman and 22-year-old Gamal, were. Both were killed as their father watched. Still, Mr. al-Alusi was unbowed." Robinson notes, "Polls suggest a majority of Americans think it was a mistake to enter Iraq. Mr. al-Alusi respectfully disagrees." Robinson concludes, "He has not given up the fight. How can we?"

NATO Forces Continue To Engage Taliban. The New York Times (11/1, Wafa, 1.21M) reports, "Clashes erupted in five provinces in eastern and southern Afghanistan on Monday and Tuesday, with roadside bombs, suicide bombings and gun battles killing four NATO soldiers and an estimated 67 Taliban fighters, NATO officials said." The violence "came as NATO forces continued a military operation started last week intended to put pressure on Taliban forces through the fall and winter, and to allow reconstruction and development to reach the country's restive south and east, NATO officials said. Taliban forces, meanwhile, continued to demonstrate their ability to carry out multiple roadside bombings and suicide attacks."

Musharraf Defends Strike Against Religious School. The New York Times (11/1, Masood, 1.21M) reports, "Faced with protests across the country, President Pervez Musharraf on Tuesday defended a military strike that killed 80 people at a religious school, and insisted that the dead were militants undergoing terrorist training." Musharraf's claim "came amid protests across the political spectrum, but especially by an alliance of Islamic parties and thousands of people in the semi-autonomous tribal areas straddling the Afghan border where the strike took place."

Pakistani Embassy Criticizes Depiction Of Musharraf. Akram Shaheedi, press minister at the Embassy of Pakistan in Washington, writes in a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (11/1, 2.03M), "Tunku Varadarajan, in his review of Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf's autobiography 'In the Line of Fire,' describes Gen. Musharraf as 'self-congratulatory, narcissistic and mendacious.' … Such words are unfair, reflecting the mindset of those determined to malign the president come what may."

Pentagon Seeks Translation Devices To Remedy Shortage Of Arabic Interpreters. On the front page of the Business section, the Washington Post (11/1, Merle, 748K) reports that "the goal of having a machine replace a human interpreter remains elusive, and the military is mounting a multimillion-dollar campaign to find a more capable successor, one that can translate both sides of a conversation, from English to Arabic and vice versa." A shortage of interpreters has forced the military "to rely increasingly on contractors -- 6,500 in Iraq and 1,500 in Afghanistan. It can be a dangerous job. Of the 648 contractors killed in Iraq since the war began in March 2003, 153 worked for the division of L-3 Communications Corp. that currently holds the linguist contract." The Post reports that progress on the device has been slow.

The Washington Times (11/1, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports, "The Army has invested $4.2 million in a Web-based software program to improve the foreign-language skills of overseas personnel. The program was created by Rosetta Stone, which provides training software in 30 languages." Army project manager Stan Davis is quoted as saying that "more than 64,000" troops are using the software.

DOJ_NMG_0089799

DOJ:

Gonzales Takes Surprise Teaching Stint At George Washington Law School. In their "Reliable Source" column for the Washington Post (11/1), Amy Argetsinger and Roxanne Roberts write, "Alberto Gonzales dropped by GWU Law School yesterday, surprising 40 students in the criminal procedure class. The attorney general talked about military commissions, terrorist surveillance and the Patriot Act and took questions for 40 minutes -- before vanishing as mysteriously as he arrived." Argetsinger and Roberts add, "Turns out this was all his idea: Gonzales just got a hankering for legal chat with some students, and his staff tracked down a willing prof, former DOJ lawyer Renee Lerner . 'I guess he really likes teaching,' she said. 'The students, of course, were delighted to have him.' Is the AG mulling a move to academia? 'He is not ruling any options out in terms of future careers,' said Justice spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos . Any more stealth visits to law schools planned? 'I wouldn't rule it out.'"

California Federal Prosecutor Ready For Iraq Duty. The Sacramento Bee (11/1, Ellis) reports, "Marlon Cobar so believes in the virtue of the rule of law that he has volunteered to go to Iraq and promote it." The Bee continues, "Cobar, an assistant U.S. attorney in Fresno, next month will start a one-year stint — with the option for a second — advising Iraqis as they work to put together a functioning legal system. … Many areas where Cobar will help already are second nature in the American legal system, such as how to make effective opening and closing arguments, how to pursue a line of questioning, how to preserve evidence and how to develop a chain of custody for prisoners." The Bee adds, "Cobar also will give advice about human rights and ethical issues that lawyers, prosecutors and judges in Iraq might face. … 'We're not going over there to take over,' Cobar said. 'We'll be assisting the Iraqis in taking the reins of their justice system any way they can.'" The Bee notes, "He will be stationed in an undisclosed province far from Baghdad and will be one of only eight such 'Resident Legal Advisers' in the war-torn country. These legal advisers advise the U.S. Embassy and Iraq's central and provincial courts. … In total, the Justice Department has more than 200 employees and contract personnel working on law enforcement, security and justice issues in Iraq. … To date, according to the Justice Department, nearly 500 Iraqi jurists and prosecutors have been trained on topics such as human rights, criminal process and the challenges presented prosecuting insurgency and terrorist cases."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Jury Finds Former Cendant Chairman Guilty Of Conspiracy To Commit Securities Fraud, Making False Statements. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, C3) reports a federal jury in the US District court in Bridgeport, CT found former Cendant Chairman Walter A Forbes "guilty of conspiracy to commit securities fraud and two counts of making false statements in a massive fraud scheme that inflated the travel and real-estate company's earnings and crippled the company's once-stellar reputation. … The conviction came in Mr. Forbes's third trial in three years, after juries deadlocked in trials earlier this year and in early 2005. The Cendant case was among the first in a series of corporate-accounting scandals that sparked outrage from investors in recent years, but is one of the last to reach a conclusion." US Attorney Christopher J. Chirstie: "We are gratified by today's verdict. … The innocent victims of this $14 billion fraud engineered by Walter Forbes have waited a very long time for justice to be done. This is a great day for those who believe that everyone in our society must be held accountable for their conduct."

The New York Times (11/1, Stowe) reports, "Prosecutors said Mr. Forbes inflated the income at his original company, CUC International, which merged with HFS Inc. in 1997 to form Cendant — with holdings including the Avis and Budget car rental companies and the Century 21 and Coldwell Banker real estate brokerage firms, among other businesses." The Times adds, "The jury foreman, David Cunningham, a business analyst from Wilton, Conn., said the jury did not think that prosecutors proved their case on securities fraud. Asked if there had been a crucial piece of evidence that swayed the jury to vote to convict on other counts, Mr. Cunningham replied simply, 'We were just following the evidence.'

USA Today (11/1, Farrell) reports, "The victory proved sweet for federal prosecutors from New Jersey, who have been pursuing Forbes for eight years. Two previous efforts to convict Forbes for his role in the Cendant fraud ended in mistrials, although jurors in the first trial found Forbes' top lieutenant, E. Kirk Shelton, guilty of participating in the fraud. Shelton was sentenced to 10 years in prison."

The Washington Post (11/1, D1, Johnson) reports, "Forbes, 63, faces more than 10 years in prison on the charges, which stem from a $250 million earnings manipulation at CUC International Inc., which through a merger became the travel and real estate conglomerate known as Cendant. … Cendant's disclosure of accounting tricks eight years ago slashed the stock price in half and erased $14 billion in shareholder value, ultimately leading the company to hand over a $3.2 billion settlement to investors, which was a record at the time." The Post notes that the verdict "marked the third time in recent years that jurors rejected a top executive's claim that he failed to detect accounting tricks because he only breezily reviewed financial reports and delegated the details to subordinates who deceived him."

DOJ_NMG_0089800

The AP (11/1, Press) reports, "The verdict could end what was, when it was first brought, the largest case of accounting fraud in the country. The Cendant case was among the first in a series of corporate accounting scandals that sparked outrage from investors in recent years. … The case was being tried after two previous juries deadlocked. … 'It's the third time and was worth all the effort,' said Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office in New Jersey. 'We always believed fully in all the evidence against Mr. Forbes. We are extremely gratified by today's results.'" The AP adds, "Prosecutors say that Forbes participated in a scheme to inflate the stock of Cendant's predecessor, CUC International, by $500 million. The fraud was reported in 1998, causing Cendant's market value to drop by $14 billion in one day. … Forbes has argued he knew nothing about the fraud. His co-defendant, former Cendant Vice Chairman E. Kirk Shelton, was convicted last year of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud, securities fraud and making false statements to the SEC."

SEC Regulators Investigate Triparty Repurchase Agreements. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, C6, Ng, Zuckerman) reports that a "regulatory probe into possible manipulation of Treasury prices" is examining "a strategy that helps traders make certain bonds scarcer and more valuable, say people familiar with the matter." The SEC "is investigating whether UBS AG was involved in improper manipulation of Treasury-securities prices. Separately, a Credit Suisse Group bond trader recently left the firm amid regulatory scrutiny of the market. No regulator has alleged wrongdoing by any individual or at any specific bank. Regulators are focusing on a large and somewhat obscure corner of the market where investment banks, hedge funds, mutual funds and other investors use bonds as collateral for short-term cash loans. … People familiar with the government's investigation say some firms might be intentionally restraining supply in the repo market by borrowing scarce bonds and then entering deals that park a large proportion of those bonds with custodian banks, keeping them from being lent out to other traders. By constraining supply this way, traders can make their holdings -- or the holdings of clients -- more profitable." These deals, called "triparty repurchase agreements," are "part of normal trading activity, but regulators are concerned they are being abused."

Former McAfee Treasurer Agrees To Fine In Fraud Case. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, C6) reports that Eric Borrmann, a former McAfee Inc. treasurer, "agreed to pay $758,000 and accept a five-year ban on serving as an officer of a public company to settle civil charges that he aided the computer-security company's multimillion-dollar fraud from mid-1999 until he left the company in July 2000, the Securities and Exchange Commission said." He "was accused of assisting McAfee's executives and senior managers in preparing and distributing false and misleading information about the company's financial results."

Professors Call For Greater Shareholder Empowerment. In a column in the Wall Street Journal (11/1), James Dow and Paolo Volpin, two professors of finance at the London Business School, write, "Executive compensation scandals are back, in Europe as well as in the U.S. Just think of the news during the last couple of weeks. … Economists have traditionally taken a benign view of stock options and generous executive compensation. Basic economic theory suggests that they align management interests with shareholders'. … But the excesses of the last few years have fueled the resurgence of the contrarian view: that high incentive pay can actually exacerbate conflicts between shareholder value and CEO interests." They explore the issue of CEO pay and corporate governance in Europe and the US, then write, "We have no doubt that shareholder empowerment is the way forward. We would like to see more mechanisms for shareholders to voice their claims as owners. … We disagree with the view that aggressive enforcement is the key to improved corporate governance. We'd certainly like to see blatant transgressors punished, but available evidence shows that relying on enforcement by securities regulators does not suffice. If there is one lesson to be learned from the options backdating scandal, it is that even the most devious lawmaker could never anticipate and prohibit all the devices that managers might conceive to abuse their shareholders."

SEC Closes Intuit Options Probe. The AP (11/1) reports, "Intuit Inc. said the Securities and Exchange Commission has closed its investigation into the software maker's stock option accounting practices without taking any punitive action." The AP continues, "The conclusion removes Mountain View-based Intuit from a long list of companies under SEC scrutiny as regulators examine whether employee stock options had been manipulated in a way that inflates profits and decreases tax bills. The SEC began its Intuit inquiry in June." The AP adds, 'Most of the problems to surface so far have revolved around 'backdating.' … Intuit, which makes the popular TurboTax and Quicken programs, had previously disclosed that it did not need to restate its past profits because an internal investigation found no evidence of stock options misconduct. … The U.S. Attorney's office subpoenaed Intuit for information pertaining to its stock options around the same time the SEC began its investigation. Intuit said the U.S. Attorney's office hasn't sought additional information since the company passed along the findings of its internal inquiry."

DOJ_NMG_0089801

CRIMINAL LAW:

Rising Florida Violent Crime Reflects National Trend. USA Today (11/1, 3A, Johnson, 2.27M) reports that Orlando, Fla., and surrounding Orange County already have set annual records for murder this year, and "the escalating number of killings in the Orlando area has made it one of the most extreme examples of the increasing violent crime rates being reported in dozens of cities across the nation, according to a recent analysis by the Police Executive Research Forum, a police advocacy group. The FBI…has not released numbers for 2006," but the PERF "report led the Justice Department to launch a review of possible demographic and economic triggers for violence in cities from Philadelphia to Sacramento. Meanwhile, the FBI has directed more than 100 additional agents to help local authorities fight violent crime." USA adds, "Across Florida, police are reporting spikes in violence after a decade of historically low crime rates."

Florida Said To Have "Complex" Roots. In the article, USA Today singles out Florida where "the violence seems to have roots that are more complex." Ron Stucker, criminal investigations chief for the Orange County Sheriff's Department, "say that although traditional gangs have a presence here, most of the homicides in this area appear to have stemmed from robberies or drug-related disputes that suddenly turned violent."

Montgomery County Reports Increase In Violent Crime. The Washington Post (11/1, Londoño) reports, "Crime in Montgomery County increased by 7 percent during the year's second quarter, largely driven by a sharp rise in robberies, according to statistics released yesterday. Robberies increased by almost 68 percent during the reporting period, which ran from April to June. Another significant rise was in auto theft, which increased by 22 percent." Police Chief J. Thomas Manger "said the increase is part of a national trend. Across the country, violent crime is on the rise, partly driven by an increase in juvenile delinquency." The Post adds, "Other jurisdictions in the area, including Fairfax and Prince William counties, also recorded more robberies in the second quarter. But Prince George's County, which generally has a higher crime rate than Montgomery, says reported robberies fell significantly."

Libby's Lawyers Ask Judge To Bar Testimony Regarding Miller. The AP (11/1, Apuzzo) reports Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald and Vice president Cheney's former Chief of Staff I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby "agree on something: keeping Libby's perjury trial in the CIA leak case focused solely on his actions. The two are separately asking a federal judge not to allow three years of politically charged backstory in the case to seep into Libby's trial starting in January. In new court documents, Fitzgerald argued that he shouldn't have to explain why Libby was charged while others, including the source of the leak, escaped prosecution. Libby said jurors shouldn't hear about New York Times reporter Judith Miller's 85-day jail term for refusing to discuss her conversations with him." Libby's attorneys "said it would be unfair for prosecutors to discuss Miller's refusal to testify. … 'The introduction of these issues would undoubtedly cause jurors to wonder whether Ms. Miller went to jail in an effort to shield Mr. Libby from liability, and whether Mr. Libby is to blame for her incarceration,' defense attorneys wrote."

The New York Sun (10/31, Gerstein) reports, "Prosecutors are asking a federal judge to preclude lawyers for a former White House aide facing trial for lying and obstruction of justice, I. Lewis Libby, from telling jurors that the government failed to charge Mr. Libby or anyone else in connection with the event that triggered the probe, the disclosure of the identity of a veteran CIA officer in 2003." The Sun continues, "Meanwhile, defense attorneys are seeking to prevent jurors from learning about any damage caused by the leak about the CIA operative, Valerie Plame. The defense also wants to keep the jury in the dark about the 85-day incarceration of a New York Times reporter, Judith Miller, after she was cited for contempt for refusing to testify about her contacts with Mr. Libby, who was then chief of staff to Vice President Cheney." The Sun adds, "The legal maneuvering came as the two sides faced a deadline yesterday to file motions aimed at restricting evidence or arguments to be presented at Mr. Libby's trial, which is set for January. … The special prosecutor assigned to the inquiry, Patrick Fitzgerald, asked Judge Reggie Walton to preclude defense attorneys from discussing during the trial why Mr. Libby was not charged with deliberately outing Ms. Plame. Mr. Fitzgerald also asked to exclude any evidence about why others were not charged in the case."

Influential Lobbyist Major Figure In Palm Beach Corruption Probe. The Palm Beach Post (11/1, Musgrave) reports, "William Boose, one of Palm Beach County's most influential lobbyists, is a central figure in the biggest corruption scandal to rock county government in nearly a century. A federal grand jury that indicted former County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti in a land-deal conspiracy also is looking at Boose. … When FBI agents started asking questions" in the Masilotti probe, "Boose falsified legal bills to disguise the fact that he didn't charge Masilotti full price for legal services, according to the court record. He worked on Masilotti's land deal while lobbying the county commission for other developer clients," without disclosing his relationship with Masilotti. The Post notes that although Boose has not been charged, "he has hired attorney Jack Goldberger -- a legal powerhouse who has a reputation for working with authorities to negotiate plea deals for high-profile clients."

DOJ_NMG_0089802

FBI Sting Snares 35 In Philadelphia Medical Insurance Scam. The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/1, Clark, 399K) reports, "A Center City lawyer and 34 other people were charged with fraud yesterday in an elaborate sting operation that focused on personal injury claims from supposed vehicular accidents, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced. U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said his office and the FBI set up a bogus chiropractic clinic…in Northeast Philadelphia as the center of the sting, which was conducted over about three years. Officials said those charged were divided into three groups: the lawyer, Jordan B. Luber, who obtained a legal settlement on behalf of two FBI agents posing as injured patients from a vehicular accident; 31 'patients' who sought financial recovery based on false medical diagnoses and nonexistent medical treatment for supposed injuries from vehicle accidents; and 'runners' who received referral fees from Injury Associates for recruiting 'patients' to the clinic while knowing the clinic was a fraudulent operation." The Inquirer notes, "Officials said the fraudulent personal injury actions pursued by the defendants yielded more than $1.5 million in settlement demands and more than $350,000 in insurance company payments."

The Philadelphia Daily News (11/1, Hinkelman, 109K) reports, "Injury Associates was not just another chiropractic clinic. … It was part of an elaborate FBI sting carried out from 2003 to June 2006 that targeted individuals participating in phony personal-injury claims against auto insurers arising out of supposed car accidents." The Daily News notes, "Each individual sting operation began with a meeting between patients and undercover agents. … FBI agents then explained to potential patients how the scam worked. The meetings were both audio- and videotaped." US Attorney Patrick Meehan "said yesterday that the investigation is ongoing." The AP (11/1) also reports on the indictments.

Federal Investigators Find Big Dig Tunnel Design Had Minimal Safety Margin. The Boston Globe (11/1, Murphy, Allen, 425K) reports, "The Big Dig tunnel ceiling that collapsed in July was designed with a smaller margin of safety than other tunnel ceilings around the country, leaving nothing to prevent heavy concrete slabs from falling on a passing car when ceiling bolts fell out, according to a preliminary report by federal investigators obtained by the Globe." The NTSB report found that the "drop ceiling was held up by steel hangers, which were suspended from bolts that had been glued into the tunnel roof. But there were no beams attaching the ceiling to the walls, and the ceiling was constructed with half as many ceiling bolts as in the original design." The Globe adds, "The NTSB report also suggests that flaws in construction of the ceiling, carried out by Modern Continental Construction Co., may have made the design more hazardous. While offering few details, the report said FBI and State Police interviews with Modern Continental workers point to 'potential problems in the procedures used during installation.'"

High Court Considers Florida Death Row Appeal. The AP (11/1, Yost) reports, "A death row inmate's attorney argued Tuesday that the U.S. Supreme Court should allow the prisoner's appeal to continue despite a federal court ruling that he had missed a deadline for pursuing the case." The AP continues, "The lawyer for Gary Lawrence said Florida courts were to blame for the tardy appeal, not the inmate. …. Attorney Mary Bonner told the justices that Lawrence did not receive a court-appointed counsel to handle his appeal for 10 months, wiping out most of the time that he had under federal law to seek review of his death sentence." The AP adds, "The issue involves the interpretation of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, which places limits on the prolonged appeals process in capital punishment cases. It imposes a one-year deadline for petitioning federal courts in death cases after final judgments in state courts. … Under questioning by Chief Justice John Roberts, Bonner agreed with Roberts that her interpretation of the law would involve a process lasting up to six months. … The state of Florida said Lawrence had just one day remaining to petition the federal courts after the Florida Supreme Court ended the case on Nov. 18, 2002. The lawyer for the convicted killer says the deadline under the law did not expire until the U.S. Supreme Court refused to consider the case several months later."

US Gets More Time To Make Kansas Death Penalty Decision. The Topeka (KS) Capital-Journal (11/1, Fry) reports, "Frank Jerome 'Chicago' Robinson, a Topekan charged with starting a fire that killed Marvina Washington last summer, will have another month before learning whether he will face possible imposition of the death penalty." The Capital-Journal continues, "A federal district judge late last week gave federal prosecutors until Nov. 30 to decide whether to seek the federal death penalty against Robinson if he is convicted of a federal count of arson. … If

DOJ_NMG_0089803

Robinson is convicted, the maximum penalties for arson resulting in a death are life in prison or under certain circumstances, the death penalty, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office has said." The Capital-Journal adds, "Marvina Washington, 53, was killed during a fire that destroyed the apartment house she lived in at 427 S.W. Tyler. After the fire was extinguished on Aug. 8, Washington's body was recovered from her second-floor apartment. … U.S. District Judge Julie Robinson said the delay wouldn't prejudice Frank Robinson and gave prosecutors until the close of business on Nov. 30 to file notice of the prosecution's intent to seek the death penalty. Before the judge's ruling, the deadline to file the notice had been Oct. 30. … In the prosecution request for more time, U.S. Attorney Eric Melgren and assistant U.S. Attorney Anthony Mattivi didn't anticipate a decision would be made by federal prosecutors by the Oct. 30 deadline. .. 'As the court is undoubtedly aware, the process within the Department of Justice for determining whether or not to seek the death penalty in a particular case is both lengthy and cumbersome,' the prosecution motion for more time said. … Any decision to seek the death penalty must be approved by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. … The judge granted the postponement motion on Oct. 26. The judge will hear the motion on Dec. 18, and Frank Robinson is to be tried starting Feb. 6."

Bockting Appeal Could Potentially Re-Open "Thousands" Of Criminal Cases. The Christian Science Monitor (11/1, Richey) reports that the case of Marvin Bockting, who was "accused of sexually abusing his 6-year-old stepdaughter" and convicted when her "mother and the detective testified about what she had told them of the alleged sexual assault. Bockting was convicted and sentenced to life in prison," will be taken up in the Supreme Court this term. Bockting "is seeking to overturn his conviction based on a 2004 US Supreme Court decision in a case called Crawford v. Washington. In that case, the Supreme Court strongly reaffirmed the constitutional right to confront one's accusers in court. At the same time, the court struck down a rule that had allowed the introduction at trial of testimonial statements made by a potential witness prior to the trial." If the court decides to apply the Crawford rule retroactively to Bockting's case, "the case would also open the courthouse doors potentially for thousands of other individuals convicted under similar circumstances, where a key piece of testimonial evidence was allowed into the trial without the constitutional safeguard of cross-examination."

Two Found Guilty In D.C. Witness Killing. The Washington Post (11/1, Cauvin) reports that Franklin Thompson and Marquette Ward were convicted of murder yesterday in the slaying of "Jahkema 'Princess' Hansen," that the Post calls "as brazen a witness attack as the city had experienced." The trial "cast an unsettling light on the netherworld that Hansen -- and her killers -- inhabited. Just a seventh-grader, Hansen hung out with people a lot older, and she was out buying drugs with some of them at 3 a.m. when she saw a killing that later would cost her her life." The Post writes, "Yesterday, as the jury foreman answered guilty again and again -- 31 times in all -- Thompson, 24, and Ward, 31, betrayed no emotion as they sat behind their attorneys. Both were convicted of first-degree murder, conspiracy to commit murder, obstruction of justice and other offenses tied to Hansen's death."

DNA Evidence Clears Man Of Rape Charges. The New York Times/AP (11/1, Press) reports that Larry Fuller, who was "convicted of rape 25 years ago," was freed Tuesday "after a judge ruled that he would probably not have been found guilty if DNA testing been available." He "was sentenced to 50 years after jurors convicted him of aggravated rape in 1981, finding that he had broken into a woman's apartment and raped her, using a butcher knife to cut her thumb, neck and back as she struggled." The article adds, "Mr. Fuller's subsequent exoneration makes him the 10th Dallas County man in five years cleared by DNA testing. More than 20 men have been exonerated in Texas by such testing, according to the Innocence Project."

Duke Rape Case Overshadows Durham, NC, Prosecutor Election. The New York Times (11/1, Wilson) reports, "A week before Election Day, the race for Durham County district attorney is as odd a political campaign as anyone here can recall. The controversial lacrosse case looms over the incumbent, Michael B. Nifong. The opposition, under the banner of Anyone but Nifong, is fractured. … After all the accusations and commentary that the case has generated around the country, there is mostly silence at the heart of the campaign: little advertising, no debates and no platform by the leading opponent except that if he should win, the governor will pick somebody else. Still, to the extent there is any campaign at all, it is because of Mr. Nifong's handling of the case against the three players, all white, accused of rape by a black woman hired to strip at a team party in March."

Teen Student Arrested After Homemade Bomb Explodes. The Washington Post (11/1, Londoño) reports, "A 15-year-old Rockville student was arrested yesterday afternoon after a homemade 'bottle bomb' he was about to bring onto a school bus exploded as a teacher discarded it, Montgomery County Fire and Rescue Service officials said. A teacher at Mark Twain School who saw something suspicious approached the student -- whom authorities did not identify because he was charged as a juvenile -- as he was getting ready to board a school bus. As the teacher seized the two-liter bottle, its contents were activated by the movement, leading to an explosive chemical reaction. No one was injured."

DOJ_NMG_0089804

California Commission Overpaid For Services, Failed To Follow State Contract Rules. The Los Angeles Times (11/1, Morain) reports, "A state commission chaired by Hollywood entertainer Rob Reiner suffered from lapses in its contracting, failed to properly award millions of dollars and did not adequately justify many of its payments, according to a state audit released today. The nonpartisan California Bureau of State Audits found that the California Children and Families Commission, also known as the California First 5 Commission, used tax money to overpay for some services and failed to follow state rules when it awarded some contracts.

Former Security Firm Chief Sentenced To Home Detention, Probation For Diverting Funds. The Washington Times (11/1, Mcelhatton) reports, Jeffrey N. Jackson, the former chief executive of Unlimited Security Inc., "a D.C. security firm that has become bankrupt," has been sentenced by the US District Court for DC to "eight months' home detention and five years' probation for illegally diverting hundreds of thousands of dollars from a payroll account." He was also ordered to pay $361,000 in restitution. The Times adds, "According to bankruptcy filings, the company's finances were entangled with Jackson's boxing-promotions business. Earlier this year, Jackson pleaded guilty to one count of bankruptcy fraud, admitting that in 2003, he illegally diverted more than $370,000 from a payroll account."

CIVIL LAW:

Supreme Court Hears Tobacco Company's Appeal Of 1999 Penalty. USA Today (11/1, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports, "An attorney for a smoker's widow urged the Supreme Court on Tuesday to uphold a 1999 jury verdict that imposed a huge penalty on Philip Morris based on the tobacco giant's publicity campaign that played down the dangers of smoking." Robert Peck "told the justices that an Oregon jury that assessed punitive damages in the lung cancer death of Jesse Williams rightly considered how other smokers across the state were affected by Philip Morris' campaign." The Oregon Supreme Court "upheld the verdict, saying the huge punitive damages award was permissible because of Philip Morris' 'extraordinarily reprehensible' conduct." Philip Morris, "which makes Marlboros, contends the punitive damages were unconstitutionally excessive because they were so disproportionate to the actual damages and because jurors considered the company's impact on smokers not part of the case." The dispute "gives the justices a chance to clarify guidelines for awarding punitive damages."

The Washington Post (11/1, A9, Lane, 748K) also says the case "could illuminate the Roberts court's approach to tort reform." In recent years, the court "has helped the business community on the punitive-damages issue, ruling that excessive awards violate companies' constitutional rights. But yesterday's case may be especially significant because the firm seeking help is tobacco company Philip Morris, and it has been found liable not for bilking a consumer out of money, but for actually killing him." A ruling in Philip Morris's favor "would suggest that the court is so concerned about high punitive damages that it would protect even an unpopular corporate defendant. For their part, consumer and anti-smoking groups hope that the court will rule against Philip Morris -- and show that punitive-damage limits do not apply to especially reprehensible conduct." The Post ads, "By the end of oral arguments yesterday, however, it seemed that the court was reluctant to rule broadly in either direction. Instead, several members of the court, including some who had supported its recent limits on punitive damages, suggested that the best way to handle the case would be to send it back to the Oregon Supreme Court for clarification of technical state law issues."

The Wall Street Journal (11/1, A13, 2.03M) reports, "In the past decade, business has won two major rulings that rolled back blockbuster punitive damage awards, money intended to punish a defendant for its behavior and deter repetition. In each case, the court ruled the awards violated the 14th Amendment's Due Process Clause."

The New York Times (11/1, Greenhouse, 1.21M) reports "there was general agreement during the argument, including by Mrs. Williams's lawyer…that awarding damages on the basis of injury to nonplaintiffs was impermissible under the Supreme Court's recent precedents." But "there was no agreement on whether that actually happened." Peck "argued that the Oregon courts had simply permitted the jury to consider harm to others, not to impose 'global punishment' but as part of its assessment of the 'reprehensibility' of the cigarette company's behavior, a factor that the Supreme Court's precedents permit juries in punitive damages cases to consider."

The Legal Times (11/1, Mauro) reports, "The Supreme Court's long-awaited oral argument in the 'Big Tobacco' punitive damages case appeared to fizzle on Tuesday, with several justices hinting that they'd like to kick the case back to the Oregon Supreme Court for clarification." The Times continues, "Instead of delving deeply into the contentious debate over the constitutionality of high punitive damages in the context of tobacco litigation, the justices seemed troubled over more technical matters during hourlong arguments in Philip Morris USA v. Williams. … But there were some signs that if the high court decides to keep the case and rule on it, the justices might be willing to uphold the large verdict in the Philip Morris case, in spite of Court precedents that point toward limiting punitive damages." The Times adds, "In the State Farm v. Campbell decision in 2003, the high court suggested that a 9-to-1 ratio between punitive and compensatory damages was the outer limit of acceptability under the Constitution, though it said some cases could warrant higher punitive damages. … But at oral argument Tuesday, there was scant mention of ratios and a greater climate of deference toward state courts and how they handle punitive damages without federal strictures. The result could be the Court tolerating a 'tobacco exception' to State Farm that would allow higher damages because of evidence of decades of industry fraud and deception over the dangers of smoking. … But much of the argument Tuesday was taken up with the smaller-gauge issue of jury instructions that were not allowed in the 1999 trial at issue in the case. Portland, Ore., jurors awarded Mayola Williams $821,485 in compensatory and $79.5 million in punitive damages levied against Philip Morris -- a 97-to-1 ratio between punitives and compensatories. Her husband, Jesse, died in 1997 after four decades of smoking Marlboros."

DOJ_NMG_0089805

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, 2.03M) editorializes, "The outcome of this case could have ramifications far beyond tobacco. Whether a jury, in a case involving a single plaintiff, can impose extra damages on a defendant for harming other people who haven't brought suit is an issue that arises in product-liability cases of all kinds -- from autos to drugs. And the Justices yesterday seemed to agree that these pseudo-class actions might present problems of due process." The Journal adds, "When a plaintiffs lawyer is permitted to argue that damages directed at Merck or Toyota should reflect that their products harmed not only his lone client but (allegedly) everyone in the state, it raises the possibility of duplicative punishment. Even if a defendant prevails, what stops the next plaintiffs lawyer from making the same argument on behalf of another (and another and another) lone client? … This may be an even deeper due process violation than outrageous punitive damages because it goes directly to the powers of the jury, and the standards by which it imposes punishment. Some guiding restraint from the Supreme Court on the matter would be helpful."

The Washington Post (11/1, 748K) writes in an editorial, "Cancer rates in this country continue to decline, in large part because of measures such as smoking bans and cigarette taxes. If tobacco companies wanted to live up to their televised pronouncements, they would not hijack the initiative process in Arizona and Ohio, nor would they pour millions into defeating new tobacco taxes."

Also this morning, Robin S. Conrad, senior vice president of the National Chamber Litigation Center of the US Chamber of Commerce, writes in USA Today (11/1, 2.27M), "In Philip Morris v. Williams, in which the U.S. Supreme Court on Tuesday heard oral arguments, Oregon's Supreme Court upheld a $79.5 million punitive damages award that is nearly 100 times the amount of the plaintiff's compensatory damages. In its amicus brief, the National Chamber Litigation Center argued that the state supreme court ignored the Supreme Court's guidance in 2003's State Farm v. Campbell, recommending a single-digit ratio for most punitive damages awards. … Some argue that the judicial branch is not the proper place for punitive damages reform, but rather that irrational punitive damages awards are solely a problem for state legislatures and even Congress. We disagree. The Constitution prohibits the deprivation of property without 'due process of law,' and the essence of 'law' is rational and predictable standards. Courts thus have a fundamental obligation to ensure that the trial procedures employed in determining punitive damages include reasonable standards for measuring them."

DC Circuit Blocks "Light" Cigarettes Ruling. The AP (11/1, Apuzzo) reports, "A federal appeals court blocked a landmark judgment against the tobacco industry Tuesday, clearing the way for the companies to continue selling 'light' and 'low tar' cigarettes until their appeals can be reviewed." The AP continues, "The decision by the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit also allows the companies to continue for now the advertising campaigns that a federal judge in August ruled were misleading. … Without comment, the appeals court granted the tobacco companies' request to put Judge Gladys Kessler's order on hold. The companies have argued that her far-reaching ruling could cost them millions of dollars and lead to a loss of customers." The AP adds, "In mid-August, Kessler ruled that the companies had violated racketeering laws and conspired for decades to mislead the public about the health hazards of smoking. … The judge ordered the companies to publish in newspapers and on their Web sites 'corrective statements' on the adverse health effects and addictiveness of smoking and nicotine. … She also ordered tobacco companies to stop labeling cigarettes as 'low tar,' 'light,' 'ultra light' or 'mild,' since such cigarettes have been found to be no safer than others because of how people smoke them."

Bloomberg (11/1, McQuillen) reports, "Praising the appellate court's ruling, Altria's associate general counsel William Ohlemeyer said Kessler's decision 'is contrary to the law and facts presented during trial.' … Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller declined to comment."

Former McAfee Treasurer To Settle Civil Fraud Charges For $758,000. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, C6, 2.03M) reports former McAfee Treasurer Eric Borrmann yesterday "agreed to pay $758,000 and accept a five-year ban on serving as an officer of a public company to settle civil charges that he aided the computer-security company's multimillion-dollar fraud from mid-1999 until he left the company in July 2000, the Securities and Exchange Commission said." He "was accused of assisting McAfee's executives and senior managers in preparing and distributing false and misleading information about the company's financial results."

DOJ_NMG_0089806

Canadian Sentenced To 10 Years In Prison For Defrauding Merrill-Lynch. Bloomberg (11/1, Schneider) reports, "Michael Ritter, a Canadian who admitted helping ex-Merrill Lynch & Co. trader Daniel Gordon hide $43 million stolen from the securities firm, was sentenced to 10 years in prison." Ritter "was also ordered to forfeit $471,000." Bloomberg notes, "Ritter was indicted by a federal grand jury in Los Angeles for his role in aiding Larry Toshio Osaki in a Ponzi scheme in which early investors received returns above market rates from money deposited by later investors. … In exchange for his guilty plea…Ritter won't be extradited to the U.S. … Osaki was the ringleader, and Ritter deserved a lesser sentence, Thom Mrozek, spokesman at the U.S. Attorney's office in Los Angeles said in a telephone interview. 'It was a fair resolution to this matter,' Mrozek said."

California Man Sentenced To Four Years In Prison For Investment Scam. The San Francisco Chronicle (10/31, B3, Hoge, 405K) reported, "A Walnut Creek man has been sentenced to four years in federal prison for swindling investors out of $1.5 million by falsely claiming that Bill Gates and other magnates were buying shares in his company, prosecutors said Monday." Lal Bhatia "was convicted in February of 27 charges of mail fraud and money laundering. … Prosecutors said Lal Bhatia had shown forged documents to investors to support his claim that a Swiss banking entity, which didn't exist, was backing him." The Chronicle noted that US District Judge Claudia Wilken "also imposed a $100,000 fine and ordered him to pay $894,531 in restitution to his victims."

The Contra Costa Times (10/31, Avalos, 180K) reported, "The FBI and the IRS teamed up to track Bhatia's complex schemes, said Joseph Schadler, a spokesman for the FBI's Bay Area operations. 'The money trail is so convoluted that it really behooves us to have the financial expertise of the IRS on board,' Schadler said. In a separate case, Bhatia awaits trial over accusations that he and other suspects posed as wealthy financiers and a British noble as part of an alleged scam in which victims lost $1.9 million. The suspects convinced developers in Florida and Texas that they could arrange large loans for their projects in return for up-front fees to process the bogus loans, FBI investigators said." The AP (10/31) also reported on Bhatia's sentencing.

Texas Woman Sentenced To Probation For Katrina Relief Fraud. The AP (11/1) reports, "A 29-year-old woman who posed as a Hurricane Katrina evacuee to collect $2,000 in federal aid received three years probation Tuesday." Tomisha Embry of Longview, Texas, "must also pay back the money as restitution after being sentenced by U.S. District Judge Leonard Davis." The AP notes, "Last month, Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez said the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force has produced charges against more than 400 people in more than 30 federal judicial districts around the nation."

Kansas Women Plead Guilty To Health Care Fraud. The Kansas City Star (10/31, 278K) reported, "Two women pleaded guilty in federal court Monday for their roles in a scheme to defraud an employee health-care plan." Sandra Rivers of Kansas City and Delorise Jean Killiebrew of Independence "had been indicted in July with 11 others. Killiebrew acknowledged that Cheri Smith, an employee of Health Midwest Comprehensive Care's claim department, persuaded her to cash nine checks totaling more than $33,000." The Star noted, "A total of $121,284 was fraudulently paid out between January and August 2002, according to the charges." The Kansas City Business Journal (10/31) added, "Rivers admitted that she had learned about the health care fraud conspiracy from Killiebrew, a co-worker, and had agreed to accept checks in the summer of 2002. Rivers received two checks for a total of $5,516. After cashing each of the checks, Rivers kept $300 and gave the rest of the money to Killiebrew." The Journal noted, "Executive Assistant U.S. Attorney Roseann Ketchmark is prosecuting the case, which the FBI investigated."

3rd Circuit Revives Suit Against Asbestos Class Action Attorneys. The Legal Intelligencer (11/1, Duffy) reports, "The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has revived a proposed class action suit against a group of lawyers from southern states brought by more than 2,600 former clients from northern states who say they were cheated out of their fair share of $400 million in asbestos personal injury settlements in the Mississippi state courts when the lawyers gave larger payouts to southern plaintiffs." The LI continues, "Reversing a lower court's decision that dismissed the suit, Senior U.S. Circuit Judge Jane R. Roth issued a stern lecture to lawyers about the duty of loyalty. … 'We are embarrassed to have to explain a matter so elementary to the legal profession that it speaks for itself: All attorneys in a co-counsel relationship individually owe each and every client the duty of loyalty. For it to be otherwise is inconceivable,' Roth wrote in Huber v. Taylor." The LI adds, "The case provides a rare glimpse into the high-stakes world of asbestos litigation in which plaintiffs are termed "inventory" and settlements often involve hundreds or even thousands of cases. … The plaintiffs in Huber v. Taylor are steelworkers from Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana who joined a massive Mississippi asbestos suit. The defendants are lawyers from Mississippi, North Carolina and Texas. .. The suit, filed by attorneys Esther S. Trakinski and Irving Cohen of Cohen Pope in New York, alleges that the northern plaintiffs were never made aware of a complex series of agreements between and among the lawyers that, they say, ultimately led to their receiving smaller payouts than southern plaintiffs. … The northern plaintiffs had all retained lawyers in their home states -- referred to in the case as 'local counsel' -- who had in turn struck deals with a Texas lawyer who served as co-counsel. … But when the lawyers struck a series of settlements worth more than $400 million, the northern plaintiffs claim that their share was reduced because the southern lawyers wanted to allocate a greater percentage of aggregate settlements to southerners in order to minimize the percentages paid to the northern plaintiffs' local counsel."

DOJ_NMG_0089807

Center For Digital Democracy Asks FTC To Investigate Online Advertisers. USA Today (11/1, Hopkins) reports that the Center for Digital Democracy "is expected to file a Federal Trade Commission complaint asking the agency to investigate online advertisers. It also wants the FTC to force companies to halt what it calls deceptive practices and encourage Congress to pass legislation bolstering consumer privacy protection." Jeff Chester, the center's executive director, "says hundreds of companies now track consumers online, gathering detailed dossiers about reading, spending and other habits that endanger personal privacy. Privacy policies published on websites don't adequately warn consumers, he says."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ To Send Election Monitors To At Least 20 States. USA Today (11/1, Wolf, Johnson) reports, "Thousands of lawyers, election monitors and volunteers with video cameras will be mobilized on Election Day in an effort to guard against problems at the polls." USA continues, "The Justice Department will dispatch more than 800 observers, a record for a non-presidential election year, to look for evidence of discrimination, intimidation and other obstacles to voter accessibility in at least 20 states." USA adds, "The Democratic Party has a 50-state voter-protection effort and an estimated 7,000 lawyers at the ready. Liberal groups have set up hotlines for voters to call if they are denied the right to vote. And hundreds of people plan to film interviews at polling places where voters are being challenged that day. … Fueling the activity this year: dozens of close elections that could decide control of Congress and the potential for problems caused by electronic voting machines, statewide databases and identification requirements. … Republican and conservative interest groups are keeping a lower profile. The Republican National Committee is relying on its state parties for poll monitors and lawyers. Groups such as the Republican National Lawyers Association lack the manpower to match the NAACP, Common Cause and People for the American Way." USA notes, "Justice Department monitors will be deployed next week, partly based on close races for Congress and where questions have been raised about the integrity of the election process. That could include Baltimore, Chicago, Cleveland and other places that encountered problems during primaries this year. … Prosecutors will be on standby in each federal district across the country to pursue possible fraud cases or other election-related criminal activity. 'Everyone agrees that we want to make voting easier and fraud harder,' says Assistant Attorney General Wan Kim."

CNN.com (11/1, Frieden) reports, "The Justice Department plans to dispatch more than 800 federal observers and monitors to 20 states to protect voting rights in potentially troubled polling locations, officials announced Tuesday. … That is a record number of federal officials watching polling stations in an off-year election. … 'Yes, the anticipated closeness of races is one factor in our decisions about where we'll be sending people,' said Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights Wan Kim." CNN continues, "Kim said he would not identify until Monday the more than 65 cities and counties to which the observers will be sent. … The locations where federal observers will be stationed are selected because of past polling problems, an uneasy history among ethnically or racially diverse groups, or where fears and allegations of potential violations are asserted. … The Justice Department is reluctant to make public plans for elections observers. One official said that is because observers are viewed, in part, as frontline collectors of data that could be used to construct cases against local jurisdictions."

NAACP To Monitor Election In St Landry Parish, LA. The Baton Rouge (LA) Advocate (11/1, Burgess) reports, "The NAACP plans to organize poll watchers in St. Landry Parish to monitor what's expected to be a tight race between a black woman interim sheriff and her white male challenger." The Advocate continues, "Concerns of possible racial intimidation in the sheriff's election have also attracted the attention of the U.S. Justice Department, which monitored the parish's primary election on Sept. 30 and is expected to return next week. .. .The NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, working with local civil rights groups, hopes to assemble a team of 24 poll watchers to oversee the elections, said Kristen Clarke-Avery, assistant counsel for the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund." The Advocate adds, "Clarke-Avery said the group had 12 monitors for last month's elections. … 'All of us are out there to see to it that everybody can exercise their constitutional right to vote,' said Clifton Lemelle Sr., a retired educator from Eunice who is helping organize the poll watchers. … Lemelle said there were no confirmed reports of racial intimidation from the Sept. 30 election. … Federal monitors also reported no apparent violations."

DOJ_NMG_0089808

DOJ Says States Will Not Be Penalized For Voting Systems Lapses. The AP (11/1, Jordan) reports, "The Justice Department isn't penalizing states that fail to upgrade voting systems by next week's elections, a requirement passed by Congress in 2002." The AP continues, "Federal efforts to combat election fraud and prevent voter intimidation on Nov. 7 are among the most rigorous ever, Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim said Tuesday. He estimated 800 federal observers and monitors are headed next week to oversee elections in 20 states - selected in part because of close races there. … But prosecutors have not penalized states, or tried to hold them in contempt, if they failed to comply with the 2002 Help America Vote Act, Kim said. The law required states to plan for switching to electronic ballot machines and have a voter registration database up and working in time for the 2006 elections." The AP adds, "If states 'miss a deadline, or if they don't do something by a certain time, then obviously we would first go back to the table and try to figure out why, and how we can fix the problem,' Kim told reporters. … If a state still falls short, the Justice Department could go to court and seek a contempt order, which could carry penalties, Kim said. 'But that's something we don't like to do. It means a problem's broken and we can't fix it easily.' … Justice Department officials said it is unclear how many states have not fully updated their voting systems. The department has filed lawsuits against four states - Alabama, Maine, New Jersey and New York - and they have until sometime in 2007 to comply. … Other states are in varying degrees of compliance. They have escaped legal action because they have made good-faith efforts to meet the new standards. … But critics say the absence of electronic voting machines and outdated registration rolls can lead to major problems at the polls - and potentially skew election results."

GOP Challenges Westchester, NY, Voter Rolls. The New York Times (11/1, Santos) reports, "Republicans are challenging the right of thousands of registered voters in the local State Senate district to cast ballots on Nov. 7, charging that these voters do not live at the addresses listed with the Westchester County Board of Elections." The Times continues, "The dispute set off a war of words between the district's longtime incumbent, State Senator Nicholas A. Spano, and his Democratic rival, Andrea Stewart-Cousins, whom Mr. Spano beat by just 18 votes in 2004, after a contentious recount that lasted three months. … John Ciampoli, a Republican lawyer who handled the recount for Mr. Spano two years ago, said he found the discrepancies after checking postal change-of-address cards against district's voting rolls. On Friday, Mr. Ciampoli submitted the challenges to the Board of Elections, questioning the validity of 5,929 voter registrations and asking the board to send police officers to voters' homes to find out if any of them had moved." The Times adds, "Ms. Stewart-Cousins, a six-term county legislator, held a flurry of news conferences criticizing the challenges. In an interview, she called the idea of using officers to verify addresses as 'an attempt to intimidate voters before the voting even begins.' … Mr. Ciampoli, who lives on the outskirts of Albany, said he filed the challenges on behalf of the state's Republican Party and the Westchester Republican Committee. In 2004, he successfully challenged hundreds of paper ballots most likely cast for Ms. Stewart-Cousins in the 35th State Senate district race."

12 Charged In California Voter Fraud Case. The AP (11/1, Flaccus) reports, "Twelve people have been charged with tricking voters in Orange County (CA) into registering as Republicans, prosecutors said Monday." The AP continues, "The defendants, ranging in age from 19 to 52, were accused of fraudulently registering 37 voters as Republicans between August 2005 and February 2006. Democrats, Green Party members and a noncitizen were registered as Republicans, prosecutors said." The AP adds, "The suspects were hired to register new Republicans by private firms paid by the Orange County Republican Party, prosecutors said. The recruiters worked for the firm Bader & Associates, as well as a subcontractor, John Burkett. Both have said they no longer work on voter registration drives. … No charges were filed against the companies or the Republican Party." The AP notes, "The recruiters visited shopping centers and college campuses and were paid $10 a head for newly registered Republicans in a district represented by U.S. Rep. Loretta Sanchez, a Democrat, prosecutors said. … Voters were asked to sign petitions for lower taxes or stricter sex offender laws, then tricked into signing voter registration cards, Orange County prosecutor Anthony Rackauckas said. Other information was filled in using voters' driver's licenses, he said."

US Settles Racial Bias Complaint Against Milwaukee Nightclub. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (11/1, Barton) reports, "The federal government and the owner of a downtown Milwaukee nightclub have agreed to settle a civil rights suit in which the government accused the business of discriminating against African-Americans." The Sentinel continues, "The suit, filed by U.S. Attorney Steven M. Biskupic in late 2005, said that Eve, a club at 718 N. Milwaukee St., has discriminated against African-Americans since at least 2002, according to court records. The suit accused the owner of the club, Tom Wackman, of refusing entry to black patrons on the basis of race. Wackman contended that he runs an exclusive club that turns prospective patrons away for a number of reasons, but not race." The Sentinel adds, "The government contended that Eve gave 'false or pretextual reasons' for denying black people entry, 'such as inappropriate attire, exclusion due to a private party, or that Eve was already full, while similarly-situated white persons were admitted to Eve,' according to a Department of Justice news release." The Sentinel notes, "Eve did not admit wrongdoing and will not be sanctioned, according to Timothy Baldwin, attorney for Wackman. … 'We'll continue to do business as in the past, and the government will watch and make sure we're doing exactly what we said, which is maintaining a high-end, limited-access nightclub,' Baldwin said. … Wackman has contended that his goal was to run an exclusive club like those in Chicago and Los Angeles that grant or deny entry based on things such as clothing, attitude and fame."

DOJ_NMG_0089809

DOJ Will Not Probe Death Of Virginia Man In Police Custody. The Lynchburg (VA) News & Advance (11/1, Brown, Busse) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department says it lacks sufficient information to justify a civil rights investigation into the death of Clarence Lightfoot Beard Jr., who died Sept. 24 while in custody of Lynchburg police." The N&A continues, "The department's decision was outlined in an Oct. 25 letter to L. Garnell Stamps, a local civil rights activist who requested the investigation. … Stamps wrote an Oct. 6 letter to the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division expressing his concerns about the circumstances surrounding Beard's death." The N&A adds, "The matter is the focus of an ongoing investigation by the Virginia State Police and two separate investigations by the Lynchburg Police Department. … Meanwhile, city officials have refused to release public records about the incident, saying they are confidential because they deal with 'personnel matters' or an 'ongoing investigation.' … The lack of a public record weighed heavily on the justice department's decision not to proceed with a civil rights investigation. … 'The information which you furnished is insufficient to permit us to determine the existence of a possible violation of federal criminal civil rights statutes,' wrote Daniel Rosenholtz, a paralegal specialist for the Civil Rights Division's Criminal Section, to Stamps. 'Therefore, we are unable to authorize investigation of your complaint at this time.'"

Legal Challenge To Mississippi Judicial Election Withdrawn. The AP (11/1) reports from Jackson, MS, "The attorney for a group of black plaintiffs has withdrawn a federal complaint challenging how Mississippi will elect state circuit and chancery judges." The AP continues, "Attorney Carroll Rhodes of Hazlehurst, who filed the lawsuit in U.S. District Court in October, told Judge Henry T. Wingate that he was withdrawing the request after the Justice Department officially pre-cleared the election change Monday in a letter. .. 'Our complaint was that it should be submitted for pre-clearance,' Rhodes said. 'On Oct. 10, the state submitted it for pre-clearance and on Oct. 30, 2006, the attorney general tentatively gave pre-clearance.' … Rhodes told Wingate the request shouldn't go forward." The AP adds, "In the pre-clearance letter, the Justice Department said that for the remainder of the 60-day period the office has to review the matter under the Voting Rights Act, information can be submitted that could result in changes to the pre-clearance. .. .Rhodes said plaintiffs were never seeking to stop or postpone the election. Rhodes said he wanted the judiciary races under the election law before it was rewritten by the Legislature in 2005. … He said the new law was to take effect Jan. 1, 2007, not for the Nov. 7 general election."

Illinois Teen Shot By Police Stun Gun Dies. The AP (11/1) reports from Jerseyville, IL, "A teenager carrying a Bible and shouting 'I want Jesus' was shot twice with a police stun gun and later died at a St. Louis hospital, authorities said." The AP continues, "In a statement obtained Tuesday by The Associated Press, police in Jerseyville, about 40 miles north of St. Louis, said 17-year-old Roger Holyfield would not acknowledge officers who approached him and he continued yelling, 'I want Jesus.' … Police tried to calm the teen, but Holyfield became combative, according to the statement. Officers fired the stun gun at him after he ignored their warnings, then fired again when he continued struggling, police said." The AP adds, "Holyfield was flown to St. Louis' Cardinal Glennon Hospital after the confrontation Saturday; he died there Sunday, police said. … An autopsy was planned for Tuesday." The AP notes, "In a report released in March, international human rights group Amnesty International said it had logged at least 156 deaths across the country in the previous five years related to police stun guns. … The rise in deaths accompanies a marked increase in the number of U.S. law enforcement agencies employing devices made by Taser International Inc. of Scottsdale, Ariz. About 1,000 of the nation's 18,000 police agencies used Tasers in 2001; more than 7,000 departments had them last year, according to a government study. .. Police had used Tasers more than 70,000 times as of last year, Congress' Government Accountability Office said."

DOJ May Reopen Probe Of California Redistricting Plan. The Inland Valley (CA) Daily Bulletin (11/1, Anderson) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department might reopen an inquiry into a claim that the 2001 redistricting plan for the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors discriminates against Latinos, officials said Tuesday." The Bulletin continues, "Latinos comprise 47 percent of the county's population but are represented by only one of the five supervisors. … Joaquin G. Avila, special counsel to the 1,070-member Los Angeles County Chicano Employees Association, recently provided the Justice Department with what he says is new evidence that indicates supervisors packed Latino voters into a single district when two districts could have been drawn." The Bulletin adds, "First District Supervisor Gloria Molina, whose district includes Pomona, represents most of the county's Latino residents. .. .Avila's filing seeks the creation of two supervisorial districts with Latino majorities that would give the Latino community an opportunity to elect a second candidate to the Board of Supervisors, said Alan Clayton, director of equal employment opportunity at the LACCEA."

DOJ_NMG_0089810

Officials Investigate Man's Death After Scuffle With Deputies. The Los Angeles Times (11/1, Wride) reports, "Authorities today are investigating the death of a Long Beach man after a confrontation with Los Angeles County sheriff's deputies Sunday night. The 39-year-old man scuffled on a Lakewood corner with deputies who thought he had a handgun, according to the Sheriff's Department. What was thought to be a weapon turned out to be a cell phone, officials said." The man's name was not released.

South Dakota Abortion Vote Likely To Influence National Debate. The New York Times (11/1, Davey, 1.21M) reports the battle in South Dakota "over a statewide ballot measure to install one of the country's strictest anti-abortion laws is playing out in television commercials, yard signs and Sunday sermons. It is also drawing the attention of national advocates on both sides of the abortion debate, who are watching the campaign with deep intensity and even fear." Both sides "predict that the outcome of the vote in South Dakota could send the country's broader debate over abortion rights swerving in new directions, and will set the tone for the fate of similarly strict laws being considered in nearly a dozen other states." Nancy Keenan, the president of Naral Pro-Choice America, which opposes the South Dakota ban, said, "I think there's some sense out there that — 'By golly, if they can do it there, we're going to do it here.'" The Times adds Daniel McConchie, "the vice president of Americans United for Life, which favors passage of the measure, said a defeat at the polls on Nov. 7 could take the steam out of efforts to impose even less restrictive measures, like parental notification rules or waiting periods, that have been the focus of the anti-abortion movement in recent years."

NYTimes Accuses New York GOP Of Attempting To Suppress Minority Vote. The New York Times (11/1, 1.21M), in an editorial, writes, "One of the most deplorable political tactics — trying to suppress the votes of poor or minority citizens by raising the specter of voter fraud — is playing out this week in the city of Yonkers. Republican Party lawyers are calling for an 11th-hour purge of voter rolls in a clear effort to help their endangered state senator, Nicholas Spano. … If the Republicans were sincere about tidying the voter rolls, they could have raised the alarm long ago. Instead they dropped a bomb at the last minute — a conjectural list of possibly problematic names that the Board of Elections has no hope of clearing up before Nov. 7."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Suspends Antitrust Probe Of Entercom. The AP (11/1, Yao) reports, "The Justice Department said Tuesday it has suspended an antitrust investigation into Entercom Communications Corp.'s purchase of several New York radio stations because the company said it would sell three stations to comply with media ownership rules." The AP continues, "The Justice Department had been looking into Entercom's $262 million purchase of 15 radio stations from CBS Corp. in Austin, Texas; Cincinnati; Memphis, Tenn.; and Rochester, N.Y. … The investigation centered on Rochester, where Bala Cynwyd-based Entercom already owns four radio stations, one AM and three FM. The acquisition would hand over four more FM stations in the area." The AP adds, "With eight radio stations, Entercom would control more than 57 percent of the radio advertising market, and the Justice Department was investigating whether its dominant market share would lead to reduced competition and higher prices for radio advertising. … Federal Communications Commission's rules on local ownership would prohibit Entercom from owning more than five FM stations in an area, requiring it to sell two. … Entercom said it's planning to sell three stations — the CBS-owned WRMM-FM and WZNE-FM and Entercom's WFKL-FM — to comply with FCC rules. The stations are expected to be sold within three months to a buyer approved by the Justice Department, according to a news release issued by the department Tuesday."

Donnelley To Acquire Banta In $1.3 Billion Deal. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, B3) reports, "R.R. Donnelley & Sons Co. said late yesterday it has agreed to acquire Banta Corp., a Menasha, Wis., provider of printing and digital-imaging solutions, in a $1.3 billion deal. The agreement comes as printing-services provider Cenveo Inc. said it has withdrawn its $50-a-share acquisition offer for Banta. Cenveo, Stamford, Conn., in August offered to buy rival Banta for $46 a share, or about $1.12 billion. Banta rejected the offer, opting instead to announce a restructuring that would cut as many as 500 jobs and close five printing plants.:

DOJ_NMG_0089811

Widening Memory-Chip Probe Targets Sony. The AP (11/1, Robertson) reports, "An obscure corner of the semiconductor industry became an international battleground Tuesday as Sony Corp. became the fifth company ensnared in a U.S. Department of Justice antitrust probe into the sales of a particular type of memory chip." The AP continues, "The same day, European Union regulators said they raided several unnamed semiconductor companies in Germany on Oct. 11 as part of a probe into possible price fixing for the same type of chip." The AP adds, "Both investigations center on the sale of static random access memory, or SRAM, a kind of computer memory found in relatively small quantities in PCs and used in disk drives, communications equipment and networking gear." The AP notes, "European regulators were explicit that the companies targeted in the cartel raid were suspected of breaking price-fixing laws. … However, the European Commission never names the companies suspected of operating a cartel and said that the surprise inspections were a preliminary step in its probe. … Under EU law, businesses found guilty of taking part in a cartel can be fined up to 10 percent of their annual revenue. … In Washington, Justice Department officials declined to discuss details of the probe. Spokeswoman Gina Talamona would only say that antitrust prosecutors are 'investigating the possibility of anticompetitive practices in the SRAM industry.'"

The New York Times (11/1, Fackler) reports, "An earlier investigation by the Justice Department into price fixing in the market for another type of memory chip, dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, led to $731 million in fines imposed on four companies and several individuals." The Times adds, "Sony's sales last year of SRAM chips totaled $28 million, a fraction of the company's $64 billion in global sales. The bigger potential damage will probably be to Sony's once-sterling reputation, which has already been tarnished by the recent recall of 9.6 million laptop batteries and delays to its widely awaited next-generation game console, PlayStation 3. … The recent problems have come just as Sony appeared headed to recovery under its first non-Japanese chief executive, Sir Howard Stringer. … Under Mr. Stringer, who took Sony's helm last year, the company had appeared to be bouncing back from blunders like losing the market in global portable music players to the iPod from Apple and being late to produce flat-panel televisions."

Bloomberg (11/1, Newman) reports, "European Union regulators are investigating potential price-fixing of memory chips used in computers and mobile phones, working with U.S. authorities." Bloomberg continues, "A Sony Corp. chip-making unit, Sony Electronics Inc., received a U.S. Justice Department subpoena seeking information about its business, the company said in a statement today. U.S. regulators are conducting a criminal price-fixing investigation into the market for static random-access memory chips. … The EU is probing makers of SRAM chips, coordinating with U.S. authorities. The commission conducted unannounced inspections at offices in Germany on Oct. 11 along with national antitrust officials, commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said. He didn't identify the companies involved. The U.S. inquiry follows a three-year probe of price-fixing in the DRAM chip market." Bloomberg adds, "Samsung Electronics Co., Cypress Semiconductor Corp. and Micron Technology Inc., among the biggest makers of the chips, said Oct. 12 that the Justice Department had contacted them about SRAMs. In the probe of the dynamic random-access memory chip probe, the Justice Department has collected $731 million in criminal fines, including $300 million from Samsung."

Former Head Of Tulsa Firm Fined For Bid-Rigging. The Durango (CO) Herald (11/1, Hanel) reports, "A Tulsa company was fined $150,000 for rigging bids for the construction of BP natural-gas pipelines in Southwest Colorado. … Flint Energy Services received the sentence on Monday from U.S. District Court Judge Phillip Figa." The Herald continues, "The company and the former head of its Farmington office, Kenneth L. Rains, pleaded guilty in August to conspiring with other unnamed people to defraud BP by submitting high bids for pipeline construction. Bid-rigging is a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act. … Rains has been transferred to the company's Oklahoma headquarters, but he hasn't been fired. Figa questioned why not. … 'Why does the company keep on someone who has committed a felony?' Figa asked." The Herald adds, "Flint's attorney, Ryan Stoll, said the company isolated Rains from his old post but decided not to fire him because of 'personal circumstances' that might become clear at Rains' sentencing in January. Stoll said he expects Rains to be sent to prison. … Flint and lawyers for the Justice Department's antitrust division had asked for a fine of $100,000, citing the prompt cooperation of Flint executives. Federal sentencing guidelines call for a fine of $161,000 to $322,000. … Carla Stern, a Justice Department attorney, said there's no evidence the conspiracy went any higher than Rains. She praised Flint executives for cooperating and speeding up the case."

AMD Seeks Intel Documents In Antitrust Suit. The AP (11/1) reports, "Advanced Micro Devices Inc., the No. 2 computer chip maker behind Intel Corp., asked the court overseeing its antitrust lawsuit against Intel to force the company to produce documents related to its conduct outside of the United States." The AP continues, "The judge had previously ruled AMD cannot sue in the U.S. for Intel's alleged monopolistic tactics overseas. .. .But AMD argued in the motion filed Monday in a Delaware federal court that the order only applies to damages sought in the U.S. for Intel's alleged strong-arm tactics abroad. AMD maintains it should be allowed to use documentation of those actions to pursue domestic commerce claims." The AP adds, "Sunnyvale-based AMD, which filed its lawsuit in June 2005, accuses Santa Clara-based Intel of bullying major customers into exclusive deals and offering secret rebates to undercut AMD in the market for microprocessors, which act as the brains of computers. .. .The lawsuit alleges anticompetitive practices in several countries including Britain, Germany and Japan."

DOJ_NMG_0089812

Donnelley To Buy Banta In $1.3 Billion Deal. The AP (11/1) reports, "R.R. Donnelley & Sons Co. will acquire Banta Corp. in a $1.3 billion deal combining two Midwestern printing firms with histories dating back more than a century, the companies announced Tuesday." The AP continues, "Chicago-based R.R. Donnelley, which prints the Yellow Pages, said the acquisition will allow it to expand its range of products and services for customers and also enhance its services in magazine, catalog and book printing and in direct marketing." The AP adds, "Donnelley also said in a press release that while it expected its 2006 earnings from continuing operations to be at the high end of earlier guidance of $2.45 to $2.50, anticipated restructuring charges made it impossible to estimate net income for the full year. … Banta, based in Menasha, Wis., has operations in Europe and Asia, in addition to the United States. … The cash deal is valued at about $1.3 billion, or $36.50 per share after a special dividend of $16.00 per share already declared by Banta. The offer, equal to $52.50 per share, represents a premium of 18.6 percent over Banta's closing share price Tuesday on the New York Stock Exchange of $44.28."

Stratex-Harris Deal Gets Antitrust Nod. The AP (11/1) reports, "Stratex Networks Inc., a maker of digital microwave radios used in wireless communications, said Tuesday the required waiting period for its merger into Harris Corp.'s microwave communications unit has ended." The AP continues, "The deal, announced in September, would give Harris a majority stake in the new company." The AP adds, "Melbourne, Fla.-based Harris, which sells communications products to government and commercial customers, will contribute its microwave division and $25 million in cash and get a 56 percent ownership stake in the combined company. Shareholders of Stratex will own 44 percent. … The waiting period was required by the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976. … The deal still requires approval by other regulators and Stratex shareholders."

Music Publishers Strike Anti-Piracy Deal With Kazaa. The AP (11/1) reports, "The music publishing industry reached a tentative deal with operators of the Kazaa file-sharing network over claims of copyright infringement, an industry group said." The AP continues, "Publishers pursuing a class-action suit against Kazaa informed U.S. District Court on Monday that the peer-to-peer network had agreed to pay "a substantial sum" under the agreement, the National Music Publishers' Association said in a statement. … The amount of the settlement was not disclosed. It is subject to final approval by the association board." The AP adds, "The settlement 'will be another key milestone of the ongoing transformation of the digital music marketplace to one that will allow legal services to thrive,' NMPA president and chief executive David Israelite said in the statement. … Sharman Networks announced in July that it had settled copyright infringement lawsuits with music labels and movie studios, agreeing to redesign its software to block customers from downloading protected music and movies and to pay more than $115 million in penalties."

Two Real Estate Firms Merge. The Washington Post (11/1, Hedgpeth) reports, "CB Richard Ellis Group Inc., the world's largest commercial real estate broker and one of the most prominent real estate firms in Washington, agreed yesterday to buy rival Trammell Crow Co. in a deal worth $2.2 billion that will more than double its property management business. Although neither company is based here, both are considered major local players. CB Richard Ellis, which manages 22 million square feet of space in the Washington area, is handling the leasing of one of the Watergate office buildings and has done leasing for Northrop Grumman Corp., Verizon Communications Inc. and General Dynamics Corp." The Post adds, "The deal is one of several mergers that have occurred in the past few years as clients seek more efficient ways of buying, selling and leasing office space, industry experts said."

The Wall Street Journal (11/1, B4, Chittum, Herrick) reports, "The deal, by far the biggest in the commercial real-estate services sector, hastens consolidation that began in earnest a decade ago and has transformed what were once regional businesses focused on lease and sales brokerage into a handful of multiservice behemoths catering to multinational corporations increasingly looking to outsource their global real-estate functions. … Much of the industry's consolidation has been driven by geographic considerations, including the last major deal in 2003 when CB Richard Ellis swallowed Insignia/ESG to boost its New York presence."

Google Acquires Document Management Firm. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, A15, Delaney) reports, "Google Inc. said it acquired closely held start-up JotSpot for an undisclosed sum, a move that could strengthen Google's expanding services for users to create and share documents online. JotSpot, exploiting a technology called wikis, provides free and paid services that allow individuals to jointly work on Web-based information such as spreadsheets, photo albums, calendars and contact lists. Google, Mountain View, Calif., has assembled free online word-processing, spreadsheet, email and calendar services that have some similarities with JotSpot's offerings. Such services could win away some of the consumers Microsoft Corp. is targeting with its Office software."

DOJ_NMG_0089813

ENVIRONMENT:

Boulder Set To Vote On Whether To Impose Nation's First Carbon Tax. USA Today (11/1, 6A, Kenworthy, 2.27M) reports, "Voters in Boulder, Colo., will decide Tuesday whether the city will become the first in the nation to impose a 'carbon tax' on homeowners and businesses to fund efforts to reduce emissions that cause global warming. If approved, the ballot measure would tax electricity usage and add about $16-$20 a year to the average residential electric bill." Boulder's "City Council authorized the ballot measure to fund a city plan to reduce greenhouse emissions 7% below 1990 levels. ... Four years ago, the city adopted emission targets set by the 1997 Kyoto Protocol, an international agreement the United States has not ratified... ." USA Today notes, "No group has organized in the city to oppose the tax measure, and even the Boulder Chamber of Commerce has endorsed it."

Venture Capitalist's Promotion Of Prop 87 Criticized. In his Wall Street Journal (11/1, 2.03M) column, Holman W. Jenkins, Jr., criticizes venture capitalist Vinod Khosla, "an avid investor in ethanol ventures," for his promotion of California's Proposition 87 ballot measure, under which "California-produced oil would be taxed to fund alternative energy projects." Jenkins says, "there's been no shortage of capital for alternative energy ventures. ... This year's boom was sparked by a sudden shift in federal policy and a short-lived gasoline spike. The price of ethanol is expected to fall dramatically." Khosla's "real concern, to the extent that he has offered a coherent one, is global warming. Now this at least could be the subject of an intelligent debate -- about whether climate concerns justify putting a heavy government finger on the scale to help biofuel investors in their competition with gasoline. But the public would have to be told that part of the plan is higher gas prices." The "proposition is expected to lose handily, but for his modest contribution (a reported $1 million), Mr. Khosla has reaped an untold bonanza of propaganda for his energy investments. Already Congress is hurriedly putting together an expansion of the ethanol mandate in last year's energy bill in hopes of soaking up the excess supply stimulated by previous government actions. Earth's atmosphere might not notice the difference, but Mr. Khosla's portfolio certainly will."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Person Of Interest In California Wildfire Arrested As Fifth Firefighter Dies. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/1, Glazer) reports, "Authorities on Tuesday arrested a 37-year-old man suspected of igniting two wildfires this summer and who is considered a 'person of interest' in the Esperanza blaze, which killed five firefighters. Word of the arrest came an hour after a somber news conference at which officials announced the death of a horribly burned firefighter," Pablo Cerda, "who survived five days on life support. Raymond Lee Oyler of Beaumont was arrested…on two counts of arson related to wildfires in June, the Riverside County Sheriff's Department said in a statement posted on its Web site late Tuesday." The AP notes, "As part of the investigation, authorities said they sifted through hundreds of tips and interviewed previously convicted arsonists who live in the Cabazon area. Assisting in the investigation were the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The reward for information leading to an arrest had topped $500,000."

The Los Angeles Times (11/1, Reston, Lin, Abrams, 918K) reports, "Investigators continued working with more than 300 tips called in to an arson hotline since the fire began early Thursday. … Although authorities didn't indicate which fires Oyler was charged with setting, Riverside and San Bernardino counties were hit with a rash of more than 40 small, suspicious fires in May and the first half of June. One such fire in mid-June broke out in Cabazon, burning 10 acres near the intersection of Esperanza Avenue and Broadway, not far from the Esperanza blaze.

17 Indicted After FBI, Wisconsin Police Raid Drug Gang. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (11/1, Barton, 259K) reports, "Seventeen people affiliated with a gang that authorities say has been distributing cocaine, crack cocaine and marijuana on Milwaukee's north side for about 15 years have been charged with conspiracy and other drug offenses in federal court in Milwaukee, according to an indictment made public Tuesday." The Journal Sentinel notes, "Two hundred law enforcement officers from the FBI, Milwaukee Police Department, state Department of Justice and other state and local agencies rounded up the defendants in the culmination of a two-year investigation, said Linda Krieg, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Milwaukee office. Swat teams from the FBI's Milwaukee and Chicago offices both were involved in the arrests because the suspects were considered armed and dangerous, Krieg said. The 10 arrests were made without incident, she said. Five other defendants already were in state custody," and "two remained at large Tuesday evening."

DOJ_NMG_0089814

Protest Of Utah Pot Sale Sentence Grows. The Salt Lake Tribune (11/1, Neff) reports, "Former top Justice Department officials and several judges have asked the U.S. Supreme Court to hear the appeal of a Utah man sentenced to serve 55 years in prison for selling pot - a sentence decried by a judge who said the law forced his hand." The Tribune continues, "The 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver in January rejected an argument that the sentence handed down to record producer Weldon Angelos was cruel and unusual punishment that was disproportionate to his crime. … But a friend of the court brief filed with the high court by 145 people -including former U.S. Attorneys General Griffin Bell, Benjamin Civiletti, Nicholas Katzenbach and Janet Reno; other former high ranking Justice Department officials and former federal judges - urges the high court to take the case." The Tribune adds, "Angelos, 26, the founder of Extravagant Records, was accused of selling 8 ounces of marijuana to a police informant three times in May and June 2002. At one sale, he had a gun strapped to his ankle, according to court records. At the other drug buys, there were firearms in the vicinity. … A federal grand jury originally indicted Angelos in November 2002 on one gun possession count, three counts of marijuana distribution and two lesser charges. After Angelos rejected a plea bargain that would have sent him to prison for 16 years, authorities obtained a new indictment with 20 charges. … . When Angelos asked to reopen negotiations, prosecutors said it was too late. In December 2001, a jury convicted him of 16 counts."

Maryland Man Convicted Of Drug Distribution Gets 20-Year Sentence. The Frederick (MD) News Post (10/31) reports a Frederick man "caught in an undercover operation headed by the Drug Enforcement Administration was sentenced Monday to 20 years in federal prison. Winfred Gregg Travis' sentence stems from his conviction for distributing crack cocaine and possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. … Since 1991, Travis has been charged in Frederick and Montgomery counties 10 times, primarily with drug crimes, but also with breaking and entering, battery and disorderly conduct, according to court records."

Eighth Member Of Hawaiian Drug Ring Sentenced. The Maui News (11/1) reports, "The eighth member of a methamphetamine trafficking ring was sentenced Monday by U.S. District Court Judge J. Michael Seabright to nearly 24 years in prison, according to the U.S. Department of Justice." The News continues, "Leandro Gomez III, 30, of Las Vegas, was one of 10 defendants to plead guilty to charges of taking part in a large-scale organization that imported methamphetamine from Las Vegas to Maui. .. .'Gomez was the Las Vegas supplier of the methamphetamine, which was transported to Maui either by couriers or mail shipment,' a Justice Department news release says." The News adds, "In Las Vegas, he had been assisted by co-defendants Timothy James Sullivan and Gilbert Gomez Jr., federal officials said. And, on Maui, 'Nathaniel Russell and Pamela Mahealani Newton (husband and wife) oversaw an extensive distribution network involving co-defendants John Corniel Jr., Charles R.K. Farren, Roger Manu Bates, Cyrinah L. Aken and Reed Kaleookalani Aken.' … The investigation of the drug ring resulted in the recovery of 616.8 grams (1.4 pounds) of methamphetamine from Bates in early May 2005 on Maui, according to Justice Department officials."

The Honolulu Star-Bulletin (10/31) reports, "The 30-year-old Las Vegas supplier of a large-scale trafficking organization bringing 'ice' to Maui in 2005 was sentenced in federal court yesterday to 23 years and eight months in prison. U.S. District Judge J. Michael Seabright sentenced Leandro Gomez III, who pleaded guilty to methamphetamine-trafficking charges along with nine others. … U.S. Attorney Michael Kawahara "said efforts by Maui police, the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and other law enforcement agencies in this and other cases have 'stemmed the flow of drugs to Hawaii.'" The Maui News (10/31) and Honolulu Advertiser (10/31) also report on the sentencing.

Court Ruling Could Reduce Michigan Man's Sentence In Heroin Case. Grand Rapids (MI) Press (10/31, Agar) reports a federal appeals court ruling "could shorten the 25-year prison term for a man who provided heroin to a friend and failed to call 911 as she was dying in his Grandville home. Kevin Obi, 23, pleaded guilty to providing heroin that killed Nora Lares, 21, in 2004." The Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals "said recently the prosecution failed to show Obi's false statements [to investigators] significantly hurt the investigation. The court ordered the case returned to U.S. District Court for resentencing." The government "argued Obi's false statements led police to initially consider the crime scene to be the vehicle, rather than his basement, which resulted in a loss of possible evidence."

San Diego Chargers Linebacker Drops Appeal Of Drug-Related Suspension. There are nearly 300 media references to San Diego Chargers linebacker Shawne Merriman dropping an appeal of his drug-related suspension imposed by the NFL. For example, the New York Times (11/1, Schmidt) reports Merriman yesterday "dropped his appeal of a four-game suspension for violating the National Football League's policy on banned substances, and he blamed his positive drug test on a supplement he took before the season to boost his energy for workouts. Merriman said his lawyer, David Cornwell, was considering legal action against the supplement maker because its product contained a precursor to the steroid nandrolone. Dietary supplement makers are prohibited from including nandrolone's precursors in their products."

DOJ_NMG_0089815

The San Diego Union-Tribune (10/31) reports Merriman "had been leaning toward this decision for days, weighing the likelihood he could win a reversal of his suspension versus the desire to clear his name along with the question of what would be best for his team. In the end, he decided Tuesday to drop the appeal of his four-game suspension for a positive drug test."

The Washington Post (11/1) reports Merriman "is scheduled to begin serving his suspension immediately and will miss the Chargers' next four games, beginning Sunday against the Cleveland Browns."

The AP (11/1) reports the suspension "won't officially begin until after Merriman addresses teammates today. After that, he will be barred from the team's headquarters until he is eligible to return Nov. 27."

Reputed Member Of Colombia Drug Cartel Arrested In Spain. The AP (11/1) reports police in Spain "said Tuesday they arrested a leading member of one of Colombia's most feared drug-trafficking cartels. Orlando Sabogal Zuluaga, 40, was arrested last Thursday in a shopping center on the outskirts of Madrid, the Civil Guard police force said in a statement posted on the Interior Ministry's Web site. Police said Sabogal Zuluaga was a right-hand man to the former head of the Norte del Valle cartel, Luis Hernando Gomez Bustamente, who himself was captured in Cuba in 2004." According to Colombian anti-narcotics police, Sabogal "is wanted for extradition to the U.S. to face charges of drug-trafficking and money-laundering."

Colombia's Vice President Says Celebrities Are Financing "Drug-Fueled" Conflict. In Bogota, the AP (11/1, Goodman) reports Colombia's vice president "is taking a hard-hitting anti-drug message to Europe, complaining about cocaine-snorting celebrities who he says are financing the drug-fueled civil conflict bleeding this South American nation. Vice President Francisco Santos spoke of supermodel Kate Moss, although she doesn't appear in the ads that he planned to unveil Wednesday in London along with 13 European anti-drug czars. Santos called Moss a perfect example of liberal European attitudes toward drug use because she is enjoying a career comeback after a British tabloid last year published photos of her apparently snorting cocaine." The European Monitoring Center for Drugs and Drug Addiction "says surveys in Denmark, Italy, Hungary, the Netherlands and Austria also show a rise in cocaine use among young adults. Santos noted findings by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy that cocaine consumption has declined 50 percent in the United States over the past two decades."

Barr Says NRA Not To Blame For Violent Crime. In an op-ed for the Atlanta Journal-Constitution (11/1), former Rep. Bob Barr writes, "Atlanta suffers from a rate of violent crime about four times the national average; murders take place in the city at a rate about five times the nation's average. The reasons Atlanta's crime statistics remain stubbornly high are many and persistent, but criminologists and law enforcement experts know that none of them is the fault of the National Rifle Association. .. .Yet last week, Atlanta police Chief Richard Pennington was at the National Press Club in Washington offering sound bites and photo ops with the anti-gun lobby organization, the Brady Center to Prevent Gun Violence, blaming the city's sorry crime statistics on the NRA." Barr continues, "Taking potshots at the NRA has become a time-worn practice of big city mayors such as New York's Michael Bloomberg. While one expects liberal politicians in northeastern cities to curry favor by leveling broadsides at the NRA, it is surprising to find their ranks joined by a police chief from Atlanta, the capital of a state with a long and positive relationship with the NRA." Barr adds that "the material Pennington's new-found friends at the Brady Center are pushing is simply political pap of the sort the center has been espousing every election cycle for more than a decade." Barr argues that "while the evidence clearly shows that broader civilian ownership of firearms translates into less, not more, violent crime in America, and even as members of Congress of both political parties support efforts to reform and streamline federal firearms regulatory efforts, the anti-firearms crowd that apparently now includes Atlanta's police chief prefers hollow rhetoric to cooperative action."

Los Angeles ATF Office Uses Statistics To Prove Success. The Federal Times (11/1, Curl) reports, "Convictions — also up 23 percent. … Gang cases referred for prosecution — up 86 percent. … John Torres, special agent in charge of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives' Los Angeles field division, said these numbers, a comparison between fiscal 2005 and fiscal 2006, are proof positive that its performance measurement process is working. COMPSTAT, short for comparative statistics, is a public event where arrest, conviction and other statistics are reviewed and dissected. Officials in charge are held accountable for meeting goals and the numbers help determine where funds are allocated. … 'We saw that the system works and if we're paying attention to where we're dedicating our resources we're going to have an impact on violent crime,' Torres said. 'That's the bottom line.'" The Times continues, "COMPSTAT began in the 1990s in New York City where the police department would hold regular meetings to set goals for law enforcement and publicly hold officers accountable for their results. Torres began holding COMPSTAT meetings for the Los Angeles ATF on a quarterly basis in October 2005. … The most recent COMPSTAT was held Oct. 24. The event is open to the public and often attended by representatives from other law enforcement agencies. Agents are asked to report their statistics. Depending on how these numbers match goals from the previous COMPSTAT, they're asked on the spot to explain what went wrong or what went right." The Times adds, "Torres said his interest in COMPSTAT has its roots in the administration's overall push to measure results governmentwide. He recommends other federal law enforcement agencies and other agencies in generalconsider adopting the process, though he said different approaches would be necessary depending on the outcome they're trying to achieve."

DOJ_NMG_0089816

Leader Of Prison Gang Resentenced To 19 Years. The Arizona Republic (11/1, Wagner) reports, "A leader of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang with an extensive criminal record was resentenced to more than 19 years behind bars Monday for a weapons violation, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office." The Republic continues, "Bruce Foy Lowry, 52, was convicted by a jury after his 2003 arrest by federal marshals who tracked him down on a fugitive warrant. At the time, Lowry was wanted for failure to appear in a drive-by shooting case where he was accused of firing a gun at a mother, father and child who followed him from the scene of a hit-and-run accident." The Republic adds, "According to a recorded conversation played during the sentencing, Lowry told a friend that he would have gotten into a gun battle with marshals if he'd had the opportunity. 'If I could have drawn I would have,' he said. 'I couldn't even draw.' … Lowry, known as 'Boss Hog,' appealed his case in 2004 to the Ninth Circuit Court, which remanded it back to the U.S. District Court in Arizona. On Monday, Judge David Campbell ordered Lowery to serve 235 months in prison for possessing ammunition in violation of the Armed Career Criminal Act." The Republic notes, "Prosecutors stressed Lowry's extensive history of violent crimes, including seven felony convictions dating to 1974. The list of offenses includes armed robberies and two Aryan Brotherhood knife attack on an inmate. Lowry and a half-dozen other assailants left the knife in their victim's heart, prosecutors said, but surgeons managed to remove the weapon and save the inmate's life."

IMMIGRATION:

Five Indicted In Ballplayer-Smuggling Investigation. USA Today (11/1, Leinwand) reports that Gustavo "Gus" Dominguez, Totoal Sports International vice president, was "indicted by a Miami grand jury on Tuesday for allegedly smuggling ballplayers and other Cuban nationals into the USA." He "is charged as part of a 53-count indictment related to two operations in 2004." USA Today adds, "Geoffrey Rodrigues, Robert Yosvany Hernandez, Ramon Batista and Guillermo Valdez, allegedly hired by Dominguez to transport the Cubans by speedboat to the USA, also were indicted."

The AP (11/1, Sedensky) reports, "Prosecutors say Rodrigues and Dominguez traveled by boat to Cuba on July 28, 2004, and loaded 22 Cubans aboard, but were intercepted by U.S. authorities at sea. Less than a month later, on Aug. 22, 2004, authorities say the two men successfully brought 19 Cubans into the country."

Suit Challenges Illegal Immigrant Crackdown In Allentown, PA. The AP (11/1, Rubinkam) reports, "Hispanic groups and the American Civil Liberties Union filed a lawsuit against a small U.S. city that has sparked national attention over its immigration policies, setting the stage for a legal battle over its crackdown on illegal immigrants." The AP continues, "The ordinance, approved by the Hazleton City Council last month, imposes fines on landlords who rent to illegal immigrants and denies business permits to companies that give them jobs. The law empowers the city to investigate written complaints about a person's immigration status, using a database operated by the federal government." The AP adds, "Lawyers for the ACLU and other groups planned to ask a federal judge for a temporary restraining order to prevent enforcement of the law, set to begin Wednesday. … 'Immigration reform is an important issue but if every little town like Hazleton across the 50 states makes up their own rules about immigration, we're going to be left with an even bigger mess,' Witold J. Walczak, legal director of the ACLU of Pennsylvania, said Monday. … Hazleton's ordinance has spurred dozens of copycat versions in small towns around the United States, as the illegal immigration issue has become a key campaign debate as the country heads into congressional elections next week. Some states and communities are accusing the government of inaction."

TAX:

Churches Reevaluate Their Political Activities In Light Of IRS Crackdown. McClatchy (11/1,

DOJ_NMG_0089817

Douglas) reports, "Scores of houses of worship nationwide are re-examining how they conduct get-out-the-vote programs and other election activities as the Internal Revenue Service investigates religious institutions for illegal campaign activity. Churches grew more nervous when the IRS launched an investigation of the liberal All Saints Episcopal Church in Pasadena, Calif. after a former rector delivered a sermon that was critical of the Bush administration and the Iraq war shortly before the 2004 presidential election. … Several religious and voting rights groups are schooling churches, synagogues, and other religious institutions about what they can and cannot do politically under IRS regulations.

GAO Urges IRS To Tighten Oversight Of Private Collection Agencies. The Washington Post/AP (11/1, D2, Abrams) reports the GAO is recommending that the IRS "improve oversight of a new program that uses private agencies to collect back taxes before it expands the effort." A GAO report "commended the IRS for addressing some important factors for the success of the program, such as proper training of collection-agency employees, ensuring that taxpayers are treated properly and that taxpayer information is secure. But it said the agency has not completed critical work on setting goals and determining costs. The IRS lacks criteria to assess 'whether the program performance warrants expanding the number of private collection agencies and turning over more cases to them,' the report says."

IRS Could Lose Money In First Year Of Using Private Bill Collectors. USA Today (11/1, Mccoy) reports, "The IRS could lose money or break even in the first phase of its program to turn some tax debts over to private collection agencies, newly released agency data show." The GAO's fiscal projects show "show the IRS expects to collect $55.8 million to $92 million in the recently started first phase of the private collection effort." The data "offer one of the first fiscal looks at this year's selection of three private firms to collect taxes from taxpayers who owe less than $25,000 and have not contested the debts. The firms began contacting an initial group of 12,500 taxpayers in September. They are eventually scheduled to handle about 158,000 cases, according to the IRS. The IRS cost data include the companies' fees; up to 24% of what they collect in overdue taxes."

IRS Steps Up Checks On Partnerships, Trusts, S Corps. In his "Tax Report" column in the Wall Street Journal (11/1), Tom Herman writes, "The IRS has improved efforts to check up on taxpayers in partnerships, trusts and S corporations, a report says." Herman continues, "That's a significant change from just a few years ago, when the IRS drew heavy criticism from a congressional investigative agency and some lawmakers for embarrassing blunders in its efforts to combat tax evasion in this area. Since then, the IRS has done a better job but still needs to do more, says a report by the Treasury Inspector General for Tax Administration. … The IRS program involves 'document-matching,' which means comparing information that people report on their tax returns against what is reported separately to the agency on 'Schedule K-1.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Propose New Spending On Defense, Homeland Security And Education. The Washington Post (11/1, A07, Birnbaum, Weisman, 748K) reports, "As part of their midterm election push, House Democrats are promoting a wide-ranging legislative agenda that would add tens of billions of dollars a year to the federal budget for the military, homeland security and education yet still impose a new budget restraint that would make it harder to widen the annual deficit. … Critics say the Democrats will be forced to choose between keeping their pledge of fiscal rectitude and their promises of federal largess." The Democrats' proposal "would allocate billions of dollars to build up the military, subsidize student loans and bolster port security. It would raise the minimum wage, make college tuition payments tax-deductible, repeal oil-company tax breaks and expand incentives for personal savings accounts, among many other provisions. The program would prohibit the House from approving new spending or tax measures that widen the budget deficit. It would do that by restoring budget rules requiring that all future spending increases and tax cuts be offset by equivalent tax hikes or spending cuts."

Democrats Dispute Bush's Charge That They Will Raise Taxes. The Washington Times (11/1, Lambro, 88K) reports, "Repealing President Bush's tax cuts and boosting social-welfare spending have been the meat and potatoes of the Democrats' campaigns since the 2002 election, and they would be in a position to attempt both if they win control of Congress next week. Mr. Bush has been warning in campaign speeches across the country that the Democrats 'will raise your taxes' if voters put them in power, and Republican leaders have been making similar charges as Election Day draws closer. … Recent polls show that most Americans expect Democrats to raise their taxes and increase spending for new big-ticket programs such as health care for the uninsured." The Times notes, "Senior Democratic advisers say…major tax and spending changes are unlikely to happen because of a number of institutional obstacles that would be extremely hard for the Democrats to overcome, especially in what is likely to remain a narrowly divided Congress."

DOJ_NMG_0089818

Rangel Says He Has No Animosity Towards Cheney Despite Cursing Him. The AP (11/1, Barrett) reports Rep. Charles Rangel "feels bad — but not too bad — about directing a curse word at Vice President Dick Cheney." Rangel "called Cheney a 'son of a b....' on Monday when asked by the New York Post about comments Cheney made about him in a television interview. He repeated his comments in an interview with The Associated Press on Tuesday, but added, 'I shouldn't have said it.' 'I thought that he should be flattered, there's certainly no animosity in it,' said Rangel, saying he had been making an observation about Cheney."

Appeals Court Hears New Arguments In McDermott-Boehner Tape Case. The AP (11/1, Daly) reports Christopher Landau, a lawyer for Rep. Jim McDermott, "told a federal appeals court Tuesday that McDermott should not be punished for giving reporters access to an illegally taped telephone call involving House Republican leaders. In arguments that evoked the Pentagon Papers and other press freedom cases…Landau said McDermott had merely received the tape from a Florida couple and therefore had done nothing wrong. … A three-judge panel of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled against McDermott in March. The 2-1 opinion upheld a lower court ruling that McDermott had violated the rights of Rep. John Boehner who was heard on the 1996 call."

Commission For Labor Cooperation Director Resigns Over Outside Lobbying. The Washington Post's Al Kamen (11/1), in his "In The Loop" column, writes, "Mark Knouse , a Pittsburgh-based lobbyist who was appointed in 2004 by Labor Secretary Elaine Chao to a three-year term as executive director of the Commission for Labor Cooperation, has called it quits after an investigation raised questions about his use of government money to pay for lobbying for his old clients, the National Journal reports. Knouse, whose wife is Chao's executive assistant, told the magazine he'd done nothing wrong and thought he could take on outside work, despite a commission requirement that such work must be approved. The investigation also noted that, in 18 months, he charged the commission for more than a dozen trips to meet with Pennsylvania officials but met just twice with officials who were not from his home state."

GAO Warns Administration Could Miss Deadline On Expedited Background Checks. The Washington Post's Stephen Barr (11/1), in his "Federal Diary" column, writes, "The Bush administration appears at risk of missing a deadline set by Congress aimed at shortening the time it takes to investigate federal employees and contractors for security clearances and determine whether they can be trusted with classified information. The 2004 Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act requires that 80 percent of all security clearances be completed in an average of 120 days. … But a report issued by the Government Accountability Office, the congressional watchdog agency, suggests that the administration could miss the Dec. 17 deadline for timely processing of security clearances stipulated in the 2004 law." Clay Johnson, deputy director for management at the Office of Management and Budget, "said in a letter to the GAO that he will convene a working group to study the issue."

Pelosi Urged To Choose Harman Over Hastings For Intelligence Committee Chair. The Washington Post's Ruth Marcus (11/1, A21) writes, "If Democrats win control of the House next week, Nancy Pelosi's first test as speaker will arrive long before the 110th Congress convenes. Her choice to head the House intelligence committee…will speak volumes about whether a Speaker Pelosi will be able to resist a return to paint-by-numbers Democratic Party interest-group politics as usual. … The panel's ranking Democrat is her fellow Californian Jane Harman -- smart and hardworking but also abrasive, ambitious and, in Pelosi's estimation, insufficiently partisan on the committee. So Pelosi, once the intelligence panel's ranking Democrat herself, has made clear that she doesn't intend to name Harman to the chairmanship. The wrong decision, in my view, but one that's magnified by the unfortunate fact that next in line is Florida Rep. Alcee Hastings. In 1989, after being acquitted in a criminal trial, Hastings was stripped of his position as a federal judge -- impeached by the House in which he now serves and convicted by the Senate -- for conspiring to extort a $150,000 bribe in a case before him, repeatedly lying about it under oath and manufacturing evidence at his trial.'

NYTimes Criticizes Administration's Actions On Pell Grants. The New York Times (11/1, 1.21M) writes in an editorial that "Pell Grants are one of the largest sources of federal help for low-income college students, and the most valuable form of aid" but "the level of aid is increasingly out of sync with the level of need." The Times describes "cuts" of "about $100 a year per recipient" as "miserliness" and adds that though "it's been four years since Congress last increased the maximum annual Pell Grant … college costs are up 35 percent from five years ago." It continues, "Bush administration officials have said repeatedly that the solution to the nation's growing income inequality is more education." Yet "if they really believed it -- and cared about a remedy -- would federal college aid be declining?" Instead "as government aid has declined, loans from banks and other private lenders have soared" and "the result is towering debt."

DOJ_NMG_0089819

Newspapers Call Hubble Mission A Worthy Risk. An editorial by the New York Times (11/1, 1.21M) called the decision by NASA administrator Michael Griffin to approve a mission to repair the Hubble telescope "a brave call, since repairing the Hubble will put the shuttle at greater risk than a typical mission to the International Space Station. It was also a welcome sign that NASA is willing to go the extra orbital mile to support superb science, even while it squanders large sums on completing the space station to perform research that can't begin to compare with the Hubble's in importance."

USA Today (11/1, 2.27M) editorializes, "Griffin made the right call. This mission poses more risks than most, but preserving one of NASA's most successful programs warrants it. The shuttle, moreover, has no other major duties besides completing the International Space Station, a program that faces an iffy future."

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Slightly Down Yesterday. NBC Nightly News (10/31, story 6, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported "the Dow fell almost six points [to close at 12,080.73]. NASDAQ was up nearly three points [to close at 2,366.71] on the days trading." USA Today (11/1, Krantz, 2.27M) says "a weaker-than-expected Conference Board report on consumer confidence prompted some investors to lose their gusto for the October stock market rally. … Even so, the Dow is still up 12.7% for the year." The Wall Street Journal (11/1, C1, Browning, 2.03M) notes that "amid continued hopes for low interest rates and moderate economic growth, the Dow Jones Industrial Average ended with a monthly gain of 3.4% -- the best monthly gain since November 2005."

Employment Costs Up. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, A2, Blackstone, Conkey, 2.03M) reports, "Employment costs gained in the third quarter at their fastest pace in more than two years, a development likely to keep Federal Reserve officials on edge about inflationary risks to the economy." The employment-cost index "rose 1% during the quarter after gaining 0.9% in the second quarter, the Labor Department reported. Employment costs were 3.3% higher than a year earlier, up from a 3% increase the previous quarter."

Bush Calls Kerry Comment "Insulting and Shameful" To US Soldiers. A remark by Sen. John Kerry to students at Pasadena City College on Monday triggered furious debate on the campaign trail yesterday. Kerry, whose comments aired on all three network newscasts last night, told his audience: "You know education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq." The President, Tony Snow and a number of GOP officials, including Sen. John McCain, yesterday termed Kerry's remark an insult to US servicemen. Bush, in remarks that were also featured on all three network shows, said while campaigning in Georgia, "The Senator's suggestion that the men and women of our military are somehow uneducated is insulting and it is shameful. And the Senator from Massachusetts owes them an apology."

The story led all three evening newscasts and is being extensively reported on in major newspapers today. Political commentators are suggesting the controversy may help the GOP in the final weeks of the campaign. Fox News' Special Report (10/31, Hume) opened its broadcast last night with a report on Kerry comments, saying, "Republicans who felt that John Kerry gave the gift that kept on giving in 2004 suddenly had reason to hope that he'd done it again."

On NBC Nightly News (10/31, story 2, 2:50, 9.87M), Tim Russert said Democrats "are not very pleased because the last thing they want a week before the election are the evening newscasts leading with this story. They want the story to be the management of the war by George W. Bush, not comments about the caliber of the troops, fairly or unfairly, no matter what John Kerry meant, they think this is unfortunate, they hope it ends." ABC World News (10/31, lead story, 3:25, Gibson, 8.78M) asked, "Will Kerry's comments help rally Republican voters? Will it help Republicans portray Democrats as against the troops" One Democratic Congressman tells me, 'I guess Kerry wasn't content blowing 2004. Now he wants to blow 2006, too.'" ABC also said this is "a fight the White House wants, one it is relishing." In fact, says this morning's New York Times (11/1, Nagourney, Rutenberg, 1.21M), "the White House took the unusual step of releasing advance excerpts of Mr. Bush's attacks."

Also on ABC World News (10/31, story 2, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said that "even in the best case," Kerry "was calling the President dumb. This gives them an opening to do to fit in the strategy of the week, rile up the conservative base voters. They spent almost $200 million in 2004 getting that base to hate John Kerry. They're happy to run that race again." The CBS Evening News (10/31, lead story, 2:30, Axelrod, 7.66M), in a similar report, said Kerry "may have energized Republicans to vote who might otherwise have stayed home. You can bet we'll be hearing a lot more about this tomorrow when President Bush does a radio interview. Whose broadcast? Rush Limbaugh's."

Chuck Todd, Editor in Chief of The Hotline, said on MSNBC's Hardball (10/31, Matthews), "I think it was clear that he was probably trying to go after the President, but he did it from that place that Northeast liberal Democrats do to much – even though it was an attack on President Bush's intellect…it is that stuff that makes the right wing crazy. They hate the elitism, intellectualism attacks on them." And US News & World Report's Michael Barone, on Fox News' Special Report (10/31, Hume) predicted "the effect of this is that it's going to increase the Republican base because they're seeing a figure there that they deeply dislike and they're seeing him make what are on their face inaccurate charges that are slanderous of the military and he's slandered them in the past. … It's a fair question to ask Democratic candidates if they agree with this statement by their party's nominee for president in 2004 -- not a peripheral figure but a central figure."

DOJ_NMG_0089820

Former House majority leader Tom DeLay, on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (10/31), said, "I don't think he intended to insult the troops at a campaign event, but he did. I don't think he intended to call them stupid, but he did. … I think what John Kerry was done has put a face on what we have been talking about all along. The left has a disdain for the military."

Some of the media coverage, however, portrays the debate as an example of the "Republican PR machine…moving into high gear," as ABC World News (10/31, lead story, 3:25, Gibson, 8.78M) put it, describing "what happened" as "an object lesson in how in this day and age, an idle political remark gets seized upon, becomes fodder for the talk shows and obscures discussion of all other issues." ABC (Tapper) added that "the war in Iraq has generally been a subject helping Democrats this election season. But today, that debate took an unpredictable turn, with President Bush accusing John Kerry of insulting US troops." Kerry "said he was addressing the President, not the troops," but "early this morning after those remarks appeared in local newspapers and the video popped up on YouTube, conservative blogs and talk radio had a field day." Rush Limbaugh, radio host: "It tells us what John Kerry, himself and the Democratic Party, think about the troops and think about the US military." Tony Snow, White House Press Secretary, was shown saying, "This is an absolute insult." Tapper: "Shortly before noon, Kerry in a paper statement insisted he had not belittled the intelligence of soldiers serving in Iraq, but rather that of 'the President who got us stuck there.' He lashed out at White House spokesman Tony Snow whom he called a 'stuffed suit mouthpiece' and 'doughy Rush Limbaugh.' But by then the Republicans were already piling on." Sen. John McCain was shown saying, "I believe Senator Kerry owes an apology to many thousands of Americans serving in Iraq, who answered their country's call."

During an appearance on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (10/31), McCain restated his point, "I hope that Senator Kerry will apologize quickly so that we can get this issue behind us. … I hope that there are some Democrats who are contacting Senator Kerry and telling him to do the right thing. … I have misspoken and I have made bad jokes, but I have apologized and Americans are very forgiving, I'm happy to say, and I have been able to move on. … I hope he apologizes, if he does I will accept his apology." Later in the interview McCain noted, "After [Kerry] got out of the Navy in the Vietnam War he repeated some terrible allegations before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee about beheadings and rapes and disembowelments and things like that that were very harmful to the men and women who were then serving in the military."

The AP (11/1, Loven) quotes House Speaker Dennis Hastert saying, "Our soldiers risk their lives in the face of grave dangers on the battlefield, and no one who chooses to courageously and selflessly defend our country can be considered 'uneducated.'" The Boston Globe (11/1, Ryan, 425K) notes GOP Gov. Mitt Romney also called on Kerry to apologize. Said Romney, "Senator Kerry owes an apology to the thousands of men and women serving in Iraq, particularly the many patriotic soldiers from Massachusetts who come from all backgrounds to defend our freedoms."

NBC Nightly News (10/31, lead story, 3:40, O'Donnell, 9.87M) reported, "Kerry's first response blamed assorted right-wing nut-jobs for distorting his intent. Followed by a defense on camera." Kerry was shown saying, "My statement yesterday and the White House knows this full well was a botched joke about the President." NBC added, "Stressing his pride as commander in chief, the President used his former opponent's words as a new political tool in an already divisive party battle over Iraq." Bush was shown saying, "The members of the United States military are plenty smart and they are plenty brave and the Senator from Massachusetts owes them an apology."

The CBS Evening News (10/31, lead story, 2:30, Axelrod, 7.66M), in a similar report, said Kerry "signaled Republicans would not 'swift boat' him again." Kerry was shown saying, "I'm not going to give them one ounce of daylight to spread one of their lies and to play this game ever, ever again. That is a lesson I learned deep and hard." The CBS Evening News (10/31, story 6, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) later interviewed Nicolle Wallace, former communications director for the current Bush Administration. Asked why "the White House would love to have John Kerry on TV every day from now until election day," Wallace said, "First of all, he didn't apologize, which is inexplicable. Second, he embodies everything the Democrats have been trying to erase about what voters think about them and national security. So for him to have popped back up and reminded voters that he is someone who really doesn't stand with the military, in their view, and who can't apologize when he says something that is so obviously a gaff is a reminder the Republicans welcome."

The Financial Times (11/1, Luce, Daniel) says the GOP "gained a late burst of energy in its flagging midterm election campaign" following Kerry's remarks. Republican "strategists, who have been watching helplessly as opinion polls have turned against them in the last six weeks, on Tuesday drew renewed purpose from a gaffe that many believe could help motivate the party's demoralised supporters to turn out to vote at the polls next Tuesday." But Democrats are predicting the controversy will have no lingering political effects. The Washington Post (11/1, A8, VandeHei, Cillizza, 748K) reports, "The unusual back-and-forth that has little to do with the 2006 midterm elections comes as Democrats are planning to end the campaign by bashing Bush and GOP candidates for supporting the US war policy. A senior Democratic strategist said the party will run Iraq-focused ads in at least 15 of the most competitive House races between now and Election Day." The strategist, "who would not discuss internal strategy on the record, said the Kerry comments are an unnecessary distraction but would soon be forgotten."

DOJ_NMG_0089821

USA Today (11/1, Jackson, 2.27M) notes "the dust-up came a day after Rep. Charles Rangel called Vice President Dick Cheney 'a son of a bitch' for saying the New York Democrat doesn't know how the economy works. Stephen Wayne, a government professor at Georgetown University, said the barbs foreshadow 'two years of strident, partisan rhetoric' regardless of who controls Congress after Nov. 7." USA Today adds, "Polls show Democrats are in a position to win control of the House of Representatives and possibly even the Senate." The Los Angeles Times (11/1, Brownstein, Gerstenzang, 918K) says Democrats "remain confident that they are on track to win the 15 seats they need to control the House. But again, Republicans -- while expecting to lose seats -- predict their organizational prowess will help them hang onto a majority in the chamber."

The Wall Street Journal (11/1, A4, Dreazen, 2.03M) says Iraq "is a vexing issue for both parties, and Democrats are struggling with the war. Leading figures within the party have failed to coalesce around a single strategy for reducing the violence there, and Democratic leaders have offered diverging strategies for Iraq that range from beginning a troop withdrawal before the end of the year to splitting the country into three ethnic regions." Democrats also "are struggling to find a way of criticizing the administration's handling of Iraq without appearing to denigrate the U.S. military personnel serving there." But Republicans "are facing the bigger problem, as Iraq dominates the public mood before Election Day. The latest Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll found 37% of registered voters believe the war has been worth its financial and human cost, the lowest level recorded to date in the survey. The poll found that anger over the war in Iraq continues to be the biggest single issue bringing voters to the polls."

Bush's Light Schedule Today Reportedly Making Democrats Uneasy. The Wall Street Journal web-exclusive "Washington Wire" column (10/1, Dreazen) reports President Bush "will hold no public events of any kind on Wednesday, an exceptionally light schedule this close to next Tuesday's midterm elections. That sparked questions about whether Bush has a 'November surprise' in store. This is, after all, a president who has twice managed to sneak away to Iraq. At the White House morning briefing, a reporter observed that the light schedule made it sound 'like something is cooking there.' Spokesman Tony Snow replied, 'No, not really.' That left some Democratic political operatives wondering just what Bush and his political guru, Karl Rove, might be up to." However, "Snow is keeping on his poker face. Bush has 'some meetings with senior advisers and a Rush Limbaugh interview,' Snow said in an email. 'No blockbusters.'"

Kerry Withdraws From Minnesota Event, Is Asked Not To Campaign In Iowa. The Mankato (MN) Free Press (11/1) reports, "The dueling rallies scheduled for Mankato today on behalf of Republican congressman Gil Gutknecht" featuring Sen. John McCain, "and Democratic challenger Tim Walz lost some of their pizzaz Tuesday night when Sen. John Kerry pulled out of the Democratic rally." Kerry withdrew from the rally, "which will still be held, as the result of a controversy over comments he made Monday in California." The Free Press adds, "Walz communication director Meredith Salsbery said Kerry canceled his visit to keep the focus on the issues and away from Kerry's comments and McCain's response."

Meanwhile, the Quad City Times (10/11) reports "Democratic congressional candidate Bruce Braley has asked…Kerry not to campaign with him Thursday in the Quad-Cities as planned, citing the flap between the White House and the senator over his remarks concerning Iraq." Jeff Giertz, a campaign spokesman, "said Braley cancelled their appearance Tuesday afternoon. 'He's not condoning the partisan bickering,' Giertz said of Braley, a lawyer from Waterloo who is running against Bettendorf businessman Mike Whalen for Iowa's 1st District Congressional seat. "

Moreover, says the Financial Times (11/1, Luce, Daniel), "some Democrats suggested Mr Kerry's remarks would almost certainly damage his presidential hopes."

O'Reilly Defends Kerry. Bill O'Reilly, host of Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/31) said, "I don't believe that John Kerry meant to demean any American military member, I just don't, and I think that fair-minded people know that would be political suicide for the senator and he wouldn't do it. But his choice of words and his delivery of that statement has now…given the Republicans a huge, huge campaign club." O'Reilly added, "This is a huge, huge development in an election that is just one week away, because the Republicans by all of the polls were on the ropes. And now by his statement, and, again, I don't think that John Kerry had any idea what was going to happen, he's basically pulled the GOP off of the defensive, and given them momentum."

DOJ_NMG_0089822

More Commentary On Kerry. Editorial pages generally considered conservative this morning criticized Kerry. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, 2.03M) editorializes on Kerry, "whose cultural condescension keeps on giving. … We didn't always do our homework, but it's hard to come to any conclusion other than that Mr. Kerry was saying that only fools and knaves, not patriots, end up fighting in Iraq." The Journal adds, "For reasons clear only to himself, Mr. Kerry has been acting as if he intends to run for the White House again in 2008. Apparently he thinks he can win. We've long thought that Democratic donors would soon enough convince him otherwise, but his behavior this week may speed up the reckoning. Congratulations, Senator Clinton; another competitor bites the dust."

The Washington Times (11/1, 88K) says in its editorial, "We understand that Mr. Kerry's primary aim on Monday was to bomb the White House to get at the commander in chief. The troops were an afterthought. Which, come to think of it, is the point -- just as it was in the 1970s, when Mr. Kerry made a career of smearing American troops as killers on his return from Vietnam."

Democrats Confidently Predicting House Majority. The AP (11/1, Espo) reports Democrats are "beginning to predict confidently if quietly that they will win control of the House in next week's elections, and possibly emerge with a relatively robust majority." Democratic fundraising is "running significantly stronger than two years ago, $104.5 million through Oct. 18. That represents an increase of more than 30 percent, and has allowed Democrats to launch late-campaign television advertising in several districts in recent days in an attempt to maximize their gains on Election Day." Still, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm "have told aides to avoid predictions of victory before the votes are counted." Republicans, too, "say that with a week of campaigning to go, Democrats are ill-advised to celebrate. They note than an extraordinary number of races remain very close, and that their GOP get-out-the-vote operation will help pull enough of their candidates to victory to preserve their majority." Karin Johanson, executive director of the DCCC, "told one group last week that Democrats felt confident they had locked up 10 of the 15 seats they need to prevail, according to participants in the meeting who spoke on condition of anonymity." But "other officials and strategists with long experience in congressional campaigns have turned far more bullish about Democratic chances, and party strategists say no more than two of the party's incumbents who are seeking new terms are in jeopardy of defeat."

House Republicans Scale Back Ads In Three Key Races As Democrats Expand Field. The AP (11/1, Espo) reports, "Signaling retreat, House Republicans are scaling back television advertising in three highly contested races, officials said Tuesday, including Rep. Curt Weldon's scandal-tinged bid for re-election in Pennsylvania and open seats in Colorado and Ohio." Some of the funds "will be spent to help other Republicans in races that remain competitive." In contrast "to the Republican strategic retreat, House Democrats are expanding the number of districts where they are advertising, an indication of growing confidence as Election Day approaches. In recent days, the party's campaign committee has moved into districts in New Hampshire, New York, Kansas and Nebraska that have long been in GOP hands." Meanwhile, in the campaign for the Senate, "Republicans moved during the day to fortify their position. The National Republican Senatorial Committee reported it would spend an additional $1 million in the campaign's final days to help Virginia Sen. George Allen in a re-election race that has become far tougher than originally expected." Senate Republicans also "decided to advertise on behalf of embattled Sen. Conrad Burns in Montana for the first time since August, and beefed up its support for Sen. Lincoln Chafee, trailing in the polls in Rhode Island."

"Security Moms" Seen As Defecting From GOP. The CBS Evening News (10/31, story 7, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Talk about political power. Two years ago, soccer moms morphed into security moms, the threat of terrorism driving them to the polls, and they helped swing election for President Bush and the Republicans. Well, what about this year?" CBS (Cowan) added, "In 2004 it was women like April Thacker who helped give Republicans the edge. They voted for Bush over Kerry by a 20-point margin. But if Republicans were hoping to get that kind of turnout for women voters this time around, they may be going against the current. According to a new CBS News/New York Times poll, over a third of women voters here say they plan to vote Republican in the state's tough Senate race this year. Half of them say they'll vote Democrat instead." Almost "half the women voters surveyed here don't like the way the President has handled terrorism. As for the war in Iraq, 57% think the troops should start coming home."

Liberal Activists Contributing To Moderate Democrats In Hopes Of Boosting Majority. USA Today (11/1, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports Democratic candidates "who oppose abortion, gun control and gay rights have some unusual allies this year: liberal online activists desperate for their party to win control of Congress." Putting aside "their own preferences, the Internet activists are promoting and raising money for moderates in swing districts across the country. Many of the candidates have military, business or law enforcement backgrounds. Some, such as Virginia Senate candidate Jim Webb and House hopeful Eric Massa of New York, are former Republicans." As of Tuesday, "online activists had contributed some $826,000 to Webb, a former Navy secretary, via ActBlue.com, a clearinghouse that has raised $16 million for scores of Democrats. Massa had $377,000." President Bush's "unpopularity, the Iraq war and congressional scandals are making it easier than usual for Democrats to bury their differences for now. The moderate makeup of contested states and congressional districts also helps."

DOJ_NMG_0089823

WSJournal/NBC Poll Shows Democrats With 15-Point Generic Advantage. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, A1, 2.03M) reports, "A week before Election Day, a new poll shows President Bush getting better marks for his handling of the economy -- an issue Republicans are emphasizing in the run-up to Tuesday's vote -- but voters' anxieties about Iraq continue to dominate their concerns. The latest Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll shows Mr. Bush, buoyed by a rising stock market and falling gasoline prices, essentially breaking even on the economy, with 46% of voters approving his stewardship and 48% disapproving. That's a gain from 39% approval and 56% disapproval in June." But "as Mr. Bush's party fights to retain control of both houses of Congress, the violence in Baghdad in recent weeks has further darkened Americans' mood about Iraq -- the issue voters say is most important in their election decision-making. The result: Voters want Democrats, rather than Republicans, to control Congress by 52% to 37%, a 15-point margin. The spread matches the widest ever recorded on this question in a Journal/NBC poll."

Morris Says GOP Turnout Can Stem Democratic Tide. Dick Morris writes in The Hill (11/1), "Can the Republicans win control of Congress? They can if they want to. It is up to the vaunted GOP base. According to the Zogby poll, Republican fortunes, while improving in early October, have fallen since. On Sept. 22, Democrats led in the generic vote poll (Do you plan to vote for the Democratic or the Republican candidate in your district?) by nine points, 42-33. But by Oct. 11, their margin was only three -- 37-34. But by Oct. 24 it was back up to 11 points -- 44-33 -- enough for the Democrats to take control of the House and probably the Senate." But "if you dig deep into the Zogby poll, you find an astonishing fact -- independents are turning to the Republican Party while Republican base voters are leaving it!" Morris adds "voters in swing states are saying: 'I want the Democrats to win, just not the guy running in my district.' It is still too early to tell if the national Democratic trend will assert itself in the end or whether the Republicans can pull out the swing districts. But the key will be whether the GOP base itself genuinely wants a Republican Congress or not."

Bush Seen As A "Liability" To Republicans In Many Parts Of Country. The Washington Post (11/1, A1, Balz, 748K) reports, "His name is not on any ballot this fall, but George W. Bush is the central issue of campaign 2006. Tuesday's vote will deliver a referendum on six years of Bush's leadership -- bold and principled or radically divisive, depending on one's political ideology -- and the wartime policies he has championed." Other issues "may come into play, congressional scandals and performance among them, but in the end, next week's verdict will be remembered for what it says about this president. With Bush's approval ratings hovering just below 40 percent, Republicans are braced for big losses." GOP strategists "know well that no political party has successfully weathered a midterm election with such an unpopular president in office. Bush's challenge as he campaigns in the final days of the election is to find a way to excite and mobilize a fractured Republican base without triggering an even bigger turnout among Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents that could cost his party the House or Senate." The "politician who has done more than anyone else over the past decade to build and expand the Republican Party has become a liability to Republicans in many parts of the country." In "strongly Republican areas, he said, the president can still rally the party's base, but in more marginal districts, Bush is a drag on GOP candidates."

GOP Outreach Notwithstanding, Bush Approval Among Black Voters Lags. The AP (11/1, Benac) reports, "So much for the Republican charm offensive toward minorities. Black voters are far less likely to approve of the way President Bush is doing his job than voters generally and they are more likely to feel that the country is on the wrong track, disheartening news for a Republican Party that has been trying to curry favor with minority voters in recent years." In what "could be a particularly bad sign for Republicans in next week's midterm elections, black voters also are more likely to say that the Iraq war was a mistake and that recent disclosures of scandal and corruption in Congress will be very important to their vote, according to an Associated Press-AOL Black Voices poll conducted Oct. 23 through Monday." But while black voters "say Republicans have done a poor job of representing their interests, they also have misgivings about the Democratic Party. Almost half of black voters said the Democratic Party takes their vote for granted; about a third said the party has done a poor job of representing their interests." The AP-AOL Black Voices poll "of 900 black adults, 361 of whom are likely voters, was conducted by Ipsos. The margin of error for the full sample is plus or minus 3.5 percentage points, 5 percentage points for the black likely voters." Blacks are "disproportionately unhappy with Bush, 89 percent of likely voters disapprove, compared with 61 percent of all likely voters." But blacks' "approval ratings for Congress — disapproval ratings, actually — are roughly similar to those for all likely voters. Some 83 percent of likely black voters disapprove of the way Congress is doing its job, compared with 75 percent of all likely voters."

DOJ_NMG_0089824

LATimes Accuses Bush Of Resorting To "Fear-Mongering." The Los Angeles Times (11/1, 918K) editorializes, "As the 2006 campaign draws to a merciful close, the only idea national Republicans seem to have left is that, when in doubt, accuse Democrats of being a bunch of terrorist-loving wimps. But as the boy who cried wolf learned the hard way, fear-mongering has its diminishing returns. … President Bush, meanwhile, is also getting into the fear-mongering. 'The Democrat approach,' he said this week on the stump in Georgia, 'comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses. And that's what's at stake in this election.' This is why much of the world considers our president a caricature figure — because on occasion he acts like one."

PAC Contributions Flowing To Ranking House Democrats, Not Challengers. The Hill (11/1, Bolton) reports political action committees "representing business interests have boosted their donations to House Democrats in recent weeks, but a significant chunk of that money has not gone to Democratic candidates." Instead, the money "has languished in the accounts of safe incumbents who have given little, or nothing at all, to Democratic candidates in the months leading up to Election Day." The "behind-the-scenes financial maneuvers have come to light in recent days with the filing of reports at the Federal Election Commission (FEC) disclosing fundraising activities through Oct. 18." The new reports "show that Democrats who are poised to become influential committee chairmen if they win control of the House have reaped hundreds of thousands of dollars in political action committee (PAC) contributions over the past several weeks." The "flow of funds, most of it from business interests, who tend to give most of their contributions though PACs, is significantly higher than two years ago when Democrats were viewed as having a slim chance of capturing the House."

Democratic Lobbyists Enjoy Revival In Washington. The Hill (11/1, Snyder) reports while the "election is still six days away, the strength Democratic candidates have shown has already produced one shift in Washington: Democratic lobbyists, once marginalized, are seeing a resurgence in their popularity." Patrick Murphy, a lobbyist who has been an active supporter of Democrats, said, "We've had more detailed conversations in the last month than we have had all year." Murphy "joined Capitol Management in July and has been aggressively marketing his ties to Democrats ever since." The Hill adds lobbyists "close to House Democrats in particular are stressing their ties. Not many lobbyists bothered with House Democrats, they say, because the caucus faced a disciplined Republican majority and had little ability to affect the course of House votes. Now those ties could produce new business." But as they "work to market themselves by stressing those ties, Democrats on K Street are also careful to strike a cautionary tone."

Republican Lawmakers Face Pressure To Change Leadership After Midterms. The Hill (11/1, Crabtree) reports, "Win or lose next week, the GOP needs some serious soul-searching, according to several rank-and-file House Republicans who already are arguing in favor of a post-Election Day leadership shake-up." Some GOP lawmakers "believe that change — be it in policy, process, or leadership matters — as soon as possible is the only way House Republicans can climb out of the rut they've been stuck in this cycle." Rep. Jeff Flake said, "If we lose the majority, I think it ought to be a clean sweep — a fresh start." Flake "worries that if the GOP keeps even a fragile hold on its majority, the conference will stick with the same leadership course with only minor changes. This, in turn, will mean continuing to put too much emphasis on trying to keep the majority by handing out earmarks to vulnerable members and special favors to certain groups instead of standing for principles such as fiscal restraint." The Hill adds that even "GOP lawmakers reluctant to discuss anything past Nov. 7 are preparing for a leadership scramble next week."

Democrats Hope To Beat Northup In Kentucky's Third CD. The AP (11/1, Lovan) reports Democrats have "been targeting Republican Rep. Anne Northup for a decade to no avail, but that hasn't stopped them from betting once again that her political luck is about to run out." Northup, "a five-term incumbent, has a lot of advantages, including a prized seat on the House Appropriations Committee. She has raised twice as much money as her Democratic opponent." But her "ties to President Bush, mounting casualties in Iraq and her district's penchant for leaning Democrat has made the race against Louisville businessman John Yarmuth a virtual toss-up." A "recent Bluegrass Poll by The Courier-Journal of Louisville showed Northup was favored 48 percent to 42 percent for Yarmuth, but that falls within the poll's margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points." The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee "began running a television ad critical of Northup on Monday night in the district. The 30-second spot is the first ad the DCCC has run in the district during the campaign, said DCCC spokeswoman Adrienne Elrod."

Parties Have Lavished Resources On Unexpectedly Competitive WA8 Race. USA Today (11/1, Ritter, 2.27M) reports, "By all rights, Republican Rep. Dave Reichert shouldn't be having such a tough time winning a second term. … He represents a district that has never elected a Democrat. His opponent has never held public office, while he's a 30-year public servant." However, "Reichert's race against Democrat Darcy Burner, a former Microsoft manager, is rated a tossup and considered a key race if Democrats are to regain control of the House. A poll Oct 24-26 by Constituent Dynamics, an independent research firm, had Burner leading 49% to 47%. Heavy hitters from both parties — including President Bush, Vice President Cheney and Democratic Sens. John Kerry and Barack Obama — have stumped this fast-growing, affluent suburban region. … The national parties have funneled in gobs of money: $1.5 million from the Republicans and nearly $900,000 from the Democrats has been spent so far. The candidates themselves have raised a combined $5.1 million."

DOJ_NMG_0089825

Democrat In NE3 Getting Support From National Party. The New York Times (11/1, Zeleny, 1.21M) reports, "This year, open seats have become dangerous territory for Republicans. Only months ago, Scott Kleeb, left, a 31-year-old cattle rancher who is running in Nebraska's Third Congressional District, where voters have not sent a Democrat to the House since 1958, could barely get an audience with Democratic leaders. This week, after a poll showed Mr. Kleeb with a slight edge, the party sent $100,000 his way."

Wilson Hopeful Duck Prop Heralds Revival. The Hill (11/1, Hearn) reports it is "a sign of the times for Republicans that the political survival of Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.), a five-term incumbent and straight-laced U.S. Naval Academy graduate, may now depend on a woman in a duck suit." Wilson "trotted out this campaign prop last week to bring attention to her Democratic rival Patricia Madrid's 'ducking' of debates. The unabashed tactic was a page from a challenger's playbook — an easy ploy to draw media attention to a flagging campaign — and it underscored Wilson's position as the underdog in the polls." New Mexican blogger Joe Monahan said, "You don't need to know the latest insider tracking polls to know that … Heather Wilson is having trouble closing out her race with rival Patricia Madrid. You just have to know about the duck." The Hill adds that by Saturday, "however, the duck was earning its keep in media stardom. A Madrid supporter had allegedly stomped on its webbed foot in a tussle outside a Democratic rally, prompting a call to police." The Wilson campaign "speedily distributed the video to news organizations, drawing attention away from the rally with House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa (D). The duck appeared on crutches with mock bandages a day later." The Hill ads the "avian performance, coupled with ads highlighting Madrid's gaffe in the candidates' one televised debate, are the incumbent's last-ditch maneuvers to stave off an impending Democratic wave." The "last six independent polls in the race have shown Wilson tied with and then trailing Madrid, the state attorney general, marking the first time the perennially vulnerable incumbent has been behind her challenger."

GOP Candidates Not Touting Medicare Prescription Drug Program. The Hill (11/1, Young) reports Republican lawmakers "looking to change the subject from unfavorable issues such as the war in Iraq have by and large avoided claiming credit for what the White House views as one of the GOP majority's signature domestic-policy accomplishments: the Medicare prescription-drug benefit." President Bush "and congressional leaders such as House Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) have urged GOP incumbents to shift the electoral debate toward matters that they say demonstrate the effectiveness of Republican-controlled government." But few GOP candidates "have actively highlighted their support for Part D, which has been under constant Democratic fire. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) has vowed to begin the process of altering the program within the first 100 hours of the next Congress if her party takes control of the House." Democrats have "maintained their drumbeat of criticism of Part D — frequently referring to it as a 'disaster' — even as the program appears to have stabilized from significant logistical problems during its rollout in January." The program "has proved popular with those beneficiaries who have joined the Part D program, according to numerous opinion polls. J.D. Power and Associates released survey findings in September showing 75 percent of Part D enrollees were satisfied with their benefits."

Democrats Find Fertile Ground In Mountain West. The New York Times (11/1, Hulse, 1.21M) reports that in Colorado's 7th CD, Democrat Ed Perlmutter "is probably unlikely to relax in the final days of his closely watched race with Rick O'Donnell, his Republican opponent, as the two kick their sophisticated get-out-the-vote machines into high gear. But Mr. Perlmutter and fellow Democrats in Colorado and neighboring states believe that unaffiliated voters" are "the key to what could be a turnaround in the party's political fortunes in the region." Despite a "Republican edge in registration, Democrats are discovering the Mountain West — and Colorado in particular — to be a new political frontier as the party benefits from a potent mix of changing demographics, anger over the war in Iraq, resentment toward conservative social initiatives and millions of dollars' worth of advocacy advertising." Republicans "acknowledge that the political terrain is shifting along the Continental Divide but argue that any realignment will be temporary and due to the Iraq war more than any other factor." If the "trend holds, Democrats could be in for a big day next Tuesday. The Democratic candidate for governor, Bill Ritter, is leading in his race against Bob Beauprez, a Republican congressman. If Democrats can retain control of the State House and Senate, which they gained in the 2004 elections, they would have total control of the state government for the first time since the early 1960s."

DOJ_NMG_0089826

Democrats Expected To Make Gains In Former GOP Strongholds. In his Washington Post column (11/1), Harold Meyerson says, "Most of the House seats that the Democrats are expected to take from Republicans are in the Northeast and industrial Midwest, heartland of the old Republican Party of Lincoln, McKinley and Eisenhower. Many of the Republicans holding these seats are a distinct minority in a party now dominated by Southerners who are more supportive of executive branch authoritarianism and yet also more government-phobic. And the Republican moderates, judging by their own comments, are boiling mad that the Democrats are going after them." But "we all remember how moderate Republicans stopped the conservatives who control their party from going after moderate Democrats in previous elections, right?" It was "precisely the Republicans' success at defeating the centrist and center-right Democrats in the South over the past two decades that has driven the GOP steadily rightward. And for all their protestations of moderation, the northern Republicans -- from Susan Collins to Lincoln Chafee to Rep. Chris Shays -- abetted that transformation."

GOP Will Not Commit To Power-Sharing Agreement In The Event Of A 50-50 Senate. The New York Times (11/1, Zernike, 1.21M) reports, "With polls nail-bitingly close, one possible result is that the Senate will divide 50-50 between the two parties. For a hint of how that may work, consider the only time that has happened, for six months in 2001…when the two parties worked out a collegial power-sharing agreement. Republicans maintained control of the Senate because Vice President Dick Cheney had the power to break tie votes. … Could it happen again? Democrats admit they have considered the possibility, 'What was done in 2001 should serve as a useful framework,' said Jim Manley, a spokesman for the Democratic leader, Senator Harry Reid. Not so fast, the Republicans say. They do not want to be seen even considering the idea of losing control, so much so that a senior Republican aide would speak only anonymously. 'If the Senate were ever to return to that ratio,' the aide said, 'the previous agreement is not precedent.'

Senate Republicans Reportedly Pleased With New Polling Data. The Washington Times (11/1, Hallow, 88K) reports, "Race-by-race surveys of Senate contests by pollster Scott Rasmussen show that Republican-leaning voters may be 'coming home' in closely watched states like Tennessee and Missouri, while the GOP is poised for a potential upset in Maryland. … Republicans have also hoped to pick up a Democratic seat in New Jersey. However, six different major polls since Oct. 10 show Republican Tom Kean Jr. trailing Sen. Robert Menendez by as many as 6 percentage points in a state where institutional advantages favor the Democratic incumbent." The Times adds, "Perhaps the most encouraging recent development for Senate Republicans has been the comeback by Missouri Sen. Jim Talent, who some polls had shown trailing by as much as 9 percentage points to Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill just three weeks ago. The most recent polls indicate the Missouri contest is a dead heat. … However, Republicans have become concerned as recent polls show Sen. George Allen losing ground in Virginia. A Rasmussen poll released yesterday showed Mr. Allen with 46 percent to 51 percent for Democrat James H. Webb Jr."

Poll Shows Corker Leading Ford 52%-44%. USA Today (11/1, 2.27M) reports, "Tennessee Republican Senate nominee Bob Corker led Democrat Harold Ford by 8 percentage points in a race that could determine who controls the Senate, according to a poll released Tuesday. The survey of 541 likely voters conducted by Opinion Research for CNN showed former Chattanooga mayor Corker favored by 52%, compared with 44% for U.S. Rep. Ford. The error margin is +/-4 percentage points." Previous polls "had them neck-and-neck for Sen. Bill Frist's seat."

Santorum Down 15 Points In New Poll. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (11/1, Brown, Burnstead) reports, "Democrat Bob Casey has opened up a 15-point lead over Republican U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum -- more than double the lead the challenger held in September -- according to a Pittsburgh Tribune-Review/WTAE-TV Keystone poll released today." Casey "leads Santorum 53 percent to 38 percent, with 9 percent undecided, according to the telephone poll of 626 registered voters conducted over five days ending Sunday. The poll has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.9 percentage points."

Santorum Calls Casey's Grasp Of National Defense Issues "Laughable." Santorum, during an appearance on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/31), said, "I've been giving speeches all over the state talking about the gathering storm of the 21st century and I believe that the threats that I've talked about from North Korea and Iran and the fascists there and Venezuela and others are the serious threats of our time. … I've even been critical of the administration for not being forthright and tough about these issues." Santorum said his opponent Bob Casey is "absolutely clueless as to what's facing this country. … It's almost laughable to look at the reaction that he has on these very complex and serious issues." Santorum added that if candidates like Casey are elected "we'll be in a world of hurt in a very short period of time"

DOJ_NMG_0089827

Liberal Blogger Heckles Allen, Accuses Him Of Spitting On His Ex-Wife. The AP (11/1, Lewis) reports a "heckler who confronted Sen. George Allen at a campaign appearance Tuesday was put in a chokehold and slammed to the floor by three of the Republican's supporters in an incident captured on video." Mike Stark, "a liberal blogger and first-year University of Virginia law student, approached Allen at an event in Charlottesville, loudly asking, 'Why did you spit at your first wife, George?' according to witnesses." Three men, "all wearing blue Allen lapel stickers, immediately grabbed Stark, dragged him backward and slung him to the carpet outside a hotel meeting room, according to video captured by WVIR-TV in Charlottesville."

Fox News' Special Report (10/31, Hume) reported, "In Virginia, an Opinion Research poll puts Democrat Jim Webb now in the lead by four points over republican incumbent Senator George Allen, that's in the margin of error, but barely. And speaking of that Virginia race, in Charlottesville, a heckler loudly accused Senator Allen of spitting at his former wife, three supporters not with the Allen campaign dragged out the man, a liberal blogger named Mike Stark and then wrestled him to the floor." Fox News' footage of the incident can be accessed by clicking on the link at the top of this story.

The Washington Post (11/1, Shear, Craig, 748K) reports the "widely disseminated video of the incident" shows the "Democratic activist who verbally confronted U.S. Sen. George Allen at a campaign rally in Charlottesville…shoved, put into a headlock and thrown against a window by three men wearing Allen stickers." Stark "yelled a question at Allen (R) about whether he had ever spit on his first wife, an unsubstantiated charge that has been circulating on liberal blogs on the Internet. Allen supporters hauled him away from the senator as television cameras rolled." In an email, Stark said, "I demand that Senator Allen fire the staffers who beat up a constituent attempting to use his constitutional right to petition his government." The Post adds Charlottesville Police Lt. Gary Pleasants "said Stark reported the incident yesterday and indicated that he wanted to press assault charges against the men. Pleasants said police are investigating and trying to determine the names of the Allen staffers involved." Allen aides "accused Democrats and the Webb campaign of orchestrating the event as a way of getting news organizations to write about the Internet rumor."

The Charlottesville Daily Progress (11/1, Gibson) reports Allen "ignored the question and shrugged off the incident." Allen said, "That guy's typical of the Webb campaign, and that's just their negativity." The Daily Progress added Stark, "a liberal blogger who confronted Allen two months ago at a Staunton hotel with questions about racial insensitivity, said he is not associated with any campaign." One of the men "who pushed Stark away from Allen, former Albemarle County GOP Chairman John Darden, said he was simply trying to protect Allen and Dole and stood between the law student and the senators not knowing what Stark's intentions might be." Allen's former wife, Anne Waddell, "later issued a statement calling Stark's question 'a baseless, cheap shot.' She said that she and Allen divorced more than 22 years ago and sealed the divorce records because it was a personal matter."

Marriage Amendment May Backfire On Allen, Bring Black Webb Supporters To Polls. The Washington Times (11/1, Bellantoni, 88K) reports the Virginia state constitutional marriage amendment "designed to motivate conservative voters and help Virginia Sen. George Allen's re-election campaign appears to be backfiring, at least among black voters." Allen "probably will benefit from evangelical Christians voting for the amendment. But, the amendment also will drive turnout among the state's black voters, many of whom are questioning whether Mr. Allen is racially insensitive and deserves a second term." Virginia's black voters "support the amendment, which defines marriage as the union of one man and one woman, by more than 60 percent, according to most polls. They also overwhelmingly favor Mr. Allen's Democratic challenger James H. Webb Jr."

Black Vote Seen As Key For Webb. The Washington Post (11/1, B1, Jenkins, 748K) reports whether Webb, "a former Republican and Navy secretary in the Reagan administration, will be able to energize loyal Democratic voters…will be critical in determining who wins one of the tightest Senate races in the country." African Americans, "who make up about 20 percent of Virginia's electorate, vote reliably for Democrats and are key to their success in the Republican-dominated state. But Webb has struggled to gain their support because of questions about whether he used a racial epithet to describe blacks when he was younger and because of his stance on affirmative action, which he once called 'state-sponsored racism.'" Allen has "had his own problems with black voters, dating to his days as a state delegate." But he has "tried to mend fences with the state's black community, highlighting his support of black colleges and appearing at several important political events." A Washington Post poll "conducted last month showed that blacks were overwhelmingly supporting Webb: 81 percent of African Americans said they would vote for the Democrat, compared with 11 percent who said they'd vote for Allen. But the determining factor, political experts said, will be how many of those voters go to the polls on Election Day, given concerns about both candidates."

Virginia Senate Race Said To Remain Allen's To Lose. The Christian Science Monitor (11/1, Dillin, 58K)

DOJ_NMG_0089828

reports that although he was expected to easily win reelection in Virginia, Republican Sen. George Allen is "fighting for his survival. Political polls have seesawed. The latest Bloomberg/Los Angeles Times survey found Webb slightly ahead, 47 percent to 44 percent." But it "remains Allen's race to lose, however. Larry Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia, explains that in federal elections in Virginia, 'Republicans almost always win the close races.'" The Monitor adds Republicans "hope so. Otherwise, this election could become part of a major shift in Washington. A Democratic victory here, combined with other states where Republicans are in deep trouble, could tip the balance in the Senate to the Democrats, and give President Bush a rough finish to his second term."

Allen's Campaign Travels Documented. The Washington Post (11/1, C1, Leahy, 748K) reports, "If tense campaigns demand that imperiled candidates, like card players, learn the art of the bluff, Allen has mastered the technique." While Presidents "have travel perks: Air Force One, helicopters, bulletproof limos that ride along cleared-out interstates," Allen "like any other senator in a reelection campaign, cruises like a road-weary salesman. There is nothing more instructive about the unglamorous nature of the midterm election process than to ride for a day in chase of the candidate's vehicle, which on this day would be racing south through Virginia, trying to put some space between the candidate and an increasingly formidable foe."

WPost Criticizes Allen For Trying To Make Issue Of Sex Scenes In Webb Books. In an editorial, the Washington Post (11/1, 748K) criticizes the Allen campaign for raising the fictional sex scenes in Webb's books, saying, "Now there's a pressing concern for Americans in 2006. Mr. Allen, a Republican whose campaign professes profound moral shock that actual sex should occur in fiction, has spent months trying to extract himself from his own 'macaca'-inspired tailspin. When all else failed -- including an Allen ad in which a woman accused Mr. Webb of misquoting her, although he never quoted her at all -- Mr. Allen apparently decided that what he needed was a sex scandal crafted to smear his rival and timed for the campaign's fourth quarter. Lacking such material in real life, he turned to Mr. Webb's novels, most of which concern the wartime experiences of soldiers and international intrigue."

Allen's Midterm Woes Likely To Boost Romney In 2008. In his Washington Post column (11/1), George Will says, "One Republican, who is not running for anything this year, will emerge from this bruising season with enlarged prospects. Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's hopes for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination have been enhanced by Virginia Sen. George Allen's difficulties." Romney's "most formidable rival for the Republican nomination is John McCain, who needs a crowded field of Republican aspirants to prevent the conservative majority of the party's nominating electorate from quickly coalescing around a single candidate. Allen once seemed likely to compete with Romney for conservatives' support." But Allen, "who makes no secret of finding life as a senator tedious, is fighting ferociously for another term, a fate from which his Democratic opponent, Jim Webb, is close to rescuing him." Allen's "ragged campaign has made him seem accident-prone, and by Tuesday he probably will have burned through all the money he could raise. But to be competitive in the nomination contests that begin with the Iowa caucuses in January 2008, a candidate probably needs to have at least $60 million by December 2007. Allen would have to raise that amount in 60 weeks. A million dollars a week is a daunting challenge."

Cardin, Steele Focus On Prince George's County In Maryland Senate Race. The Washington Times (11/1, Miller, Ward, 88K) reports the "battle for Prince George's County voters is intensifying in the final days of Maryland's U.S. Senate race." Democrat Benjamin L. Cardin "will team up a second time with Sen. Barack Obama, the Senate's only black member, to woo voters in the mostly black and heavily Democratic county." Cardin is also "lining up last-minute endorsements in the county, including from Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson, a black Democrat who could announce his support for Mr. Cardin as early as today, county officials said." Prominent black Democrats "in the county broke party ranks this week to support Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the Republican nominee and the first black elected statewide in Maryland. The Democratic crossovers have accused party officials of repeatedly snubbing the black community and their county. " Steele, "who lives in Prince George's, will be campaigning alongside his crossover supporters, which include all five black members of the County Council and former county Executive Wayne K. Curry." The election "could hinge on how Prince George's 320,000 registered Democrats vote Tuesday."

Steele Seen As Gaining Momentum. The Los Angeles Times (11/1, Reynolds, 918K) reports that although the "political momentum appears to be with Democrats around the country, the trend is going the other way in one solidly blue state, where a Republican candidate is gaining on the favored Democrat in a contest with an unexpected racial twist." Once "trailing by more than 10 points, Steele narrowed the margin to where the race is now considered by some to be nearly a tossup. His recent gains reflect growing dissatisfaction among some blacks toward the state Democratic Party." On Monday, "a group of prominent African American Democrats from Prince George's County in the Washington suburbs crossed party lines to endorse the Republican." Racial tensions "in Maryland's Democratic Party have been brewing since earlier this year, when Cardin beat back a primary challenge from former congressman and NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume by a margin of 44% to 41%." Democratic leaders "say that Cardin won because he raised more money than Mfume. But Ronald Walters, a professor at the University of Maryland who studies African American politics, said the party leadership rallied early around Cardin, which hampered Mfume's ability to raise cash." Jennifer Duffy of the Cook Political Report "says that Steele's strong performance has been a surprise." Duffy said, "Steele is a lot better than expected. It's not that Cardin is a bad candidate; he's just a little dull."

DOJ_NMG_0089829

National Parties Inundate Virginia, Maryland With Senate Ads. The Washington Post (11/1, A1, Shear, Mosk, 748K) reports TV viewers "in Virginia and Maryland are being inundated by a last-minute deluge of commercials from the U.S. Senate candidates and their national political party benefactors, who are pouring millions of dollars into the two states as the bitter fall campaign draws to a close." The "flood of money into the two states means that hardly anyone who watches TV in the next six days will be able to avoid seeing the candidates or their surrogates make a final plea for votes before Tuesday's election. In the Washington area media market, for example, even a casual TV viewer will see 42 campaign commercials for Republican George Allen or Democrat James Webb between now and Election Day, advertising specialists said." Political analyst Charlie Cook said, "Each side is dishing it out." Cook added that the "money pouring into Maryland and Virginia, especially from Democrats, is staggering. 'It's almost as though Chuck Schumer has a printing press in his basement.'" The Post adds that in Virginia, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee "has bought $2.6 million worth of TV and radio spots that began airing yesterday, bringing its contributions on behalf of Webb to about $6 million. The GOP counterpart has spent $1 million on ads for Allen." In Maryland, the National Republican Senatorial Committee "contributed $400,000 yesterday to air 93 TV spots on behalf of Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele (R) on stations in Baltimore and the Eastern Shore. Democrats have pumped $1.7 million into Maryland for U.S. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D-Md.)." The "money from Washington, combined with the substantial cash raised by the Senate candidates, reflects how critical Virginia and Maryland are to the national political parties. A Steele victory in Maryland could doom hopes for Democratic control of the Senate. A victory by Webb in Virginia could be a disaster for the GOP."

Talent, McCaskill Work To Rally Base Supporters. The Hill (11/1, Kaplan) reports Sen. Jim Talent "has a studious, bookish reputation but his fight against state auditor Claire McCaskill (D) has been as down-and-dirty as others across the country." McCaskill's ads, "particularly her most recent and controversial one, have thrown Talent off-stride. Last Saturday during the first game of the World Series, the Democrat aired an advertisement on embryonic stem cell research with actor Michael J. Fox. With his symptoms of Parkinson's disease front and center, Fox endorsed McCaskill and criticized Talent, accusing him of opposing stem cell research." While sources "from both campaigns said the race would remain close in this traditional swing state, they acknowledged the negative attacks had driven up the candidates' disapproval and unfavorability ratings. A St. Louis Post-Dispatch poll showed the race tied with each candidate pulling in 47 percent of the vote." With "six days to go, both campaigns are ginning up support among their base voters. McCaskill began a campaign swing yesterday that will take her from St. Louis to Springfield to Kansas City. She plans to campaign for 24 hours straight starting Friday." On Monday, "Talent, Bond and Rep. Jo Ann Emerson (R-Mo.) made stops in five cities in southeastern Missouri. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) campaigned yesterday for Talent and President Bush will visit Springfield on Friday."

Snow Campaigns For Talent. Fox News' Special Report (10/31, Hume) reported Sen. Jim Talent "is getting help from the big guns, White House spokesman Tony Snow." Snow was shown saying, "Jim, you said you think you will win, but the difference between and you the president is that he knows you'll win."

Chafee Takes Shot At Reid's Ethics During Debate. The Hill (11/1, Schor) reports Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), "whose collegial personality has bolstered his appeal in an otherwise blue state, took an indirect shot at Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) during a debate Monday night with his Democratic opponent, state Attorney General Sheldon Whitehouse." When Whitehouse "blasted Chafee for failing to push for Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's resignation in the wake of escalating chaos in Iraq, the incumbent — trailing his foe by as many as eight points in recent polls — asked Whitehouse why he has failed to question Reid's amended reports to the Senate ethics committee clarifying the details of a $1.1 million land deal." Whitehouse spokeswoman Alex Swartsel "did not address the Chafee camp's question directly, instead continuing to hammer the centrist Republican as a reliable vote for GOP leadership."

Swift Boat Contributor Behind Ad Tying Menendez To The Mafia. The New York Times (11/1, Mansnerus, 1.21M) reports a "much-criticized television advertisement that uses a mob character to impugn Senator Robert Menendez was financed by a Republican donor who has given more than $6 million this year to start ad campaigns attacking Democrats." Bob J. Perry, "a Houston home builder, gave $4.45 million in 2004 to the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, an independent organization that attacked Senator John Kerry's Vietnam War record, damaging his presidential campaign and leading to protests about the tactics used by such outside groups." The "anti-Menendez ad was produced by one such group, the Free Enterprise Fund Committee, which said it received about $1 million from Mr. Perry. His role in the ad was reported on Tuesday in The Star-Ledger." In the "anti-Menendez ad, titled 'Politicos,' a stocky character with a leather jacket and a 'Sopranos' accent rasps into a cellphone: 'We got a problem. Our boy down in Washington, Bob Menendez, he's caught in a federal investigation. The feds start looking at these fixed contracts, and bada-bing, we're in it deep. … We need to get the bosses to fix this thing, like they did for Torricelli,' he says at the end of the ad."

DOJ_NMG_0089830

Senate Democrats Give More To Party Committee Than GOP Counterparts. The Hill (11/1, Schor) reports more than "half of the members of the Senate Democratic caucus have tapped into campaign coffers for six-figure donations to their party committee, while only 15 Senate Republicans have given similar sums with only one week remaining and control of the chamber up for grabs." Democrats "digging deep to transfer unused campaign dollars stand to reap huge gains if they can net the six seats needed to take over the Senate. But even Democratic senators up for reelection and out of chairmanship contention made unrestricted transfers to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) in October, leaving Republicans at a $6 million disadvantage in the hunt for member money." Senate Republicans "maintain that their majority will survive despite members' reluctance to give directly to the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) and some strategists' anxiety over spending shortfalls in key races. The NRSC made a million-dollar negative-ad buy yesterday in Virginia, where the DSCC reportedly is planning to double that number in a bid to vault Democrat Jim Webb over Sen. George Allen (R-Va.)." Only "one Democratic senator who is in line to chair a committee if the Senate changes hands, Appropriations ranking member Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.), has not given directly from his campaign to the DSCC." Despite the NRSC's "nearly $1 million deficit in cash on hand entering the final stretch of one of the most hard-fought midterms in years, some GOP senators have boosted their giving since the 2004 season."

Obama Drawing Huge Crowds As He Campaigns For Fellow Democrats. The New York Times (11/1, Kornblut, 1.21M) reports Sen. Barack Obama "has become the prize catch of the midterm campaign. More sought after than virtually every other Democrat, Mr. Obama was fully booked, long ago, on a schedule to take him across a large swath of the country to help his party try to win control of Congress. … Other prominent African-Americans are summoned to the Midwest to campaign in black churches (and that is on Mr. Obama's schedule, too, before the week is out). But Mr. Obama also traveled to Rochester, Minn., in a Congressional district that is more than 93 percent white, to campaign on Monday in front of a nearly all-white crowd." The Times notes, "The war in Iraq, which he opposed from the outset, is among the areas where he sounds most like the liberal wing of his party. In other ways, especially in tone and with regard to politics, he insists that neither party has a monopoly on good ideas and frequently declines to criticize President Bush as unfit.

Dowd Notes Conservatives' Comments Regarding Obama's Inexperience. The New York Times' Maureen Dowd (11/1) writes, "Many Republicans have been tut-tutting about the author of 'The Audacity of Hope' having the audacity to hope. 'I think people might want a little more experience than that, given the nature of the times we live in,' Dick Cheney told Sean Hannity. Charles Krauthammer wrote that, despite Senator Barack Obama's charms, he could not win in '08: 'The reason is Sept. 11, 2001. The country will simply not elect a novice in wartime.' But if there's one thing W.'s reign proves beyond a shadow of a doubt, it is this: Experience, like affectations, can be dangerous. Those who declaim on the need for Senator Obama to have more experience must forget who's running the country. It often seems that the most inexperienced person alive is George W. Bush — even after six years in office."

Clinton Endorses Plan For Withdrawal Of US Troops From Iraq. Fox News' Special Report (10/31, Hume) reported Sen. Hillary Clinton "firmly endorsed a plan, first introduced by Democrat congressman and war critic Jack Murtha, calling for US troops to start pulling out over the next two months." Clinton "said that the start of a US withdrawal would force Iraqi leaders to step up to the plate for their own security."

The AP (11/1) reports Clinton said Bush had pursued "a foreign policy that had produced 'a landscape of failure and disorder,' and she urged a return to diplomacy and negotiation in tackling the world's challenges." The New York Times (11/1, Santora, 1.21M) says Clinton "outlined a foreign policy that she said tried to blend 'realism' and 'idealism,' as opposed to what she said was the Bush administration's 'simplistic division of the world into good and evil.'"

Clinton Said To Be Rehearsing 2008 Themes During Campaign Stops. The Washington Post's David Ignatius (11/1) writes, "A day spent with" Sen. Hillary Clinton "on the campaign trail…illustrates the broad, bipartisan themes that have helped rebuild the party in Upstate New York. Her comments also signal the legislative strategy that Clinton hopes to pursue next year, when…Clinton herself will be the instant front-runner in the 2008 presidential race. … The issues Clinton stresses through the day are classic 'bridge to the future' themes articulated by Bill Clinton when he was president, but with a Hillary twist. She starts the morning brainstorming with local leaders on how to make Rochester a hub for 'green' alternative-energy technologies, building around a plant that makes fuel cells. Next, she meets with a health-care network and pitches a revival of her failed 1993 campaign to lower health costs and insure the uninsured. T hen it's a tour of a poor urban neighborhood being redeveloped with public-private partnerships of the sort the Clintons have long championed. Her last stop is a steel company where she talks about reviving American manufacturing."

DOJ_NMG_0089831

Patrick Set To Become Only The Second Black Governor In US History. USA Today (11/1, Page, 2.27M) reports Massachusetts Democratic gubernatorial nominee Deval Patrick, "who is African-American…insist[s] color isn't a factor in this campaign. … Colorblind electorate or not, Patrick is likely to make history next week. The political neophyte, who led Republican Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey by 25 percentage points in a Boston Globe poll taken Oct. 22-25, is poised to become the first black governor of Massachusetts and only the second black ever elected governor in any state. He is one of a new generation of African-American politicians who are changing old assumptions about what offices black candidates can win."

Study Finds Networks' Stories Have Pronounced Pro-Democratic Slant. The Washington Times (11/1, Harper, 88K) reports, "The Big Three television networks have used unprecedented midterm election coverage to bash the Republican Party with negative stories, and plenty of them, a study says. Only 12 percent of election stories that aired on NBC, ABC or CBS were favorable toward Republican candidates, according to a study released yesterday by the District-based Center for Media and Public Affairs (CMPA). … The study found that 77 percent of the news accounts between Sept. 5 and Oct. 22 offered favorable evaluations of Democratic candidates and lawmakers."

"Rookie" Anchors Prepare For Election Night Coverage. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, B1, Barnes, 2.03M) reports, "While NBC's Brian Williams, ABC's Charles Gibson and CBS's Katie Couric have all settled into their new roles as evening news anchors, Tuesday's midterm elections mark their inaugural efforts at presiding over prime-time election results. The stakes are high. Live coverage of national elections is a defining event for news organizations."

WSJournal Says AARP Position On Taxes Hurting Democrats. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, 2.03M) editorializes, "Social Security was supposed to be a killer issue for Democrats this election year after they defeated President Bush's reform plans in 2005. But suddenly the tables are turning on several Democratic candidates because of their endorsement of the tax-increase agenda of the American Association of Retired Persons, or AARP. The liberal entitlement lobby has asked candidates around the country to fill out a questionnaire asking, 'Will you support a balanced Social Security plan to continue the program's guaranteed benefits for future generations?' That may sound innocuous, but here's how AARP defines its balanced plan on its Web site near the above question: 'AARP believes that a bipartisan plan that balances additional contributions from high income workers with modest adjustments in future benefits can maintain guaranteed Social Security benefits for future generations.' … In Washington 'additional contributions' means a tax increase." Rep. Melissa Bean "now claims she never supported the tax increase she plainly endorsed in answering AARP's questionnaire. And AARP is helping her disavow her pledge by sending a letter to her district's AARP members."

Schumer, Bloomberg Say NYC Must Improve Corporate Climate. Sen. Charles E. Schumer and Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (11/1, A18, 2.03M) write that although recent "media chatter about the possibility of London taking over New York's position as the world's financial capital" have been "overblown," the city does run the risk of losing "its pre-eminence in the global financial-services sector" if its corporate climate is not improved. In spite of New York's advantages, the US has "been losing ground as the leader in capital formation," registering only one of the top 24 IPOs of 2005 to London's four. In light of these and other "warning signs," the city "has hired a consulting firm, which will issue a report in November identifying the specific variables that are negatively impacting our financial-services industry and recommending an action plan to correct them." Schumer and Bloomberg state that the firm's early work indicates that specific attention must be paid to "overregulation, frivolous litigation and incompatible accounting standards."

North Korea Agrees To Return To Six-Party Talks. The Wall Street Journal (11/1, A6, Ramstad, Baston, King, 2.03M) reports Pyongyang "agreed to return to nuclear-disarmament talks with its four neighbors and the US in a deal brokered by China. As part of the deal, the U.S. agreed to discuss its financial restrictions on the Pyongyang regime." The deal "relieves some of the tension that North Korea created after" its nuclear test, and "comes as countries around the world prepare to enforce sanctions imposed on North Korea by the [UNSC] following the test. President Bush said he was 'pleased' by the breakthrough and thanked the Chinese for their efforts in making it happen. Yet other U.S. officials expressed concern over whether North Korea plans to actually engage in talks and isn't simply trying to dodge U.N. sanctions." The Times adds the agreement "is a significant diplomatic accomplishment for China, North Korea's neighbor and closest ally. Relations between the two have been strained by Pyongyang's drive to demonstrate its nuclear capability." Assistant Secretary Chris Hill "who represented the U.S. in the discussions, said China's role validated the Bush administration's longstanding decision to negotiate with North Korea only when other countries are involved."

DOJ_NMG_0089832

Secretary Rice was asked, during an interview with Larry Kudlow, host of CNBC's Kudlow & Company (10/31), to explain what led to yesterday's move. "The international community spoke with one voice with resolution 1718 after the North Koreans tested a nuclear weapon. China has been an effective member, effective important member of this coalition of states that is, dealing with the North Korean issue. And, the Chinese asked if we would be prepared to attend a meeting that the North Koreans had suggested. An informal meeting in Beijing, we did. The North Koreans, agreed to come back to the talks. Now we have to make certain that we really prepare the talks well so we can have a good outcome and, can get some implementation of the agreement that was actually signed in September of 2005."

All three major networks noted the announcement. ABC World News (10/31, story 5, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There has been a breakthrough in the standoff with North Korea. North Korea has returned to return to the six-party disarmament talks. It is quite a reversal. The North has been talking about war and threatening more tests. China played a key role in convincing the North to return to negotiations. But the US says sanctions against North Korea will remain until the North takes concrete steps to abandon its nuclear ambitions." NBC Nightly News (10/31, story 5, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There was surprising news for the Administration today in another foreign policy crisis. Word that North Korea has agreed to restart those so-called six-nation talks on dismantling its atomic weapons program. The talks collapsed a year ago. It's now been three weeks since the north conducted that nuclear test. The US says China made the difference in getting them back to the table."

On its front page, the Washington Post (11/1, A1, Kessler, 748K) notes Pyongyang's "unexpected" move "will end" its "year-long boycott of the talks, which have dragged on intermittently for more than three years. Fourteen months ago, North Korea agreed in principle to dismantle its nuclear programs, but hard bargaining is still necessary to determine the sequence and timing of the incentives it expects in return." Hill "emerged from the meetings to say that there was the potential for 'substantial progress' in resolving an issue that has raised tensions throughout the region… U.S. officials were privately puzzled by the mercurial government's change of heart, though they said they hope the universal condemnation of North Korea's nuclear test and the swift imposition of U.N. sanctions had played a role."

The New York Times (11/1, Kahn, Cooper, 1.21M) calls the move "a first sign of easing tensions since" the nuclear test, but notes "the chances for rolling back the country's now-proven nuclear capability remained uncertain." The deal is "a procedural victory for Beijing, which scrambled to reopen a diplomatic channel even as it joined the United States and other international powers in supporting" post-test sanctions. "While North Korea's decision to restart the talks is being heralded as a diplomatic breakthrough, American envoys will be returning to the negotiating table to face an adversary that now has a demonstrated nuclear capability — a fact that America will try to minimize even as North Korea tries to exploit it, Bush administration officials and analysts said." Secretary Rice "played down suggestions that America's negotiating task would be made more difficult by the North's nuclear test." Rice "said the United States would work with the other participants of the talks to force the North to take a concrete step toward ending its nuclear program."

The Financial Times (11/1, Dickie, Pilling, Fifield) says analysts believe Pyongyang "probably bowed to growing pressure from China, its largest benefactor and closest political ally." While "the world's big powers work through the details of how to punish Kim Jong-il's regime for" its nuclear test, Hill "said on Tuesday that the negotiations – which had been stalled for a year – could resume as soon as this month. However, with North Korea remaining defiant and the US and Japan still lobbying for tough sanctions, hopes remain dim that Pyongyang will agree to abandon its nuclear capability."

In an analysis piece entitled, "N. Korea, U.S. Both Flexible," the AP (11/1, Herman) notes Washington and Pyongyang "took a step back from the nuclear brink after both sides showed they could be willing to bend under the calm guidance of Beijing." Both "had previously stuck to ironclad positions that seemed totally at odds, leaving little apparent room for a breakthrough. Neither side wanted to cave, despite calls from other nations for flexibility." Beijing "appears to have held the key in getting both sides to compromise and allow all to save 'face.'"

The AP (11/1, Raum) calls the move "a surprise turnabout," and says the "breakthrough came after pressure from China and a U.S. offer to discuss financial penalties already in place." Bush "cautiously welcomed the deal and thanked the Chinese for brokering it. But he said the agreement wouldn't sidetrack U.S. efforts to enforce sanctions… He said there was still 'a lot of work to do' and the U.S. would send teams to the region 'to make sure that the current United Nations Security Council resolution is enforced.'" The deal "represented a step back from the nuclear crisis and was widely applauded, if with some reservations. North Korea has a history of walking away from the six-nation talks, only to rejoin them, then to bolt again." Assistant Secretary McCormack "said he was sure there would be 'an opportunity for us to have direct talks' with North Korean negotiators in the context of the six-party framework."

DOJ_NMG_0089833

Similar stories appear in this morning's Los Angeles Times (11/1, Magnier, 918K), USA Today (11/1, Slavin, Macleod, 2.27M) and Washington Times (11/1, Kralev, 88K), among other sources. In its analysis, the Christian Science Monitor (11/1, Marquand, 58K) says the "surprise" deal "has likely headed off the possibility of a second nuclear test" and "has also restored six-nation talks aimed at denuclearizing the Korean peninsula, bringing a modicum of stability to a region rocked" by the first test. "Given the bristling anger in northeast Asia after the nuclear blast, analysts say it is salutary that Mr. Kim is returning to the table to talk with his immediate neighbors." However, experts "doubt that the North, having spent 40 years on its atomic program, is likely to give it up without dramatic achievement." When talks resume, "there seems little doubt Pyongyang expects to think of itself as a bona fide nuclear-status nation as talks resume - and is likely to push others to do so as well. Such a position is leagues from the kind of dismantlement the six-party talks are based on."

Bush Says US Allies In Asia Should Not Seek Nuclear Weapons. During the second-half of an interview he did with Sean Hannity of Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (10/31) President Bush was asked if he supports helping Japan, Taiwan and South Korea to arm themselves with nuclear weapons in order to confront the threat from North Korea. President Bush responded, "I would not support them for having nuclear weapons, although I notice the Japanese official said 'if we have to, we will.' And then of course the government stepped it back. I think the less nuclear armament in the far-east the better-off the world will be. I do believe we need to work very closely with our allies on missile defense. Our missile defense systems are getting better and better because of the money that we have been spending over the past five years. The key to success there in North Korea is to convince all the parties that it's not in their interest that North Korea have a nuclear weapon, which we have successfully done."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (11/1, 748K) editorializes that the move "is, first and foremost, a victory for China and its strategy of preserving Kim Jong Il's totalitarian regime. Whether it will contribute to the cause of dismantling the North's atomic arsenal remains to be seen."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (11/1, 918K) calls the development "a big diplomatic victory for Washington, and a bigger one for Beijing. Yet there are good reasons to be skeptical about Pyongyang's motives." Kim Jong Il "is a master at the art of weakening the resolve of diplomatic coalitions, and his decision to engage in talks once again may be nothing more than an attempt to stave off aggressive enforcement of U.N. Security Council sanctions."

Rice Urges UN To Speed Up Sanctions On Iran. AFP (11/1) reports Secretary Rice "called her major power counterparts in a bid to spur tough negotiations at the United Nations over a sanctions resolution against Iran," according to Undersecretary Burns. Rice "urged the foreign ministers from the other permanent" UNSC members "to overcome the differences that have prevented agreement on the sanctions package," Burns said. "She put forward the proposal that we should try to work extremely hard to get that resolution passed as quickly as possible," he added. Separately, Assistant Secretary McCormack said Monday that North Korea's "sudden decision Tuesday to give up its nuclear arsenal in the face of UN sanctions had provided a model for confronting Iran," whom he said is "certainly are watching whether or not the world was going to react to what North Korea did."

Moscow May Back UN Sanctions On Iran. The AP (11/1, Isachenkov) reports two senior Russian officials "indicated Tuesday that Moscow could back a draft UN Security Council resolution imposing sanctions on Iran, in an apparent sign of the Islamic Republic's growing isolation over its nuclear program." Yuri Volkov, a deputy speaker of the lower house of parliament, said Russia "will apparently have to join a new resolution on Iran proposed by Britain, Germany and France that envisages limited economic sanctions." And Igor Ivanov, the head of Russia's presidential Security Council, "made comments later that also suggested Moscow could support the draft European resolution." Meanwhile, Undersecretary Hughes told the AP while traveling in Dubai, "We're working with our international partners to send a message to Iran that the international community is opposed to Iran obtaining nuclear weapons." Although "sanctions against Iran are being discussed," Hughes noted that "there is a path for negotiations and we hope they choose that path." Separately, China "issued muted criticism" of Iran Tuesday, the AP notes. Asked about the Iranian president's declaration that Tehran would oppose any sanctions, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said "the relevant parties should not take any measures that may lead to the escalation of the situation."

Lebanese Leader Says Syria Still Arming Hezbollah. The Washington Times (11/1, Sands, 88K) reports, "Syria has continued to funnel arms to the Shi'ite

DOJ_NMG_0089834

Hezbollah militia in defiance of international demands, thus undermining hopes for peace and stability in Lebanon, a Lebanese political leader said yesterday. Walid Jumblatt, longtime leader of the minority Druze community, is the most senior Lebanese politician to visit Washington since Israel's inconclusive monthlong war with Hezbollah in southern Lebanon." The Times adds, "The complaint from Mr. Jumblatt, a key figure in the anti-Syrian coalition that dominates Lebanon's parliament, came a day after John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said at a Security Council meeting that Syria and Iran -- Hezbollah's two main sponsors -- were 'actively trying to destabilize the democratically elected government of Lebanon' by re-arming Hezbollah."

Israeli Jets Stage Mock Raids On Hezbollah Strongholds. The AP (11/1, Johnson) reports, "Israel's fighter jets roared over Hezbollah strongholds Tuesday, staging mock raids in its strongest show of force since its war with the guerrilla group ended more than two months ago. The flyovers, which startled many Lebanese with fresh memories of the war, highlight the unsettled tensions between Israel and its northern neighbor, whose political situation has grown increasingly more uncertain." The Israeli fighter jets "swooped low over south Beirut at least six times in the morning before soaring back into the sky, Lebanese security officials said."

In Departure From US Policy, Blair Reaches Out To Syria. The Financial Times (11/1, Khalaf, Blitz) reports, "Tony Blair, Britain's prime minister, has launched a secret diplomatic move to prise Syria away from its support for radical Middle East groups and policies. In an initiative that departs from the US policy of isolating Syria, Mr Blair this week sent Sir Nigel Sheinwald, his most senior foreign policy adviser, to Damascus where he met Bashar al-Assad, the president, and other senior figures in the regime." The Times adds, "Downing Street and the Syrian government confirmed on Tuesday night that Sir Nigel, one of Mr Blair's closest aides, met Mr Assad on Monday."

Israeli Defense Minister Says Saudi Plan Could Be Basis For Talks With Palestinians. The AP (11/1, Heller) reports, "Israel's defense minister said Tuesday that a dormant Saudi initiative for Mideast peace could be a 'basis for negotiation,' indicating a new possibility for talks with the Palestinians after years of stalemate." The Saudi plan "calls for a comprehensive peace between Israel and the Arab world, based on a complete Israeli withdrawal from lands it captured in the 1967 Mideast war -- the West Bank, Gaza Strip, east Jerusalem and Golan Heights." Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz "said he was not endorsing the plan. But he was the most senior Israeli official even to publicly consider it."

Palestinian Adviser Says Hamas Will Honor Truce. In a New York Times (11/1, 1.21M) op-ed, Ahmed Yousef, a senior adviser to Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, says Hamas has proposed "a long-term truce" so "the Israeli and Palestinian peoples can try to negotiate a lasting peace." Yousef argues that "when Hamas gives its word to an international agreement, it does so in the name of God and will therefore keep its word." Hamas, he notes, "has honored its previous cease-fires, as Israelis grudgingly note," and its truce offer is "no ruse, as some assert, to strengthen our military machine, to buy time to organize better or to consolidate our hold on the Palestinian Authority." Instead, he says "Palestinians are prepared to enter into a [truce] to bring about an immediate end to the occupation and to initiate a period of peaceful coexistence during which both sides would refrain from any form of military aggression or provocation."

Bush Launches Review Of Darfur Policy. AFP (11/1) reports President Bush Tuesday announced a review of US policy on the Darfur crisis. Meeting with his personal envoy for Darfur, Andrew Natsios at the White House, Bush "said the diplomat had delivered a 'grim report' about the humanitarian situation" in Darfur. "The United States is going to work with the international community to come up with a single plan on how to address this issue and save lives," Bush said. AFP notes that Bush "provided few details, other than to insist that the plan would include deployment of a 'credible and effective international force to go into Darfur to save lives.'" Separately, Assistant Secretary McCormack said the Bush administration was mulling "what new or different policy proposals we might make" to end the deadlock. Although he "declined to provide details," McCormack stressed that "what all that does is underscore the fact that we want to try to get something done on this issue."

Westerners' Arrests In Yemen Renew Terrorism Concerns. The Washington Times (11/1, Waterman, 88K) reports the arrests in Yemen of six Westerners said to be members of al Qaeda has "highlighted concerns that the region remains a 'transmission belt' for Islamic converts looking for a way to join jihadi terrorist groups." However, analysts "caution that the facts of the case remain murky and warned that Yemenis had many reasons to try to burnish their counterterrorism credentials by exaggerating the importance of the arrests." Over the weekend, authorities in Yemen announced they arrested "three Australians, a Dane, a German, a Briton and two other foreigners Oct. 16 and charged them with trying to smuggle weapons to Islamic militias in neighboring Somalia." An unidentified US intelligence official speaking about the arrests was quoted as saying, "This was a pretty good wrap-up of a group of bad guys."

DOJ_NMG_0089835

Sadat's Nephew Sentenced To Prison For Defaming Egyptian Military. The New York Times (11/1, A8, Charbel, Slackman, 1.21M) reports Talaat el-Sadat, the nephew of President Anwar el-Sadat and an opposition member of Parliament, was sentenced by a military court Tuesday to one year in prison "on charges that he defamed the military by essentially blaming it for having a hand in his uncle's death." The Post notes that move comes "as Egyptian authorities have shown less and less tolerance for critical opposition." It also notes that "with increasing frequency," members of the banned Muslim Brotherhood organization "have been arrested and held without charge under a law intended to fight terrorism."

Studies Find Security Council Seats Tied To US Aid. The Washington Post (11/1, A19, Lynch, 748K) reports that although "Republican and Democratic administrations have insisted for decades they do not engage in the grubby vote-buying practices that are common in elections for key UN posts," recent academic studies have found that "poor countries that serve on the influential Security Council typically receive substantially more US aid dollars and find it easier to obtain loans or grants from financial institutions that are strongly influenced by the United States and other economic powerhouses." While officials from the US and "several international agencies questioned the findings," the Post says they "underscore the importance the United States places on cultivating even the weakest members of the Security Council" and "suggest a possible price tag." For example, a study by two Harvard University scholars that tracked US economic and military assistance from 1946 to 2001 found that a "two-year seat on the Security Council…can generate a 59 percent spike in US assistance." While "in times of crisis, US aid to some member countries has increased by as much as 170 percent," the Post notes.

China Adopts Rules Aimed At Reducing Executions. The New York Times (11/1, A3, Lague, 1.21M) reports that in response to "domestic and international criticism of its extensive use of capital punishment," China Tuesday adopted new rules "requiring review of all death sentences by the Supreme People's Court." The Times notes that the move, which "restores a power that was stripped from the Supreme Court in 1983 and given to provincial courts as part of a major crackdown on crime," comes as authorities "are facing mounting criticism from human rights groups and Chinese legal scholars for what they say is the widespread and arbitrary use of the death penalty."

Former South African Leader Botha, Dies. The death of former South African leader, P.W. Botha, Tuesday was heavily noted in lengthy obituaries in today's dailies. For example, the New York Times (11/1, B9, Gregory, 1.21M) runs a 2,100-word recount of Botha's personal history, noting that he "struggled vainly to preserve apartheid rule in a tide of domestic racial violence and global condemnation."

Similarly, in a 1,100-word obit, the Washington Post (11/1, B7, Bernstein, 748K) calls Botha an "unapologetic leader…who led his country into deepening political crisis and racial violence." The Financial Times (11/1, Mallet) notes in its piece that the former president "never understood the forces that he had unleashed" nor did he ever apologize "for the torture, the killings and the poverty inflicted on South Africans and on the inhabitants of neighboring states by his regime."

The AP (11/1, Nullis) notes that "there has been no decision on funeral arrangements."

Migrants' Remittances Seen As Imperfect Cure For Poor Nations. In a 2,350-word front page article, the Wall Street Journal (11/1, A1, Davis, 2.03M) examines the economic impact of money sent from Salvadoran immigrants in the US to relatives at home. The Journal says "many development economists believe" the funds "could transform some of the world's most impoverished regions, by putting cash directly in the pockets of the poor." At the same time it warns that "reliance on remittances may turn out to be the latest development fad that fails to live up to its hype." For countries to "reduce poverty on a sustained basis and to create a middle class," the Journal says they "need to grow rapidly over years," and "though remittances fuel some spending, there isn't much evidence they have added to sustained growth. Instead, the infusions of outside cash often distort the local economy and may diminish the long-term prospects for gains."

NYTimes Welcomes Germany's Decision To Play Greater Role In Global Security. In an editorial, the New York Times (11/1, 1.21M) welcomes Germany's "move out of its postwar pacifist mode and undertake a greater role in global security." The Times says, "There has been no good reason for some time why Germany should not do its share of global peacekeeping and peacemaking," especially at a time "when the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and multiple peacekeeping missions in Africa have strained the military resources of America and its leading NATO allies." The Times concludes, "There's a lot of work to be done, and it's time the Germans joined in."

DOJ_NMG_0089836

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Affordable Housing Bond Asks Voters For Their Vision Of L.A.."
"A Violent Month Hits Home."
"Campaign Fireworks Fly As Polls Put Senate In Play."
"Hubble Tune-Up Is A Go."
"More Than Ever, Insurgents Are Targeting U.S. Forces."

USA Today:
"Previous Hubble Upgrades."
"Hubble Repair Flight Ok'd, But First NASA Needs $900M."
"Election Tests How Much Race Matters."
"Many Eyes Will Watch The Polls."
"On Lookout For Trouble."
"Study Shows Depression's Scope."

New York Times:
"Iraqi Demands Pullback; U.S. Lifts Baghdad Cordon."
"As Vote Nears, Stances On War Set Off Sparks."
"North Korea Will Resume Nuclear Talks."
"After The Storm, Students Left Alone And Angry."
"Battle Over Abortion Focuses On South Dakota Vote."
"Working Mothers Find Some Peace On The Road."

Washington Post:
"N. Korea Agrees To Return To Nuclear Talks."
"Iraq Tells U.S. to Quit Sadr City Checkpoints."
"Va., Md. Senate Camps Dig Deep."
"Campaigner in Chief Has Limited Reach."
"Hubble Repair Mission Is A Go."
"Molded By Faith And Persistence."

Washington Times:
"N. Korea Agrees To Six-Party Talks."
"Marriage Measure May Turn On Allen."
"Baby Boom Echoes In Iraq."
"Specter Of Tax man Haunts Democrats."
"Cardin, Steele Put Focus On PG."
"Obsolete Legion Faces Uncertainly."
"Holiday Revelers Can Give Thanks For $2 Gas."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"MegaFest Off Atlanta's '07 Calendar."
"Dekalb Cops Ignore Rules In Shootings."
"Bush Skewers Kerry Over Iraq Comment."
"Vegetables To Suspect In Salmonella Outbreak."

Houston Chronicle:
"New Safety Measures Urged For BP, Others."
"NASA To repair Hubble Despite Potential Risk."
"Texas May See Its Star Wane On Capitol Hill."
"DNA Clears Inmate 25 Years After Conviction For Rape."
"Getting A Nutty Idea To take Root."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Kerry's Statements; Kerry's Statements Analysis; No More US Blockade –Iraq; US Response To Maliki; North Korea-Six Party Talks; New Medical Finding-SIDS; Airlines Making Money; Repairing Hubble; PW Botha Obit; Tag Team Parents; Elephants & Mirrors; Halloween Costumes.
CBS: Kerry's Statement; No More US Blockade-Iraq; Troops Staying Longer-Iraq; North Korea-Six Party Talks; New Medical Finding-SIDS; Kerry's Statement Analysis; Security Moms-Campaign 2006; Halloween Holiday Of The Year.
NBC: Kerry's Statement; Kerry's Statement Analysis; No More US Check Points-Iraq; Troops Staying longer-Iraq; North Korea-Six Party Talks; Stock Market; New Medical Finding-SIDS; PW Botha Obit; Repairing Hubble; Halloween Business.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: CA Wildfire-Another Firefighter Dies; CA Wildfire Investigation; San Francisco-Gunshots During Halloween Street Party; Kerry-Iraq Comments; Iraq-US Forces Leave Sadr City Blockade; Iraq-Brother's Reunion; Britain-Sexual Activity Study.
CBS: CA Wildfire-Another Firefighter Dies; San Francisco-Gunshots During Halloween Street Party; Republicans-Kerry's Iraq Comments; Iraq-Fallujah Insurgents Making Comeback; Botha Obit; Stock Markets.
NPR: CA Wildfire-Another Firefighter Dies; CA Wildfire Investigation; San Francisco-Gunshots During Halloween Street Party; Bush-Kerry's Iraq Comments; Bush-Afghanistan; Iraq-US Forces Leave Sadr City Blockade; Fiji-Coup Fears; North Korea's Decision To Rejoin Six Party Talks; Tokyo Stock Market.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY —Speaks at a Montana Victory Rally, Majestic Valley Arena, Kalispell, Mont.

LAURA BUSH — Speaks at a Ron Lewis for Congress and Kentucky Victory 2006 Rally, Colvin Community Center, Radcliff, Ky. Speaks at an Ohio Victory 2006 Rally. Emerald Room at the Makoy Center, Hilliard, Ohio.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: FINANCIAL CONFERENCE _ The Opportunity Finance Network hosts a four day conference on bringing Americans on the economic margins into the mainstream and opening emerging domestic markets. Highlights: 12:30 p.m. - 1:45 p.m. Keynote address by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave, NW.

DOJ_NMG_0089837

TREASURY REFUNDING _ 10 a.m. Deputy Assistant Treasury Secretary James Clouse holds the Quarterly Refunding news conference. Location: Room 4121, main Treasury.

COMMON ACCESS CARD _ 10:30 a.m. David S. Chu, Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, will brief on the Next Generation Common Access Card. Location: DOD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

DRUG COVERAGE _ 11 a.m. Families USA holds a telephone briefing to discuss prescription drug coverage through the ``doughnut hole." Contacts: Dave Lemmon, 202-628-3030. Notes: Callin number: 800-662-5508; passcode: 4649350.

POLITICS-YOUTH POLL _ 11 a.m. - 12 p.m. Harvard University's Institute of Politics releases a new national poll on the political views of 18-24 year olds. With Jean Shaheen, director, Harvard's IOP and former governor of New Hampshire; and Christopher Aterton, dean, George Washington University's Graduate School of Political Management. Location: Morton Auditorium, GWU, 805 21st St. NW.

PANDEMIC FLU _ 12 p.m. The Financial Services Roundtable's Blue Ribbon Commission on Mega Catastrophes sponsors a panel discussion, ``Preparing for Pandemic Flu: A Call to Action," with Harvey Rubin of the Institute for Strategic Threat Analysis and Response, Tara O'Toole of University of Pittsburgh Medical Center; Annie Searle of Washington Mutual Enterprise Risk Services. Location: National Press Club.

REAGAN-COMMUNISM _ 12 p.m. The Heritage Foundation holds a program on ``Ronald Reagan and the Fall of Communism, with author Paul Kengor. Location: Lehrman Auditorium, Heritage Foundation, 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

CLEAN AIR _ 12:15 p.m. Georgetown Environmental Law and Policy Institute, others, hold a panel discussion on the Duke Energy case which will have been heard that morning before the Supreme Court, with Sean Donahue of Environmental Defense, Holly Gordon of Stanford Law School, F. William Brownell of Hunton and Williams, and Scott Segal of Bracewell and Giuliani. Location: Room 201, Georgetown University Law Center, 600 New Jersey Ave. NW.

INDIA-US _ 12:30 p.m. The School of Advanced International Studies holds a program with former Indian External Affairs Minister Jaswant Singh and former Deputy Secretary of State Strobe Talbott discussing their meetings held in the wake of India's 1998 nuclear tests. Location: Kenney Auditorium, 1740 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

IRAN OPTIONS _ 12:30 p.m. The Council on Foreign Relations hosts ``Axis of Anxiety: US Options on Iran." Participants: ``Kenneth M. Pollack, Senior Fellow and Director of Research, Saban Center for Middle East Policy, The Brookings Institution; Ray Takeyh, Senior Fellow for Middle Eastern Studies, Council on Foreign Relations; Author, ``Hidden Iran: Paradox and Power in the Islamic Republic;" and Barbara Slavin, Senior Diplomatic Reporter, USA Today. Location: Council on Foreign Relations, 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

PURPLE HEART _ 12:30 p.m. VA Secretary Jim Nicholson presents Purple Heart Medals to four recently wounded combat veterans. Tom Poulter, national commander of Military Order of the Purple Heart, discusses groups new ``Hall of Honor in New Windsor, N.Y. Location: National Press Club, First Amendment Lounge.

SADDAM TRIAL _ 1 p.m. Attorney Ramsey Clark holds a news conference to report on the progress of the Saddam Hussein trial. Location: National Press Club.

GREENHOUSE GASES _ 2 p.m. - 3:30 p.m. The Environmental and Energy Study Institute (EESI) hosts a congressional briefing on the active role small business has taken in supporting California's recently enacted first-of-a-kind greenhouse gas legislation, AB 32, and why this can have significant implications for climate legislation nationally. Speakers: Byron Kennard, Executive Director, Center for Small Business and the Environment; Scott Hauge, Founder and President, Small Business California; and Hank Ryan, Executive Director, Small Business California. Location: Room 428-A, Russell Senate Office Building.

EXIT POLL _ 3 p.m. Rev. Jim Wallis, author of Gods Politics, and Rabbi David Saperstein, Director of the Religious Action Center, hold a telephone press conference calling on the media outlets that commissioned and prepared the 2004 ``moral values exit poll question to change the question, both in their 2006 election polling and news coverage. Contacts: Katie Barge, 202-544-7921.

RYAN LECTURE _ 4 p.m. Professor William Eskridge Jr. delivers the Thomas F. Ryan Lecture, ``Supreme Court Deference to Agencies, 1981-2006: An Empirical and Normative Examination." Location: Georgetown University Law Center Gewirz Student Center, 12th Floor 120 F St. NW.

MINUTEMAN-IMMIGRATION _ 7:30 p.m. Chris Simcox, founder and President of the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps, speaks at Georgetown University. Location: Copley Formal Lounge, Copley Hall, Georgetown University.

DOJ_NMG_0089838

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Wednesday, November 01, 2006 11:51 AM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CRT); Ames, Andrew; Battaglia, John T; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Beckner, Rick (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Davis, Deborah J; Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Gunn, Currie (SMO); Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McDonald, Esther Slater; McMahon, Linda M (CIV); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John (USAEO); O'Quinn, John C; Osborn, Tara (CIV); Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Shaw, Aloma A; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 11/1/06 Civil News News

Tobacco Companies Win Delay of `Light' Cigarette Marketing Ban

Court Blocks Ruling on Tobacco Industry

New Battle Over Executive Privilege Is Looming in Washington

Judge Dismisses Oilman's Fraud Claims

School to pay $1.3M, settle feds' charges

Bloomberg

October 31, 2006

Tobacco Companies Win Delay of `Light' Cigarette Marketing Ban

By William McQuillen

Altria Group Inc.'s Philip Morris USA and other U.S. cigarette makers won a delay of a court-imposed ban on the marketing of ``light'' cigarettes the industry claimed would cost it hundreds of millions of dollars.

The ruling by the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington postpones changes imposed in August by U.S. District Judge Gladys Kessler. She ordered the companies to stop marketing cigarettes as ``light'' and ``low-tar'' by January, and to make statements about the health effects of smoking in the media and on cigarette packages. Today's decision by the higher court delays enforcement of her order while the companies pursue an appeal.

Following a nine-month trial, Kessler ruled that the companies violated the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, or RICO, in a case filed in 1999 by the U.S. Department of Justice. In an order today, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit said the companies had ``satisfied the stringent standards required'' for a stay pending their appeal to the court.

In her August decision, Kessler declined to order the companies to pay $14 billion to fun nationwide smoking cessation and anti-smoking education programs.

Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller declined to comment.

In addition to Philip Morris, the defendants that requested the stay are Reynolds American Inc.'s R.J. Reynolds Tobacco; Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp.; Loews Corp.'s Lorillard Tobacco Co. and British American Tobacco Plc's British American Tobacco (Investments) Ltd.

Shares of New York-based Altria were unchanged at $81.33 at 5:04 p.m. in trading after the close of the New York Stock Exchange. Shares of Winston-Salem, North Carolina-based Reynolds American fell 34 cents to $63.16.

The case is U.S. v. Philip Morris USA, 99-CV-2496, U.S. District Court, District of Columbia (Washington).

END

AP

November 1, 2006

Court Blocks Ruling on Tobacco Industry

By MATT APUZZO

WASHINGTON - A federal appeals court blocked a landmark judgment against the tobacco industry Tuesday, allowing the companies to continue selling "light" and "low tar" cigarettes until their appeals can be reviewed.

The decision by the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit also allows the companies to continue for now the advertising campaigns that a federal judge in August ruled were misleading.

Without comment, the appeals court granted the tobacco companies' request to put Judge Gladys Kessler's order on hold. The companies have argued that her far-reaching ruling could cost them millions of dollars and lead to a loss of customers.

In mid-August, Kessler ruled that the companies had violated racketeering laws and conspired for decades to mislead the public about the health hazards of smoking.

The judge ordered the companies to publish in newspapers and on their Web sites "corrective statements" on the adverse health effects and addictiveness of smoking and nicotine.

She also ordered tobacco companies to stop labeling cigarettes as "low tar," "light," "ultra light" or "mild," since such cigarettes have been found to be no safer than others because of how people smoke them.

Kessler's ruling was appealed by Philip Morris USA, Lorillard Inc., Brown & Williamson Corp. and British American Tobacco PLC.

"The company believes the trial court's decision is contrary to the law and facts presented during trial, and looks forward to the opportunity to present its arguments to the appellate court.," said William S. Ohlemeyer, vice president and associate general counsel for Altria Group Inc., the parent company of Philip Morris.

William V. Corr, executive director of the Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids, said the appeals court stay was not surprising.

"Judge Kessler's finding was that these companies have lied to the American people for 50 years," Corr said. "We're confident that, if it means going all the way to the Supreme Court, the government's case will be vindicated and the industry will be held accountable."

The Justice Department declined comment.

The three-judge appeals court panel was divided 2-1 on whether to block the order, with Republican-appointed Judges David B. Sentelle and A. Raymond Randolph in the majority and Democratic appointee Judge David S. Tatel in dissent.

The court will consider written and oral arguments in the case. No date has been set for arguments. It could be more than a year before an opinion is released.

END

New York Sun

November 1, 2006

New Battle Over Executive Privilege Is Looming in Washington

BY JOSH GERSTEIN - Staff Reporter of the Sun

A new executive privilege battle is looming in Washington as a federal appeals court considers whether to intervene in an election-eve dispute over records of visitors to Vice President Cheney's home at the Naval Observatory, as well as his offices in the White House complex.

Last month, a federal judge in Washington, Ricardo Urbina, ordered the Secret Service to disclose two years of visitor logs to the Washington Post immediately or explain in detail why the records are exempt from release under the Freedom of Information Act.

The Justice Department has asked the U.S. Court of Appeals to block Judge Urbina's order to allow the parties to present more extensive legal arguments about the dispute.

"Disclosure of the records at issue could reveal an ever-expanding mosaic that would allow observers to chart the course of vice presidential contacts and deliberations in unprecedented fashion," government attorneys argued in a brief filed yesterday. "Such an unwarranted intrusion into the most sensitive deliberations of the vice presidency cannot be countenanced."

Judge Urbina and the Post cited the upcoming election as a reason for expeditious release of the logs.

Justice Department lawyers said the election was not a proper factor to consider. They also scoffed at the suggestion that voters might change their minds because of the visitor records. "The timing of congressional elections should not drive (or be seen to drive) the timing of FOIA litigation, especially litigation raising sensitive issues concerning the vice president and separation of powers," the government said.

Judge Urbina's order did not actually order the release of any records, because the Secret Service could still assert exemptions, including one that covers executive privilege. "The government has failed to articulate how invocation of appropriate FOIA exemptions might somehow be inadequate to protect it from unwarranted harm," an attorney for the Post, David Sobel, told the appeals court. Mr. Sobel said the time pressure now on the Secret Service was the product of its failure to respond in a timely fashion to the Post's request, which was filed in June.

In his recent opinion, Judge Urbina signaled a willingness to shield personal visits to Mr. Cheney from disclosure. However, he said that if personal and official visits could not be easily segregated, Mr. Cheney's privacy might have to yield to the public's interest in open government.

In response to recent Freedom of Information Act lawsuits, the Secret Service has released logs of White House visits by a disgraced lobbyist, Jack Abramoff, and other GOP insiders, such as Grover Norquist and Ralph Reed. The Justice Department said those were "discretionary" releases that did not undermine the government's position that the visitor logs are presidential records not subject to public records requests until years after the president leaves office.

END

AP

Oct. 31, 2006, 6:58PM

Judge Dismisses Oilman's Fraud Claims

By BEN NEARY Associated Press Writer

CHEYENNE, Wyo. — A federal judge has dismissed all 73 lawsuits in which a Colorado oilman had claimed that natural gas companies around the West had underreported their production on federal lands.

Jack Grynberg, who runs a petroleum company based in Greenwood Village, Colo., had sued 73 energy and pipeline companies charging they inaccurately measured gas production. Under the federal False Claims Act, he stood to collect a bounty if the courts agreed.

However, in a strongly worded ruling entered Friday, U.S. District Judge William Downes of Casper concluded that most of Grynberg's knowledge of the companies' gas-measurement techniques was secondhand or speculative. Federal law requires that to collect a bounty, a person must show the government new information about the fraud he or she alleges.

"Grynberg deliberately chose to make sweeping allegations of fraud against nearly the entire industry, based in large part on rank speculation," Downes wrote. "By employing such odious tactics, he now becomes the instrument of his own undoing."

Downes has yet to rule on a request that he dismiss six similar lawsuits in which Grynberg has charged that companies underreported the amount of CO_2 they produced from federal lands.

In a telephone interview on Tuesday, Grynberg said he plans to appeal Downes' ruling. Grynberg emphasized that a special master in the case _ a legal hearing officer who oversees involved litigation for the judge _ had recommended that Downes allow 35 of his cases to go to trial.

"Needless to say, we're going to be taking the cases to the 10th Circuit," Grynberg said. The 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver considers appeals from Wyoming.

Grynberg said he disagrees with Downes' finding that he had only secondhand or speculative knowledge of the gas production.

"I am the original source," Grynberg said.

"I'm sure the 10th Circuit is going to resolve it," Grynberg said. "We think that all of them should go to trial. That's of course our opinion, not the judge's opinion. It's a highly technical situation, a highly technical case."

Grynberg said he's spent over $20 million on the litigation. His 73 cases named 305 defendants.

"I think I was very careful," Grynberg said. "It's supposed to be the largest False Claims Act litigation in the history of the United States."

Grynberg said he hadn't done any calculations about how much he stood to gain if the courts ultimately ruled in his favor. He said he was not motivated by the prospect of personal gain.

Rather, Grynberg said he wants to see energy companies pay their fair share for drilling on American Indian lands, and also wants to see them pay to support public schools that draw revenue from energy production on other federal lands.

Denver lawyer Gary Davenport represents three companies named in one of Grynberg's lawsuits: Western Gas Resources Inc. _ acquired by Anadarko Petroleum earlier this year _ and MIGC and MGTC, which operate pipelines in Wyoming's Powder River Basin.

"Obviously, we feel that the judge did exactly the right thing," Davenport said Tuesday.

Davenport said he's not aware of any estimates of how much money could have been involved in the case if Grynberg had prevailed.

"The defendants in this case don't think their measurement techniques were wrong in any case," he said.

END

Asbury Park Press
November 1, 2006

School to pay $1.3M, settle feds' charges

BY JOHN VANDIVER
TOMS RIVER BUREAU

LAKEWOOD — One of the township's largest private schools has agreed to pay more than $1.2 million to the federal government to resolve charges that it provided false information to obtain funds for preschoolers' lunches, U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie announced Tuesday.

The government alleged that between 1996 and 2000, Lakewood Cheder School submitted claims for school lunches for more than 1,100 preschool-age children whose lunches were served at about 90 private residences. These were ineligible and unapproved sites under the program, Christie said.

"This is an abuse of government funds that takes money away from other children who are truly in need and deserving of these resources," Christie said in a news statement detailing the alleged offenses.

The school submitted the false information and statements to the U.S. Department of Agriculture through the state Bureau of Child Nutrition, the U.S. Attorney's Office said. The false information resulted in excessive payments to Lakewood Cheder under the National School Lunch Program.

Under terms of the settlement, Lakewood Cheder School does not admit liability.

Officials at Lakewood Cheder did not return phone calls seeking comment. The U.S. Attorney's Office also could not be reached to clarify the charges.

The settlement was signed Oct. 25 by Baruch Manes, the school's vice president, who is also vice chairman of the Igud, an influential council of private school leaders.

By providing false information, the school obtained an increased payment of $953,421 under the National School Lunch Program to which it was not entitled, Christie's office reported. The settlement amount is $1,295,549.

"It is wrong, and we will continue to look for such misappropriations and recoup that money so that it can serve the intended recipients," Christie's statement said.

Lakewood Cheder for boys is affiliated with Bais Faiga School for girls. In 2000, they had a combined enrollment of more than 2,500 pupils at three locations.

There are some 50 private schools in Lakewood, home to the state's largest concentration of Orthodox Jewish families. Private school enrollment is about three times the public school total.

Controversy about public funds and private schools is not new in Lakewood. Earlier this year, the Board of Education determined that the Lakewood school district shortchanged private schools about $1.1 million in Title I funding during the 2005-06 school year. Title I provides federal aid to low-income students, both public and private.

The settlement resolves allegations against Lakewood Cheder for violations of the False Claims Act, which permits recovery of triple the amount of damages to the government plus penalties, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Rudolph A. Filko, deputy chief of the Civil Division of the U.S. Attorney's Office.

END

Goodling, Monica

From: Goodling, Monica
Sent: Wednesday, November 1, 2006 7:48 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: Not read: RE: Second Draft of Bradbury testimony re Hamdan

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Thursday, November 02, 2006 9:31 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Thursday, November 02, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061102.pdf; dojclips061102.doc

This morning's Department of Justice News Clips is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNewsâ€™ express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Detainees' Attorneys Ask Court To Allow Challenges (WP) 5
Detainees Challenge Military Trials Law (AP).....5
Padilla Papers Detail Allegations Of Mistreatment (NYT/AP)....6
Ex-judges: Detainee Law Unconstitutional (AP-Y).....7
Alleged Terrorist Mastermind Languishes In British Legal Limbo (FINDLAW/AP).....8
Britain Said To Seek Weaker Torture Protections (WP) 9
British Authorities Charge Suspect With Violations Of Terrorism Laws (NYT) 10
Israeli Agent Scoffs At Hamas Defendant's Torture Claims (AP)..... 10
What They Don't Know Is Frightening (WT)..... 11
FBI Logs On For Monitoring Service For Arabic Networks (GCN) 12

Homeland Response:

Air Plot Said To Target Cities (WP) 12
PayPal Building Targeted In Explosion (AP)..... 13
Probe Of Blast At EBay's North S.J. Campus Yields Few Answers; Site Set To Reopen Thursday (MERCN)..... 13
Explosive Shatters Window At PayPal Headquarters (NYT) ... 15
EBay Campus Closed After Halloween Explosion (SJBIZ) 15
Man Convicted In Fake Hazmat Incident (NSDY/AP)..... 15
Man Behind Chemical Attack Hoax Could Get 5 Years (WVIT)..... 16
Uncasville Man Admits Lying To FBI In Powdery Substance Hoax (NORBULL) 16
There's Secrecy, And There's Expediency (WP) 16
Bonuses Don't Cut Turnover For TSA (USAT) 17
Ruby Ridge Revisited: Deval Let Sniper Off The The Hook (BOSH)..... 18

War News:

Staying The Course, Win Or Lose (WP) 18
US Air Strike Kills Al-Qaeda Kingpin: Military (AFP) 20
Iraqi Shiites Continue To Exert Independence And Seek Changes To U.N. Deal On U.S. Troops (NYT) 20
Iraqi Prime Minister Asserts Independence, Gains Stature (CSM).....22
Baghdad Attacks Target Busy Areas (WP).....23
Last Gasps In Iraq (USAT) 24
Army Journal Cites Problems With Iraqis (AP-Y).....25
Military Rebuts Media On Iraq (LAT) 26
Homeward Bound -- If Only For A Year (LAT) 27
Medic Tends A Fallen Marine, With Skill, Prayer And Fury (NYT).....28
Same Old Demons (NYT) 31
Hadley Travels To Afghanistan After Iraq (AP-Y) 32
Stop Calling It The 'War On Terror' (LAT) 32

DOJ:

Attorney General Makes Surprise Lecture At Law School (HATCHET).....33

Corporate Scandals:

H-P's Hurd Answers House Panel On Probe, Sheds Little New Light (WSJ) 34
Sorin To Plead Guilty In Comverse Backdating Case (WSJ) .35
5 Workers Charged With Conspiracy & Security Fraud (KCBS).....36
Prosecutors Are Prospering (HC).....36
New York AG Presses Companies To Stop Paying Indicted Employees' Legal Bills (LAW).....38
Halliburton Says It Will Agree To SEC's Request For More Time For Bribery Investigation (FINDLAW/AP) 39

Criminal Law:

Judge May Allow Abramoff To Be Sentenced In Washington (MH) 40
Breach At Lab Called Significant (LAT) 41
Karen Weldon's Ties To Serbs Detailed (PHI).....42

Powerful Republican Enters A Dogfight Over Lobbying Link (FT) 43
Women's Testimony Continues At FCI Trial (TALLDEM) 44
Ex-Ala. Fire College Official Agrees To Plead Guilty To Fraud (AP) 45
Former Elsa Officer Second Accused Of Taking Bribes (FWST) 46
Sentencing Postponed For City Official In Truck Scandal (AP) 46
Commerce Bancorp Is Off The Hook (PHI) 47
Fla. Lawmaker Resigns Over Threatening Phone Calls (USAT/AP) 48
Mob Enforcer Denied Bail On Extortion Charges (PHI) 48
Pittsburgh Mob Boss Dies (KDKA) 49
Late Design Change Is Cited In Collapse Of Tunnel Ceiling In Boston (NYT) 50
CEO Is Charged With Stealing Identities (MH) 50
Former Atlanta Editor Gets 8 Years In Child Porn Case (TEXGAZ) 51
Supreme Court Ponders Retroactive Ruling (AP) 51
Second Guilty Plea In Cable Fraud Scheme (UPI) 52
Despite Flawed Defense, A Death Sentence Stands (NYT) ... 52

Civil Law:

Groups Ask FTC To Probe Online Ad Profiling (WP) 54
Torts Gone Wild (LAT) 54

Civil Rights:

Poll Assignment Calls Mislead (BSUN) 55
U.S. Attorney's Office: We're Ready To Investigate Election Fraud (BALTBIZ) 56
More Poll Workers Recruited, But Training Proves Daunting (WP) 57
Md. Democrats Say GOP Plans To Block Voters (WP) 59
False Voter Registrations Allegedly Submitted (KCS) 60
Four ACORN Workers Indicted In Kansas City (SLPD) 61
Conference Looks At Human Trafficking Along Border (EPTIMES) 61
Annexation Excludes Vote (BSH) 62
Activist Calls For Cop Probe In DeKalb Rally Set For Friday Over 31 Shootings Since 2001 (AJC) 63
US State Attorney General Gets Patient Records From Abortion Clinics After 2-year Effort (FINDLAW/AP) 64
Outside Money Fuels Battle On Abortion (NYT) 65
Military Pressed Over Expressions Of Faith (WP) 65
Marriage Limits Set To Face Stiff Fight In 3 States (WT) 66
Female Voters Courted In Affirmative-Action Fight (WP) 67

Antitrust:

CVS Buying Caremark For About $21.2B (AP) 68
Kazaa Said To Pay $10 Million In Settlement (NYT) 70
Fate Of Canadian Steelmaker To Be Decided Soon (BSUN/BLOOM) 70
Orthopedics Maker Is Said To Be In Talks To Buy A U.S. Rival (NYT) 71
Tribune To Weigh Offers For Parts Of Its Holdings Decision Follows Tepid Bids For All Of Media Company; A Prod To Private Equity? By SARAH ELLISON (WSJ) 71

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Justices Appear Divided In Case On Emission Rules (WSJ) .. 74
Justices Challenge EPA's Arguments In Clean Air Act Case (WP) 75
Groups Want Forest Rules Overturned (AP) 75
U.S. Agency To Review Oil Royalties (NYT) 76
California Can Lead The Way (USAT) 77

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Balco Grand Jury To Charge Graham (MERCN) 78
BALCO Panel To Charge Track Coach (LAT/AP) 79
2 Suspects In Arson Cases Arrested (USAT) 79
Nationwide Dragnet Nabs Local Fugitive (TOLB) 80
Multi-agency Sweep Nets Murray Man (MURRLT) 80
Fugitive In Sexual Assault Case In Colorado Arrested (LVRJ) 81
Tips Sought On Missing Explosives (MUCHRONICLE) 81
Drug Death Defendant Pleads Not Guilty (SLPD) 82
Heroin Kingpin Convicted, Could Get Life Sentence (AP) 83
FEDS FINISH GIVING 'ICEBOX' EVIDENCE (TMT) 83
Border Guard Accused Of Accepting Bribes Released Pending Trial (AP) 85
Ex-Mexican Drug Czar Faces More Charges (AP) 85
Ex-LCC Coach Given Probation In Drug Case (SDUT) 86

Immigration:

Federal Judge Blocks Town's Crackdown On Illegal Immigrants (FINDLAW/AP) 86
Bush May Find An Ally On Immigration (WT) 87
Lawsuit Says Latino Citizens Were Caught Up In Raids Seeking Illegal Immigrants (LAT) 89

Congress-Administration:

Bush Says Rumsfeld, Cheney Should Stay (AP-Y) 90
Kerry Offers Apology To Troops (WP) 92
Bush Stands By Cheney, Rumsfeld (LAT) 93
Bush Works To Solidify Base With A Defense Of Rumsfeld (NYT) 94

DOJ_NMG_0089849

Bush Seeks To Minimize Burden Of Iraq On Republican Candidates (BLOOM) 95
Bush To Hit GOP Campaign Trail (CHIT) 97
IGs Probe Allegations On Global Warming Data (WP) 98
Democrats Say Hunger Report Stalled (AP-Y) 99

Other News:

Economy Displays More Signs Of Slowing (USAT) 100
Weak U.S. Manufacturing Data Signal Slowdown In Economy (WSJ) 101
Catching Breath: Dow Industrials Ease For 4th Day (WSJ) 102
Kerry Sorry For 'Stuck In Iraq' Remark (AP-Y) 102
Flubbed Joke Makes Kerry A Political Punching Bag, Again (NYT) 104
Kerry Apologizes For Iraq Remark (USAT) 105
Kerry Apologizes For Insulting Troops (WT) 106
Analysis: Iraq War Dominates Campaign (AP-Y) 107
Bush's Nostalgia (NSWK) 108
First Lady: World Listening To Iraq Talk (AP-Y) 110
Party Shuns Kerry After Iraq 'Joke' (FT) 110
Kerry Issues Apology After Iraq 'joke' (FT) 111
Kerry's Remark Puts Presidential Bid At Risk (LAT) 111
Job From Hell Dept. (RC) 113
The Great Divider (NYT) 114
A Taxing Time For The GOP (WP) 115
Is GOP Confidence For Real? (CSM) 117
Democrats' Foreign Policy Pickle As Iraq And Terror Top Agenda (WSJ) 118
Cantor Pushes For Reforms (RC) 120
Word To The Wise: Don't Ignore Independents This Year (RC) 121
What It's Like Being Caught Up In A Wave: I've Been There (RC) 122
With Iraq Driving Election, Voters Want New Approach (NYT) 124
Democratic Leader Put To Work As G.O.P. Campaign Star (NYT) 125
Pelosi's War Blunder (WT) 127
Scandals Alone Could Cost Republicans Their House Majority (WP) 128
Picking Up The Pace (NYT) 129
Winning Small (NYT) 130
How Big Will The Democratic Wave Be? Use This Formula (RC) 131
Behind The Gridlock (WP) 134
Republican Seems To Rally In Run For Seat Foley Quit (NYT) 135
Luring Lapsed Democrats In Kentucky (NYT) 136
Politics That Go Against The Grain (WP) 137
Republicans In Uphill Slog In Colorado (CSM) 139
Why Economy Is Key In Indiana Election (CSM) 141
Concentration Of Competitive Races Puts Ohio At Center Of Midterm Battle (NYT) 142
Reverse Swiftboating (WT) 144
GOP Closing Gaps In A Couple Of Key Races (USAT) 145
Parochial Issues Come To The Fore In Tennessee Senate Race (MCT) 146
Clinton Campaigns For Ford In Memphis (USAT) 147
Beating Around The Bush (WSJ) 148
Virginia's Tight Senate Campaign Turns On Personal Attacks (MCT) 149
Allen Suggests Webb Behind Heckler Incident (WT) 150
Steele Gains Key Support Beneath The Surface In PG (WT) 151
Arizona, Maryland Senate Races Targeted (AP-Y) 152
Ohio Voters Unmoved By Incumbent's Bipartisan Reputation (FT) 153
Clawing For Votes, Chafee Steers Race Toward Gutter (WP) 154
Republican Is A Political Force, Despite Party Baggage (WP) 155
On Election Night, Networks Plan To Proceed With Caution (WP) 157
Elections Rake In Big Bucks For Media Outlets (USAT) 158
Stem-cell Issue Gains Momentum In Homestretch (WT) 159
Local Issues Mirror National Ones, But The Special Effects Occasionally Stand Alone (NYT) 160
Voting For Judicial Independence (NYT) 161
Life, Liberty And Property Rights (USAT) 162
Loose Change Lawmakers Tap PAC Money To Pay Wide Array Of Bills Funds For Candidates At Risk Also Cover Hotels, Meals And Gifts For Big Donors $5,000 For A Texas Funeral By BRODY MULLINS (WSJ) 163
Stinging From Scandal, Tribes Trim Donations (USAT) 166
PodestaMattoon Said To Be Ready To Split Up (RC) 167
An Election On Drugs (WP) 168
Wiring Development (NYT) 168
North Korea Wants Bank Accounts Unfrozen (AP) 169
N. Korea's Bank Accounts Targeted (LAT) 170
Money May Underlie North Korea's Return To Talks (WSJ) 172
U.N. Creates N.Korea Sanctions List (AP) 174
U.S. Debates Value Of North Korea Talks (NYT) 174
Russia Speaks Against Iran Draft Measure (AP) 175
Incoming UN Chief Calls On Iran To Halt Enrichment (AFP) 176
Iran Announces Military Maneuvers (AP) 177
U.S. Faults Syria, Iran, Hezbollah On Lebanon (WP) 177
U.S. Reports Plot To Topple Beirut Leaders (NYT) 178

DOJ_NMG_0089850

Syria 'plotting To Destabilise' Lebanon (FT) 180
U.S. Sees Evidence Of Lebanon Coup Plot (LAT) 180
Hezbollah Threatens Protests In Lebanon (AP) 181
Ethiopian PM: Islamic Militia A Threat (AP) 183
State Dept Vetted Speakers For Criticism Of Bush Adminstration (KCS) 183
Big Israeli Strike With Tanks Kills 8 Palestinians In Gaza (NYT) 185
Israeli Troops Spark Clashes In Gaza Strip (WP) 186
Al-Jazeera Plans To Battle Western Media (AP) 187
Taiwan Set For New Clash With Beijing (FT) 188
African Leaders, China To Meet On Investment (WT) 189
China's Great Haul: 15 Billionaires (USAT) 190
Chinese Activist's Verdict Overturned (WP) 191
Bush Renews US Sanctions On Sudan (AFP-Y) 191
Turkey's EU Bid Quietly Loses Steam (WSJ) 192
US Seeks Return Of Democracy Organization To Bahrain (AFP) 193
Rivals For U.N. Council Seat Reach Deal To Back Panama (WP/AP) 194
Latin Fight For U.N. Security Council Seat Ends (NYT) 194
Panama In Line For UN Security Council Seat (FT) 195
Venezuela To Sell D.C. Oil At Discount (WT) 195
'Yes, You Will Be Thoroughly Beaten' (WSJ) 196
Punished For Being Female (NYT) 198
Why Meddle In Nicaragua? (WP) 199
Ortega's Strange Allies (WSJ) 200
Stern Review (WSJ) 201
Climate Non-Conformity (WSJ) 203
Climate Threat Heats Up (LAT) 204

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0089851

TERRORISM NEWS:

Detainees' Attorneys Ask Court To Allow Challenges (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

Attorneys for captives in the Guantanamo Bay military prison asked a federal appeals court yesterday to reject a provision of the new military-commission law that strips hundreds of detainees of their right to challenge their detention in U.S. courts.

The lawyers, joined by a group of retired judges from both political parties, argued that the United States cannot indefinitely imprison foreign nationals in a military prison without charging them with crimes and deny them the chance to test the evidence against them in the U.S. justice system.

President Bush sought Congress's approval this fall for the Military Commissions Act, which also set new rules for military trials of the detainees, and signed it into law Oct. 17. Government lawyers quickly moved to throw out hundreds of pending challenges by the detainees, known as habeas corpus cases. The issue is pending before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

But attorneys for detainees argue that the law does not apply to detainees with ongoing cases, in part because the government can take that drastic step only when the country is in the middle of an active war.

"We do not believe Congress wiped out our cases in this act, and we feel strongly if Congress had done that, it would be unconstitutional," said David H. Remes, one of the lawyers. "The only time Congress can suspend the writ of habeas is in cases of invasion and rebellion. We are not being invaded, and there is no rebellion."

The administration pressed for passage of the new law after the Supreme Court ruled this summer in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld that pending habeas cases could continue, despite administration arguments that a previous law had ended those rights.

Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said yesterday that the government would not comment but would respond in a brief due to the appeals court Nov. 13.

An estimated 435 detainees remain at the military prison at Guantanamo Bay. The government has determined that about 100 could be released or transferred. Another group may be charged with crimes and tried before military commissions.

The habeas dispute involves the majority, who never will be charged but have been deemed "enemy combatants" by a three-member military panel.

A group of seven federal judges, who filed a separate friend-of-the-court brief, argued that the new law is fatally flawed for another reason. Under a separate provision, they noted, the military can imprison someone without any charges based on evidence produced through statements of the detainee or of someone else made during torture.

The government "created a tribunal that was permitted to accept evidence secured by torture and presume that evidence was genuine and accurate," the judges wrote. If U.S. courts have no role in testing the basis for holding detainees, they said, the U.S. government "cannot remove the stain of torture" from the military's decisions.

The detainee attorneys also argued that the law uses imprecise language in describing the effective date for the act to apply to specific categories of cases.

Detainees Challenge Military Trials Law (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON - Lawyers for dozens of Guantanamo Bay detainees asked a federal appeals court Wednesday to declare a key part of President Bush's new military trials law unconstitutional.

The detainees' lawyers challenged the military's authority to arrest people overseas and detain them indefinitely without allowing them to use the U.S. courts to contest their detention.

DOJ_NMG_0089852

Bush gave the military that authority last month when he signed a law that sets up special commissions to hold trials for foreigners designated as "enemy combatants." Bush hailed the law as a crucial tool in the war on terrorism and said it would allow prosecution of several high-level terror suspects.

In written arguments, attorneys for more than 100 detainees who would be locked out of the regular judicial system asked the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit to let the detainees keep their legal challenges going in civilian courts.

The framers of the Constitution never would have permitted the government to hold people indefinitely without charges, the lawyers wrote.

"Persons imprisoned without charge must retain the right to obtain a court inquiry into the factual and legal bases for their imprisonment," they wrote.

This argument echoes a Supreme Court ruling in June in which the justices ruled that the Bush administration's system for trying enemy combatants violated U.S. and international law. Within weeks, the president persuaded Congress to pass a law setting up military commissions and barring detainees from using the civilian court system.

Shortly after the law was signed, the Justice Department told hundreds of detainees that their cases in the U.S. courts had been rendered moot.

Even if the court decide not to declare the law unconstitutional, attorneys offered a creative way for the court to keep the case alive. They suggested the judges rule that the law doesn't mean what the Justice Department thinks it means - because if it did, it would be unconstitutional.

On Wednesday, seven retired federal judges from both political parties filed legal briefs in the detainees case before the Washington appeals court, arguing that the military commissions law would allow authorities to use evidence obtained by torture.

"We believe that compelling this court to sanction executive detentions based on evidence that has been condemned in the American legal system since our nation's founding erodes the vital role of the judiciary in safeguarding the rule of law," the judges wrote.

Although the law prohibits torture, the judges said the military has not addressed torture claims made by detainees. The retired judges also argued that the new law illegally strips courts of the power to question military decisions about the detainees' torture claims.

The Justice Department had no comment on the briefs Wednesday and has until Nov. 13 to respond in court.

Padilla Papers Detail Allegations Of Mistreatment (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

MIAMI, Nov. 1 (AP) — Jose Padilla is asserting that he was tortured during his three and a half years in American custody as an enemy combatant, including being threatened with execution and forced to stand for long periods.

Mr. Padilla's lawyers are asking a federal judge to dismiss the terror support charges against him because he suffered from "outrageous government conduct" during more than 1,300 days in military custody.

"Many of the conditions Mr. Padilla experienced were inhumane and caused him great physical and psychological pain," Michael Caruso, a lawyer for Mr. Padilla, said in court papers filed last month. It is the first time Mr. Padilla has made such detailed allegations about his treatment. His lawyers cited no corroborating evidence or witnesses.

United States Attorney R. Alexander Acosta in Miami declined to comment. Prosecutors and Defense Department officials said they would respond to the allegations by Nov. 13.

Mr. Padilla, a 36-year-old former Chicago gang member, was declared an enemy combatant by President Bush in June 2002, shortly after he was arrested when he arrived at O'Hare International Airport in Chicago. American authorities initially said he was on a mission for Al Qaeda to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in an American city.

He was held and interrogated at a Navy brig, mostly in a small isolation cell, until he was transferred to civilian custody in January to face federal terrorism support charges in Miami along with two others. Trial on those charges is scheduled to begin Jan. 22.

DOJ_NMG_0089853

In the court papers, Mr. Padilla asserted among other things that interrogators had threatened him with "imminent execution" or with painful cuts; that he was forced to wear a hood and stand in "stress positions" for long periods; that noxious fumes were sometimes introduced into his cell; that he was forced to endure extreme heat and cold, bright lights or total darkness, denied opportunities to shower for weeks and deprived of sleep; and that he was not provided with a copy of the Koran.

Ex-judges: Detainee Law Unconstitutional (AP-Y)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 2, 2006

Seven retired federal judges from both political parties have joined dozens of Guantanamo Bay detainees in urging an appeals court to declare key parts of President Bush's new anti-terrorism law unconstitutional.

The judges, in a rare court filing Wednesday, said stripping courts of the right to question how the military handles terrorism suspects "challenges the integrity of our judicial system" and effectively sanctions the use of torture.

Bush signed a law this month allowing the military to arrest people overseas and detain them indefinitely without allowing them to use the U.S. courts to contest their detention. Bush hailed the law, which established a system of military trials, as a crucial tool in the war on terrorism and said it would allow prosecution of several high-level terror suspects.

For detainees challenging their imprisonment, the law locks them out of the civilian court system. Dozens of detainees argued Wednesday that the law is unconstitutional, and the retired judges echoed that in their own papers filed with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

"We believe that compelling this court to sanction executive detentions based on evidence that has been condemned in the American legal system since our nation's founding erodes the vital role of the judiciary in safeguarding the rule of law," the judges wrote.

The brief was filed by retired Judges Shirley M. Hufstedler, Nathaniel R. Jones, George N. Leighton, Timothy K. Lewis, Frank J. McGarr, Abner J. Mikva and Patricia M. Wald. Three of the judges — Leighton, Lewis and McGarr — were appointed by Republican presidents.

Though Congress banned the use of torture in the military commission law, the judges said military documents revealed evidence of torture that officials didn't properly address.

In one instance cited in court documents, a man who denied receiving artillery training said an interrogator beat him until he bled from his head.

"I was in a lot of pain, so I said I had the training," the man said, according to a transcript cited in court documents. "At that point, if he had asked me if I was Usama Bin Ladin, I would have said yes."

Without the court system, the judges said, there is no check on such behavior.

In their own court filings, lawyers for the detainees argued that the law is unconstitutional because it prevents people from challenging their detention in U.S. courts — a right that attorneys said the framers of the Constitution never would have allowed to be stripped.

"Persons imprisoned without charge must retain the right to obtain a court inquiry into the factual and legal bases for their imprisonment," attorneys wrote.

This argument echoes a Supreme Court ruling in June in which the justices ruled that the Bush administration's system for trying enemy combatants violated U.S. and international law.

Within weeks, the president persuaded Congress to pass a law setting up military commissions and barring detainees from using the civilian court system. Shortly after the law was signed, the Justice Department told hundreds of detainees that their cases in the U.S. courts had been rendered moot.

Supporters of the law compare military detainees to prisoners of war, who don't normally have access to civilian courts. They say wartime decisions should be left up to the president, who acts as commander in chief, not the courts.

The Justice Department had no comment on the briefs Wednesday and has until Nov. 13 to respond in court.

A Pentagon spokesman, Navy Cmdr. Jeffrey D. Gordon, defended the new law and said that terror suspects were being given their day in court.

DOJ_NMG_0089854

"As a responsible democracy, we have an obligation to protect our citizens and those of our allies," Gordon said. "Holding unlawful enemy combatants captured during the war on terror is essential to preventing their return to the battlefield while collecting valuable intelligence in order to avert terror attacks like those seen on 9/11 and in cities around the world."

Alleged Terrorist Mastermind Languishes In British Legal Limbo (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jill Lawless, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 2, 2006

(AP) - LONDON-He's an al-Qaida-linked terrorist who worked with Osama bin Laden and plotted to bomb Los Angeles airport at the turn of the millennium, according to U.S. authorities.

Yet for the past year, Abu Doha has been imprisoned in a British jail for nothing more serious than immigration violations: A U.S. attempt to extradite him collapsed, and Britain lacks the evidence to charge him with terrorism.

Abu Doha's legal limbo has both civil libertarians and counterterrorism officials concerned - and some experts questioning how big a terrorist player he really is.

"I think if all that had been said about him was true, there would have been efforts to sustain the (extradition) request from the United States," Paul Wilkinson of the Center for the Study of Terrorism and Political Violence at St. Andrews University in Scotland said Wednesday.

The British government, however, says Abu Doha is a threat to national security and wants to deport him to his native Algeria.

Abu Doha is appealing, and the case is due to be heard early next year.

In Washington, an official who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the case, said the U.S. Justice Department was "horrified" at the idea of Abu Doha being free.

Abu Doha, 40, also known as Dr. Haidar, Amar Makhlulif and "The Doctor," has been described by U.S. prosecutors as a key al-Qaida figure who oversaw a plot to blow up Los Angeles airport on New Year's Eve 1999.

The plan was foiled when another Algerian, Ahmed Ressam, was caught trying to enter Washington state from Canada in a car loaded with explosives. Ressam identified Abu Doha as ringleader of the plot.

Abu Doha was arrested at Britain's Heathrow Airport in February 2001 while trying to travel to Saudi Arabia on a fake passport. He has been held in a high-security prison ever since.

In August 2001, he was indicted in New York as a mastermind of the Los Angeles millennium bomb plot. According to the indictment, he sent terrorists to training camps in Afghanistan and dispatched others to Canada to prepare for the failed attack.

Police and prosecutors claimed that Abu Doha, who moved to London in the 1990s, was a major player at the Finsbury Park Mosque - a key center for Islamist recruitment and training - and led a mostly Algerian terrorist network with cells in Europe and North America.

U.S. prosecutors also alleged that in late 1998, he met with bin Laden in Afghanistan "to discuss cooperation and coordination" between al-Qaida and "a group of Algerian terrorists whose activities Abu Doha coordinated and oversaw."

But in August 2005, the U.S. dropped its extradition request. Ressam, now serving a 22-year sentence for his involvement in the millennium plot, had stopped cooperating with prosecutors in 2003. Without his continued testimony, the U.S. said it was forced to drop its cases against Abu Doha and another alleged co-conspirator, Samir Ait Mohamed.

"Ressam's testimony would have been an essential part of the government's evidence at trial against Abu Doha," Assistant U.S. Attorney Eric B. Bruce wrote in an Aug. 21, 2005, notice asking the U.S. District Court in Manhattan to dismiss the charges.

Britain's Home Office said Abu Doha is now being held on immigration charges, appealing against its decision to extradite him to Algeria - a prospect that concerns civil liberties groups.

As a signatory to the European Convention on Human Rights, Britain is not allowed to deport people to countries where they may face torture or abuse.

In July, Britain and Algeria signed an agreement promising that nationals returned there will not be mistreated. Amnesty International says the Algerian security service uses torture on terrorist suspects, and has called the deportation agreement "a green light to torture."

DOJ_NMG_0089855

A former senior U.S. intelligence official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said it was almost certain Abu Doha would be imprisoned on his return.

Rabah Toubal, spokesman at the Algerian Embassy in London, said Abu Doha had been involved in "many acts of terrorism" in his homeland, but declined to specify what would happen to him if he returned.

"If he comes back, he has to respond to some questions about what he did," he said.

Associated Press writer Lara Jakes Jordan in Washington contributed to this report.

Britain Said To Seek Weaker Torture Protections (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 2 -- The British government has systematically attempted to water down laws banning the transfer of terror suspects to countries that practice torture, according to a report issued Thursday by Human Rights Watch.

British officials strongly disputed the report's conclusions.

"Britain cannot have it both ways," Benjamin Ward, an official with the New York-based rights agency, said in a statement. "The government claims to oppose torture. Yet at the same time, it is actively trying to undermine the global ban against it."

The group concluded that the government of Prime Minister Tony Blair has adopted a "dangerous ambivalence" toward torture of suspected terrorists abroad since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States and the July 2005 bombings of the London public transit system.

"We're not in any way ambivalent about torture; we absolutely condemn torture and oppose it unreservedly," said a spokeswoman for the British Home Office, which handles domestic security. The spokeswoman spoke on condition of anonymity, following government practice here.

British opposition parties say Blair's government slavishly follows the American lead in foreign affairs, in particular the decision to invade Iraq. The war is widely unpopular here.

British and European law prohibit deportation to a country where there is a likelihood that the deportee would be tortured. The British government has announced that it is seeking written assurances from countries, including Syria, Lebanon and Jordan, that they would not torture or mistreat suspected extremists deported from Britain.

Human Rights Watch said such assurances were little more than a legal fig leaf. "When it comes to torture, diplomatic assurances simply don't work," Ward said.

The Home Office spokeswoman said British officials believe that such assurances would be effective and added that the government was "happy to leave it up to the courts" to decide whether that policy was proper. She pointed out that in August a British judge ruled that the government could deport an Algerian man to his home country despite his argument that he would face torture there.

"The government is committed to protecting the public from the very real threat of terrorism," she said, adding that the government was trying to balance a deportee's risk of being tortured against the security risk posed if the person remained in Britain.

"It should be possible to take some account of the risk posed by the person on grounds of national security," she said.

The rights group also accused the Blair government of "whitewashing U.S. government abuses," including the practice of "rendition" of suspected extremists to countries that use torture.

A spokesman for the Foreign Office said British officials have no evidence that U.S. officials ever conducted a rendition using British territory or airspace.

"The U.K. government have not approved and will not approve a policy of facilitating the transfer of individuals through the U.K. to places where there are substantial grounds to believe they would face a risk of torture," the spokesman said.

Human Rights Watch said Blair had failed to use his close relationship with President Bush to press for changes to policies such as rendition. "The U.K. is losing the credibility that it once enjoyed," the report concluded. "The government's determination to bend the rules on its own account, and its refusal to confront abuses committed by its closest ally, is a moral and political abdication, in defiance of international law."

DOJ_NMG_0089856

British Authorities Charge Suspect With Violations Of Terrorism Laws (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 1 — A 29-year-old man from East London was charged Wednesday with trying to take terrorism-related materials, including a manual titled "The Mujahideen Poisons Handbook," on a Pakistan-bound flight from Heathrow Airport.

The man, Sohail Anjum Qureshi, was arrested by antiterror officers at the airport on Oct. 18 as he was waiting to board a flight to Islamabad, Pakistan. He was carrying about $17,000 in cash, a night-vision scope, two metal batons, two backpacks, two sleeping bags and a computer disk and hard drive containing a combat-training manual as well as the poison manual, the authorities said.

Mr. Qureshi, who lives in the Forest Gate neighborhood, has been charged with three counts of violating British antiterrorism laws and is to appear in court on Thursday. The authorities said that the charges were related to terrorist activities that were to have been carried out abroad, and that Mr. Qureshi was not involved in any of the other terrorism cases they were investigating.

In a separate case, a judge freed 2 of the 24 men arrested in August on suspicion of being part of what the authorities said was a foiled plot to blow up trans-Atlantic airplanes with homemade liquid explosives. The men, Mehran Hussain, 24, and Umair Hussain, 25, both of Chingford, East London, were set free after a hearing at a magistrate's court in central London.

The judge in the case, Quentin Purdy, said there was "insufficient evidence" to put the two men on trial. But he warned the men, who are brothers, that they should not consider themselves exonerated, and he said that if new evidence came to light, prosecutors were free to charge them again.

The men had been charged with failing to disclose information to the authorities about their brother, Nabeel, a suspect in the bombing-plot case.

Nabeel Hussain, 22, remains in custody, charged with conspiracy to murder and with planning to bring liquid bomb-making materials on board airplanes and then to assemble and detonate them in midair.

Israeli Agent Scoffs At Hamas Defendant's Torture Claims (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, November 2, 2006

CHICAGO - An Israeli security agent scoffed Wednesday at a Chicago grocer's claim that he was deprived of sleep, forced to wear a foul-smelling hood and otherwise tortured after his arrest on charges of bankrolling terrorists.

"Isn't it true that he was psychologically and somewhat physically brutally, brutally abused?" defense attorney Robert Bloom asked the Israeli who testified under the alias Nadav at Muhammad Salah's trial.

"That is not correct," Nadav testified in Hebrew through a translator.

Salah, 53, of suburban Bridgeview and former university professor Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, of Alexandria, Va., face federal charges of with conspiring to funnel cash and fresh recruits for a terrorist campaign against Israel.

Salah was arrested at an Israeli checkpoint in January 1993 and agents found $97,000 in his East Jerusalem hotel room. He served 4 1/2 years in an Israeli prison after signing statements that he met with Hamas leaders.

Both defendants deny they are members of Hamas, which is intent on toppling the Israeli government, and Salah says that when arrested he was delivering the money to charities on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Salah claims he was tortured by agents of Israel's Shin Bet security service into admitting he furnished funds to Hamas commanders.

Nadav said he didn't attend the initial interrogation of Salah. But he said he knew the agents who took part refrained from using torture.

Bloom suggested Nadav had played the part of the "good cop" to warm up Salah while other agents placed a reeking hood over his head, forced him to sit handcuffed in a tiny chair and "beat the hell out of him."

DOJ_NMG_0089857

Nadav steadfastly refused to agree to any of it.

In 3 1/2 hours of cross examination, Bloom and Nadav, a Shin Bet agent, played cat and mouse over what happened in the hours after Salah's arrest.

Nadav admitted that it took only 1 1/2 hours to get from the checkpoint to the Shin Bet interrogation center at Ramallah. But he balked when Bloom said Salah's arrest at about 5:30 p.m. and arrival at the center at 10 p.m. suggested soldiers had taken the long way to "soften him up."

"If there is a document that shows what time Mr. Salah was arrested I would be glad to see it," Nadav said. Pressed by Bloom, he said Israeli interrogators are not given arrest records but only arrest warrants.

"Are you aware that you are known to the Palestinians as Captain Liar?" Bloom asked Nadav. The agent said that was "far from the truth."

Salah attorneys had hoped to question Nadav further about Shin Bet interrogation methods but were barred from doing so. Some of the material they sought to elicit from the witness is classified for security reasons.

In place of the evidence, the defense attorneys introduced government supplied "substitutions," which were not as specific but did give a sharp glimpse into how prisoners were questioned.

The statement from the government said at the time Salah was questioned, Israeli interrogators were allowed to use hoods, handcuffs and shackles and to handcuff prisoners in small chairs, to threaten them and to threaten to arrest their family members.

In some cases, interrogators were allowed to slap prisoners, according to one of the substitutions read to the jury.

The trial is being conducted among heavy security. The courtroom is cleared of spectators and even those allowed to watch on TV from a room five floors away must pass through a metal detector, watched by an explosives-sniffing Labrador retriever named Comet.

What They Don't Know Is Frightening (WT)

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

How alarmed should Americans be upon learning that one of the nation's highest-ranking FBI counterterrorism policy-makers and two members of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, among numerous other unnamed officials, possess shallow knowledge about terrorist groups that have slaughtered Americans in the past, are killing our soldiers in the war on terror today and threaten to obliterate us in the future?

In a recent op-ed essay in the New York Times, Jeff Stein, the national security editor at Congressional Quarterly, revealed how ignorant these people are. Wrapping up lengthy interviews with Washington counterterrorism officials, Mr. Stein would ask, "Do you know the difference between a Sunni and a Shi'ite?" He wasn't seeking theological explanations, "just the basics: Who's on what side today, and what does each want?"

Recently appointed as the executive assistant director of the National Security Branch of the FBI, Willie Hulon previously served as deputy assistant director of the Counterterrorism Division, when he testified July 13, 2004, before Congress about how important it was to develop "our knowledge and expertise about foreign cultures and our terrorist adversaries overseas." Mr. Hulon appeared stumped when he was asked: Which one is Iran -- Sunni or Shi'ite? "Iran and Hezbollah," Mr. Stein prompted. "Which are they?" Mr. Hulon guessed Sunni. Wrong.

"The FBI believes the Lebanese-based Hezbollah," which blew up the Marine barracks in Lebanon in 1983, killing 241 Marines, "has terrorist cells in at least 10 U.S. cities," Bill Gertz, national security reporter for The Washington Times, revealed in his latest book, "Enemies." John Miller, the FBI's assistant director for public affairs, told Mr. Gertz that the FBI is concerned that Iran could activate a network of Hezbollah terrorists in the United States if the international community takes action to stop the Iranian nuclear program.

Given that Sunnis and Shi'ites are massacring each other throughout Baghdad and across Iraq in sectarian strife bordering on civil war, one would think that seven-term Alabama Republican Rep. Terry Everett, who serves as vice chairman of the subcommittee on Technical and Tactical Intelligence, would be on top of it. To Mr. Stein's basic question, Mr. Everett replied, "One's in one location, another's in another location. No, to be honest with you, I don't know" the difference. Three-term Virginia

DOJ_NMG_0089858

Republican Rep. Jo Ann Davis, who chairs the subcommittee on Terrorism/HUMINT, Analysis and Counterintelligence, which oversees the CIA's performance in its recruitment of Islamic spies, told Mr. Stein: "It's a difference in their fundamental beliefs. The Sunni are more radical than the Shia. Or vice versa. But I think it's the Sunnis who're more radical than the Shia." Asked which branch al Qaeda's leaders follow, she reasoned as follows: "Al Qaeda is the one that's most radical, so I think they're Sunni. I may be wrong, but I think that's right."

You could not make this stuff up. Given their governmental responsibilities, the ingrained incuriosity of these officials is as appalling as it is frightening.

FBI Logs On For Monitoring Service For Arabic Networks (GCN)

By Wilson P. Dizard III, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, November 2, 2006

The FBI now has access to an online service that its employees can use to screen TV broadcasts and provide alerts when specified words are used, either on English-language networks or networks broadcasting in Arabic.

Critical Mention Inc. of New York City provides the service, which it is furnishing to multiple users at the bureau under a recently concluded one-year contract with options for renewal.

"CriticalTV alerts users about a relevant clip seconds after a broadcast, and allows users to share the clip instantly within a workgroup via secure video-e-mail or a private video gallery. Users can also order a professional transcript or hard copy online," according to a company announcement.

The vendor has forged a partnership with IBM Corp. to incorporate an Arabic-to-English, speech-to-text translation feature into the CriticalTV service. The TV monitoring service generates alerts of the use of a specified word or term within two minutes or so of its broadcast via a satellite or terrestrial broadcast network, the company said.

The bureau is using the service to monitor TV news mentions of the term "FBI" on various news networks to track the public's perception of the law enforcement agency, sources said.

In a similar vein, a user at the bureau could use the service to track the use of other words of interest that might be broadcast in Arabic, including the names, events, locations, physical objects, organizations, vehicles, political parties, products or the like. Then a user could receive an English-text version of the Arabic broadcast as well as a video clip, and potentially incorporate the information in an appropriate database.

The company's chief financial officer, Alan Davison, noted that its existing customers include many Fortune 500 companies as well as members of Congress who seek to track the news profile of political campaigns, major public events, their own companies, competitors, their products and the like.

Davison said that Critical Mention would launch its monitoring of five Arabic-language TV networks in mid-November, including Al Jazeera and other major broadcasters.

He added that the company plans to expand the foreign-language TV monitoring service to other languages as well.

A system user views a screen that provides, among other features an opportunity for "advanced search" which limits an inquiry by the network monitored or by other dimensions. Once the user has crafted a search that limits the inquiry to a targeted word or phrase, the system generates a response that includes text and video clips of the use of that term.

The user can immediately view the entire video clip or text version of the broadcast, translated by the advanced IBM Arabic-to-English translation tool if necessary.

The company already has about 500 clients, including private companies and government agencies.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Air Plot Said To Target Cities (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089859

A group of alleged terrorists arrested in London in August planned to blow up airliners over U.S. cities to maximize casualties, rather than over the Atlantic Ocean as many intelligence officials originally thought, according to recent remarks by a senior FBI official.

The comments by Mark Mershon, head of the FBI's New York field office, indicate that U.S. and British intelligence officials now think that the airliner plot was aimed at maximizing the potential loss of life and economic impact.

"The plan was bring them down over U.S. cities, not over the ocean," Mershon said Oct. 24 at the Infosecurity 2006 conference in New York, according to Government Security News, which first reported the remarks this week.

Authorities had previously said it was unclear where the alleged terrorists intended to detonate liquid explosives, which they planned to smuggle onto as many as 10 transatlantic flights. Michael P. Jackson, deputy secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, said shortly after the plot was thwarted that while the conspirators appeared to be targeting nonstop flights to the United States, "the real focus was to blow up airliners and the people on them."

British police arrested 25 people in raids across Britain after uncovering the alleged plot. Eleven have been charged with conspiracy to murder and preparing acts of terrorism. Two brothers, Umair Hussain, 25, and Mehran Hussain, 23, were released Wednesday after a British court ruled evidence against them was insufficient to warrant a trial.

Christine Monaco, a spokeswoman for the FBI in New York, declined to comment on Mershon's speech.

Mershon told cybersecurity conference attendees that representatives of MI5, the British intelligence service, briefed the FBI on the liquid explosives case in recent weeks. "It would make your hair stand up to be in the room to hear that presentation," Mershon said, according to GSN.

Bruce Hoffman, a terrorism expert and Georgetown University professor, said the case indicates that Islamic extremists remain focused on attacking U.S. cities.

"They were clearly desirous of exceeding 9/11," Hoffman said. "The loss of life on the air and ground would be significant."

PayPal Building Targeted In Explosion (AP)

By Jordan Robertson

AP, November 2, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. - A Halloween night explosion shattered a window at a building housing offices for eBay's PayPal division, forcing the evacuation of dozens of employees.

PayPal spokeswoman Amanda Pires said Wednesday that the company had not received any threats but declined to comment on the investigation. The blast hit the first floor of the company's network operations center.

"We believe this is an isolated incident," she said. "We're working closely with local authorities. We have everything under control."

Business was not disrupted, but the complex was closed Wednesday and cordoned off by police tape. About 1,900 eBay and PayPal employees who work in buildings on the campus where the explosion occurred were asked to work from home or at another eBay campus in San Jose, Pires said.

No injuries were reported and no explosive device was found, but investigators determined the blast was deliberately set, Sgt. Nick Muyo said. Police had no suspects.

Investigators from the San Jose police and fire departments, the FBI and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives were investigating.

PayPal, which provides a platform for online payments, is a lucrative division of San Jose-based eBay Inc., generating some $350 million in revenue for the online auction company in the latest quarter.

Probe Of Blast At EBay's North S.J. Campus Yields Few Answers; Site Set To Reopen Thursday (MERCN)

By Sean Webby And Kimra Mcpherson

The San Jose Mercury News, November 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089860

EBay shut down its North San Jose campus on Wednesday, clearing the way for bomb-sniffing dogs and investigators, who still don't know who planted a powerful explosive that blew out a window and forced more than 1,900 employees to work elsewhere.

Nobody was injured in the Halloween night blast -- and other Silicon Valley companies were not put on alert. EBay expected Thursday morning to reopen the campus that also houses some of its PayPal operations.

The company received no threats before or after the blast, which happened about 7:30 p.m. Tuesday in a landscaped breezeway outside the 100,000 square-foot, four-story building.

But the corporate target was so sensitive, the explosion so powerful and the bombing so rare in Silicon Valley that law enforcement from San Jose, the federal Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms and FBI converged on the campus.

After more than 24 hours scouring for clues, investigators had few answers. Was it someone intentionally targeting the Internet corporate giant, a techno-terrorist? Or was it a dangerous prank on a night known for smashed pumpkins and toilet paper attacks?

``It could have been a Halloween thing, it could have been kids, it could have been something larger," said San Jose Police Sgt. Nick Muyo. ``If it's a Halloween prank it's a sophisticated one."

Bomb-sniffing dogs spent the day nosing around the office and other campus buildings, all emptied of its employees, and at eBay's headquarters on Hamilton Avenue. They found nothing suspicious.

And investigators said that there was no indication that the company had been warned or that the bomber had targeted any other place. No one had taken responsibility for the blast as of Wednesday night.

EBay officials said eBay and PayPal service was not disrupted. Many of the processes that keep the Web pages running can be handled from other locations, eBay spokesman Hani Durzy said.

Durzy said the company expected to reopen the campus Thursday and ``the safety and security of our employees is our top priority for us."

Muyo described the source of the blast as a sophisticated explosive device that not only shattered a large, two-inch thick plate of safety glass, but blew over furniture inside.

``Whatever caused it was pretty strong," San Jose Fire Capt. Jose Guerrero said.

About 1,900 eBay employees work at eBay's North San Jose campus, which includes PayPal headquarters, technology staff, sales, marketing and the network operations center, Durzy said. Employees at that campus were invited to work at the company's other San Jose location or dial in from home, he said.

When PayPal employee Dan Hyder arrived for work this morning, he was told the office was closed and given a flier explaining what had happened. He walked around the site for a while after, taking photos of the investigators milling around the building where he used to work.

``It's bizarre," said Hyder, who now works in a different building and had already left work by the time the incident began Tuesday night.

Muyo said the timing of the explosion, at 7:34 p.m. when many people had already left work for the day, might indicate that whomever placed the device at the building wasn't looking to injure people.

Authorities received multiple reports of a smoke detector alarm sounding, Guerrero said, followed a few minutes later by multiple calls of an explosion.

When crews arrived, they found a 6-by-7-foot window had been shattered near a first-floor exit. The window's frame was bent and a light haze covered the area, Guerrero said. No flames, however, were visible, nor was there any other damage. Other debris was in the area, said Guerrero, who couldn't say exactly what the debris was.

Authorities have an idea about what may have caused the blast, Guerrero said, but he declined to disclose it. Muyo declined to say whether security cameras may have captured video footage from the site.

``We're not ruling anything out," said Muyo. Neither PayPal nor its corporate parent eBay received any threats prior to the blast, Muyo said.

``It was fortunate that no one was hurt," said Catherine England, an eBay spokeswoman.

From Google to Yahoo, other Silicon Valley corporations reported no similar threats or incidents.

Security experts said such dangers unfortunately came with the corporate territory.

``You're a target if you have a commodity that's of any particular value, whether it's home invasion or the CEO being kidnapped. It doesn't have to be a terrorist group, it could be the animal liberation front," said Forrest Franklin, direction of operations for Focus Group Consultants, Inc. in Carson City, Nev., who has worked as a consultant for several Silicon Valley companies. ``If you've got 3,000 people in your company, you've got 3,000 potential perps."

Ken Silva, Chief Security Officer for Verisign, agreed that such attacks can come from disgruntled employees.

``It could also just be a random person who is disgruntled with the company," Silva said. ``It doesn't take much for among millions of people out there for someone to get angry."

Explosive Shatters Window At PayPal Headquarters (NYT)

By Greg Sandoval, For News.com

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

An explosive left outside the headquarters of eBay-owned PayPal blew out a window Tuesday evening but caused no injuries, according to eBay.

San Jose, Calif.-based PayPal, an online payment system, closed the building on Wednesday as FBI agents and local police investigated, said eBay spokesman Hani Durzi. The blast occurred at about 7:25 p.m., and at that time about 45 employees occupied the building, said Durzi.

The explosion triggered the security alarm and officials from the San Jose Fire department later ordered the building, which is typically occupied by about 1,900, to be evacuated. Employees are scheduled to return to work tomorrow, Durzi said. He added that PayPal's operations were never interrupted.

"We have at this point no reason to believe that this was anything other than an isolated incident," Durzi said. "The most important point is that we continue to provide a safe and secure work environment for our employees."

Durzi said he was unaware whether authorities have identified a suspect. Calls to the San Jose Police Department and the FBI were not immediately returned.

Capt. Jose Guerrero, of the San Jose Fire Department, said it's believed that the device "was not highly sophisticated." Authorities have called in the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to help identify the explosive.

EBay Campus Closed After Halloween Explosion (SJBIZ)

San Jose Business Journal, November 2, 2006

The North San Jose campus of eBay Inc. remained closed Wednesday while investigators combed the area looking for clues to what caused an explosion Tuesday night that shattered a window.

Following the explosion, about 26 employees were evacuated from the offices used by Pay Pal, a unit of of eBay (NASDAQ:EBAY), shortly after 7:30 p.m.

By midday Wednesday, investigators from the FBI, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and San Jose police were on the scene and employees were not allowed inside.

No one was injured during the blast at 2211 N. First St. and no explosive devices were found.

About 1,900 eBay employees work at campus, which houses PayPal headquarters. Employees were either allowed to work from home Wednesday or at the company's other San Jose location.

EBay said there has been no disruption experienced by its customers due to the explosion or ongoing investigation.

Man Convicted In Fake Hazmat Incident (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, November 2, 2006

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) _ An Uncasville man was convicted Wednesday of lying to federal authorities about being the victim of a chemical attack.

Robert Robishaw, 40, pleaded guilty to one count of making false statements to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, prosecutors said. He entered his plea in U.S. District Court in Hartford, eight months after telling Groton fire authorities that an unknown substance fell out of a newspaper that he purchased at a Waterford convenience store. He told authorities the off-white, powdery substance caused his skin to turn red and tingle.

DOJ_NMG_0089862

The report prompted a massive hazardous materials response in Waterford and Groton, and sent eight people to the hospital for decontamination. The substance turned out ot be cigarette ash that prosecutors say Robishaw put in the newspaper.

Robishaw was indicted on the federal charge in April and faces up to five years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000 when he is sentenced on Jan. 23.

U.S. Attorney Keven O'Connor said the case was prosecuted under a relatively new federal law that makes it a crime to perpetrate a hoax about a bombing, chemical attack or similar incident.

Man Behind Chemical Attack Hoax Could Get 5 Years (WVIT)

WVIT-TV, November 2, 2006

HARTFORD, Conn. -- An Uncasville man who reported a chemical attack that turned out to be a hoax could spend five years in prison, NBC 30 News reported.

Robert Robishaw, 39, pleaded guilty Wednesday to making a false statement to the FBI.

Robishaw claimed he was exposed to a white powder at a Waterford gas station in March. The powder turned out to be cigarette ash.

The scare sent eight people to a hospital for decontamination.

Uncasville Man Admits Lying To FBI In Powdery Substance Hoax (NORBULL)

Norwich Bulletin, November 2, 2006

HARTFORD — A 40-year-old Uncasville man pleaded guilty today to one count of making a false statement to the FBI in connection with his claim that he was exposed to a white powder substance which caused toxic chemical effects.

Robert Robishaw, 40, formerly of 119 Maple Ave., entered the plea in federal court in Hartford, according to U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor.

On March 16, Robishaw called the Groton fire department to report he had been exposed to an unknown powder substance that had dropped from a newspaper at Cumberland Farms in Waterford earlier in the day. He claimed there was a reaction on his skin from the substance.

His claim prompted a large scale response by firefighters at his location at 266 Bridge St. in the City of Groton, where the area was evacuated and individuals were decontaminated.

The Cumberland Farms in Waterford, where he had allegedly purchased the newspaper, was also evacuated and employees subjected to decontamination procedures.

Robishaw later revealed that the substance was cigarette ash, and that he had placed the ash on his desk.

"Individuals who make threats of mass violence, however real or intended, will be prosecuted to the extent that federal law allows," O'Connor said.Robishaw is scheduled to be sentenced by Chief U.S. District Judge Robert N. Chatigny on Jan. 23, 2007 .

He faces a maximum sentence of five years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000.

The case was investigated by the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force and is being prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorneys David Ring and Mark Rubino.

There's Secrecy, And There's Expediency (WP)

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

In 2004, the Department of Homeland Security inspector general's office issued a report slamming the department's failure to consolidate a dozen government watch lists containing information about suspected terrorists. The lack of a reliable master list, the report said, slows efforts to find terrorists trying to enter the country or plan an attack.

At least that's what the report seemed to say. When it was released, entire pages were blacked out, ostensibly for security reasons.

But recently, the Washington-based National Security Archive found a surprise in its mailbox: a mostly uncut copy of the report. The editor of a legal publication had requested an unedited version of the 48-page report under the Freedom of Information Act two years ago. By the time the government handed it over last month, the requester, Daniel Kowalski of Bender's Immigration Bulletin, had lost interest. So he mailed the report to the archive, an independent institute that collects and publishes declassified documents obtained through the FOIA. Its library, containing hundreds of thousands of once-secret notes, memos and reports, illuminates many of history's most significant, and clandestine, decisions and events.

DOJ_NMG_0089863

"So many of these secrecy stamps look like Nixon's madman theory in operation," said Thomas S. Blanton, director of the National Security Archive. "If everybody thinks you're just not rational, that keeps them off balance, whether they are your fellow bureaucrats, your outside critics, or even your international criminals and terrorists."

Often, secrecy-related edits aren't about national security -- or madness -- as much as they are about convenience. Although some of the redacted information is truly sensitive, some is merely embarrassing to the government. Other cuts reflect the bureaucratic fact that it's easier to keep information secret than to risk releasing too much.

Several portions of the 2004 report seem to bear that out. It took two years to get, but here's Page 26, in its edited and restored forms. The problems the report describes, by the way, persist.

Bonuses Don't Cut Turnover For TSA (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — An ambitious program that paid the nation's airport screeners $18 million in bonuses as an enticement to stay in their jobs did not reduce the turnover rate at the Transportation Security Administration, which still has one of the highest attrition rates in the U.S. government, according to agency data.

The TSA has battled high turnover among screeners since the agency was formed after the Sept. 11 attacks. It is looking for ways to curb a staffing problem that has lengthened lines at airport checkpoints.

The TSA began paying 36,000 of its 45,000 screeners "retention bonuses" of $500 or $1,000 each in May. The turnover rate over the summer was unchanged from the winter and spring months, according to the TSA and the federal Office of Personnel Management.

One in five screeners left from Oct. 1, 2005, to Sept. 30.

"It's menial labor," said Michael Boyd, an aviation consultant who advises airports and airlines. "These are people who paw through luggage."

The TSA acknowledges the attrition problem and is taking additional steps. Among more recent efforts to curb turnover is a new pay grade that will raise salaries of high-quality veteran screeners by up to $5,300 and better position them to move into other government-security jobs such as the Secret Service or Border Patrol, according to TSA.

The agency also says it is creating screener jobs with salaries up to $56,700 that will focus on detecting bombs or identifying suspicious passengers. TSA has maintained that screeners with more experience are better at finding weapons at checkpoints.

Such improvements could help upgrade screening — which pays an average of $30,000 a year — "from a dead-end job to an occupation where (screeners) can see years of opportunity," said Gale Rossides, a TSA associate administrator.

The efforts come as some airports face longer security lines, prompting a TSA publicity campaign that urges travelers to know the rules about items they can carry onto planes so fewer bags have to be searched.

Cris Soulia, a screener in San Diego, said $500 bonuses amounted to $335 after taxes and "really don't have any effect" on people quitting.

Rossides said the attrition "is probably not that high" when considered against screeners' salaries and their physically demanding work, which often requires lifting heavy bags. Some efforts to retain screeners started too recently to affect attrition, Rossides said.

TSA figures show that attrition is lower than before 9/11, when private companies ran airport security.

Rossides said the bonuses and other efforts are improving morale and screener retention. She said TSA data show screeners are less likely to quit now than they were six months ago. But those gains are being offset by a growing number of part-time screeners, who are twice as likely to leave as full-timers.

DOJ_NMG_0089864

The agency has 8,200 part-time screeners, up from nearly 6,200 late last year, and will add even more. Part-time screeners work brief shifts at busy periods.

Randy Walker, director of Las Vegas' McCarran International Airport, said that he's seen no reduction in turnover and that lines are "still painful on our peak times." But he said a new program that shifts screener hiring from TSA headquarters to TSA's local airport security directors means vacancies are filled faster.

Ruby Ridge Revisited: Deval Let Sniper Off The The Hook (BOSH)

By Kimberly Atkins, Boston Herald Reporter

Boston Herald, November 2, 2006

As the Justice Department's chief civil rights prosecutor, Deval Patrick made the controversial decision not to criminally prosecute an FBI sniper who shot and killed an unarmed woman as she held her infant daughter in her arms during a 1992 standoff in Ruby Ridge, Idaho.

The incident, in which U.S. Marshall William F. Degan of Quincy and the wife and son of white separatist Randy Weaver were killed during an 11-day standoff, is cited by experts as the spark that started the anti-government militia movement that exploded after the standoff in Waco, Texas, less than a year later.

In 1994, Patrick, the Democratic candidate for governor who was then assistant attorney general, concluded there was insufficient basis to prosecute FBI sniper Lon Horiuchi for shooting and killing 43-year-old Vicki Weaver. Horiuchi had testified that he opened fire on the woman's husband and his friend, Kevin Harris, when he thought they were about to fire on an FBI helicopter.

Patrick made the recommendation despite a report by a task force assembled by Patrick's boss, Attorney General Janet Reno, that found numerous problems with the FBI's handling of the standoff, and called the protocol used by the FBI's Hostage Rescue unconstitutional under the circumstances.

The report referred the case to Patrick's department to decide whether to charge Horiuchi. Aides to Patrick said he was unavailable for comment because he was preparing for last night's debate.

Former Justice Department spokesman Myron Marlin called the incident "a tragic one that occurred during the final months of the first Bush administration."

"The Justice Department believed the critical element of willfulness necessary for a criminal civil rights prosecution could not be established beyond a reasonable doubt," Marlin said in a statement to the Herald yesterday. "Such willfulness, or knowing, intentional use of unreasonable force could not be made out against the FBI agent."

Patrick's assessment, he noted, was"reaffirmed by a separate criminal investigative team."

In 1995, however, a Senate subcommittee headed by Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) found "simply no justification" for the shot Horiuchi took that killed Vicki Weaver and "missed the 10-month-old baby in her arms by less than two feet."

"Horiuchi should have known that as he fired blind through the cabin door, he was shooting into an area which could well have contained Vicki Weaver and her two younger daughters," states the report, which took no position on whether Horiuchi should have been prosecuted.

The decision not to prosecute was ripped by both conservative and liberal groups. "It was obscene," said author James Bovard, an outspoken critic of federal officials' handling of the case. "There was no need for the excessive force the FBI used in gunning down a mother holding her baby."

WAR NEWS:

Staying The Course, Win Or Lose (WP)

By Robert Kagan

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

BRUSSELS -- Here in Europe, people ask hopefully if a Democratic victory in the congressional elections will finally shift the direction of American foreign policy in a more benign direction. But congressional elections rarely affect the broad direction of American foreign policy. A notable exception was when Congress cut funding for American military operations in support of South Vietnam in 1973. Yet it's unlikely that a Democratic House would cut off funds for the war in Iraq in the next two years.

DOJ_NMG_0089865

Indeed, the preferred European scenario -- "Bush hobbled" -- is less likely than the alternative: "Bush unbound." Neither the president nor his vice president is running for office in 2008. That is what usually prevents high-stakes foreign policy moves in the last two years of a president's term. In 1988 Ronald Reagan had negotiated a clever agreement to get the dictator Manuel Noriega peacefully out of Panama, but Vice President George H.W. Bush and his advisers feared the domestic political repercussions of cutting a deal with a drug lord at the height of the "war on drugs," so they nixed the plan. The result was that Bush had to invade Panama the very next year to remove Noriega -- but he did get elected.

This President Bush doesn't have to worry about getting anyone elected in 2008 and appears to be thinking only about his place in history. That can lead him to act in ways that please Europeans -- for instance, the vigorous multilateral diplomacy on Iran and North Korea. But it could also take him in directions they will find worrisome if that diplomacy fails.

There is a deeper reason this election, and even the next presidential election, may not change U.S. foreign policy very much. Historically, and especially in the six decades since the end of World War II, there has been much more continuity than discontinuity in foreign policy. New administrations change policy around the margins, and sometimes those changes prove important -- George H.W. Bush temporized about the Balkans; Bill Clinton temporized and then sent troops. Clinton temporized about Iraq and then bombed. George W. Bush temporized and then invaded. But the motives behind American foreign policy, and even the means, don't differ all that much from administration to administration. Republicans berated the Democrats' "cowardly" containment until they took the White House in 1952, then adopted that strategy as their own.

This tendency toward continuity is particularly striking on the issue that most divides Americans from Europeans today: the use of military force in international affairs. Americans of both parties simply have more belief in the utility and even justice of military action than do most other peoples around the world. The German Marshall Fund commissions an annual poll that asks Europeans and Americans, among other things, whether they agree with the following statement: "Under some conditions, war is necessary to obtain justice." Europeans disagree, and by a 2 to 1 margin. But Americans overwhelmingly support the idea that war may be necessary to obtain justice. Even this year, with disapproval of the Iraq war high, 78 percent of American respondents agreed with the statement.

This broad bipartisan conviction is reflected in U.S. policies. Between 1989 and 2003, the United States engaged in significant military actions overseas on nine occasions under Bush I, Clinton and Bush II: Panama in 1989, Somalia in 1992, Haiti in 1994, Bosnia in 1995-96, Kosovo in 1999, Afghanistan in 2001 and Iraq three times -- 1991, 1998 and 2003, an average of one major military action every year and a half.

The reasons for this prolific use of military force have to do with the nation's history -- Americans have been fighting what they considered just and moral wars since the Revolution and the Civil War. And it has to do with Americans' relative power. It is no accident that the United States began to use force more frequently after the fall of the Soviet Union.

Those who imagine that the Iraq imbroglio may change this approach could be right, but the historical record suggests otherwise. Less than six years after the defeat in Vietnam, Americans were electing Reagan on a promise to restore American military power and engage in a concerted arms race with the Soviet Union.

Even today leading Democrats who oppose the Iraq war do not oppose the idea of war itself or its utility. They're not even denouncing a defense budget approaching $500 billion per year. While Europeans mostly reject the Bush administration's phrase "the war on terror," leading Democrats embrace it and accuse the administration of not pursuing it vigorously or intelligently enough. Nor do leading Democrats reject the premise of the United States as the world's "indispensable nation" -- a notion that most Europeans find offensive at best and dangerous at worst.

In this respect, there is even less debate over the general principles of American foreign policy than during the Vietnam era. In those days, opponents of the war insisted that not just President Richard Nixon was rotten but that the "system" was rotten. They did not just reject the Vietnam War, they rejected the whole containment strategy of Dean Acheson and Harry Truman, which, they rightly claimed, helped produce the intervention in the first place. They rejected the idea that the United States could be a benevolent force in the world.

DOJ_NMG_0089866

Today Democrats insist that the United States will be such a force as soon as George W. Bush leaves office. Although they pretend they have a fundamental doctrinal dispute with the Bush administration, their recommendations are less far-reaching. They argue that the United States should generally try to be nicer, employ more "soft power" and be more effective when it employs "hard power." That may be good advice, but it hardly qualifies as an alternative doctrine.

Many around the world will thrill at the defeat of Republicans next week. They should enjoy the moment while they can. When the smoke clears, they will find themselves dealing with much the same America, with all its virtues and all its flaws.

Robert Kagan, a senior associate at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and transatlantic fellow at the German Marshall Fund, writes a monthly column for The Post. He is the author of "Dangerous Nation," a history of American foreign policy.

US Air Strike Kills Al-Qaeda Kingpin: Military (AFP)

AFP, November 2, 2006

American forces killed an Al-Qaeda chieftain in the lawless western Iraqi city of Ramadi by destroying his car with a laser guided bomb, the US military said.

"Rafa Abdul Salam Hamud al-Ithawi, also known as Abu Taha, was the emir of Shamiyyah," it said. "He frequently harboured foreign fighters who entered Iraq illegally in order to assault innocent Iraqis and coalition forces."

Ithawi was killed on Wednesday along with his driver, "diminishing the al-Qaeda in Iraq network," the statement said.

Ramadi has become the focus of the battle between US forces and Sunni Arab insurgents fighting under the Al-Qaeda banner. Last week a US spokesman said marines were fighting to take back the city.

On October 15, Al-Qaeda militants held a brief parade in central Ramadi to declare the region an independent emirate, scoring a propaganda victory, but fierce fighting has continued since.

Iraqi Shiites Continue To Exert Independence And Seek Changes To U.N. Deal On U.S. Troops (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 1 — In a continued effort to demonstrate their independence from Washington, Iraqi Shiites are pressing a fresh set of conditions on their American supporters, asking for changes in the Iraqi government's relationship with the United States military.

In a move that seemed designed more to placate Iraq's Shiite majority than to influence the broader management of the war, Iraqi leaders have drawn up a set of changes to a United Nations agreement that provides some of the legal basis for American troops here.

The changes, if enacted, could give the Iraqi government more control over its own armed forces, something Iraqi leaders want, but were not likely to change fundamentally the way the war is directed.

The United Nations agreement, which expires on Dec. 31, is not the only source of legal justification for continued presence of American troops here. Another is the Iraqi Constitution. Even if the agreement expired, the status of the American military here would not change. What is more, no single Iraqi group truly wants the Americans out.

Iraqi leaders say they cannot accept a continuation of the United Nations agreement, which gives the United States and 27 other countries "the authority to take all necessary measures to contribute to the maintenance of security and stability in Iraq" without attaching some conditions to the original agreement. They say they want more control over their military to protect vulnerable areas from insurgent attacks.

A common view among American officers in the field, though, is that Iraqi troops, more than three years after the American effort to rebuild the Iraqi forces began, are years away from being able to fight the war on their own.

A 19-member committee of Iraq's top political leaders, its prime minister and its president has agreed on six conditions, said one Shiite politician who has participated in negotiations. The points are being discussed with senior American military commanders here as well as with officials from the American and British Embassies.

DOJ_NMG_0089867

They will be codified in a memorandum between Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and President Bush, Shiite lawmakers said, although the type of document is still a subject of debate. Iraqis say they will not insist on reopening the case publicly at the United Nations to avoid the risk of not having it extended.

Even so, they could embarrass the Americans by refusing to relent on changes, even as the deadline for extending the United Nations agreement nears or passes. But if that happened, the only serious question would be about the status of foreign forces from other countries, who provide more than 17,000 troops and whose legal status for being here is still more closely bound with the United Nations agreement.

"They agreed on almost all the conditions," said Sami al-Askari, a Shiite politician whose political bloc has participated in the talks, but "we want legal guarantees that this document will be implemented, otherwise we will have a problem facing the Parliament."

A spokesman for the United States Embassy in Baghdad confirmed that American officials were in talks with the Iraqi government on the subject, but would not give details.

The changes the leaders seek include speeding up the process of handing over control to Iraqi regions for their own security sooner, currently scheduled to be completed in the first half of next year. Under the current arrangement, American forces have full operational control nationally until the end of 2007, and political leaders seek more control over security for portions of the country earlier, according to Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser.

"Iraqi leaders are handcuffed" by the United Nations agreement, said Hadi al-Ameri, a member of the committee and the leader of the Defense and Security Committee in Parliament. "We will not tell the Americans to go, but if they stay it should be according to conditions."

Mr. Maliki remarked bitterly in an interview with [a news service] last week that he could not move one company of Iraqi soldiers without permission from the American military.

The complaint is a striking example of just how far apart Iraqi and American leaders are, at least in their public statements.

Demands for a faster transition to Iraqi control are being made at a time when the 141,000 American forces deployed here remain the indispensable core of the war effort. Shiite officials in the Maliki government have acknowledged that fast-forwarding the move to Iraqi control involves "risks," an assessment many American officers call an understatement.

Nowhere is that more apparent than in Baghdad, where American and Iraqi officials have said the war will be won or lost. In the stepped-up effort to regain control of the capital that began in August — an effort now admitted by American commanders to be faltering, partly for lack of troops — nearly two-thirds of the forces have been American. Only a third of the needed Iraqi forces ever showed up, leaving the effort vastly understaffed.

The Shiite demands spring from a frustration deep within the Shiite leadership that has been building for months over the American approach to the war. Shiites say Americans, particularly Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, have focused unfairly on Shiite-run death squads and that the American military has not been tough enough on Sunni militias.

"There is a feeling that the Americans diverted their support to the Sunni side," Mr. Askari said.

Mr. Maliki has repeatedly acted to soothe this frustration in recent weeks with policy moves asserting his own independence from the Americans. Last month, he demanded that the American military release a Shiite cleric whom it had suspected of death squad activity, and on Tuesday, he ordered the lifting of an American security cordon here. He has to ask American permission as he does not have operational control of the American forces, something that Americans will never give.

"Now they hear about amnesty for Baathists," Mr. Askari said, referring to the Sunni-dominated party that ran the country under Saddam Hussein. And Sadr City, the largest Shiite district, he said, "is surrounded from all sides. If it continues like this, it is very dangerous."

Mr. Maliki even refused an American request last month for amnesty for some prisoners at the end of Ramadan, Mr. Askari said. Many in American facilities are Sunni Arabs, and Shiites often say that Americans release too many of them.

That argument goes to the very heart of the war here, which has shifted from a Sunni-led insurgency to an even deadlier conflict in which Shiite and Sunni militias force members of the other group out of neighborhoods and carry out revenge killings with relative impunity. But while formerly these arguments were the domain of Iraq's most partisan politicians, Mr. Maliki himself is now putting them forth in a sign of just how strained relations with the American military have become.

DOJ_NMG_0089868

They are also deeply troubling to American military commanders, who fear the government will use the security forces, largely Shiite, selectively to protect Shiites, or in an even darker possibility, as a fighting force on one side of a civil war.

American officials have expressed frustration with the government of Mr. Maliki, saying it has been slow to begin to make changes badly needed to stabilize the country and that action against death squads is just one of them. Mr. Khalilzad detailed a series of goals last month in remarks that Mr. Maliki angrily dismissed as "inaccurate."

Attacks that harden Iraqi groups against one another continued. At least 18 Iraqis were killed in a series of attacks across the capital on Wednesday. In addition, 35 bodies were found. Casualties mounted in a suicide attack Tuesday on a wedding party. In all, 23 Iraqis, including 9 children, the bride and the groom, were killed in the blast, The Associated Press reported. Gunmen on Wednesday seized two Sunni coaches from a youth center. One of them taught blind athletes.

The military on Wednesday announced two deaths on Tuesday, a soldier in Baghdad and a marine in western Iraq, bringing the toll for October to 105.

Iraqi leaders said they expected to submit the new text of the changes by Dec. 1. It must pass through Parliament before taking effect.

Iraqi Prime Minister Asserts Independence, Gains Stature (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, November 2, 2006

BAGHDAD

Shiites from the crowded Baghdad district of Sadr City are reveling in what they deem their "victory" over American forces after Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki on Tuesday ordered the dismantling of US and Iraqi checkpoints surrounding the area.

The checkpoints - manned by US and Iraqi troops for a week in an effort to find a kidnapped US military translator of Iraqi descent as well as snare an alleged death-squad leader - had snarled traffic and bred growing anger in the slum.

They also provided Mr. Maliki with a chance to further assert his independence after weeks of friction between Washington and Baghdad - just days before US midterm elections, in which the Iraq war has become a defining issue.

Aides to the premier have said that they want to take advantage of the vote, and the unpopularity of Mr. Bush and the Iraq war, to expand Maliki's authority. The new assertive tack is boosting the portrayal of Maliki as commander in chief.

The US pullback is being seen in Sadr City as a loss for the Americans, even as Maliki has shown that he can issue orders and deliver - though he has yet to follow through on vows to stanch sectarian killings.

At the same time, anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia has been accused of playing a key role in sectarian murders, has also gained from a careful marshalling of his loyalists. Militiamen enforced a general strike on Tuesday to protest the US "siege," shutting down shops, offices, and schools.

Maliki's decision caught US commanders off guard, but was nonetheless carried out on the ground. The US Embassy insisted later that a joint Iraqi-US decision had been made.

Some Sadr City residents said the growing threat of unrest prompted the US acceptance of the checkpoint dismantling.

"The Americans agreed with Maliki's decision to leave Sadr City because of the US elections," says a driver with the nickname Abu Haidar. "If they let [the unrest] continue, it will spread. Moqtada [al-Sadr] and Maliki played it very well."

"It's a tactical loss for the Americans," says a jobless resident nicknamed Abu Ali, who says the decision to pull back was wise. "Because if they stayed [and violence flared], they would lose much more, not just in Iraq, but in the US."

A primary complaint echoing in Sadr City is that the US-Iraqi checkpoints did little to stop the violence: 26 laborers died in a market blast on Sunday. In the nearby district of Ur, also apparently subject to checkpoint control, a wedding party was hit with a car bomb Tuesday, leaving 23 dead, among them nine children.

Across Iraq Wednesday, police searched for at least 40 Shiites suspected to have been abducted by Sunni gunmen along a dangerous highway north of Baghdad. At least 27 Iraqis died in a spate of attacks.

Under fire by critics for not authorizing enough troops in Iraq, US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said that he had agreed to expand the size of Iraqi forces beyond the current 310,000 listed on the books as trained, and the previous goal of 325,000.

DOJ_NMG_0089869

In Baghdad, an increasing number of Shiites believe that the US is more to blame for violence in Baghdad than Sunni insurgents - a once-common accusation that largely disappeared last February, when sectarian bloodletting surged after destruction of a key Shiite shrine. Some even accuse US forces of deliberately planting bombs to stoke more violence.

"The bombs came after the Americans came. When they are there, they are controlling security, so who is to blame?" says Ali al-Saidi, an Internet cafe owner. "When [US forces] entered Sadr City, we were worried. When they leave, we feel safer."

"The Americans are trying to make trouble in Sadr City," asserts Abu Ali. "They want to return Sadr City and the Mahdi Army to a war situation."

US forces fought pitched battles with the Mahdi Army in the holy city of Najaf and in Sadr City in April and August 2004. Sadr has since ordered his fighters not to attack US forces, and his support of Maliki's fragile Shiite coalition ended a months-long deadlock earlier this year.

After Maliki's order to remove the checkpoints, Sadr's office crowed in a statement to supporters: "Your patience and unity brought victory."

US forces have rubbed increasingly against Sadr's militia in recent months, with friction turning to gunfights at times. And the Mahdi Army, while winning kudos among many Shiites for defending them against Sunni insurgent attack, is also believed to be behind some sectarian killings that are leaving more than 2,500 Iraqis dead each month.

A second purpose of the US-Iraqi checkpoints was to snare a Shiite man alleged to be a death-squad leader. Residents and Sadr supporters jump to Abu Deraa's defense, countering that he is a simple man with a penchant for helping hostages get released from kidnapping gangs.

"One man gave him a camel for helping free his son," says Abu Kumail, a money changer who has seven children. "He saved a Sunni man from a gang - does that mean he is a leader of the death squads?"

"We are feeling that whenever [Americans] raid in Sadr City, they leave many bombs and IEDs [roadside bombs]," says Abu Kumail. "Who is the terrorist? We didn't know terrorism in our country before the [2003] US invasion."

Coming after one of the bloodiest months for US troops since the 2003 Iraq campaign began - 105 Americans died in October - some say US commanders preferred not to push harder on Sadr City now.

"It's a victory for the Iraqi people," says Abu Kumail. "They obeyed the cleric's order [for a strike], and they proved to the government and American soldiers they are peaceful people, and civilized.

"It's a victory, too, for the government," he adds. "They proved their power with a decision, a small justice that is fair to the people."

In a suburb that is home to an estimated 2.5 million Iraqis, Maliki's decision is resounding widely.

But so, too, do rumors that US troops are behind some of the blasts. Among the most common reasons cited here for a US interest in more war: Iraqi Shiites and militias have grown too powerful, both in government and outside of it; and even more conflict would justify a longer US presence, according to this perception.

"The Americans have different ways to make these blasts," charges Abu Ali, the jobless young man. "Sometimes they do it, and plant these bombs. Sometimes they create the good environment for bombs."

"We are not seeing [bombs being planted], but the Americans control the night," he adds, making a deductive leap. "All IEDs and bombs are planted at night, in the curfew."

Baghdad Attacks Target Busy Areas (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 1 -- At least 17 people were killed in car bombings, mortar attacks and roadside explosions in Baghdad on Wednesday, as the sounds of gunfights and explosions reverberated through the capital for much of the day.

In Sadr City, a Shiite Muslim slum in eastern Baghdad, life returned to normal a day after U.S. and Iraqi checkpoints were removed to allow the free flow of traffic and a strike was lifted to permit residents to reopen shops and return to jobs and classrooms.

DOJ_NMG_0089870

The forced shutdown of most activities in Sadr City this week by the powerful Mahdi Army militia apparently played a major role in compelling the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to order an end Tuesday to a nearly week-long U.S. blockade of the teeming slum, home to 2.5 million Shiites. U.S. troops had cordoned it off in an effort to find an abducted U.S. soldier and a man considered to be one of Iraq's most notorious death squad leaders, both of whom were believed to be there.

But while Shiites hailed Maliki for asserting his independence and authority, and for alleviating the hardships imposed by the cordon, some Sunni Arab leaders questioned the decision.

Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, a Sunni, said in a statement that security in Baghdad had "noticeably improved" during the barricading of Sadr City. He said lifting the checkpoints "may mean freeing up the movement of terrorists."

Alaa Makky, a Sunni member of parliament from the Iraqi Islamic Party, said in an interview that Maliki "should suspend his decision" to lift the siege. Makky called for Maliki to forward the matter to the country's National Security Council, which he said could "consider the complications and side effects of the decision" and formulate a security plan for all of Baghdad, not just one neighborhood.

The crackle of gunfire and the boom of bombs and mortars punctuated life in the capital for most of the day. In the deadliest incidents, six people were killed by a roadside bomb in the Shurjah market of central Baghdad, five were killed and seven wounded by a car bomb at Aqaba bin Nafi intersection in eastern Baghdad, and three people were killed in a car bombing Wednesday morning in the southwest Bayaa neighborhood.

The U.S. military said in a statement that a soldier assigned to Regimental Combat Team 7 in Anbar province west of Baghdad -- a stronghold for Sunni insurgents and the group al-Qaeda in Iraq -- died of combat injuries on Tuesday, raising the number of U.S. service members killed in Iraq in October to at least 104. It was the fourth-deadliest month for U.S. troops since the start of the war, and it brought the most fatalities since January 2005, when 106 U.S. service members were killed.

In a sign of how violent the month was, an unusually large number of October's deaths occurred in combat. Ninety-nine of the troops were killed in action, compared with 63 in September, 58 in August and 38 in July. Only two other months brought more U.S. troops killed in action -- November 2004 (125) and April 2004 (126).

On Wednesday, a U.S. soldier was killed by a roadside bomb west of Baghdad, the military said in a statement.

[A] news service, citing data from Iraq's Interior Ministry, reported that 1,289 Iraqi civilians died last month in political violence -- nearly 42 people per day -- up 18 percent from the 1,089 such fatalities in September. Many violent deaths in Iraq are believed to go unreported, however. This summer, the United Nations put the nationwide death toll at more than 3,000 people a month.

Because of the political sensitivity of death counts, the Interior Ministry has stopped publicly releasing death statistics, and the [news service] report could not be independently verified. The news agency said the data, a nationwide compilation of reports from the Interior, Defense and Health ministries, did not include all violent deaths, but only those judged to be the result of political, sectarian or ethnic killings, as opposed to criminal acts.

Last Gasps In Iraq (USAT)

By Ralph Peters

USA Today, November 2, 2006

On Tuesday, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki obeyed Muqtada al-Sadr's command to withdraw U.S. troops from Baghdad's Sadr City. He halted a vital U.S. military operation. It was the third time in less than a month that al-Maliki had sided with the anti-American cleric against our forces.

President Bush insists that we have no conflicts with the al-Maliki government. The president isn't telling the truth — or he himself doesn't support our military's efforts. He can't have it both ways. Bush appears increasingly desperate just to get through the upcoming elections.

I supported the removal of Saddam Hussein. I believed that Arabs deserved a chance to build a rule-of-law democracy in the Middle East. Based upon firsthand experience, I was convinced that the Middle East was so politically, socially, morally and intellectually stagnant that we had to risk intervention — or face generations of terrorism and tumult. I still believe that our removal of Hussein was a noble act.

DOJ_NMG_0089871

I only wish the administration had done it competently.

Iraq is failing. No honest observer can conclude otherwise. Even six months ago, there was hope. Now the chances for a democratic, unified Iraq are dwindling fast. The country's prime minister has thrown in his lot with al-Sadr, our mortal enemy. He has his eye on the future, and he's betting that we won't last. The police are less accountable than they were under Saddam. Our extensive investment in Iraqi law enforcement only produced death squads. Government ministers loot the country to strengthen their own factions. Even Iraq's elections — a worthy experiment — further divided Iraq along confessional and ethnic lines. Iraq still exists on the maps, but in reality it's gone. Only a military coup — which might come in the next few years — could hold the artificial country together.

This chaos wasn't inevitable. While in Iraq late last winter, I remained soberly hopeful. Since then, the strength of will of our opponents — their readiness to pay any price and go to any length to win — has eclipsed our own. The valor of our enemies never surpassed that of our troops, but it far exceeded the fair-weather courage of the Bush administration.

Yet, for all our errors, we did give the Iraqis a unique chance to build a rule-of-law democracy. They preferred to indulge in old hatreds, confessional violence, ethnic bigotry and a culture of corruption. It appears that the cynics were right: Arab societies can't support democracy as we know it. And people get the government they deserve.

For us, Iraq's impending failure is an embarrassment. For the Iraqis — and other Arabs — it's a disaster the dimensions of which they do not yet comprehend. They're gleeful at the prospect of America's humiliation. But it's their tragedy, not ours.

Iraq was the Arab world's last chance to board the train to modernity, to give the region a future, not just a bitter past. The violence staining Baghdad's streets with gore isn't only a symptom of the Iraqi government's incompetence, but of the comprehensive inability of the Arab world to progress in any sphere of organized human endeavor. We are witnessing the collapse of a civilization. All those who rooted for Iraq to fail are going to be chastened by what follows.

Iraq still deserves one last chance — as long as we don't confuse deadly stubbornness and perseverance. If, at this late hour, Iraqis in decisive numbers prove willing to fight for their own freedom and a constitutional government, we should be willing to remain for a generation. If they continue to revel in fratricidal slaughter, we must leave.

And contrary to the prophets of doom, the United States wouldn't be weakened by our withdrawal, should it come to that. Iraq was never our Vietnam. It's al-Qaeda's Vietnam. They're the ones who can't leave and who can't win.

Islamist terrorists have chosen Iraq as their battleground and, even after our departure, it will continue to consume them. We'll still be the greatest power on earth, indispensable to other regional states — such as the Persian Gulf states and Saudi Arabia — that are terrified of Iran's growing might. If the Arab world and Iran embark on an orgy of bloodshed, the harsh truth is that we may be the beneficiaries.

My disillusionment with our Iraq endeavor began last summer, when I was invited to a high-level discussion with administration officials. I went into the meeting with one firm goal, to convince my hosts that they'd better have Plan B in case Iraq continued to disintegrate. I left the session convinced that the administration still didn't have Plan A, only a blur of meandering policies and blind hopes. After more than three years, it was still “An Evening at the Improv.”

Then, last month, as Iraq's prime minister seconded al-Sadr's demand that our troops free a death-squad mastermind they had captured, I knew a fateful page had turned. A week later, al-Maliki forbade additional U.S. military raids in Sadr City, the radical mullah's Baghdad stronghold. On Tuesday, al-Maliki insisted that our troops remove roadblocks set up to help find a kidnapped U.S. soldier. Iraq's prime minister has made his choice. We're not it. It's time to face reality. Only Iraqis can save Iraq now — and they appear intent on destroying it. Après nous, le deluge.

Iraq could have turned out differently. It didn't. And we must be honest about it. We owe that much to our troops. They don't face the mere forfeiture of a few congressional seats but the loss of their lives. Our military is now being employed for political purposes. It's unworthy of our nation.

Ralph Peters is a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors and the author of 21 books. He is a retired U.S. Army officer.

Army Journal Cites Problems With Iraqis (AP-Y)

By John Milburn

DOJ_NMG_0089872

AP, November 2, 2006

Iraqi soldiers being trained by American military advisers go on rampages, flee from dangerous situations and waste ammunition in undisciplined bursts of fire at any provocation, according to an account in a U.S. Army journal.

In contrast to the iron discipline imposed during Saddam Hussein's regime, "the new army serves the cause of freedom, and officers and soldiers alike are a bit confused about what this means," Lt. Col. Carl D. Grunow wrote in the July-August issue of Military Review.

Iraqi soldiers frequently use excessive force, going on retaliatory rampages after colleagues are killed by insurgents, Grunow wrote in the journal, a publication of the U.S. Army Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan.

"The `burst reaction' may be attributed to Iraqis experiencing denial, anger and grief all at the same time," he wrote.

Grunow, who spent a year with an Iraqi armored brigade north of Baghdad, also said that Iraqis often fail to report for training, and that sometimes up to 40 percent of some units flee from dangerous situations without fear of punishment.

"As of this writing, the only power holding them is the promise of a paycheck (not always delivered) and a sense of duty. Good soldiers leave after receiving terrorist threats against their families," Grunow wrote.

The old Iraqi army "executed deserters unhesitatingly," he said.

Another problem, Grunow wrote, is the Iraqi "death blossom," in which an attack by even a single sniper "provokes the average Iraqi soldier to empty his 30-round magazine and fire whatever belt of ammunition happens to be in his machine gun."

That is both dangerous and wasteful, he said.

Military Rebuts Media On Iraq (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

Washington — As concern in the Defense Department mounts over eroding public support for the Iraq war, the Pentagon has launched a rapid-response public relations effort to rebut news stories that officials believe are inaccurate or misleading.

Although all administrations have been critical of the media, most have avoided regular, ongoing public fights with journalists. But in recent weeks the Bush administration has shown a willingness to fight over facts and reporters' analysis of news events.

The Defense Department's rapid-response efforts echo an initiative called "Setting the Record Straight," in which the White House identifies what it says are news reports' inaccuracies or quotations out of context. Among the first results of the Pentagon response is a new "For the Record" section of the Defense Department's website, http://www.defenselink.mil .

On Wednesday the section contained critiques of a Washington Post article, a Newsweek cover story and two New York Times editorials, as well as a list of "Five Myths About the War on Terror" that it said were "some of the more prominent ones in the public dialogue."

Pentagon officials say the effort is not in response to negative coverage of the war, but rather an attempt to adapt to new technologies and find ways to communicate with the American public and international audiences.

"We've always thought it is important to go out and correct the record," said Pentagon spokesman Bryan G. Whitman. "If we are doing it more aggressively, it is because we understand in this Information Age, it is easy for wrong information to be perpetuated."

The effort shows Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's frustration with increasingly negative coverage of the war, said Marvin Kalb, Washington-based senior fellow for Harvard's Shorenstein Center on the Press, Politics & Public Policy.

But Kalb said as long as the war was going badly, the media coverage was sure to be negative.

"It is not a matter of improving communication, it is a matter of the reality of the war," Kalb said. "The effective response has to be in the policy you pursue, not in the way the policy is covered.

"Rumsfeld is not the first government official who turns on the news at night and throws a bottle of Scotch at the TV."

Pentagon officials said they were dedicating staffers to the effort but would not specify how many would be hired or transferred. They also declined to say how much was going to be spent on the effort.

DOJ_NMG_0089873

In an Oct. 3 memo released this week, J. Dorrance Smith, the assistant secretary of Defense for public affairs, outlined four focus areas for his department: distributing information on newer media forms like podcasts and YouTube; increased television and radio bookings; better assistance to military analysts and other "surrogates"; and the rapid-response group.

Pentagon Press Secretary Eric Ruff said the changes were part of an effort to improve the D-plus rating that Rumsfeld had given the public affairs operation.

"We're trying to do better than a D-plus," Ruff said this week.

"Al Qaeda has demonstrated time and again how they can use the Internet. We are, very frankly, behind the curve."

Homeward Bound -- If Only For A Year (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

camp paliwoda, iraq — Home means snowboarding, family meals and first-run movies. Home is where you can sleep late and drive around town in a pickup with the windows down and the radio up.

"I want to relax, maybe dress down, put on shorts and a T-shirt instead of wearing a uniform, maybe every once in a while not shave," Sgt. Jon Bullard said as he prepared to pack up his gear and head home to his wife and 12-year-old daughter.

Bullard and the other soldiers of the 1st Battalion, 8th Infantry Regiment, or the 1-8, are finishing up a one-year tour of duty in Iraq, leaving the portable toilets and processed food of this bleak base 50 miles north of Baghdad for division headquarters in Ft. Carson, Colo.

But home may be a fleeting respite. This was the battalion's second tour in Iraq, and most think they will be back for a third time, probably in another year.

"I hate this place," said Spc. Alex Esteban, a 21-year-old Miami native who mapped out plans for a trip to Las Vegas. At home, "I won't worry about getting shot at or mortared. But there's a 90% chance that I'll be back here in a year. I have no choice. It's my job."

Outside the former schoolhouse used as a battalion headquarters, the soldiers waited for the Chinook helicopters that would ferry them to nearby Anaconda, the massive air base where they would stay for a few days before heading to Kuwait and beyond.

Delay followed delay. They laid their rucksacks and M-16s on the ground; some dozed beneath the stars daydreaming, smoking cigarettes and chewing tobacco.

The talk turned to politics.

"There is no progress," said Sgt. Stephen Brodbeck, a 25-year-old Denver native. "We've been here doing the same thing for 3 1/2 years. These are the same Iraqi soldiers we tried to train in 2003. We did a lot, but it was all in vain. And the guys we lost, we lost in vain."

Others chimed in, some vehemently disagreeing.

"We're helping provide security and buy time for the Iraqi government to step in," said Capt. Andrew Kletzing, 25, of Chicago. "Every month that goes by, they get a little bit more credibility and a little stronger. In the grand scheme of things it's making a difference. If we can succeed here, we can change the course of history."

Still, many of the soldiers despair at how bad things have gotten since they were last here.

"This doesn't look good, the things here," said Sgt. Dominie Price, 25, of Wheaton, Ill. "Maybe we don't see the big picture, and things will be better the next time we come back."

Almost all have become news junkies in Iraq, hanging on every word spoken by U.S. officials about the war, reading newspapers and news websites for clues about the country's security situation, any deployment extensions and whether the war will continue for many months or many years.

A sobering toll

It's been a harsh year for the men and women of the 1-8, a unit of the 3rd Brigade of the 4th Infantry Division, and the rest of the troops in Iraq. At least 780 troops have died in the country since the 4th Infantry deployed here last November, 105 in the last month alone. At least 5,500 troops have been wounded in the last year.

DOJ_NMG_0089874

Five guys from the 1-8 won't be making it back to Ft. Carson. Their comrades recall their names as they were read out during commemorative roll calls:

Staff Sgt. Curtis T. Howard II, 32, of Ann Arbor, Mich.

Sgt. Gordon F. Misner II, 23, of Sparks, Nev.

Sgt. Dimitri Muscat, 21, of Aurora, Colo.

Spc. Thomas J. Wilwerth, 21, of Mastic, N.Y.

Spc. Walter B. Howard II, 35, of Rochester, Mich.

The soldiers cherish memories of home to keep up morale. Back home, though, life has not stopped. Relationships with loved ones have become more strained. Children have grown a year older.

"I'm worried about my son not recognizing me," said Spc. Joseph D. Leon, 23, of Santa Paula. "It's been hard just with the kids being so young still and just trying to get them going, and my wife being home by herself taking care of everything."

First thing he'll do when he gets home is take his wife, son and daughter to the zoo. "My daughter loves the monkeys running around, and the birds," he said.

Capt. Mark T. Jenner's mother died of cancer while he was deployed in Iraq. He's planning to leave the military. The 26-year-old Cherry Hill, N.J., native is looking forward to spending Thanksgiving with his wife and piecing together a new life as a civilian.

"We're into wine," he said. "We had a little hobby of traveling around the Colorado countryside and visiting the vineyards."

A light rain began, among the first signs of the coming winter. The noontime call to prayers floated across from a nearby mosque as Capt. Keith L. Carter, the departing commander of Bravo Company, set out on what was likely to be his last visit to Balad, a friendly, ramshackle Shiite Muslim farming town that has been the focus of the troops' attention.

Carter has put on 15 pounds since taking up weight lifting in Iraq. He used to run five or more miles a day. Being here, he says, has changed his physique.

"Since being in Iraq, I can bench press way more than I used to," he said.

But like many officers here, the low-key 29-year-old Chelmsford, Mass., native wonders whether any of his efforts to train Iraqi forces and improve security have made a difference.

"I think we're winning," he said. "But the pace isn't as rapid as a lot of people would like."

Confrontation in Balad

A commotion erupted in downtown Balad as the convoy pulled in. Residents gathered near the police headquarters. Carter led a group of men inside. The police chief and mayor were triumphant, showing off a pair of bloodied suspected insurgents they had captured.

A group of Iraqi soldiers and police manning a volatile checkpoint had confronted a car carrying three suspected insurgents. They engaged in a gun battle, killing one man who turned out to be a member of a local security force and arresting the two others, who had dynamite and other munitions in their Toyota sedan.

The suspected insurgents had a map of Balad that obviously came from Americans, giving credence to long-held suspicions that the security force in question, the Iraqi Strategic Infrastructure Battalion, had been infiltrated by insurgents.

"Did the terrorists have this map on them?" Carter asked.

Yes, they replied.

"Good job," he told them.

The rain clouds dispersed as the patrol pushed through traffic toward the base. Beams of sunlight illuminated the green farmlands.

"They did this by themselves," Carter said. "We didn't even know about it."

Later that night at the base, the next batch of soldiers scheduled to head home started to assemble near headquarters. They clutched their redeployment orders as they waited for roll call. They eventually dozed off, but sprung to life as the roar of the Chinooks began to fill the sky over Iraq.

Medic Tends A Fallen Marine, With Skill, Prayer And Fury (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

KARMA, Iraq, Oct. 30 — Petty Officer Third Class Dustin E. Kirby clutched the injured marine's empty helmet. His hands were coated in blood. Sweat ran down his face, which he was trying to keep straight but kept twisting into a snarl.

He held up the helmet and flipped it, exposing the inside. It was lined with blood and splinters of bone.

"The round hit him," he said, pausing to point at a tiny hole that aligned roughly with a man's temple. "Right here."

Petty Officer Kirby, 22, is a Navy corpsman, the trauma medic assigned to Second Mobile Assault Platoon of Weapons Company, Second Battalion, Eighth Marines. Everyone calls him Doc. He had just finished treating a marine who had been shot by an Iraqi sniper.

"It was 7.62 millimeter," he continued. "Armor piercing."

He reached into his pocket and retrieved the bullet, which he had found. "The impact with the Kevlar stopped most of it," he said. "But it tore through, hit his head, went through and came out."

He put the bullet in his breast pocket, to give to an intelligence team later. Sweat kept rolling off his face, mixed with tears. His voice was almost cracking, but he managed to control it and keep it deep. "When I got there, there wasn't much I could do," he said.

Then he nodded. He seemed to be talking to himself. "I kept him breathing," he said.

He looked at Lance Cpl. Matias Tafoya, his driver, and raised his voice. It was almost a shout. "When I told you that I do not let people die on me, I meant it," he said. "I meant it."

He scanned the Iraqi houses, perhaps 150 yards away, on the other side of a fetid green canal. Marines were all around, pressed to the ground, peering from behind machine-gun turrets or bracing against their armored vehicles, aiming rifles at where they thought the sniper was.

The sniper had made a single shot just as the marines were leaving a rural settlement on the western edge of Karma, a city near Falluja in Anbar Province.

The marines had been searching several houses on this side of the canal, where they found five Kalashnikov assault rifles and bomb components, and were getting back into their vehicles when everyone heard the shot. It was a single loud crack.

No one was precisely sure where it had come from. Everyone knew precisely where it hit. It struck a marine who was peering out of the first vehicle's gun turret. He collapsed.

Petty Officer Kirby rushed to him and found him breathing. He bandaged the marine's head as the vehicle lurched away. Soon he helped load the wounded marine into a helicopter, which touched down beside the convoy within 12 minutes of the shot.

Once the helicopter lifted away, he ran back to his vehicle, ready to treat anyone else. He was thinking about the marine he had already treated.

"If I had gone with him," he said, and glanced to where the helicopter had flown away, over the line of date palms at the end of a field. His voice softened. "But I'm not with him," he said.

He turned, faced a reporter and spoke loudly again. "In situations and times like this, I am bound to start yelling and shouting furiously," he said. "Don't think I am losing my mind."

He held his bloody hands before his face, to examine them. They were shaking. He made fists so tight his veins bulged. His forearms started to bounce.

"His name was Lance Cpl. Colin Smith," he said. "He said a prayer today right before we came out, too."

"Every time before we go out, we say a prayer," he said. "It is a prayer for serenity. It says a lot about things that do pertain to us in this kind of environment."

The only sounds were Doc's voice and the vehicle's engine thrumming.

He recited the prayer. There was a few moments of silence. "It's a platoon kind of thing, if you know what I mean," he said.

He listened to his radio headset and looked at Lance Corporal Tafoya, relaying word of the marines' movements. "Right now the grunts are performing a hard hit on a house," he said. He turned back to the subject of Lance Corporal Smith, 19.

DOJ_NMG_0089876

"The best news I can throw at anybody right now, and that I am throwing to myself as often as I can, is that his eyes were O.K.," he said. "They were both responsive. And he was breathing. And he had a pulse."

He listened to his radio. "Two houses they've hit so far have both been swept and cleared."

He looked at the reporter beside him. "Do you pray?" he asked. "Do that. I'd appreciate it."

After a few minutes he started talking again. "You see, having a good platoon, one that you know real well, it's both a gift and a curse. And Smith? Smith has been with me since I was..."

He stopped. "He was my roommate before we left," he said.

He refilled his lungs and raised his voice. "His dad was his best friend," he said. "He's got the cutest little blond girlfriend, and she freaks out every time we call because she's so happy to hear from him."

He sat quietly again. A few minutes passed. "The first casualty we had here — his name was James Hirlston — he was his good friend."

"Hirlston got shot in the head, too," he said.

He said something about Iraqi snipers that could not be printed here.

Then he was back to the subject of Lance Corporal Smith.

"I really thank God that he was breathing when I got to him, because it means that I can do something with him," he said. "It helps. People ask you, 'What are you doing? What are you doing?' It helps, because if he's breathing, you're doing something."

There had been many Iraqi civilians outside a few minutes before the sniper made his shot. Most of them had disappeared. Now an Iraqi woman walked calmly between the sniper and the marines, as if nothing had happened.

She passed down the street.

Petty Officer Kirby began to list the schools he had attended to be ready for this moment. Some he had paid for himself, he said, to be extra-prepared.

In one course, an advanced trauma treatment program he had taken before deploying, he said, the instructors gave each corpsman an anesthetized pig.

"The idea is to work with live tissue," he said. "You get a pig and you keep it alive. And every time I did something to help him, they would wound him again. So you see what shock does, and what happens when more wounds are received by a wounded creature."

"My pig?" he said. "They shot him twice in the face with a 9-millimeter pistol, and then six times with an AK-47 and then twice with a 12-gauge shotgun. And then he was set on fire."

"I kept him alive for 15 hours," he said. "That was my pig."

"That was my pig," he said.

He paused. "Smith is my friend."

He looked at his bloody hands. "You got some water?" he said. "I want some water. I just want to wash my wedding band."

He listened to the tactical radio. The platoon was sweeping houses but could not find the sniper.

The company started to move. It stopped at another house. The marines were questioning five Iraqi men. Doc watched from the road, waiting for the next call.

"I would like to say that I am a good man," he said. "But seeing this now, what happened to Smith, I want to hurt people. You know what I mean?"

The marines had not fired a shot.

They took one of the men into custody, mounted their vehicles and drove back to Outpost Omar, their company base, passing knots of Iraqi civilians on the way. The civilians looked at them coldly.

Inside the wire, First Lt. Scott R. Burlison, the company commander, gathered the group and told them that Lance Corporal Smith was alive and in surgery. He was critical, but stable. They hoped to fly him to Germany.

Doc had scrubbed himself clean. A big marine stepped forward with a small Bible, and the platoon huddled. He began with Psalm 91, verses 5 and 11.

"Thou shall not be afraid for the terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day," said the big marine, Lance Cpl. Daniel B. Nicholson. "For he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways."

DOJ_NMG_0089877

Then he asked for the Lord to look after Lance Corporal Smith and whatever was ahead, and to take care of everyone who was still in the platoon.

"Help us Lord," he said. "We need your help. It's the only way we're going to get through this."

Doc stood in the corner, his arm looped over a marine. "Amen," he said. There were some hugs, and then the marines and their Doc went back to their bunks and their guns.

Same Old Demons (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

Policy makers are again considering fundamental changes in our Iraq policy, but as they do I hope they read Elie Kedourie's essay, "The Kingdom of Iraq: A Retrospect."

Kedourie, a Baghdad-born Jew, published the essay in 1970. It's a history of the regime the British helped establish over 80 years ago, but it captures an idea that is truer now than ever: Disorder is endemic to Iraq. Today's crisis is not three years old. It's worse now, but the crisis is perpetual. This is a bomb of a nation.

"Brief as it is, the record of the kingdom of Iraq is full of bloodshed, treason and rapine," Kedourie wrote.

And his is a Gibbonesque tale of horror. There is the endless Shiite-Sunni fighting. There is a massacre of the Assyrians, which is celebrated rapturously in downtown Baghdad. Children are gunned down from airplanes. Tribal wars flare and families are destroyed. A Sunni writer insults the Shiites and the subsequent rioters murder students and policemen. A former prime minister is found on the street by a mob, killed, and his body is reduced to pulp as cars run him over in joyous retribution.

Kedourie described "a country riven by obscure and malevolent factions, unsettled by the war and its aftermath." He observed, "The collapse of the old order had awakened vast cupidities and revived venomous hatreds."

In 1927, a British officer asked a tribal leader: "You now have a government, a constitution, a parliament, ministers and officials — what more can you want?" The tribal leader replied, "Yes, but they speak with a foreign accent."

The British tried to encourage responsible Iraqi self-government, to no avail. "The political ambitions of the Shia religious headquarters have always lain in the direction of theocratic domination," a British official reported in 1923. They "have no motive for refraining from sacrificing the interests of Iraq to those which they conceive to be their own."

At one point, the British high commissioner, Sir Henry Dobbs, argued that if Britain threatened to withdraw its troops, Iraqis would behave more responsibly. It didn't work. Iraqis figured the Brits were bugging out. They concluded it was profitless to cultivate British friendship. Everything the British said became irrelevant.

The Iraq of his youth, Kedourie concluded, "was a make-believe kingdom built on false pretenses." He quoted a British report from 1936, which noted that the Iraqi government would never be a machine based on law that treated citizens impartially, but would always be based on tribal favoritism and personal relationships. Iraq, Kedourie said, faced two alternatives: "Either the country would be plunged into chaos or its population should become universally the clients and dependents of an omnipotent but capricious and unstable government." There is, he wrote, no third option.

Today Iraq is in much worse shape. The most perceptive reports describe not so much a civil war as a complete social disintegration. This latest descent was initiated by American blunders, but is exacerbated by the same old Iraqi demons: greed, blood lust and a mind-boggling unwillingness to compromise for the common good, even in the face of self-immolation.

The core problem is the same one Kedourie identified decades ago. Iraq is teetering on the edge of futility. Perhaps a competent occupation could have preserved it as a coherent entity, but now the Iraqi national identity is looking like a suicidal self-delusion.

Partitioning the country would be traumatic, so after the election it probably makes sense to make one last effort to hold the place together. Fire Donald Rumsfeld to signal a break with the past. Alter troop rotations so that 30,000 more troops are policing Baghdad.

But if that does not restore order, if Iraqi ministries remain dysfunctional and the national institutions remain sectarian institutions in disguise, then surely it will be time to accede to reality. It will be time to effectively end Iraq, with a remaining fig-leaf central government or not. It will be time to radically diffuse authority down to the only communities that are viable — the clan, tribe or sect.

DOJ_NMG_0089878

A muscular U.S. military presence will be more necessary than ever, to deter neighboring powers and contain bloodshed. And the goals will remain the same: to nurture civilized democratic societies that reject extremism and terror.

But the boundaries may have to change. The war was an attempt to lift a unified Iraq out of its awful history, but history has proved stubborn. It's time to adjust the plans to reality.

Hadley Travels To Afghanistan After Iraq (AP-Y)

AP, November 2, 2006

President Bush's national security adviser arrived in Afghanistan Wednesday after wrapping up two days of meetings in Iraq aimed at soothing tension with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley traveled to Kabul for meetings with Afghan President Hamid Karzai and senior military leaders. A joint NATO-Afghan force has stepped up patrols in areas where insurgents are active to increase security in the country.

Perino said Hadley, who made the trip unannounced as a security precaution, "had two days of good meetings in Iraq." His visit came as al-Maliki was trying to assert authority with the Americans, most recently with Tuesday's orders to lift joint U.S.-Iraqi military checkpoints around the Shiite militant stronghold of Sadr City and other parts of Baghdad.

Al-Maliki has repeatedly said the United States was trying to impose timelines for progress without first seeking his approval. At one point, he said he was a friend of the United States, but "I am not America's man in Iraq." The White House has sought to down play any serious dispute and said Hadley was not on a fence-mending mission.

Stop Calling It The 'War On Terror' (LAT)

By Timothy Garton Ash

The Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

WHETHER or not a formal post-mortem into the Iraq war is launched by a newly Democrat-controlled Congress after Tuesday's midterm elections, no one doubts that this has been a war, one without end. Yet one day it will end. Will we then still be at war? Were 9/11, Afghanistan, Iraq, the London bombings, Madrid, Bali and the rest all just pages of the opening chapter in a long saga called the War on Terror?

For all their criticisms of the way President Bush has waged the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, most Democrats don't challenge the central concept of the war on terror. They merely claim they could fight it better. Only a few intellectual Democrats, such as financier and philanthropist George Soros, insist that the very idea of the war on terror is, in his words, "a false metaphor."

Most Europeans, by contrast, agree with Soros. I have argued the same point. British military historian Sir Michael Howard was prescient in a brilliant article in Foreign Affairs titled "What's in a name?" and published just months after the 9/11 attacks. When then-Secretary of State Colin Powell declared that the U.S. was "at war" with terrorism, wrote Howard, "he made a very natural but terrible and irrevocable error." Apart from anything else, to use this language dignified the terrorists with the status of belligerents when they should have been treated as criminals. In a backhanded way, the coinage was itself a kind of glorification of terrorism.

Political words have consequences — especially when used by the most powerful nation on Earth — and one could plausibly suggest that much blood has flowed as a result of that choice of words.

It's clearly the case that after Sept. 11, 2001, when the administration said "war," it meant war in the familiar sense of trained people being commanded to go kill other people. In 2002, I asked a very senior administration official how this war on terror might end. He replied: "With the elimination of the terrorists." Yes, from the outset officials acknowledged that this was no longer war in the classic sense of two uniformed armies meeting on a field of battle. Yet the decision to make Iraq a central theater of the war on terror was, among other things, a kind of desperate reaching back to a more conventional kind of warfare that the mightiest army in the history of the world could clearly and swiftly win. Or so they thought.

In the last week, I have heard two powerful arguments for retaining the word "war" to describe the essential character of the age we're in. Lecturing in Oxford, Philip Bobbitt, the American historian and author of "The Shield of Achilles," and Matthew d'Ancona, editor of the conservative British weekly the Spectator, both insisted that we should not throw out the baby of the "war on terror" with the bathwater of Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0089879

Both counter-posed the notion of war to that of combating crime, favored by many liberal Europeans. Yes, bad mistakes were made in Iraq, said D'Ancona, but the very nature of this war is so new that it was inevitable that big mistakes would be made. The new terrible trio of rogue states, weapons of mass destruction and international terrorism cannot be beaten by the old Cold War trio of containment, deterrence and nonproliferation. Terrorists are waging a long-term psychological war, aimed at reducing us to a state of terror. This is not the Cold War, said D'Ancona, it's the cold-sweat war.

Bobbitt, meanwhile, talked of no less than three wars on terror: against global-networked terrorists, against the proliferation of WMD and against large-scale natural and non-natural assaults on civilian infrastructure, from earthquakes and the consequences of global warming to genocide and ethnic cleansing. That just about covers all the bases.

Both made some strikingly similar claims, far removed from the initial gung-ho rhetoric of Bush, Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld. This, D'Ancona and Bobbitt insisted, is a long-term, generational struggle, which requires patience as much as patriotism. Neither had a good word to say for Guantanamo Bay or Abu Ghraib. Both agreed that this war has to be fought within a framework of international law — which, however, must be adjusted to the new circumstances. And they emphasized the new context of what Bobbitt calls "market states," in which citizens have become like consumers, with governments behaving like nervous company boards. Does the consumer not like the product? Withdraw it from the shelves at once. Our presence in Iraq, said D'Ancona, is being treated like a listed company whose shares on the stock exchange are in free fall.

These are important points, which a segment of the British and European left has already taken onboard.

They failed to convince me, however, that the term "war on terror" should not be thrown out. It wasn't a good term to start with. Whatever the might-have-beens, it's now inextricably associated with a discredited U.S. policy and a disastrous real war in Iraq. What would we lose by dropping it?

However, then we need an alternative. It might be better if international terrorists were treated as international criminals, but the overall metaphor of crime is not up to the job. A word that keeps popping up is "struggle." In substance, that's about right. This is a long-term struggle against multiple threats to free and open societies.

But the word "struggle" has its own baggage. It really won't do in German; not since "Mein Kampf" anyway. In English — English English, that is — it has a faint echo of people handing out copies of Socialist Worker on street corners. No, I can't see President John McCain or Hillary Clinton taking up "the struggle." So I'm struggling to find a better term. Ideas, anyone?

DOJ:

Attorney General Makes Surprise Lecture At Law School (HATCHET)

By Brandon Butler

George Washington University Hatchet, November 2, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made a surprise visit to a Law School class Tuesday and spoke about U.S. policy in the war on terror.

Students in the Law School's criminal procedure class were surprised to see the special guest speaker in Stockton Hall Tuesday. Associate professor of law Renee Lerner teaches the class and is an acquaintance of Gonzales'. The two worked together when she was at the Department of Justice and he served as White House counsel.

"When he walked in there was a definitive gasp," Lerner said. "The students were happily surprised to see him."

The attorney general spent about 15 minutes talking about issues such as the USA PATRIOT Act, wiretapping and military tribunals. Then, for about 35 minutes he answered questions from the 40 students in the class.

Lerner said Gonzales had a "very warm and inviting manner" when speaking with the students, whom she said responded well to the visit.

"Several students mentioned it was good to hear from someone who is directly involved in legal questions they study in an academic setting," she said. "Some also mentioned how fortunate we are to be in Washington D.C. where we have access to such high-ranking officials."

Lerner said she arranged the visit a couple of months ago when Gonzales approached her because he wanted to guest lecture in a Law School class. She did not tell her students Gonzales would be joining the class, but assigned readings on the subjects he spoke about.

She said that in the late 1990s, she arranged a guest lecture from then special prosecutor Kenneth Starr who was investigating President Bill Clinton.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

H-P's Hurd Answers House Panel On Probe, Sheds Little New Light (WSJ)

By DON CLARK And PETER WALDMAN

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

There are a few lingering questions in the Hewlett-Packard Co. leak-investigation scandal. For the most part, Chief Executive Mark Hurd has answered them with a standard response: I don't remember.

Mr. Hurd yesterday submitted written answers to 16 questions that were put to him by a House subcommittee investigating the affair, following his Sept. 28 testimony before the subcommittee. The responses don't provide much new information.

The investigation into media leaks of boardroom discussions, which began in early 2005 at the behest of former Chairman Patricia Dunn, included the examination of private phone records of directors, journalists and others. Private investigators, working on behalf of H-P, obtained records using a technique called pretexting, which involves pretending to be the user of a particular phone account.

SEE MORE

1

Read Mark Hurd's written responses2 to the House subcommittee questions.

One unanswered question is exactly when Mr. Hurd learned that phone records were being examined. He attended portions of a July 22, 2005, meeting that discussed the first phase of the leak investigation, called Kona I, but in response to questions from the House subcommittee, he said he can't recall much about it.

"I cannot say that as of the July 22, 2005, meeting I understood that 'phone record information' was being obtained in connection with, or was assisting in the 'Kona I' phase of the investigation. At some point, I did come to understand that telephone-call information was being used," Mr. Hurd said in a response to the subcommittee.

Mr. Hurd said, in retrospect, he wishes he had been more focused on the "investigatory methodologies" used in the probe. He said he "did not think that anything improper might have been done" until much later, after Thomas Perkins resigned as a director in May 2006 and raised questions about the investigation.

"Unfortunately, I was not focused on the issue, so I did not dive into the details" of the investigation at the July 22, 2005, meeting, Mr. Hurd wrote.

Other evidence, indicates Mr. Hurd was indeed focused on media leaks during this period. In two separate speeches to H-P employees within days of his July 22, 2005, briefing on the leaks investigation, Mr. Hurd upbraided H-P workers for leaking corporate information to the media before H-P had formally disclosed it. In one of those speeches, Mr. Hurd called media leaks "reprehensible and unacceptable," and promised to "deal with [the leakers] appropriately." He said, "It is absolutely unacceptable that information does not stay in the company and that we have people that can't behave like adults."

Other participants in the July 22, 2005, briefing on the leaks investigation have said phone records were indeed discussed. Tony Gentilucci, H-P's former chief of investigations -- who ran the Kona I probe -- told H-P's outside counsel in August 2006 that he briefed Mr. Hurd and other H-P officials at the July 22 meeting, and "that the issue of obtaining phone records came up." Mr. Gentilucci added that he didn't think the details of pretexting were discussed.

Kevin Huska, another H-P security official who attended the July 2005 meeting, told H-P's outside lawyers that he thought "the concept of obtaining phone records" was discussed, but he wasn't sure whether pretexting itself came up.

DOJ_NMG_0089881

And Ronald DeLia, the private investigator who led the leak probes for H-P, told H-P's outside lawyers that "any results" discussed at that July 2005 meeting, "would have had to include the results of the telephone research." Mr. DeLia said he didn't recall if Mr. Hurd was in the room for any discussion of phone records.

Several of the subcommittee's questions homed in on a remark that Mr. Hurd made to H-P's outside counsel in August of this year that he got the impression that H-P's investigators may have been obtaining phone records from some Web site. But he said he couldn't clarify whether he got that impression from the July meeting.

"I cannot say who made the remark about obtaining phone-record information off the Web or when that remark was made without speculating," Mr. Hurd wrote. "What I recall is that at some meeting someone mentioned getting phone-record information off of the Web and thinking there must be some sort of Web site with this information."

When Ms. Dunn gave similar testimony at the subcommittee hearing in late September, she was ridiculed by some House members, who found her belief that private phone records were publicly available to be implausible.

The subcommittee asked Mr. Hurd to explain his understanding of a PowerPoint slide presented at the July 2005 meeting, which said "intelligence" had been obtained that indicated one H-P director "appears to have contacted" certain journalists.

In response, Mr. Hurd wrote that he didn't recall any discussion at the July 2005 meeting of "what 'intelligence' meant or what specific types of 'intelligence' had been obtained."

The subcommittee's written questions focused only on the Kona I investigation. An H-P spokesman said Mr. Hurd is expected to respond to a second set of questions from the subcommittee within the next 30 days.

Last month, Ms. Dunn, Mr. DeLia and three other people were charged by California prosecutors with criminal fraud and conspiracy stemming from H-P's spying. All have professed innocence. Ms. Dunn was forced to resign as an H-P director. Messrs. Gentilucci and Huska were not charged with any crimes; Mr. Gentilucci resigned from H-P. Mr. Hurd was named to the additional post of H-P chairman, succeeding Ms. Dunn.

Sorin To Plead Guilty In Comverse Backdating Case (WSJ)

By PAUL DAVIES And MARK MAREMONT

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

The former general counsel of Comverse Technology Inc. is expected to plead guilty today to one count of criminal conspiracy in connection with an options-backdating scheme, according to people familiar with the matter.

William F. Sorin, a Harvard-educated lawyer who was at Comverse for more than two decades, would be the second former executive of the telecommunications-software firm to plead guilty. The company's former chief financial officer, David Kreinberg, entered a guilty plea last week.

Mr. Sorin, 57 years old, is scheduled to have a hearing at 12:30 p.m. EST today before Judge Nicholas Garaufis in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn, N.Y. He was charged in August with conspiracy to commit mail fraud, securities fraud and wire fraud and is expected to plead to one conspiracy count. The maximum time in prison for that charge is five years.

The main target in the case, former Comverse Chief Executive Kobi Alexander, fled the country ahead of the charges and was arrested in September in Namibia after an international manhunt. An Israeli citizen and U.S. resident, Mr. Alexander is fighting extradition requests by the U.S. government, which has charged him in a 35-count indictment with securities fraud, bribery and other crimes. His attorneys have said he will contest the charges if and when he returns to the U.S.

Mr. Kreinberg is cooperating with the government, and in pleading guilty last week he claimed Mr. Alexander was the mastermind of a stock-options backdating scheme at Comverse that secretly boosted pay for top executives and caused the company to inflate its net income. Mr. Sorin has been in plea discussions with prosecutors in the Eastern District of New York, who declined to comment on whether he also will cooperate against Mr. Alexander.

Comverse is one of more than 130 companies being investigated by federal authorities for manipulating their options to benefit insiders. Options allow recipients to buy stock at a preset exercise price, generally set at the market price on the day they were granted. Backdating involves pretending that an option was granted on an earlier date when the market price was lower, thus conveying extra potential profit to the recipient.

In charging Mr. Sorin in August, federal authorities claimed that he, in effect, had tricked compensation committee members of Comverse's board into approving the backdated grants, by getting them to sign documents with the bogus grant dates already filled in.

5 Workers Charged With Conspiracy & Security Fraud (KCBS)

KCBS-TV, CBS 2, Los Angeles, November 2, 2006

(CBS) LOS ANGELES Five men who worked for a San Diego brokerage took secret commissions for selling stocks their firm had bought cheaply and that their superiors wanted to run up in value, a prosecutor told a jury Wednesday.

The brokerage, Hampton Porter Investment Bankers, shut its doors abruptly in 2001, U.S. Justice Department attorney Kathleen McGovern told a federal jury in Los Angeles.

The five, Bryan Laurienti, Michael Losse, David Montesano, Curtiss Parker and Donald Samaria are charged with conspiracy and securities fraud in connection with the transactions, which typically involved thinly traded low-value stocks their firm had received at deep discounts, the prosecutor said.

The stocks were known as "house stocks." "They carried out this scheme by pushing house stocks on their clients, many of whom had no business being in these stocks," McGovern said her opening statement.

The owners of the brokerage, John Laurienti and Gregory Walker, have pleaded guilty and are cooperating with the prosecution of their former underlings, McGovern said.

Prosecutors allege that more than 100 of Hampton Porter's clients were bilked out of an estimated $5 million as the result of trades made between 1998 and 2000.

Once the clients bought the stocks, the prices would go up, and co-conspirators in the alleged scam would sell their shares for huge profits, according to the government.

In addition to the commissions the clients paid for trades, Hampton Porter paid the defendants special commissions of about 10 percent for selling the house stocks, which they were allowed to keep only if the clients didn't then sell the shares, prosecutors allege.

But Bryan Laurienti's attorney said her client did not conduct any trades clients did not request. He "wasn't answering to a contingent in the firm, who the prosecution has told you they know were crooks," defense lawyer Evan Jenness said.

Jenness said some of the clients who bought the house stocks "made a lot of money" very quickly.

Jenness also blamed the dot-com stock market crash for prompting some of the clients to decide they should not have been involved in risky trades.

Lawyer Marcia Brewer, who represents Curtiss Parker, contended John Laurienti and Walker kept their scam hidden from the underlings at Hampton Porter because they wanted to make the brokerage seem legitimate. The brokers were yelled at if they did not sell the house stocks, Brewer said.

Testimony in the case is expected to begin Thursday morning.

Prosecutors Are Prospering (HC)

By Kristen Hays

Houston Chronicle, November 2, 2006

Talent from the task force is moving on or moving up

The Enron scandal led former CEO Jeff Skilling to a lengthy prison sentence.

But it also led to lucrative moves to law firms, promotions or academic careers for several of the federal prosecutors who dogged him and other corporate crooks.

Two of the three prosecutors who headlined the trial of Skilling and former Enron Chairman Ken Lay have left government work for law firms with deep pockets. The third is considering options.

Several prosecutors have done the same, though others chose different paths after serving an Enron tour of duty.

Upon Skilling's sentencing last week to 24 years and four months in prison for 19 criminal counts, the Justice Department said its Enron Task Force was disbanding after nearly five years, more than 30 indictments, 16 guilty pleas and five trials with a mixed record of success.

Their experience in chasing crimes made task force members hot commodities to law firms offering big money, said Adam Gershowitz, a professor at the South Texas College of Law in Houston.

"They got a lot of recognition from it. That means the next time a major white-collar case comes along and people look down the Rolodex on who to hire, they may want one of these guys," he said.

Most white-collar work, such as internal company investigations, never reaches a courtroom, though companies pay a lot for such guidance, Gershowitz said. Ex-federal prosecutors "are a cash cow for some of these big law firms because white-collar is very lucrative."

Sean Berkowitz, the third director of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force since its inception in January 2002, left the government this week to switch sides. He cross-examined Skilling, challenging everything from the ex-CEO's truthfulness to whether he paid his taxes.

"I'll be accepting with a major law firm in the Chicago area as soon as this week," Berkowitz said Wednesday, declining to confirm the name. Several firms have reportedly pursued Berkowitz since the trial ended.

John Hueston, who brutally cross-examined Lay, will join Los Angeles firm Irell & Manella next week after wrapping up a two-week Enron speaking tour in China.

The third main prosecutor, task force deputy director Kathryn Ruemmler, confirmed Wednesday that she is exploring opportunities but hasn't decided what her next move will be.

Berkowitz said critics may decry prosecutors who bolted for lucrative private-sector jobs. But he said none knew when they joined the Justice Department that Enron would come along or whether prosecutions would be successful. And most federal prosecutions go unnoticed.

"If we had not performed well, obviously it would not have gone as well," he said. Enron "has allowed people on a national level to see the talent that exists within the ranks of the Department of Justice."

North and FleissSeveral top white-collar attorneys that Enron prosecutors have faced also were once federal prosecutors.

Those include John Keker, lead lawyer for former Enron finance chief Andrew Fastow, and Mark Holscher, a member of Skilling's legal team. Keker prosecuted Oliver North in the Iran-Contra scandal and Holscher prosecuted Hollywood madam Heidi Fleiss.

None of the Enron prosecutors served on the task force from its inception through to the Lay-Skilling convictions. They hailed from cities throughout the country, and the work often required months away from home.

The first director, Leslie Caldwell, left the task force in March 2004, shortly after Skilling was indicted but before Lay was. She joined Morgan Lewis in New York a few months later.

She said she has no regrets about missing the premier trial in the probe.

"I never intended to stay for the duration, only to get things focused and moving forward until at least the key players were addressed," she said. "And I knew the case was in great hands."

The deputy director who moved up to replace her, Andrew Weissmann, stayed longer than any other task force prosecutor before he stepped down in July 2005. For several months he served as special counsel to FBI Director Robert Mueller, and in March of this year he joined Jenner & Block in New York. Another ex-Enron prosecutor, Lisa Monaco, now advises Mueller.

"Doing a very sophisticated white-collar investigation prepares you for representing companies," Weissmann said. "Enron itself was the world's most complicated internal investigation."

Sam Buell chose academia after leaving the task force in early 2004 upon having secured an indictment against Skilling. He was a visiting professor for two years at the University of Texas School of Law, and this fall joined the faculty of Washington University School of Law in the St. Louis area.

He said he always expected to write and teach in his post-prosecutorial life.

"Enron was the ultimate case in terms of its challenging complexity and national importance, so there really wasn't a whole lot left for me to do in the Department of Justice after Enron that would excite me," Buell said.

Justice promotionsStill others have moved up in the Justice Department.

DOJ_NMG_0089884

• Cliff Stricklin, a former Texas state judge in Dallas who helped prosecute Skilling and Lay, in August was appointed first assistant to U.S. Attorney Troy Eid in Denver. He is to lead the prosecution team in the March insider trading trial of former Qwest Communications CEO Joseph Nacchio.

• Matthew Friedrich, who helped prosecute two trials, is counselor to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

• Ben Campbell, who led the prosecution team in the first broadband trial last year, succeeded Friedrich as acting chief of staff and principal deputy assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's criminal division.

• Van Vincent, who joined the task force in December to lead the retrial of two of the broadband executives this year, will begin a six-month detail in Iraq later this month as attorney adviser with the Justice Department's Regime Crimes Liaison Office in Baghdad. The organization helps the Iraqi High Tribunal with war crimes investigations and trials.

New York AG Presses Companies To Stop Paying Indicted Employees' Legal Bills (LAW)

By David Hechler, Corporate Counsel

Corporate Counsel, November 2, 2006

Federal prosecutors aren't the only ones putting the squeeze on corporate defendants, it turns out. Like the U.S. Department of Justice, New York state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer has also pressured companies to stop paying the legal fees of employees who face criminal charges. Spitzer appears to be the only state AG who has raised fee payment as an issue.

A handful of defense attorneys with clients indicted by Spitzer knew that he had demanded fee cutoffs. But the AG's tactics came as a surprise to several white-collar crime experts and leaders of the bar, including officials at the Association of Corporate Counsel, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers and the American Bar Association.

Most of Spitzer's targets are financial institutions swept up in his probe of mutual funds. According to a Corporate Counsel review of 17 agreements that Spitzer's office struck with companies accused of market timing, nine settlements included "no indemnification" clauses. These provisions prohibit a business from paying the legal fees of indicted employees unless its bylaws require it. In one instance, Bank of America Corp. agreed to a no-indemnification clause even though its bylaws require it to pay fees. Moreover, the bank had already begun advancing expenses in at least one case.

Spitzer's office declined to comment on the no-indemnification clauses. (Spitzer is running for governor of New York.)

The fee issue first garnered public attention in the Justice Department's prosecution of 16 former employees of KPMG for allegedly promoting and selling illegal tax shelters. In June the federal district court judge hearing the case ruled that Justice lawyers had unconstitutionally pressured KPMG to stop paying the legal bills of its ex-employees. Judge Lewis Kaplan wrote in his decision that the right of employees to have their companies pay their legal expenses "is as much a part of the bargain between employer and employee as salary or wages."

Though the fee cutoff question had come up in court before, Kaplan appears to be the first judge to issue a written ruling since the Justice Department issued its corporate prosecution guidelines in 2003. Known as the Thompson Memorandum, the guidelines instruct federal prosecutors to consider whether a company is paying its employees' legal bills when deciding whether to indict the business.

Spitzer has also taken an aggressive approach on fee payment, most often in mutual fund cases. Starting in 2003, the AG began investigating firms that engaged in market timing of their funds -- rapid trading that benefited favored clients to the detriment of long-term shareholders. It was a natural issue for Spitzer, since New York is the capital of the financial services industry. Believing that federal securities enforcement was lax, the AG resolved to go after perceived offenders himself. He was helped by a New York state securities law, the Martin Act, which allows prosecutors to win convictions without having to prove criminal intent.

To date, nine companies implicated in the market-timing probe have signed agreements with the AG that contain no-indemnification clauses. In virtually identical language in a section headed "Cooperation," the businesses are prohibited from paying expenses of "current or former directors, officers, employees, or agents," except where required by law or written agreement.

In addition to Bank of America, the companies that have agreed to this provision are Bank One Corp.; Federated Investors Inc.; Pilgrim Baxter & Associates Ltd.; RS Investment Management Inc.; Strong Capital Management Co.; Alliance Capital

DOJ_NMG_0089885

Management Corp.; AIM Advisors Inc. and Invesco Funds Group, which are affiliated; and Waddell & Reed Financial Inc., which signed the most recent agreement, in July.

One corporate defense attorney who challenged Spitzer on fee payments is C. Evan Stewart of New York's Zuckerman Spaeder. Stewart represents former Bank of America financial adviser Theodore Sihpol III, who was indicted by Spitzer's office in 2004. Though Bank of America's bylaws required it to pay its employees' legal fees, Stewart says he had to sue the company to force the issue.

According to Sihpol's complaint, filed in Delaware Chancery Court in 2003, his attorney was told by a Bank of America lawyer that it had decided to "cooperate fully" with Spitzer's office, and any "request for advancement of [legal] expenses by Mr. Sihpol would be vetted with the attorney general." After the bank's lawyers submitted a written request to Spitzer's office, they later told Sihpol that expenses would not be advanced. But shortly before the suit was scheduled to go to trial, Bank of America agreed to pay.

In Stewart's view, the denial of fees is "fundamentally a denial of due process." He explains, "You're taking away the ability of people to defend themselves." A lawyer for Bank of America did not respond to a request for comment. In July 2005 a Manhattan jury acquitted Sihpol on 29 of 33 charges, deadlocking on the others. Three months later, the AG dropped those charges too.

Spitzer has aggressively pushed the fee issue in at least one other case. Last year his office sued Soundview Health Center to require that its indicted executives post a bond before it could could pay their attorneys' fees. Spitzer wanted to ensure that employees at the New York-based nonprofit health care provider who had been charged with misusing state funds would personally repay their legal expenses if they were eventually convicted.

Soundview's lawyer, Susan Necheles of New York's Hafetz & Necheles, says she had never heard of a prosecutor demanding a bond in such circumstances. "The attorney general was trying to squeeze people into cooperating with the investigation," Necheles says. "They were trying to cut off fees so people couldn't defend themselves." The state court judge denied Spitzer's demand. The employees eventually pleaded guilty to lesser offenses and still work at Soundview, Necheles says.

Defense lawyer Stewart hopes prosecutors at both the state and federal level will have a change of heart about fee payments after the KPMG ruling, but he isn't sanguine about it. "The optimist in me says I hope so, but I remain skeptical," he says. "I think the government will use every power it has at its disposal to do what it thinks is necessary."

Halliburton Says It Will Agree To SEC's Request For More Time For Bribery Investigation (FINDLAW/AP)

By Marcy Gordon, Ap Business Writer

AP, November 2, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Halliburton Co. has said it will agree to the Securities and Exchange Commission's request for more time to investigate possible bribery and corruption in connection with the company's natural gas operations in Nigeria.

The oilfield services conglomerate disclosed the SEC's recent request for a so-called tolling agreement in a regulatory filing on Tuesday. Such an accord will put off the time when the legal clock started running, or tolling, on the case under the statute of limitations - generally five years for such investigations.

The agreement also gives Houston-based Halliburton more time to make its case to the SEC against possible civil charges under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act or to work out a settlement with the agency. The act makes it unlawful to bribe foreign government officials or company executives to obtain or retain business.

"In September 2006, the SEC requested that we enter into a tolling agreement with respect to its investigation. We anticipate that we will enter into an appropriate tolling agreement with the SEC," Halliburton said in its filing.

SEC spokesman John Nester declined comment Wednesday.

Both the SEC and the Justice Department have been investigating an alleged $180 million (â,¬141 million) bribery scheme in Nigeria involving the predecessor company of Halliburton engineering and construction subsidiary Kellogg, Brown & Root and three other companies - from France, Italy and Japan. The allegations center on a contract for a $4 billion (currently â,¬3.1 billion) Nigerian liquefied natural gas plant that was awarded in 1995 to a consortium of the four companies.

DOJ_NMG_0089886

Halliburton fired two consultants, including former KBR chairman A. Jack Stanley, for violating the company's business code of conduct by receiving "improper personal benefits" related to the consortium's construction of the Nigerian plant.

A former KBR employee has asked Congress to investigate what he claims are Halliburton's efforts to cover up violations of the anti-corruption law and to mislead federal investigators.

David A. Smith said in a filing with the SEC in September that he mistakenly received e-mails from a company attorney on how to handle federal investigations - notes he says were intended for David R. Smith, a vice president with Halliburton's tax group.

The e-mails, he said, focused on how Halliburton would defend itself against bribery charges.

David A. Smith, who says he owns a single share of Halliburton's common stock said in his SEC filing that David R. Smith "was being asked to weigh in on how to explain away the source of the bribes paid to Nigerian officials."

Halliburton has said that Smith's allegations are groundless.

The company, whose chief executive was Vice President Dick Cheney from 1995 to 2000, has been criticized since the beginning of the war in Iraq in connection with multibillion-dollar government contracts.

In a report released last month, the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction found that KBR, which provides food, shelter and other logistics to U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan, abused federal rules to conceal details of its contract performance.

On the Net:

Securities and Exchange Commission: http://www.sec.gov

Halliburton Co.: http://www.halliburton.com

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge May Allow Abramoff To Be Sentenced In Washington (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, November 2, 2006

The imminent surrender of superlobbyist-turned-superinformant Jack Abramoff on a South Florida fraud conviction is eclipsing his starring role in a Washington corruption probe.

Abramoff is set to turn himself in on Nov. 15 to serve about six years in prison for lying to obtain a $60 million bank loan to buy a fleet of South Florida gambling ships.

Now, Justice Department lawyers and Abramoff's attorneys are rushing to have the once-powerful Republican insider sentenced two days later on a separate corruption conviction.

That way, they say, he can be imprisoned near Washington to continue to inform the government on dozens of lawmakers under investigation. Abramoff faces between 9 and 11 years in prison.

This week, U.S. District Judge Ellen S. Huvelle might consider their request for the Nov. 17 sentencing in Washington.

Justice Department prosecutors fear that if Abramoff ends up being incarcerated hundreds of miles from the nation's capital, their complex influence-peddling probe would be seriously hampered or indefinitely stalled.

The reason: Abramoff would not be as readily available to make sense of thousands of sensitive documents, e-mails, computer files and other potentially incriminating records for investigators. While he has been free on bond, he has been working around the clock as an informant for the Justice Department.

The investigation, which is likely to affect next week's congressional midterm elections, has already netted a half-dozen Washington lobbyists and GOP Congressman Bob Ney of Ohio.

The Washington probe's fate may come down to the timing of Abramoff's two sentencings.

U.S. District Judge Paul Huck, who has granted Abramoff three surrender extensions since his sentencing in late March, won't budge anymore.

DOJ_NMG_0089887

"My main concern is, there comes a time when people have to pay the piper, so to speak," Huck said at a late September hearing in a Miami federal court. ``I think that time has come."

Breach At Lab Called Significant (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian

Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

More classified information from Los Alamos nuclear facility was found in the police raid of a residential trailer than was first disclosed, sources say.

A significantly larger amount of classified information from a nuclear weapons laboratory in New Mexico was discovered in a residential trailer during a police search on Oct. 17 than was disclosed by law enforcement officials, sources close to the investigation said Wednesday.

The search turned up a number of copies of classified documents from Los Alamos National Laboratory in the trailer park where a former employee lived.

Law enforcement officials last week had described finding only three electronic storage devices, known as memory sticks or thumb drives, inside the trailer. It was unclear whether the employee had knowingly removed secret material and placed it on the drives.

The discovery of the documents heightened concerns that the removal of classified information from the laboratory was not purely accidental, according to the sources, who asked not to be identified because they were not authorized to make public statements.

Spokesmen for the laboratory and the Department of Energy said they would not comment about the classified documents, noting that the matter was in the hands of the FBI.

An FBI spokesman in New Mexico said the agency did not comment on ongoing investigations.

But it was clear that federal officials had grown concerned about the security breach.

Deputy Energy Secretary Clay Sell and National Nuclear Security Administration chief Linton F. Brooks went to Los Alamos this week to assess the breach and oversee the administrative probe into how the classified information was removed.

The facility has a long history of security and safety breaches. After new management was installed by the Energy Department this year, top officials had hoped the problems were solved. But the current incident is "one of the utmost concern," according to lab director Michael Anastasio.

Despite plans to eliminate most, if not all, of the access that employees have to transfer data from classified computers to removable storage devices, a significant ability still exists to place documents on disks and drives that can be taken from the lab, according to one official.

The existence of a larger amount of classified data at the trailer was first disclosed by Nuclear Watch New Mexico, a watchdog group in Santa Fe, which said it had obtained a detailed summary of a laboratory briefing.

Portions of the information were independently corroborated by The Times.

The summary indicated that police had found 228 documents with information printed on both sides, including classified intelligence and weapons data.

The computer thumb drives contained 408 separate classified documents.

Those numbers could not be independently verified, but sources told The Times it was a "large amount of information."

The documents originated in a classified data vault in the lab's dynamic experiments division, which conducts tests on nuclear weapons components, the summary said.

When Los Alamos police arrived at the trailer in response to neighbors' report of a fight, they found Justin Stone, 20, who was wanted on a probation violation, according to a police report.

Stone was hiding in the trailer owned by former laboratory archivist Jessica Quintana, and agreed to come out only after police promised he could smoke a cigarette before being placed under arrest.

A search of the trailer turned up a sizable amount of drug paraphernalia associated with methamphetamine use, and the classified data. Stone remains in custody.

DOJ_NMG_0089888

Quintana, 22, later admitted to police that one of the glass drug pipes was hers, according to the police report. She has not been charged.

Quintana's attorney, Stephen Aarons, told New Mexico newspapers that Quintana did not know the significance of the information on the thumb drives.

Karen Weldon's Ties To Serbs Detailed (PHI)

By Mark Fazlollah And John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 2, 2006

As her father the congressman publicly supported a Serbian family with close ties to war criminal Slobodan Milosevic, lobbyist Karen Weldon in 2003 won a $240,000 contract to help improve the family's image.

Her relationship with the Karic family continued into late 2004, months after the House ethics committee began an investigation of her contracts and the role of her father, Rep. Curt Weldon (R., Pa.), The Inquirer has learned.

A newly obtained State Department cable shows that she tried to help the wife of Serbian tycoon Bogoljub Karic get a visa to visit Florida. The State Department - noting the request came from a congressman's daughter - opposed the visa, citing links to "terrorist activities."

"Karic wanted the visa to try to make himself respectable," recalled Ambassador Richard Gelbard, who was President Bill Clinton's personal envoy to the Balkans. "Getting a U.S. visa is like getting the Good Housekeeping Seal of Approval."

Bogoljub Karic has been on the lam since being charged in February with embezzling Serbian state funds. The Karics were once referred to as "the Rockefellers of Serbia."

The FBI is now investigating Karen Weldon's work for the Karics and other clients, trying to determine whether Curt Weldon used his position to help her win contracts.

Curt Weldon, who also repeatedly tried to persuade the State Department to grant visas to the Karic family, has said that his daughter never lobbied him and that he has not violated any ethics rules.

A lawyer for Curt Weldon, William J. Winning, said that the "cable doesn't say anything about what Congressman Weldon did or didn't do, or that he even knew about it."

"I think it's extremely disturbing that we've had a series of bureaucratic leaks so close to the election that are obviously calculated to undermine Congressman Weldon," Winning said. "That strikes me as being particularly unfair."

The lawyer for Karen Weldon, James J. Rohn, declined to comment on the cable. Speaking generally about the investigation, Rohn said: "I've reached out to the government and offered our cooperation."

Prosecutors declined to comment.

The investigation became public Oct. 13, in the last weeks of a tough reelection fight for Weldon, a 10-term Republican from Delaware County.

On Oct. 16, FBI agents raided Karen Weldon's home in Philadelphia and office in Media. Agents also raided the Florida office of Itera International, a Russian energy giant that has paid about $500,000 to Solutions Worldwide for public-relations work, and whose employees have contributed $20,000 to Curt Weldon.

Gelbard said he twice met with Karic in an unsuccessful attempt to get him to disavow Milosevic. When he refused, the United States took away Karic's visa in 1999.

"We tried to use the visa as leverage," Gelbard said. "When he wouldn't help, we got the Europeans to revoke his visa also."

Both Weldons have long-standing relationships with the Karic family. He tried to help them as a congressman; she promoted them as a public-relations agent.

In 2003, Weldon unsuccessfully lobbied U.S. diplomats and immigration officials to allow Dragomir Karic, Bogoljub's brother, to enter this country as the congressman's guest at the annual National Prayer Breakfast in Washington.

Later that year, Weldon led a congressional delegation to Serbia to meet with Bogoljub Karic and the Serb's trade group.

Weldon has acknowledged that he has reviewed extensive - and unflattering - U.S. intelligence reports about the Karic family's ties with Milosevic.

"They told me that he and his brothers owned Milosevic, that they owned the banking system," Weldon said in a 2002 hearing before his House Armed Services Committee, speaking of conversations with U.S. Army intelligence officers.

"... The wives of the Karic brothers were best of friends with Milosevic's wife," Weldon told the committee. "The Karic brothers actually owned the house Milosevic lived in that we bombed."

Weldon came to change his mind about the Karics, and to believe they were humanitarians who were bullied into supporting Milosevic, a former staffer told the Los Angeles Times.

Karen Weldon's firm received a $20,000-a-month contract from the Karic family foundation in March 2003 to burnish the Karics' image and help them establish a "Serbia House" in Washington.

The State Department cable was posted by the U.S. Embassy in Belgrade on Oct. 15, 2004. It included a paragraph about Karen Weldon's efforts on behalf of Bogoljub Karic's wife, Milanka.

"An invitation letter was submitted from Karen Weldon, daughter of Congressman Curt Weldon," the document says. It noted that Bogoljub Karic is "ineligible under 212(a)(3)(B) (Terrorism Activities)."

"Mrs. Karic is in the lookout system as a '00' hit," the document says, a designation used for a person believed to be involved in criminal activity, according to State Department officials. A former senior diplomat said that Bogoljub Karic was suspected of money-laundering and gun-running.

Milosevic, who died in prison this year while on trial before the U.N. war-crimes tribunal at the Hague, was indicted in 1999 for ethnic cleansing during the 1990s Balkans war.

State Department officials said they could not comment on whether Milanka Karic received the visa.

The House ethics committee began investigating Karen Weldon's contracts in March 2004, after the Los Angeles Times report.

Curt Weldon has said he was cleared by that investigation. He has declined to release the committee's letter, which was issued in late September.

Karen Weldon owns a firm called Solutions Worldwide with partner Charles P. Sexton Jr., a top Delaware County Republican leader. Joseph Fioravanti, a lawyer for Sexton, said he could not comment, adding that he did not recall any details of the firm's work for the Karics.

U.S. diplomats have used the "terrorist activity" label to block visas for people as varied as Iran's hard-line president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, members of the Palestine Liberation Organization, and Venezuela's Supreme Court president, Omar Mora.

Powerful Republican Enters A Dogfight Over Lobbying Link (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington

Financial Times, November 2, 2006

In the high-stakes world of US lobbying, the Pennsylvanian town of Media is an unlikely power base for one of Europe's biggest defence manufacturers.

But in June 2005, Oto Melara, a division of Italy's Finmeccanica, turned to Cecelia Grimes, a property agent-turned lobbyist based in the quiet suburban town, to lobby on the company's behalf on crucial congressional defence appropriations decisions.

At first glance the decision to hire Ms Grimes, who runs her firm Grimes & Young from home, was an odd one. The lobbyist, who is known as "Cece", did not have the credentials of a seasoned Washington power player, unlike the company's former lobbyist, David Bates, who had served as an aide to President George Bushsenior.

But Ms Grimes did have at least one influential friend from the state in the US Congress: Curt Weldon. Today, Mr Weldon, a 10-term congressman who is the number two Republican on the powerful House armed services committee, is in a fight for his political life ahead of next week's mid-term elections.

In an election year that has been tough for Republicans across the country because of the unpopularity of the war in Iraq and a host of corruption scandals in the capital, Mr Weldon's campaign battle has been made more difficult by allegations that the lawmaker used his political weight to steer lobbying work to friends such as Ms Grimes and his own daughter, Karen, who heads the lobbying firm Solutions North America.

DOJ_NMG_0089890

Last month, the FBI raided Ms Weldon's home and lobbying firm and the Florida headquarters of Itera, a Russian natural gas company that was championed by the congressman and was one of Ms Weldon's most lucrative clients.

According to a report in the Washington Post, prosecutors have already empanelled a grand jury on the Weldon case, and have obtained evidence through wiretaps on Washington-based mobile phones.

While it is unclear whether the investigation by federal prosecutors is limited to questions about the Weldon family's links to Itera, the probe has put Mr Weldon's other activities - including his support of Finmeccanica - under the microscope. It has also raised new questions about the fine line that regulates dealings between corporate lobbyists, lawmakers and the companies they advocate following the scandal involving the convicted "super-lobbyist" Jack Abramoff.

The Pennsylvania lawmaker has defended his record and said he believed the FBI's investigation was politically motivated.

Whatever the outcome of the probe, Mr Weldon's broad support for Finmeccanica has undoubtedly helped the company make inroads in the lucrative market for US defence projects. The support also appears to have bolstered the congressman's hometown district, which was chosen by Oto Melara in 2004 as a site for a new plant.

That same year Mr Weldon convinced the US Navy to reconsider a gun manufactured by Oto Melara, the Super Rapid 76mm, even though contractors had already chosen a gun made by United Defense, another manufacturer. At the time Mr Weldon said he was confident that giving Oto Melara "a fair chance" to bid for the project would lead to a "major investment" in the company's product.

One year later AgustaWestland, which is 50 per cent owned by Finmeccanica, won with Lockheed-Martin a $1.7bn (€1.4bn, £895m) contract to build the presidential helicopter, Marine One.

Although the award of the contract was seen at the time as a gesture of gratitude by the US to the government of Silvio Berlusconi, then Italian prime minister, for his support for the Iraq war, Aviation Week, a defence publication, noted the friendship between Mr Weldon and Pier Francesco Guarguaglini, Finmeccanica's chief executive. Mr Weldon's other daughter, Kim, was retained by AgustaWestland last year.

Russ Caso, a top aide to the lawmaker, denies Mr Weldon helped AgustaWestland to clinch the helicopter deal or that the company hired Kim Weldon to win favour with the congressman.

The Italian defence group said it had not been contacted by federal investigators and said it did not "seem" to be involved in the investigation. The company said it hired Ms Grimes last year after the chief executive of the subsidiary's US division, Howard Goldberg, met the lobbyist and was impressed by her "local expertise" in the Philadelphia market.

The statement contrasts with Ms Grimes's own lobbying disclosure forms, which indicate she lobbied lawmakers in Washington. Ms Grimes did not respond to requests for comment by the Financial Times, but she told the Los Angeles Times this year that her clients picked her firm over other Washington lobby groups because she was more affordable.

She also denied her clients liked her lobbying firm because of her friendship with Mr Weldon, whom she has known for 15 years.

Women's Testimony Continues At FCI Trial (TALLDEM)

By Chitra Subramanyam, DEMOCRAT STAFF WRITER

Tallahassee Democrat, November 2, 2006

One by one, women walked into a federal courtroom Wednesday to testify against two correctional officers charged in a sex-with-prisoners conspiracy on Day Three of their trial.

Ten women, some in suits and others in chains and prison uniforms, described their encounters with the two men at the Federal Correctional Institution in Tallahassee.

Alan Moore and Gregory Dixon are two of five FCI officers arrested June 21. A sixth officer, Ralph Hill, was killed in a shootout at FCI after he opened fire on federal agents. Moore and Dixon are facing trial on charges of mail fraud, bribery, witness tampering and conspiracy. The other officers, Alfred Barnes, Vincent Johnson and E. Lavon Spence, earlier pleaded guilty to mail fraud.

DOJ_NMG_0089891

Some women told jurors they had sex with the officers in exchange for banned items. Others said they acted as lookouts or paid the officers to bring packages containing banned items into the prison. Defense attorneys tried to prove the witnesses were testifying in exchange for a reduced sentence.

One woman told jurors she had sex with Barnes and Moore.

"It wasn't a written agreement or anything like that," she said, referring to Barnes. She had sex with him "for the things that he brought me," she said. Moore, she said, entered her cell one night while her cellmate was sleeping. They had sex twice that night, she said.

A former inmate testified that she often acted as a lookout for Barnes. On one occasion, Dixon propositioned her, she said. On being questioned by defense attorneys, she said she didn't say anything about it earlier because "it was bad for me to cooperate while I was at FCI."

Another inmate, serving time for murder, said she had sex with Hill over a six-month period. On one occasion, she said, Dixon told her he "treated all females like they were wearing wires," and groped her. She told jurors Moore also talked to her about Hill.

One inmate, serving time on drug charges, told jurors Dixon "kinda took me under his wing ... looked at me like a little brother."

The Tallahassee Democrat is not using the women's names because of concerns raised by the U.S. Attorney's Office about identifying them.

The trial continues today.

Ex-Ala. Fire College Official Agrees To Plead Guilty To Fraud (AP)

By Desiree Hunter, The Associated Press

AP, November 2, 2006

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (AP) — A former deputy director at the Alabama Fire College agreed to plead guilty to conspiracy and fraud charges Wednesday, the fifth person at the fire college in Tuscaloosa to be charged in the ongoing probe of corruption in the state's post-secondary system.

The three-count plea agreement was reached with Robert Nix, who retired as deputy director in 1996, took a post at Shelton State Community College and served on the Alabama Fire College and Personnel Standards Commission from 2001-2005.

A former board member and treasurer of the Fire College Foundation, Nix admitted to spending about $70,000 of foundation funds for home improvements such as a gazebo-covered Jacuzzi and various purchases including a large screen TV and two Harley Davidson motorcycles.

He also admitted directing about $25,000 in fraudulent foundation scholarships to his son, granddaughter, grandson, sister and girlfriend's two daughters.

Nix, 67, faces up to five years in federal prison and a maximum $250,000 fine for counts one and two, which are conspiracy to commit theft and conspiracy to commit wire fraud. The third count seeks restitution of $328,000, the total amount Nix admitted receiving for personal use. He also agreed to cooperate with investigators and to plead guilty to a state felony ethics charge.

According to the plea agreement, Nix and the college's executive director spent hundreds of thousands in foundation funds from about January 2000 until September 2004 and falsified financial records. The executive director during that time was W.L. Langston, who was removed in April after concerns were raised about his management of the college.

U.S. Attorney Alice Martin announced the plea deal at a joint news conference in Attorney General Troy King's office at the Alabama Statehouse and said the fire college foundation could have been called the "friends and family foundation."

"When you read that he admits to having paid scholarships that were supposed to be money for the training of volunteer firefighters and EMTs, I wonder how much safer we are as a result of his children receiving scholarships to their grammar schools," she said.

"For too long, too many too powerful have been left unchecked," Martin said.

DOJ_NMG_0089892

Birmingham attorney Tommy Spina, who began representing Nix in 2004, said earnest pre-negotiations between his client and investigators had been going on for a few months. He said he expects Nix to have his first court appearance later this month.

Spina said Nix, who resigned from his part-time job as a fire safety specialist at Shelton State on Monday, recently decided on the plea deal so he could "right the wrongs and move forward."

Martin said the investigation, which began more than two years ago, is still "in the very beginning." She and King would not say how many others could be charged in the case.

"Everybody who has stolen a nickel from the two-year school system is a person of interest and every one of them will be sought and will be prosecuted," King said.

Former state Rep. Bryant Melton, D-Tuscaloosa, was the first to be charged in the joint federal and state probe at the fire college, which is located at Shelton State. He entered an agreement similar to Nix's in June, admitting he funneled state legislative grants to the fire college foundation and then used the money to pay gambling debts.

Next, Jasper banker Phillip Curtis Grace was charged with obstruction of justice and making false statements to federal investigators in August and two Shelton State assistants were arrested in the case last month. Doris Phillips and her daughter, Melinda Phillips Sexton, are accused of conspiring to fraudulently obtain state property and were charged with two counts of theft.

The state's two-year college system has been under intense scrutiny, with questions being raised about the use of state funding and nepotism issues.

Former Chancellor Roy Johnson was fired in July and Interim Chancellor Thomas Corts has begun investigations at Bishop State, where six people have been charged with theft by deception in connection with financial aid irregularities.

Two-year college spokesman Andre Taylor pointed out Wednesday that the fire college is autonomous from the two-year college system and is governed by a separate board. Taylor said two-year officials are working to make sure the "policies, procedures and practices" within the system are "up to par."

Former Elsa Officer Second Accused Of Taking Bribes (FWST)

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, November 2, 2006

McALLEN, Texas - A former Elsa police officer is the second to be indicted recently for allegedly taking bribes to protect drug loads, federal prosecutors said Wednesday.

Ismael Gomez, 27, is accused in a one-count indictment of receiving about $2,500 to use his official position to protect a vehicle he believed was transporting 10 kilograms of cocaine. The indictment was returned by a McAllen grand jury on Oct. 24 and unsealed Wednesday.

Gomez surrendered to the FBI and was ordered held without bond pending a hearing Nov. 6. He faces up to 20 years in federal prison and $250,000 in fines if convicted.

Another former Elsa police officer, 45-year-old Herman Carr of Donna, was indicted in an unrelated case in September for allegedly taking $5,000 to provide protection for a vehicle he believed was transporting five kilograms of cocaine. Carr is a waiting trial.

Sentencing Postponed For City Official In Truck Scandal (AP)

AP, November 2, 2006

CHICAGO - The sentencing of a key figure in the federal investigation of Chicago's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program was abruptly postponed Wednesday.

Donald Tomczak, 70, the former deputy head of the city water department, was rescheduled to be sentenced next Monday.

Attorneys said Tomczak was unable to come to court Wednesday because he had an unspecified medical condition.

Tomczak was charged in a federal investigation of the Hired Truck Program which outsources city hauling work to private companies.

He admitted taking payoffs from trucking companies in exchange for hauling work. He pleaded guilty to racketeering and a tax offense.

DOJ_NMG_0089893

He also acknowledged that he headed a so-called patronage army of city workers that campaigned for Mayor Richard M. Daley and his allies. Daley has not been accused of any wrongdoing.

Commerce Bancorp Is Off The Hook (PHI)

By Joseph N. Distefano And John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 2, 2006

One year after two of its former Pennsylvania executives were sentenced to prison, Commerce Bancorp Inc. says federal prosecutors in Philadelphia are no longer investigating the company.

After "several inquiries" by the office of U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan in 2004 and 2005, "we were recently advised by the U.S. Attorney's Office that it has concluded its investigations without any action against us," Commerce said in a statement filed yesterday with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

"As a result, Commerce and its employees are not subjects of any investigations" by Meehan's office, the statement said.

Two federal law enforcement officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, confirmed that authorities had concluded their investigation.

Commerce shares fell 10 cents, or 0.3 percent, to $34.82 yesterday on the New York Stock Exchange. Even before the announcement, investors had stopped focusing on the bank's legal problems, and worried more about declining profitability in the banking business, said Gerard Cassidy, bank analyst at RBC Capital Markets, in New York.

Commerce, which has headquarters in Cherry Hill, is the largest bank based in the Philadelphia area. It has grown rapidly across New Jersey and Pennsylvania since the 1970s, targeting local-government deposit, insurance and bond accounts as a key part of its expansion strategy.

But Commerce's attempts to win Philadelphia city business away from locally dominant Wachovia Corp. after Mayor Street's election in 1999 brought the bank under the scrutiny of a federal probe of city contracting practices. The investigation examined the role of the late Ronald White, a lawyer and political fund-raiser, whom Commerce hired as a consultant and appointed as head of the bank's Pennsylvania advisory board.

Commerce Bank of Pennsylvania executives Glenn K. Holck and Stephen M. Umbrell were convicted last year on corruption charges related to former city treasurer Corey Kemp, who, with White's help, tried to win city business for Commerce. Kemp was convicted of providing help in winning city business in return for cash and favors, and sentenced to 10 years in prison. Holck and Umbrell are free while they appeal their convictions.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Schwartz, chief of the public-corruption unit in Philadelphia, said it would be inappropriate to comment.

"Typically, we don't comment on when an investigation is begun, whether it is active or has been concluded," said Schwartz, who prosecuted Holck and Umbrell.

Michael Drewniak, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in New Jersey, where Commerce is based, would not comment on whether his office had also made inquiries involving Commerce.

Commerce spokesman David Flaherty had no comment.

In the summer of 2005, Meehan said the FBI had seized Commerce records to determine whether the bank had also given municipal officials in Philadelphia suburbs preferential treatment to win government business. But investigators found no wrongdoing by the bank.

Key Dates in Commerce Probe

February 2003: The FBI begins bugging campaign to record Philadelphia officials' dealings with financial companies that sought city business.

October 2003: FBI bug discovered by Philadelphia police in City Hall.

June 2004: Commerce Bank of Pennsylvania executives Glenn K. Holck and Stephen M. Umbrell indicted on charges of attempting to corrupt Philadelphia officials.

May 2005:Holck and Umbrell convicted of conspiring to deliver personal benefits to Philadelphia treasurer Corey Kemp in exchange for help in winning city business.

DOJ_NMG_0089894

July 2005: Kemp sentenced to 10 years in federal prison.

November 2005:A federal judge in Philadelphia sentences Holck and Umbrell to two years in prison and fines. Both men appeal.

December 2005: Commerce pays $600,000 to settle NASD accusations that its bond unit violated political campaign finance rules.

January 2006: U.S. Attorney's Office subpoenas Delaware County and several local governments in Delaware and Bucks Counties, seeking records of their business dealings with Commerce.

November 2006: Commerce tells the Securities and Exchange Commission that the U.S. Attorney's Office in Philadelphia has "concluded its investigations without any action against us."

Fla. Lawmaker Resigns Over Threatening Phone Calls (USAT/AP)

By Laura Wides-munoz, The Associated Press

USA Today, November 2, 2006

HIALEAH, Fla. — A state lawmaker resigned Wednesday from the Florida Legislature and was charged with two felonies in connection with leaving obscenity-filled messages and a racial slur on a colleague's voice mail.

State prosecutors charged Rep. Ralph Arza, a Hialeah Republican, and his 25-year-old cousin, Paulino Barbon. Both men could face up to 10 years in prison if convicted.

Arza, 46, had been urged to resign by House Republicans and Gov. Jeb Bush after the messages left on Rep. Gus Barreiro's voice mail became public.

Barreiro, a Miami Beach Republican, had already filed a complaint with the House rules committee, claiming Arza used racial epithets when referring to a Miami-Dade County official. To thwart the investigation, Arza allegedly left threatening phone messages for Barreiro.

The felony charges are one count each of retaliating against and tampering with a witness.

Authorities said a total of 10 phone calls were made Oct. 21 and Oct. 22 to Barreiro from phones belonging to Arza and Barbon. Five threatening calls were recorded, two from Arza's cellphone and three from Barbon's phone.

The men were expected to turn themselves in today, according to the Miami-Dade County State Attorney Katherine Fernandez Rundle.

Earlier in the day, Arza apologized for his actions and said he didn't want to distract from the work of the Republican-led Legislature. “I do not want to be the story,” he said. Arza previously acknowledged leaving the messages last month but said he was drunk.

He said he had learned that Barreiro had filed the complaint alleging Arza had earlier used a racial epithet when referring to Miami-Dade County schools Superintendent Rudy Crew, who is black. He used the same epithet in the phone message to Barreiro, who is Hispanic, but he has vehemently denied ever using a racial slur to refer to Crew.

Arza resigned about an hour before a special House panel was set to begin hearings on whether to expel him. The hearings were canceled.

“It's not really a happy day for anybody, I don't think,” Barreiro said. “I think he made the right decision — the right decision not only for himself, but I thought he looked at the bigger picture, which is the institution he represents.” Crew called the situation “a tragedy all the way around,” but said Arza was right to leave the Legislature.

The GOP gets to choose a replacement for Arza for Tuesday's general election, but his name will still be on the ballot. The situation will be similar to what has happened in former U.S. congressman Mark Foley's district. The GOP has replaced him with Joe Negron.

Mob Enforcer Denied Bail On Extortion Charges (PHI)

By George Anastasia

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 2, 2006

Mob enforcer Vincent "Big Vince" Filipelli was trying to explain to a deadbeat gambler the rules of the underworld:

He bet. He lost. Now he had to pay.

DOJ_NMG_0089895

And if he didn't, Filipelli added, he would "hunt him down and put him in the hospital."

That was the message the hulking, former competitive bodybuilder delivered to a gambler named "T.J." during a meeting in the parking lot of a South Philadelphia "gentleman's club" back in May, according to an FBI agent who testified yesterday at Filipelli's bail hearing in federal court in Camden.

What Big Vince didn't know at the time was that T.J. was a New Jersey State Police trooper working undercover in an organized crime gambling investigation. The parking lot meeting was picked up on both audio and videotape as part of a 15-month probe.

After a protracted five-hour bail hearing yesterday, U.S. Magistrate Judge Ann Marie Donio pointed to that threat as the primary basis for granting the government's motion to have Filipelli, 53, held without bail.

Three witnesses outlined the confrontation, which took place in the parking lot of Crazy Horse Too, an upscale go-go bar and restaurant on Columbus Boulevard in South Philadelphia.

Filipelli met that day with T.J. and Lou, two men who had been placing bets with a mob-linked Internet gambling operation. T.J. was State Trooper James Calderelas. Lou was Trooper Leonard DiJoseph.

FBI Agent James Titcombe, who was part of the joint federal-state probe, provided a detailed account of several meetings Filipelli had with the undercover investigators. Titcombe said Filipelli, a former Mr. America bodybuilding champion, boasted about his acts of violence and the fact that he was a "made" member of the mob.

While none of the tapes was played in open court, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jacquline Carle quoted from them in arguing that Filipelli was a danger to the community and should be denied bail.

Filipelli was charged with gambling, extortion and traveling interstate to make a violent threat when he was arrested last week. Those charges were formalized in an indictment returned by a federal grand jury yesterday.

Carle, in her closing argument, referred directly to one tape-recorded conversation in which Filipelli bragged that he had burst into an office and in front of 40 people had beaten a gambler who had refused to pay.

" 'He tried to get cute with me,' " Carle said, quoting the conversation recorded in April in which Filipelli told DiJoseph about the assault. " 'I put the kid in the hospital.' "

Donald Manno, Filipelli's attorney, had argued that the conversations were "street talk" and "puffing" by his client. "No one was assaulted," Manno said.

But Donio ruled the testimony was strong enough to support the government's request for no bail in the case.

Pittsburgh Mob Boss Dies (KDKA)

KDKA-TV, November 2, 2006

PITTSBURGH Michael Genovese was one of the last links to a lost era - an old-school mob boss who the law never caught up with.

The head of the western Pennsylvania La Cosa Nostra is dead.

By all accounts, mob informants, FBI agents and the now-defunct Pennsylvania Crime Commission, Genovese was the don of the Pittsburgh mob.

An old-style mob boss who ran one of 24 original mafia families in the U.S. that trace their roots back to Sicily.

Gambling, narcotics, loan sharking, even murder were all linked to the Genovese mob.

But Geneovese was never indicted - never sent to prison.

Several of his underbosses - including Chuckie Porter, Lou Ruicci and other mob lieutenants - were all convicted in a federal trial in the 1990s.

But they never brought charges against the reputed mob boss.

Genovese is reported to have been suffering from bladder cancer and heart disease.

He was 87 years old and died in his sleep.

The U.S. Attorney's office in Pittsburgh declined comment on Genovese's death.

In the past, the U.S. Attorney has said that the mob trials of the 1990s severely weakened mafia influence in the Pittsburgh area.

Late Design Change Is Cited In Collapse Of Tunnel Ceiling In Boston (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 1 — Engineers changed the design of the ceiling in Boston's Big Dig highway tunnel after they had already finished building the roof from which it would hang, and attached a new, heavier ceiling with hardware that had little margin of strength, the National Transportation Safety Board said on Wednesday.

Part of the ceiling collapsed on July 10, killing a woman as she rode in her car to Logan Airport and injuring her husband, who was driving. Details of the board's most recent discoveries were reported Wednesday in The Boston Globe.

According to the board, the original plan was for the ceiling in the area of the collapse to be made of metal coated with porcelain, but because of its high price, designers substituted pre-cast concrete panels, which are heavier. In some areas, they installed steel brackets in the roof for hanging the panels, but in the area of the collapse, in a connector tunnel that leads to Interstate 90, the roof was finished. So instead, they drilled holes in it and glued in anchors.

The heavier ceiling system, approved by engineers in March 1997, was a "one hanger out" design, meaning that it could survive the failure of one hanger. But that design "provides little or no redundancy," the board said in a report it released on Wednesday. "The N.T.S.B. has researched other tunnels throughout the country and has found that significant redundancy is built into the ceiling design so that in the event of hanger failures, the panels are self-supported."

In addition, the safety board said, it had not found any evidence that the tunnels were inspected between January 2003, when the tunnel opened to traffic, and the date of the collapse. An inspection after the collapse found that where the ceiling was still intact, many anchors had begun to pull away from the roof, some showing "extreme displacement" of more than one inch, the board said.

The board said it was trying to determine if there was a standard for tunnel inspection, but it noted that bridges were typically inspected every two years.

The board is also supervising an analysis of the epoxy used with the anchors, and it said it had interviewed an employee of CobnAm Testing, which was hired to test the strength of the anchor bolts.

"The tester's description of the testing procedure differs from what has been found in the construction contract," the board said.

The board is an advisory agency that makes recommendations to government agencies and private parties after its investigations. The Massachusetts attorney general's office, the Justice Department and the Transportation Department's Office of Inspector General, whose investigations could lead to indictments, are also looking into the accident.

CEO Is Charged With Stealing Identities (MH)

The Miami Herald, November 2, 2006

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y. - A prominent Westchester businessman has been charged with stealing his employees' identities to obtain more than $1 million in bank loans and credit card charges, prosecutors said.

Terrence Chalk, 44, the chief executive officer of Compulinx Managed Services of White Plains, was indicted along with his nephew, Damon Chalk, by a federal grand jury on charges of conspiracy, credit card fraud, and making false statements to banks.

Terrence Chalk pleaded not guilty in U.S. District Court on Tuesday, where U.S. Magistrate Judge George Yanthis ordered him held on $250,000 bond.

Terrence Chalk founded Compulinx, a computer management firm, in 1990. He is accused of using the names, addresses, and Social Security numbers of his employees to secure the bank loans between 2001 and 2006, prosecutors said. He also ran up $100,000 in credit card charges using their identities, they said.

Chalk and his company were inducted this year into the Hall of Fame by the Business Council of Westchester. He serves on the boards of the American Red Cross and Hospice and Palliative Care of Westchester.

Last year, Terrence Chalk was nominated to the White Plains Youth Bureau, and was named businessperson of the year in February by the Westchester chapter of the Omega Psi Phi fraternity.

DOJ_NMG_0089897

His lawyer, Mayo Bartlett, did not immediately return a call for comment.

Damon Chalk, 35, of Florida, was arrested by FBI agents Tuesday at La Guardia Airport. He was ordered held without bail. The name of his lawyer could not be immediately determined.

Former Atlanta Editor Gets 8 Years In Child Porn Case (TEXGAZ)

By Paige Milton, Texarkana Gazette

Texarkana Gazette, November 2, 2006

Federal child pornography charges stem from February 2004 incident

MARSHALL, Texas—Former Cass County newspaper editor Charlie Harrist will spend 97 months in a federal prison for child pornography charges, a judge ruled Tuesday.

The sentence was handed down by Judge T. John Ward of the Eastern District of U.S. District Court of Texas.

Harrist was convicted in June of two charges of federal child pornography, including possession of material involving sexual exploitation of minors and receiving material involving sexual exploitation of minors.

The charges stem from a February 2004 incident. Harrist took his personal computer to Atlanta, Texas, technician Jerry Griffin for repair. Griffin's employee, Melanie Warren, found child pornography images on Harrist's computer and reported her findings to the Cass County Sheriff's Office.

Harrist's computer was turned over to the sheriff's office, which was assisted in its investigation by the FBI.

During the trial, Billy Harrell, Harrist's attorney, argued the computer's hard drive had been cleaned prior to the discovery, negating the possibility the images belonged to Harrist.

Harrell also raised the possibility of tampering while the computer was in police custody, and pointed out Harrist had an adversarial relationship with law enforcement because of his reporting.

The defense also asserted Harrist was out of town during the times the images were placed on the computer, as shown by the computer system's clock.

Prosecutors argued the computer also contained news stories with Harrist's byline and personal photographs of Harrist and a friend, and the computer's system clock can be reset. A Longview, Texas, police detective who examined the computer testified he found "thousands" of images and videos of underage girls in sexual situations.

Harrist was indicted by a Tyler federal grand jury in April 2004.

He is the former editor of the Citizens Journal newspaper, based in Atlanta.

Supreme Court Ponders Retroactive Ruling (AP)

By Mark Sherman, The Associated Press

AP, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — If Marvin Bockting were on trial today, his stepdaughter's accusations that he sexually abused her would not be allowed unless she testified about them in court.

The Supreme Court settled that issue in 2004 when it ruled that defendants have a constitutional right to cross-examine witnesses against them.

But Bockting was convicted in 1988 after 6-year-old Autumn Bockting's statements to Las Vegas police were presented to the jury even though the girl did not testify during the trial. He received a life sentence.

The question that reluctant justices confronted Wednesday was whether to apply the new rule to older cases, which the court has refused to do in a dozen cases over 17 years for matters of criminal procedure. However, an appeals court said the rule should apply retroactively and overturned Bockting's conviction as a result; other appellate courts have ruled differently.

Nevada Attorney General George Chanos and Justice Department lawyer Irving Gornstein argued that justices should not apply their 2004 ruling to older cases because, among other things, it would open the door to many defendants whose convictions depended on out of-court statements that were not subject to cross-examination.

Justice Anthony Kennedy singled out that problem if the court were to uphold the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in this case. "We have to look at the rule in the whole universe of cases, not just your case. It seems to me that was the problem you had in arguing in this area, and maybe you can suggest some way out. I don't see it," Kennedy said.

Franny Forsman, Bockting's lawyer, countered that the right to confront a witness was so important to the integrity of the trial that it deserved the same consideration as, say, the court's landmark ruling in the 1960s that guaranteed a lawyer to defendants in criminal trials.

Forsman, the federal public defender in Nevada, also told the justices that concerns about courts being weighed down with defendants challenging their convictions as a result of a favorable ruling for Bockting were overblown. Her research found just five cases, as of late September, in which convictions were overturned because the ruling about confronting witnesses was applied to older cases, she said. Claims based on the 2004 ruling would already have to be under way, she said.

"It is not going to open the floodgates," Forsman said.

A ruling is expected before July.

If Bockting loses at the Supreme Court, it will not be because his lawyer was ineffective.

Forsman received some rare public praise from the bench at the conclusion of her argument. "Ms. Forsman, can I ask you a personal question? Were you a moot court finalist?" Justice John Paul Stevens asked, referring to the law school exercise in which students display their advocacy skills in mock trials.

No, she said. Undeterred, Stevens said he attended a moot court at the University of Notre Dame law school around the time Forsman was a student there. "It was an awfully good moot court," he said.

The case is Whorton v. Bockting, 05-595.

Second Guilty Plea In Cable Fraud Scheme (UPI)

United Press International, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 1 (UPI) -- A second Connecticut defense contractor has pleaded guilty to fabricating test data on fiber optic cables used on the Patriot missile system.

Patrick Hale was the operations manager for Ace & Co., Inc., in Naugatuck, Conn. Ace distributes electronic components through its Stran Technologies division, which makes fiber optic and electrical connectors.

The military bought hundreds of the electrical connectors, known as the Tactical Fiber Optic Cable Assembly. Some were used on the first generation of the Patriot missile launchers, among other military systems.

All the Stran cables have since passed the required tests, and there are no known safety or suitability issues, according to the Justice Department.

The fraud began in 1999 when Ace was attempting to qualify as a military source for the cables, according to court documents filed at the beginning of August.

The humidity tests required by the Army's Communications and Electronics Command would have taken three months to complete, costing Ace up to $42,000, and would have delayed its ability to fill military orders for the connectors.

So Ace fabricated and falsified test results, and leased testing equipment to convince Army inspectors who visited the facility that the tests had been completed. Hale participated in the scheme to deceive the government.

On Aug. 2, 2006, Ace & Company, Inc. entered a corporate guilty plea based on the same scheme. Also on Aug. 2, the owner and president of Ace, James E. Stranberg, Jr., pleaded guilty to tax evasion based on his filing a false corporate income tax return for Ace in 2003.

Hale faces a maximum term of imprisonment of five years and a fine of up to $250,000 on the fraud charge, and a maximum term of imprisonment of one year and a fine of up to $25,000 on a tax charge.

Despite Flawed Defense, A Death Sentence Stands (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

Defense lawyers in capital cases are often criticized for conducting superficial investigations of their clients' backgrounds, but Ferdinand Radolovich's performance in a Kentucky case, one that ended in a death sentence, may have set a new standard.

"Apparently," a federal judge wrote in 2001, "neither attorney Radolovich nor the prosecution knew of petitioner's actual identity until his case had been affirmed on appeal."

DOJ_NMG_0089899

When he was later challenged about the quality of his work on the case, Mr. Radolovich testified that he was an accomplished death penalty lawyer at the time, having tried four capital cases. The real number was zero, the federal judge, Jennifer B. Coffman, found, and Mr. Radolovich has been indicted for perjury for his statement.

But none of this has helped the inmate in question, who was sent to death row as James Slaughter but whose real name is Jeffrey Leonard.

Yesterday in Cincinnati, splitting 7 to 7, the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit declined to rehear the case. A dissenting judge, R. Guy Cole Jr., said the decision to allow Mr. Leonard to be executed even though the jury did not even know his real name, much less his background, opens a "new chapter in our death penalty history."

The case is not one of mistaken identity, and there is substantial evidence that Mr. Leonard is guilty of murder. But Mr. Leonard's current lawyers say a competent investigation of his background would have yielded a trove of evidence that might well have persuaded the jury to spare his life. He is, for instance, apparently brain damaged, and he endured a brutal childhood.

In June, the federal appeals court's three-judge panel agreed that Mr. Radolovich's performance was so bad that it violated the Constitution. But the two judges in the majority ruled against Mr. Leonard anyway, saying that better legal work would not have caused the jury to sentence him to life in prison instead of death.

Mr. Leonard, as James Slaughter, was sent to death row in 1983 for the stabbing death that year of Esther Stewart at a Louisville consignment store she owned.

In an interview yesterday, Mr. Radolovich defended his work.

"Mr. Slaughter admitted that he had lied to me, that he had given me a false name, a false date of birth, a false Social Security number." Mr. Radolovich said. "He told me he had no living relatives. Where was I supposed to go? What was I supposed to do?"

He added that the perjury charge, to which he has pleaded not guilty, was a result of a misunderstanding. While he acknowledged that the Leonard case was his first capital trial, he said that his testimony, at a 1994 state court hearing on Mr. Leonard's motion to vacate his conviction, meant to refer to experience he gained after the trial.

Judge Coffman, of Federal District Court in Lexington, Ky., wrote that Mr. Radolovich's investigation was inadequate.

"Petitioner could not even correctly spell the name, Slaughter, which he misspelled phonetically as being 'Slawter,' " Judge Coffman wrote. "This fact alone would cause the effective attorney to wonder about the veracity of his client's background information."

In yesterday's dissent, Judge Cole listed some of the information that Mr. Radolovich had failed to locate. Mr. Leonard "has possible brain damage from an untreated childhood skull fracture." His mother and stepfather "beat him so badly as a child that scars remain all over his body." His stepfather "once fired a gun at him as he ran out of his home carrying his younger brother." And "his mother, brothers and grandparents (who did not know about the trial) would have testified on his behalf."

The judges who declined to rehear the case yesterday did not give reasons. In the panel decision in June, the two judges in the majority said that "we do not find it reasonably probable that the outcome of Slaughter's sentencing would have been different if Radolovich had unearthed" the additional information.

Judge Cole, dissenting yesterday, said that was speculation.

"Although we cannot be absolutely certain," Judge Cole wrote, "that a single juror sentencing Jeffrey Leonard — a brain-damaged man whose family would corroborate his testimony and plead for his life — would come to a different conclusion, this court's decision leaves one aspect of this case indisputable: We will never know."

Judge Cole noted that one juror in the 1983 trial, in a sworn statement, said she would have voted to spare Mr. Leonard's life had she known more about him.

Kathleen K. Schmidt, a lawyer for Mr. Leonard, said she would ask the United States Supreme Court to hear the case.

Mr. Radolovich said he had mixed sentiments about yesterday's decision. "I'm heartsick that James went to death row," Mr. Radolovich said. "But after he told me he did it and after he lied to me, I'm a little less sympathetic."

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ_NMG_0089900

Groups Ask FTC To Probe Online Ad Profiling (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

Two consumer advocacy groups asked the Federal Trade Commission yesterday to investigate online advertising practices of Internet companies, asserting that the practices violate consumer privacy.

In a 50-page complaint, the D.C.-based Center for Digital Democracy and the U.S. Public Interest Research Group outlined online consumer tracking and profiling systems that they said are "deceptive and unfair to millions of users."

"Our online travels are increasingly becoming part of vast databases that comprise the source material for sophisticated analytical engines designed solely to make us more susceptible to online marketing," the complaint said.

The groups asked the FTC to investigate Microsoft Corp., Google Inc., Yahoo Inc. and other online companies and software firms, which they said were "aggressively" building new tools to analyze and classify consumers' behavior across the Internet and other digital media -- computers, cellphones, video games and televisions.

They singled out a Microsoft service that allows advertisers to take information gleaned from watching the millions of people who use the company's MSN Internet network. The information is combined with demographic data from credit bureaus and other sources to tailor ads to people based on geographic location, sex, age group, lifestyle and time of day. Microsoft's ad system "is deceptive and unfair," the report said.

The report also described new Web software programs that allow marketers to monitor people as they click and scroll online, logging where they enter a Web site, how long they linger on a page, even which part of the page they move their mouse across.

The groups urged the FTC to halt advertising practices that "abuse consumers" and to recommend federal legislation to protect them.

Mike Hintze, a senior attorney for Microsoft, said in an e-mail statement that "transparency" with consumers is "extremely important" and "will continue to be a central focus" of Microsoft's design of online services: "Consumer trust is essential to the success of online business and helping protect consumers' privacy is a top priority for Microsoft in our development and implementation of online services."

Google spokesman Barry Schnitt said that Google recognizes "that privacy is important" and that as it develops its advertising programs, it comes back "every time to the idea that the trust of the user is paramount." Yahoo spokeswoman Nissa Anklesaria said consumer trust and privacy were important and that the company had "a longstanding commitment to providing users with clear notice and choice" on the way their data is used.

Torts Gone Wild (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

WHEN LAWYERS say, "hard cases make bad law," what they often mean is that a sympathetic plaintiff or an unattractive defendant can induce judges to depart from a general rule that makes sense. The U.S. Supreme Court should resist that temptation in ruling on an Oregon jury's decision to order a tobacco company to pay $79.5 million in punitive damages in a case involving a lifelong smoker who died of lung cancer.

Lawyers for the widow of Jesse Williams convinced the jury that Philip Morris had targeted people like her husband with a "massive, fraudulent campaign to sow doubt about smoking and disease" — a campaign so effective that it could blunt warnings by the surgeon general. The jury then ordered the company to pay Mrs. Williams $821,000 in actual damages.

Fair enough, even though Williams had disregarded warnings from his family about the risks of smoking, realizing too late that "those darn cigarette people … were lying all the time."

But then the jury tacked on a punitive-damage award that was almost 100 times what it thought was necessary to compensate her for her loss. The jurors did so after her lawyer asked them to think about "how many other Jesse Williams[es] in the last 40 years in the state of Oregon there have been. It's more than fair to think about how many more are out there in the future."

DOJ_NMG_0089901

Actually, the $79.5-million award was less than fair. In recent years, the Supreme Court has held that due process of law is violated when punitive damages — admittedly designed to punish the defendant for wrongful conduct, not to compensate the plaintiff — are "grossly excessive."

In a landmark 2003 ruling, the justices suggested that punitive damages should be capped at nine times the amount of actual damages.

After Oregon's highest court affirmed the jury verdict against Philip Morris, the U.S. Supreme Court asked lawyers for the company and Mrs. Williams to address two questions. One was whether Philip Morris' "reprehensible" conduct overrode the requirement that punitive damages bear a reasonable relation to actual damages. The other was whether the Constitution allows a jury in a case brought by one individual to punish the defendant for the effects of its conduct on others.

Both questions seem like no-brainers in light of past decisions about the need for punitive damages to bear a reasonable relationship to proven harm. Yet during oral arguments Tuesday, several justices seemed to suggest that ambiguities in the record — such as whether the Oregon Supreme Court had concluded that punitive damages could be based on harm to non-parties — might require returning the case to lower courts.

Punting the case would be a terrible idea. As this lawsuit demonstrates, many lower courts are uncomfortable with the Supreme Court's efforts to curb outlandish punitive-damage awards. An inconclusive ruling would embolden those courts in their resistance. It also would encourage speculation that recent changes in the high court's membership have undermined its punitive-damage precedents. Two of the six justices in the majority in the 2003 ruling, the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Sandra Day O'Connor, are no longer on the court.

Huge awards in individual lawsuits — as opposed to sensible legislation — are not the best way to curb smoking, obesity, gun violence and other threats to public health. The Supreme Court should see through the smoke screen of this "hard" case and say that.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Poll Assignment Calls Mislead (BSUN)

By Melissa Harris, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, November 2, 2006

Workers falsely told of changes in Election Day posts; FBI notified

With Baltimore scrambling to make sure next week's voting goes smoothly, city elections officials expressed concern Wednesday at reports that a rogue caller was contacting poll workers and changing their Election Day assignments -- raising the prospect that some precincts might not have the staffing they need.

State elections chief Linda H. Lamone contacted the FBI Wednesday after Baltimore officials reported that someone called at least 10 poll workers and falsely told them that their precinct assignments had been switched.

Baltimore Board of Elections Chairman Armstead B. Crawley Jones Sr. said that poll workers are receiving legitimate calls this week from employees at the University of Baltimore's Schaefer Center, reminding election judges where to go and what time to arrive.

But the assignments have not been shuffled, Jones said. Such changes might be needed to fill vacancies but would not be made until early next week, he said.

The mysterious calls were being made as Baltimore elections officials hurried to make final preparations for Tuesday, when they hope to avoid a repeat of the no-show judge problem that the Sept. 12 primary suffered. Many precincts did not open on time, and a judge ordered polls to remain open an extra hour.

Overall, the city has trained enough volunteers -- 2,206 as of Wednesday for 2,100 spots -- but not enough of those are chief judges, who must attend a class to teach them how to supervise precincts.

This week, state auditors reported that Baltimore had not filled 250 of its 580 chief judge slots.

DOJ_NMG_0089902

Helen Jankowiak, a Highlandtown Democrat who has been a chief judge for "longer than she can count," said that she could not return for the general election because she had no way of getting to the required refresher training course. She does not drive.

Lamone required local election boards to retrain every chief judge in the state after some jurisdictions experienced problems during the primary that resulted in late-opening precincts, slow results and a heavy reliance on paper ballots.

Election officials determined that all of the judges who reported the phone call attended the same training class of about 20 people.

"We don't want this to start spreading to other classes," said Jones, the interim chief.

The rogue calls added a new element of uncertainty to a tense election. Voters have requested more than 175,000 absentee ballots after calls from both political parties to use the paper alternative rather than risk equipment malfunction.

Federal prosecutors and the FBI have established an election fraud initiative in Maryland, as they do every two years, and warned Wednesday that fraud is often subtle.

"It is a federal crime to seek out elderly or illiterate voters for the purpose of obtaining control of their ballots," according to a press release from U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein. "In addition, every voter has the right to mark his or her ballot in private."

About 10 election judges have reported that a female caller, who gave her name as either "Miss Brown" or "Marcia," called them Wednesday morning with a new precinct assignment, said Jones, the acting city elections chief.

In some cases, judges reported the call to city officials simply to complain about the switch. Two of the 10 judges reported that a phone number appeared on caller ID, but when that number was later dialed, a message said that the number was not in service, Jones said. Officials with the Schaefer Center were checking to make sure the calls were not coming from there.

In response to concerns about fraud generated by Wednesday's phone calls, interim elections director Cornelius L. Jones clamped down on election judges' personal information.

For instance, the Baltimore City Council has requested rosters of election judges, technicians and facility managers -- a request election officials said they would deny Wednesday.

Poll workers in the affected class also will receive a letter in the mail, confirming their assignments.

"It is extremely unfortunate that someone has resorted to cowardly and sneaky tactics to disrupt the election," said Raquel Guillory, a spokeswoman for Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley.

Armstead Jones, said that he is concerned because, at some point, the city likely will have to move poll workers and it will be difficult for judges to discern whether the switch is real.

He said that election officials would use e-mail addresses, cell phone numbers and a combination of methods to convey the information, including, if necessary, doing so in-person Tuesday morning.

The moves would likely be needed to fill chief judge vacancies.

Election supervisor Abigail Goldman said that the number of unfilled spots in Baltimore is shrinking every day but that she did not know exactly where the city stood and would not have a final count until training sessions conclude Sunday.

State law requires two chief judges per precinct, one Republican and one Democrat.

If there are still holes, Goldman said that she would "ask someone in that polling place to take the responsibility and become a chief judge" and that historically "people do step up to the plate."

Megan Shook, a chief Republican judge at Baltimore's Western High School, said that the system has improved since the primary.

"This time I got a phone call confirming when and where to report for duty," she said. "I've been paid for the primary, and I've already voted my absentee ballot. So I'm all set."

melissa.harris@baltsun.com

U.S. Attorney's Office: We're Ready To Investigate Election Fraud (BALTBIZ)

Baltimore Business Journal, November 2, 2006

In a preemptive move that underscores the highly partisan and tightly contested races for public office that will be decided next week, the Maryland U.S. Attorney's office said Wednesday that federal prosecutors and FBI agents are prepared to review and investigate allegations of election fraud.

A federal task force has been formed to look into any allegations of ballot forgery or theft, voter intimidation, campaign finance violations and corruption, among other federal election crimes, Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein said in a statement.

The task force has consulted with Maryland Elections Administrator Linda H. Lamone, Attorney General J. Joseph Curran and Special Prosecutor Robert A. Rohrbaugh on how it will handle fraud or voting rights violations, and will have a team of federal prosecutors and FBI agents at the ready while polls are open Nov. 7.

"Our goal is to prevent election fraud and preserve public confidence in the integrity of the democratic process," Rosenstein said in a statement. "Fair elections are the foundation of American government. Because elections involve high stakes and strong emotions, allegations of wrongdoing frequently arise. We will review all allegations in a nonpartisan manner and pursue any evidence that warrants criminal prosecution."

Such a move isn't unprecedented; the U.S. Department of Justice has long mobilized its resources in election years to quell electoral corruption, said Marcy Murphy, public affairs specialist for the U.S. Attorney's Office.

But Murphy also conceded "a lot of people are talking" about voter fraud in Maryland, and Rosenstein and his top prosecutors want to get the word out: We're ready to investigate wrongdoing.

Gov. Robert Ehrlich, locked in a tight and increasingly nasty race with Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, has called for voters to avoid the polls and vote with absentee ballots after human errors caused delays in Baltimore City and Montgomery County precincts during the Sept. 12 primary. Democrats have criticized Ehrlich's push as an attempt to depress turnout.

Controversy has also swirled around the use of electronic voting machines and their accuracy.

"I don't believe it's in response [to allegations already surfacing], but I think they are trying to alleviate the concerns about the election," Murphy said.

More Poll Workers Recruited, But Training Proves Daunting (WP)

By Christian Davenport

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

He had heard the horror stories about the voter check-in machines crashing during Maryland's September primary. And he knew about the doomsday fears of hackers hijacking an election.

But Samuel Goodman's main concern during a training session last week for prospective election judges in Montgomery County was something far more simple: how to turn on the machines.

In the aftermath of glitches that marred primaries in Maryland and other states, a lot of attention has focused on electronic voting systems -- why they malfunctioned and how susceptible they are to attack. But the pillars of Election Day are the legions of judges, the human safeguards in a process that has become more complicated as voting has grown more automated and layered with regulations.

The judges, often known as poll workers, have been recruited en masse locally and across the country leading up to the general election Tuesday. Prince George's and Montgomery counties, for example, will have 300 more than in the September primary.

Goodman is part of the wave of hastily recruited Montgomery trainees, and at 73 he fits what elections officials say is the age profile of the average poll worker nationwide. Most are well into their retirement years, and the technology changes can be daunting for some of those who didn't grow up using computers. That is why some states are looking to recruit college, and even high school, students to work the polls.

Goodman, a former NBC television news producer who lives near Rockville, said he found the jargon of the training session offered by the county Board of Elections incomprehensible and the technology overwhelming. It wasn't long before his eagerness hardened to frustration as he realized the job of check-in judge was going to be a lot harder than he thought.

DOJ_NMG_0089904

He's no computer whiz, but given a bit more time he could manage, he said. In a single three-hour class, "there was no way to absorb all that," he said.

For the most part, poll workers are ordinary people who work long hours for little pay and perform admirably under trying conditions. Since the 2000 presidential election debacle, several states, including Maryland, have replaced paper ballot voting with electronic systems, and poll workers have had to relearn their jobs.

Some states have new rules to learn about checking photo identification at the polls and offering provisional ballots.

"We've made more election reform in the last six years in this country than we had in the 230 before it," said Paul S. DeGregorio, chairman of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission, which was created in 2002 to help elections run smoothly. "When you have poll workers who have been used to one system for 20, 30, 40 years, teaching them a new system can take a couple of elections for them to get used to."

Across Maryland, officials launched an aggressive campaign to recruit judges after the troubled fall primary, saying they needed more people to help with the general election. The judges are hired temporarily and paid $150 or more to work at precincts on Election Day after several hours of training.

State officials have called for additional training, but some local elections administrators say the sessions aren't nearly long enough.

"I think we should do a lot more," said Robert J. Antonetti Sr., the Prince George's interim elections administrator. He added that many of the judges find the new technology "mind-boggling." The county has held training sessions almost nightly and twice on Saturdays, he said.

Virginia did not experience any problems on the level of Maryland's during its primary, but it has also worked to recruit more judges in anticipation of an unusually high turnout for a midterm election. Helping the recruitment was a grant received by the University of Virginia, which went toward training 80 students from U-Va. and Piedmont College to be poll workers.

Jean Jensen, secretary of the Virginia Board of Elections, said recruiting efforts also were greatly aided by a new state law that prevents employers from penalizing workers who want to serve as elections judges, by, for example, forcing them to use a personal day.

Virginia uses touch-screen machines in 105 of its 135 cities and counties, with the rest using optical-scan machines. The touch-screen machines, which have been the focus of concerns in Maryland and elsewhere, have been operated in at least one previous election in each jurisdiction that is using them, Jensen said.

In Maryland, training sessions for Montgomery's judges have been held six days a week and will continue through Monday afternoon, the day before the election, officials said.

Montgomery is more familiar with electronic voting than most Maryland jurisdictions because it was introduced to the technology in 2002 with Prince George's and two other counties.

Still, the training session last week revealed how difficult it is for some prospective judges to master such a large amount of material in a short time. The trainees struggled with a new vocabulary: voter access cards, USB port, local area network, GEMS server. After the trainer said using the electronic poll book -- the machine that repeatedly faltered during the primary -- was a lot like using a PDA, Goodman wondered what a PDA is. It's a personal digital assistant, such as a BlackBerry or PalmPilot, he was told.

Later, when the instructor, Belinda Lee, asked the class to plug in the ethernet line, some stared blankly at the tangle of wires in front of them until she told them it was the one that looks like a telephone cord.

"Oy vey!" an exasperated Goodman blurted out.

During a break, trainee Joseph Burke, 80, of Chevy Chase thumbed through the thick three-ring binder he will have to become familiar with before Tuesday.

"That's a lot of stuff they threw at us," he said. "It's going to take some more studying."

Anthony DiLullo, 67, of Bethesda was comforted only by the fact that another check-in judge would be working the polls with him Election Day. "I hope the other person knows more than I do," he said.

Some fear that the changes in the way elections are run might be driving longtime poll workers away.

DOJ_NMG_0089905

"It's a nationwide issue, and particularly when you transition to new equipment you see that some of your traditional poll workers decide it's time to retire," said DeGregorio, of the Election Assistance Commission. "So it puts the election officials in a bind in trying to fill the polls."

Although most poll workers are retirees who don't have to sacrifice a day of work to work the polls, states across the country are reaching out to younger generations, who have grown up using computers.

In Chicago, 754 high school students have been recruited to work the polls. Those younger than 18 are allowed to work as judges under a state law designed to involve younger people in the voting process, according to a news release. The city has also trained 2,000 college students to work as technicians at every polling place to prevent the kinds of problems that affected the city's primary this March.

In Ohio, Cuyahoga County has turned poll worker training over to the local community college, which has extended sessions by an hour and limited the class sizes. People must pass a written exam before they can serve as poll workers on Election Day.

Staff writers Zachary A. Goldfarb, Rosalind S. Helderman and Alec MacGillis contributed to this report.

Md. Democrats Say GOP Plans To Block Voters (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

A recently distributed guide for Republican poll watchers in Maryland spells out how to aggressively challenge the credentials of voters and urges these volunteers to tell election judges they could face jail time if a challenge is ignored.

Democrats said yesterday they consider the handbook, obtained by The Washington Post, evidence of a Republican effort to block people from voting Tuesday.

"The tenor of the material is that they are asking folks, if not directing them, to challenge voters," said Bruce L. Marcus, an attorney for the state Democratic Party. "It's really tantamount to a suppression effort."

Advocacy groups including the National Campaign for Fair Elections, Common Cause and the NAACP, as well as a George Washington University professor who is an expert on voter suppression, agreed with that assessment.

Barbara Burt of Common Cause said the technique, last seen in Ohio in the 2004 presidential election, is an "insidious voter intimidation tactic."

Republicans rebutted that charge, saying they merely are guarding against fraud. "I don't think that's borderline suppression," said state Republican Party Chairman John Kane. "It's making sure that people who have earned the right to vote are voting. We've had people die in wars to protect those rights."

No one disputes the legality of having poll watchers set up folding chairs and monitor the election on behalf of their party. Typically, though, poll watchers are present to help ensure that their party's supporters get to vote, not the other way around.

Democrats, for instance, have distributed advice to their poll watchers to "make sure that voters are not being turned away."

"The key is the perspective each party brings to the process," Marcus said. "Our philosophy is, if we have a qualified voter, we're going to turn things inside out and upside down to get them to be able to vote."

The GOP poll-watcher program, outlined in a 13-page document, states: "Your most important duty as a poll worker is to challenge people who present themselves to vote but who are not authorized to vote."

It cautions, "Undoubtedly, the challenge process will be awkward and may cause consternation on the part of the challenged voter as well as the judges." It advises, "If there is cause to make a challenge, you should not hesitate to do so merely because it upsets the challenged voter or the election judges."

It adds, "If the election judge should try to ignore your challenge, point out that they would be committing a criminal offense punishable by not less than 30 days in jail."

Jonah H. Goldman, director of the National Campaign for Fair Elections, said the program "raises serious concerns."

"When you have a political party telling people their Number 1 responsibility is to challenge voters, our ears certainly perk up," Goldman said. "This could either be intended to challenge voters in a discriminatory way or in a disruptive way. A lot of times, they just try to cause chaos and long lines."

DOJ_NMG_0089906

The manual provides a range of scenarios in which the volunteer should phone complaints to the party's legal headquarters or fill out "incident reports." The scenarios include voters who can't readily supply their full name, address or date of birth -- or who are assisted by election judges.

"People raising questions about the poll-watcher program may be looking at it from the wrong perspective," said Dirk Haire, the legal counsel for the state GOP. "I wonder if they are concerned that efforts we take could uncover fraud."

Democratic National Committee counsel Joseph E. Sandler said he believes one goal is to create a record for the GOP to use to challenge a close election's outcome in court.

Kane disputed this: "I think what we're doing is protecting ourselves. The Democrats are going to have 500 roving lawyers out there looking for every possible legal challenge."

Sandler said the legal team organized by his party will "be there to help deter the Republicans from effectively carrying this out. So people's votes are safe and secure."

The poll-watcher programs also underscore how tense both parties are about turnout -- particularly among black voters -- in the final days of the contests for Maryland governor and a U.S. Senate seat.

Various polls have shown that the outcome changes dramatically depending on how many black voters cast ballots.

A recent Washington Post poll that measured black turnout at 25 percent showed Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D) with a lead of 10 percentage points over Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R). A poll published yesterday by the Baltimore Sun that assumed black turnout at 19 percent showed the race as a statistical dead heat.

Spencer A. Overton, the GWU professor, said a program designed to encourage Election Day challenges has the potential to disenfranchise black voters. "Parties target particular communities, and they don't apply the rules uniformly to all voters in all areas," Overton said.

Kane, however, said the program is in no way intended to bar black voters. Ehrlich said he would not tolerate such an effort, adding that his plan has been to woo black voters, not turn them away. "I think our message has really struck a chord."

False Voter Registrations Allegedly Submitted (KCS)

By Dave Helling

The Kansas City Star, November 2, 2006

A federal grand jury handed up indictments Wednesday against four people for allegedly submitting false voter registrations to the Kansas City election board.

The indictments — against Kwaim A. Stenson; Dale D. Franklin; Stephanie L. Davis, also known as Latisha Reed; and Brian Gardner — include two felony counts against each, the U.S. attorney's office said.

All four defendants worked this year as voter registration recruiters for the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, known as ACORN. They could not be reached for comment.

ACORN officials said they no longer work for the group. And, they emphasized, ACORN turned in the names of three of the defendants to authorities last month after learning of the problem.

"I think that our system is working because we caught these people," Andrew Gins-berg, head organizer for Kansas City ACORN, said in an interview. "Sometimes people cheat, whether they make eight dollars an hour or eight million an hour."

Each charge of "knowingly and willingly" filing the false information carries a potential penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

"Those who commit fraud in the electoral process dilute the votes of their fellow citizens," U.S. Attorney Bradley Schlozman said in a statement.

The statement added: "This national investigation is very much ongoing."

Claudie Harris, board president for Kansas City ACORN, said the indictments do not taint the 35,000 other voter registrations submitted by ACORN in Kansas City this year. "I think we're doing a great job," she said.

Kansas City's Republican election director, Ray James, said the indictments could help maintain public trust in the election process.

DOJ_NMG_0089907

"I hate for anyone to be prosecuted and suffer," James said. "But I've long been concerned about the rights of the general public to a fair election."

James and his Democratic counterpart, Sharon Turner Buie, have said that as many as 15,000 recently submitted voter registrations could be "questionable" — which they define as duplicates, unreadable applications, or containing information that doesn't match other existing records.

Last week the board chairwoman, Melodie Powell, said the board had turned over the investigation of the questionable cards to local and federal authorities.

ACORN has said that some of its applications may have contained honest mistakes. But it also says some of the problems may be political.

"I think if we had registered 35,000 Republicans, none of this would have been in the news," Ginsberg said.

Republicans were quick to respond. "This illegal assault on our election system should concern every voter in the state," party spokesman Paul Sloca said in a statement.

Democratic party spokesman Jack Cardetti said, "We absolutely support the prosecution of anyone who turns in fraudulent registration cards."

The Republican election director in St. Louis has criticized ACORN's voter registration process in that city. Its board sent letters to 5,000 voters asking them to re-verify their registrations, an action some critics called illegal.

Four ACORN Workers Indicted In Kansas City (SLPD)

By Jo Mannies

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, November 2, 2006

According to the Kansas City Star, the U.S. attorney's office over there has just announced it has indicted four workers with ACORN for "providing false information to the Kansas City Election Board, and…filing a false voter application with the board."

Each offense carries a penalty of up to five years in prison and a fine of $250,000; anyone found guilty also loses their right to vote.

ACORN, which stands for the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, has come under fire in a number of states — and the city of St. Louis — over allegedly fraudulent voter registrations.

ACORN national spokesman Kevin Whelan said the group actually had been responsible for three of the indictments. "We caught them; we turned them in," he said. "We're pleased that the FBI was able to bring these indictments and we provided them with information that helped with the investigation."

ACORN provided a copy of the letter it had sent to Kansas City authorities on Oct. 11.

ACORN officials have maintained that they welcome any arrests of workers found to have committed fraud, but that they don't want such problems to take away from the legitimate registrations honest workers have turned in.

ACORN sent out a release earlier Wednesday, saying that its workers in St. Louis plan on "knocking on 150,000 doors — three times on Election Day — to get out the vote!"

Meanwhile, the U.S. Attorney's office here Catherine Hanaway, U.S. attorney for Missouri's Eastern District, said Wednesday that her office has set up a hotline for people reporting possible election fraud or voter discrimination in connection with Tuesday's election. The number is 314-539-7733.

Assistant U.S. Attorney John Bodenhausen, an assistant U.S. attorney, will coordinate the office's efforts, which are part of the Justice Department's nationwide Election Day Program.

Complaints about ballot access problems or discrimination can also be made directly to the Civil Rights Division's Voting Section in Washington at 1-800-253-3931 or 202-307-2767.

Conference Looks At Human Trafficking Along Border (EPTIMES)

By Darren Meritz, El Paso Times

El Paso Times, November 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089908

Far West Texas and Southern New Mexico's proximity to the U.S.-Mexico border creates a unique environment in which immigrant-smuggling operations can easily change into abusive, exploitative human trafficking, experts said Wednesday at an El Paso conference.

Victims of human trafficking -- who often are manipulated into forced labor, prostitution, sex tourism and pornography -- are typically reluctant to come forward for fear of deportation, recriminations from their trafficker or insecurity about admitting they are victims, experts said.

"The difficult aspect of this is actually identifying the victims," said Paul Piñon, coordinator of the El Paso Human Trafficking Task Force and an organizer of the two-day conference titled "Human Trafficking: Working Together to End Modern-Day Slavery." The conference continues today.

About 300 representatives of law enforcement agencies and social service organizations, such as the Salvation Army and the Diocesan Migrant and Refugee Services, attended the third annual conference.

Piñon detailed several cases in the El Paso area that illustrated crimes possibly related to human trafficking and indicative of the close association of human trafficking and immigrant smuggling.

In one case, police charged two men in October 2005 with unlawful transport for holding an 18-year-old man and an 18-year-old pregnant woman against their will after they had crossed the border into the United States near Fabens.

In another case, police in February this year recovered a 15-year-old Salvadoran girl during an undercover sting operation at the Downtown Greyhound bus station. Her alleged kidnapper tried to hold her in exchange for a $5,500 ransom, Piñon said.

Though local figures were unavailable, officials at the conference Wednesday conference speculated that trafficking in the region is rising and cited a Department of State estimate that about 18,000 people are trafficked annually in the United States. The FBI estimates that human trafficking generates about $9 billion in profit each year.

"During the past few years, we have seen an increase in trafficking in this area, but they're difficult to investigate because victims don't want to cooperate," said Michelle Arriaga, a graduate student who presented a report on local efforts to curb the crime. "If they're in constant fear of being deported, it's very difficult for them to be willing to participate or discuss what's happened to them."

Jennifer Romero, a victim specialist for the FBI in El Paso, said that victims often experience debilitating psychological abuse at the hands of the trafficker, who lures them with the promise of good jobs and assistance navigating through the U.S. immigration process, she said.

Human traffickers use coercion and control, sometimes depriving victims of basic necessities and using long-term manipulation to instill enough fear and doubt to prevent them from reporting to authorities, she said. Victims then can be forced into jobs that are illicit and illegal, such as prostitution and sex tourism.

"Screw with the mind, and the body will follow," she said.

Darren Meritz may be reached at dmeritz@elpasotimes.com; 546-6127.

Annexation Excludes Vote (BSH)

By Ryan Lafontaine

Biloxi Sun Herald, November 2, 2006

WAVELAND - Newly annexed residents here will not have a say in Tuesday's party primaries for mayor and aldermen, according to a letter Wednesday from the Justice Department.

However, voters who register to vote before 5 p.m. on Monday will be allowed to vote for mayor and aldermen in the Dec. 5 general election.

The city had been awaiting an official decision from the federal government for several weeks on whether nearly 1,000 residents would be included in next week's vote.

The residents officially became Waveland citizens in July when the city settled an annexation dispute with neighboring Bay St. Louis in a deal that gave Waveland a stretch of land along the western right of way of Mississippi 603.

DOJ_NMG_0089909

According to federal legislation adopted in the 1960s, the Justice Department must review changes in ballot procedures, voting districts and other electoral rules in several states - mostly in the South - to ensure that minorities maintain influence in elections.

In the settlement, Bay St. Louis took a massive slice of land between the highway and the Jourdan River, stretching north to Interstate 10.

Many residents on both sides of the highway were anti-annexation, and some believe Waveland purposely delayed a federal decision to eliminate the disgruntled new voters from this year's election.

Earlier this year, Waveland attorney Zach Butterworth said the city was hoping to have a decision at least 30 days before the party primaries, which would have given the new residents time to become registered voters.

On Wednesday, Butterworth dismissed claims of malice and said federal approval simply took longer than the city first thought.

GOP mayoral candidate Craig Cameron, who is looking to make history by becoming the city's first black mayor and just the second Republican ever to hold the city's top office, said a chunk of new votes made available days before the election could muddy the campaign for any candidate.

"I have no way of knowing whether anything was done to purposely exclude them," Cameron said. "Having new voters at the last minute could complicate things for all the candidates, but I am very sympathetic to (the new residents') concerns."

Mayor Tommy Longo said the court denied a request last year from Waveland, asking to postpone an annexation decision until the two cities could recover from Hurricane Katrina.

"There wasn't much we could do," Longo said. "The annexed land was handed to us, and we asked to get a decision on the new voters as quickly as we could, but we were at the mercy of the federal government."

Activist Calls For Cop Probe In DeKalb Rally Set For Friday Over 31 Shootings Since 2001 (AJC)

By David Simpson, Mae Gentry, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 2, 2006

A DeKalb County civil rights activist Wednesday called for an outside investigation of a string of shootings by police, and the sister of a slain suspect plans to organize a protest this week to demand that the department do a better job of training its officers.

"Bring in the FBI, the GBI and the Justice Department to investigate all of the shootings," said John Evans, former president of the DeKalb County chapter of the NAACP. "And then set up a civilian review board [to review future cases]."

An article in Wednesday's Atlanta Journal-Constitution prompted the call for the outside investigation, said Evans, who now heads up a local civil rights group based in Lithonia known as Operation LEAD.

The AJC examined internal reports of 31 shootings from 2001 to 2005 and found that officers had a pattern of violating department policy, such as forcing confrontations with armed suspects without backup, shooting into moving cars and neglecting safety rules for handling suspects once they were in custody.

Most of the officers involved were not disciplined, the newspaper found, and the department did not address the pattern of violations in its training programs.

Iffat Muhammad, whose brother was fatally shot by a DeKalb officer in August, said the newspaper's report confirmed her concerns about the recent string of shootings.

Her brother was shot by an officer checking on a trespassing complaint. He attacked the officer and tried to get her gun, police said.

"Basically, we were told this doesn't happen in DeKalb County," said Muhammad, the president of the DeKalb County chapter of the New Order Human Rights Organization. "Yes, it does, from 2001 to 2005 and into 2006."

Nick Marinelli, the county's interim police chief, and DeKalb Chief Executive Officer Vernon Jones did not respond to messages seeking comment on Evans' and Muhammad's statements, which were made late Wednesday afternoon.

The GBI can only enter a shooting case at the request of the law enforcement agency, said GBI spokesman John Bankhead. An FBI spokesman declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0089910

In the meantime, the department is putting together a process to detect patterns of problems, Marinelli said earlier.

The department also is making changes to its training after a consultant found it hadn't paid enough attention to "de-escalation" of confrontations, Marinelli said.

So far this year, DeKalb County police officers have shot and killed 11 suspects — the highest number in metro Atlanta. One officer also has been killed.

The department hasn't finished its investigations of those cases, but Marinelli has said he is expediting the process and plans to release his findings soon.

In its examination of the 31 shootings, the AJC found that officers had violated department policy in nine of them. Two officers were fired, one was suspended and another was reprimanded.

In light of the findings, community leaders called on the department to place a greater emphasis on training.

"The message is train them properly, follow procedures," said Muhammad, whose group is planning a protest outside police headquarters at 2 p.m. Friday.

"We're not saying that the outcomes would be different, but who knows? They may have been," she said.

The newspaper's article comes at a time when the county is conducting a search for a new police chief. Marinelli is among the candidates being considered by Jones.

Civil rights activist Gerald Rose, the founder and CEO of the New Order organization, said Wednesday he hopes Jones "looks at the true facts" about the shootings and ensures that the next chief takes the issue seriously.

Kristie Swink, a spokeswoman for Jones, said, "The next DeKalb County police chief will ensure that all officers are properly trained and well-equipped in order to protect the safety of every resident in DeKalb County."

In south DeKalb, constituents have been concerned about the shootings, said County Commissioner Lee May, who wants to hear more about Marinelli's training plans.

"That is definitely something that I'm going to ask to see," May said.

Staff writer Ty Tagami contributed to this article.

US State Attorney General Gets Patient Records From Abortion Clinics After 2-year Effort (FINDLAW/AP)

By John Hanna, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 2, 2006

(AP) - TOPEKA, Kansas-The state attorney general said that his office has received the records of 90 patients from two abortion clinics and is reviewing them for possible crimes, the culmination of an effort that prompted concerns over patient privacy.

Attorney General Phill Kline, one of the United States' foremost abortion opponents, said Tuesday the targets of his investigation are rapists, sex offenders with child victims - and doctors involved in abortions. Those doctors could include physicians performing abortions, providing a second opinion for late-term abortions or failing to report abuse of a child.

The clinics had argued that giving the attorney general access to the records would invade patients' privacy.

Shawnee County District Judge Richard Anderson subpoenaed the records at Kline's request in September 2004, concluding there was probable cause to believe they contained evidence of crimes.

While Anderson didn't give Kline unfettered access to the records, the state Supreme Court imposed new guidelines for having them reviewed and edited before they were given to the district court. Under that process, neither Kline nor the judge saw the names of the patients.

Kline's office received redacted copies of the records a week ago.

His disclosure came a week before the Nov. 7 general election, with Kline, a Republican, in a tight race with Johnson County prosecutor Paul Morrison, a Democrat. Morrison has made Kline's pursuit of the records a key issue in his campaign, even suggesting the efforts are an abuse of power.

Because the records are redacted, individual patients cannot be identified, Kline said. He could seek the names of any victims of child rape to build cases against the perpetrators, he said.

In addition to child rape, possible crimes include potentially illegal late-term abortions, incest, forcible rape and making a "false writing," he said.

The records came from a clinic in Overland Park, Kansas, and a clinic in Wichita, Kansas, operated by Dr. George Tiller.

Pedro Irigonegaray, an attorney for the clinic, said that the records don't show any wrongdoing by the clinics and that if the clinics had not fought back, the attorney general would have seen unedited files.

"Nothing whatsoever in those records supports the proposition that our clients have violated the law," Irigonegaray said.

Outside Money Fuels Battle On Abortion (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

The fierce battle over abortion in South Dakota has cost some $4 million, much of that from places other than South Dakota.

That is what the two largest political groups campaigning on the issue say they have collected in the months leading up to next week, when voters there will decide whether to uphold a ban on nearly all abortions in what would become the most restrictive such law passed in the nation in at least 14 years.

Vote Yes for Life, a group that has pressed for approval of the law, said on Wednesday that it had received $2.15 million in cash, as well as contributions of $39,000 in goods and services. The South Dakota Campaign for Healthy Families, which has urged voters to reject the provision legislators adopted in February and the governor signed in March, said it had collected $1.8 million since late June, as well as in-kind contributions of less than $50,000.

All along, each side had said its efforts were being driven by South Dakota natives, but had complained that the other side was being pressed on and heavily financed by well organized national organizations from Washington and elsewhere.

As a deadline for filing financial data to state officials arrived this week, both sides issued news releases that show they have received money from outside South Dakota.

The South Dakota Campaign for Healthy Families said that of the $1.8 million, less than $160,000 — about 9 percent — came from South Dakota; the campaign got 738 contributions from state residents, it said. The rest — more than 10,000 donations totaling more than $1.6 million — came from elsewhere. Vote Yes For Life, meanwhile, said that 65 percent of its money came from inside the state.

Military Pressed Over Expressions Of Faith (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

The U.S. military is being buffeted by dueling legal claims over religion, with one set of plaintiffs contending that the Pentagon is suppressing evangelical Christianity and another set arguing just the opposite -- that the brass gives the most aggressive evangelicals free rein to proselytize in uniform.

Although Congress intervened this fall, directing the Air Force and Navy to rescind controversial new policies on religion, chaplains on both sides of the issue said the congressional action only muddied the waters.

"Congress took action, but who won? I'm not sure. The only thing I can safely predict is, get ready for new controversies over the place of evangelism in the armed forces," said retired Navy Capt. Gary R. Pollitt, executive director of the Military Chaplains Association, a private, nonprofit group representing chaplains in all the services.

In the latest lawsuit, an evangelical Christian chaplain is charging the Navy with violating his First Amendment rights by forbidding him to pray "in the name of Jesus" at public ceremonies.

Chaplain Gordon J. Klingenschmitt filed the lawsuit Oct. 25 in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia with assistance from the Rutherford Institute, a Charlottesville-based public interest law firm that sued the Pentagon over its policy of requiring U.S. servicewomen stationed in Saudi Arabia to wear a Muslim head covering.

Klingenschmitt's suit alleges that the Navy has effectively established a "civic religion" and is "suppressing [his] Christian faith" by requiring him to offer nonsectarian prayers when speaking to diverse groups of sailors.

DOJ_NMG_0089912

He also alleges that his objections to the Navy policy are the real reason that his commanders court-martialed him in September and are now in the process of kicking him out of the Navy. Klingenschmitt was found guilty of disobeying an order by wearing his uniform at a political protest in front of the White House.

"Can the Navy censor a chaplain's prayers, yes or no? That's what my suit is asking," Klingenschmitt said yesterday.

A spokesman for the Navy, Lt. j.g. Karl Lettow, said it does not comment on pending litigation. Navy officials have said that chaplains are free to pray however they wish in voluntary worship services but that the Navy encourages them to "respect the diversity of their audience" when addressing mandatory gatherings.

Meanwhile, a former White House counsel whose lawsuit against the Air Force was dismissed last week said he intends to refile a broader suit, or possibly multiple suits, accusing all the armed services of allowing evangelical Christians to pressure members of other faiths.

U.S. District Judge James A. Parker dismissed the initial suit by Michael L. "Mikey" Weinstein because it was based on alleged incidents of religious bias at the Air Force Academy, but neither Weinstein nor any of his five co-plaintiffs claimed to have suffered from those incidents.

Weinstein, who spent 10 years as an Air Force lawyer and worked in the Reagan White House, said he is now picking the best cases from "a veritable cornucopia of new plaintiffs and accusations."

Some evangelical groups and individuals "believe they have an illimitable right to push their biblical worldview in the military, 24 hours a day, seven days a week, up and down the chain of command," Weinstein said. "Our view is that you certainly have that right at certain times and places that are well established by the U.S. Constitution and our case law. . . . But you can't do it on the job when you're wearing the uniform during the workday."

Reports of aggressive evangelism at the Air Force Academy led the service to issue interim guidelines last year urging commanders to be "sensitive" about sharing their faith and called for a minute of silence or at most a "brief, non-sectarian" prayer at mandatory gatherings.

Evangelical groups complained about the Air Force guidelines and a similar Navy instruction, and House Republicans proposed legislation to guarantee that chaplains can always pray as they wish. In a compromise, that wording was dropped from a defense authorization bill, but a legislative report urged both the Air Force and the Navy to rescind their policies. Congress is expected to hold hearings on the issue next year.

Marriage Limits Set To Face Stiff Fight In 3 States (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

Voters in eight states are expected Tuesday to pass constitutional amendments that define marriage as the union of one man and one woman. But in at least three states, the margin of victory -- if there is one -- may be razor-thin.

In Arizona, a recent Northern Arizona University (NAU) poll shows Proposition 107 squeaking by, 51 percent to 42 percent, which is "way too close for comfort," said Cathi Herrod of Protect Marriage Arizona Coalition.

The Arizona amendment has attracted huge public support -- more than 300,000 people signed petitions to get it on the ballot -- and survived a court challenge. But it also has been targeted for defeat by a well-organized coalition called Arizona Together, which says the amendment will hurt both heterosexual and homosexual couples.

Several polls, including one by Arizona State University (ASU) and KAET-TV, indicate the amendment will be soundly defeated. Recent ASU polling results, which show 30 percent of voters supporting the amendment, "reaffirm that Arizona voters do not want to take away health care from families," said state Rep. Kyrsten Sinema, a leader of Arizona Together.

Mrs. Herrod said NAU used the ballot language in its poll and is a more accurate reflection of voter intent. But she worries that the opponents' vigorous campaign and voter complacency will pose problems. "People think these marriage amendments pass easily. That's not true," she said.

In Wisconsin and South Dakota, polls have shown marriage amendments headed for defeat. Fair Wisconsin, which opposes the amendment, has promised to run "one of the biggest campaigns in the state in 2006." In South Dakota, a poll released in August showed the amendment losing, 49 percent to 41 percent, and South Dakotans Against Discrimination has initiated a radio and print campaign to educate voters about this "poorly worded" and "extreme" amendment, said spokesman Jon Hoadley.

DOJ_NMG_0089913

But traditional-values groups in those states say they have no intention of losing. "There is just a groundswell of movement in support of this amendment," said Julaine Appling of Vote Yes for Marriage in Madison, Wis., noting that recent polls have consistently put them ahead by 51 percent to 53 percent.

Rob Regier of the South Dakota Family Policy Council said he can't explain polls showing a defeat for the marriage amendment, but he noted that at least one poll showed the amendment winning by a landslide. South Dakota voters are "still pretty conservative," he said. "I don't see South Dakota being the first and only state to lose a marriage amendment."

Polls in South Carolina, Tennessee and Virginia suggest those amendments will pass. In Idaho, citizens lobbied lawmakers for more than three years to pass an amendment, and at least one poll showed a 2-to-1 margin of support, "so I think it will pass," said Marriage Protection Alliance leader Julie Lynde.

Colorado has two marriage-related measures that are expected to pass: A new Denver Post poll of 625 voters indicated a marriage amendment would win, 51 percent to 43 percent, as would a domestic partnership law, 47 percent to 42 percent.

Female Voters Courted In Affirmative-Action Fight (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

DETROIT -- The women are having their say in Michigan politics this year. With Democrats trying to reelect Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm and Sen. Debbie Stabenow over their male Republican challengers, no state has a more feminist cast to its ballot.

And, in a referendum fight over affirmative action, female voters will probably decide whether Michigan becomes the third state to outlaw preferential treatment for minorities and women in education, state employment and public contracting.

Ward Connerly, the Californian who sponsored successful anti-affirmative-action initiatives in California and Washington state during the 1990s, has brought an identical measure to Michigan.

His spokeswoman here is Jennifer Gratz, who was the plaintiff in a lawsuit accusing the University of Michigan of discriminating against her for being white when it did not admit her as a student a decade ago. The Supreme Court ultimately upheld the university's right to give preference to "under-represented groups" but barred it from artificially boosting their entrance qualification scores.

After her rejection, Gratz said in an interview, she contacted Connerly and asked him to bring the fight to end racial and gender preferences to Michigan. It has turned into an expensive and bitter battle -- with women's votes the main prize in what polls suggest is a tossup election.

Trisha Stein, campaign manager for One United Michigan, the broad coalition fighting the measure to ban affirmative action, said polling shows that "if this is a campaign about gender, the proposal will not pass, but if it's a campaign about race, it will likely pass."

The opposition to Connerly looks formidable. Stein counts more than 200 organizations on her side, including major Michigan businesses, labor unions, and religious and civic groups. One United Michigan has raised and spent more than $3.3 million.

But Connerly faced equally formidable establishment opposition in California and Washington and prevailed. In an interview, he said Michigan has presented "more obstacles than I expected," but he still predicted victory. "People see simple fairness in what we're proposing," he said.

On Friday, his supporters in Michigan reported raising $1.3 million and spending slightly more than half, with the rest in reserve. More than $1 million came from Connerly's California organization and similar groups elsewhere.

The proposed amendment to the state constitution would "ban affirmative action programs that give preferential treatment to groups or individuals based on their race, gender, color, ethnicity or national origin for public employment, education or contracting purposes."

DOJ_NMG_0089914

Debbie Dingell, a General Motors executive who is co-chairman of One United Michigan, said that if the initiative passed, it would jeopardize special treatment programs for breast and cervical cancer and end an effort to attract more women into science and mathematics careers.

Gratz says such fears are exaggerated. "I have a degree in math," she said, "and colleges are eager to have more women coming into the field. This is a distraction from the real issue: discrimination on the basis of race and gender."

Church groups and civil rights organizations in Detroit are trying to mobilize the African American community in opposition to the initiative. But at a rally of female activists in a local Teamsters hall, leaders complained that it is difficult to communicate the message that a vote in favor of affirmative action requires marking the ballot "no."

One United Michigan's radio and television ads are targeted at women, with one concluding that the measure "hurts Michigan's mothers and daughters, taking away opportunities, risking their future."

Connerly's side ran ads during the summer but has delayed going back on the airwaves until the final days. A tracking poll for One United Michigan conducted by Steve Mitchell, a veteran Michigan pollster, found a sharp gender split on the proposition.

In the first few days after the ads began in mid-October, opposition among women rose from 36 percent to 49 percent, and most recently it has leveled off at 47 percent, with 35 percent opposed. Men supported the measure, 49 percent to 40 percent. Mitchell said the outcome is too close to judge, especially because there is a history of white voters fudging their answers to pollsters on racial matters.

Mitchell also noted that on ballot issues, the undecided typically break to the "no" side, but he cautioned that the racial aspect of the measure might change the pattern.

There is also a partisan split in the polling. Although GOP gubernatorial candidate Dick DeVos and other prominent Republicans have urged a "no" vote, 63 percent of Republicans in the poll said yes, while 59 percent of Democrats said no. Independents were split.

ANTITRUST:

CVS Buying Caremark For About $21.2B (AP)

By LUCAS L. JOHNSON II

AP, November 2, 2006

NASHVILLE, Tenn. - Drugstore operator CVS Corp. announced Wednesday it is buying pharmacy benefits manager Caremark Rx Inc. for about $21.2 billion in stock, creating a company that will have formidable power in negotiating lower prices with drug companies.

The deal would create a $75 billion drug distribution powerhouse that could compete more effectively for customers as Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and other retailers introduce programs selling cheap generic drugs.

"This is all about giving the consumers unparalleled access and choice ... It will help providers deliver the right drugs at the right time," CVS CEO Tom Ryan said in a conference call.

But investors sent shares of both companies lower, and some analysts raised concerns about integrating the two businesses.

CVS shares tumbled $2.32, or 7.4 percent, to close at $29.06 on the New York Stock Exchange while Caremark lost $1.06, or 2.2 percent, to finish at $48.17. Caremark shareholders will be getting CVS stock in the deal.

SunTrust Robinson Humphrey analyst David Magee wrote in a note that the deal could be seen as too much risk for CVS which is still digesting acquisitions from the past couple of years, including purchasing the Sav-On drug store chain made earlier this year. He also wrote the deal could distract CVS from growing its existing business lines.

He said the he was optimistic about the long-term implications of the deal because of the size and buying power of the new company.

Company officials said the deal would create significant benefits for employers and health plans through more effective cost management and new programs, and for consumers through expanded choice and more personalized services.

DOJ_NMG_0089915

"Combining Caremark's expertise in serving employers and health plans with CVS's expertise in serving consumers will create a powerful force for change in pharmacy services," said Edwin "Mac" Crawford, Chairman, CEO and President of Caremark, which is based in Nashville.

The merger brings together companies from two industries that have had a sometimes bitter rivalry. PBMs offer customers the option of purchasing their drugs through the mail for reduced prices. Drug stores have argued such policies cut into their revenue and compromise patient safety because it deprives them of access to a pharmacist.

The growing mail order business has been hurting drug stores' market share, said Morgan Stanley analyst Mark Wiltamuth. CVS has its own mail order subsidy and analysts said buying Caremark would bolster that portion of its business, analysts said.

The companies called the deal a "merger of equals" and under the terms, Caremark shareholders will receive 1.67 shares of Woonsocket, R.I.-based CVS for each share of Caremark. CVS shareholders will own 54.5 percent of the combined company and Caremark shareholders will own 45.5 percent.

The new company will be called CVS/Caremark Corp. and will be headquartered in Woonsocket.

The pharmacy services business will remain based in Nashville. Combined 2006 revenue for the companies are expected total about $75 billion, a joint statement said.

Caremark's Crawford will become the chairman of the combined company and Ryan will become president and chief executive of the combined company.

After the markets closed Wednesday, CVS reported its third-quarter profit rose 13 percent on higher same-store sales.

Net income grew to $280.7 million, or 33 cents per share, from $249.2 million, or 30 cents per share, a year ago.

Revenue rose 25 percent to $11.21 billion.

Analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial expected earnings per share of 32 cents on revenue of $11.24 billion.

Caremark reported a 25 percent increase in third-quarter profit on strong sales in the company's mail-order and retail businesses.

Net income grew to $288.6 million, or 67 cents per share, from $231.4 million, or 51 cents per share, a year ago.

Revenue rose 13 percent to $9.14 billion.

Analysts expected earnings per share of 63 cents on revenue of $9.23 billion.

Glenn Garmont, an analyst with First Albany Corp., said before the announcement that the deal was likely spurred in part by the fear that Wal-Mart, "will emerge as a fierce new competitor following its introduction of selected $4 generic drugs."

Wal-Mart announced last week that it is extending its $4 for a one-month supply of 314 different generic prescriptions to make the program available at 1,008 stores in 27 states.

However, Ryan and Crawford said Wal-Mart's action didn't affect their decision to merge.

"We've been working on all this for some time," Crawford said. "This didn't have anything to do with Wal-Mart."

Garmont said such a deal between Caremark and CVS "would spawn others, and we view all PBMs ... as potential take-out targets."

Still, some analysts said the deal might face antitrust concerns. Barry Barnett, a health care consultant for PricewaterhouseCoopers, said regulators might be concerned that Caremark might unfairly funnel business to CVS pharmacies at the expense of other drug stores.

Caremark buys drugs from pharmaceutical companies directly and then distributes them through its national network of about 60,000 pharmacies and seven mail-order offices. It provides services for over 2,000 corporate, insurance, managed care, government, and union health plans.

Caremark posted 2005 net income of $932.4 million on sales of $32.99 billion.

CVS is the nation's largest pharmacy chain by prescriptions filled, and is second to Walgreen Co. in total sales. It operates more than 6,200 stores in 45 states and reported 2005 net income of $1.22 billion on sales of $37.01 billion.

The Securities and Exchange Commission has been investigating whether executive stock options were backdated at Caremark, company officials have acknowledged. In September, Caremark's Crawford said the company is in "good shape" regarding the investigation and doesn't expect to have to restate earnings.

DOJ_NMG_0089916

Kazaa Said To Pay $10 Million In Settlement (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

Kazaa, the file-sharing successor to Napster that record companies have been battling for years, has reached a tentative settlement in the last of three major lawsuits against it.

Under the agreement with the National Music Publishers' Association, Kazaa agreed to pay music publishers and songwriters a "substantial sum," the association said. Though it not disclose the figure, a person with knowledge of the terms of the deal said it was about $10 million.

Kazaa also agreed to continue using filtering software intended to prevent unauthorized exchange of copyrighted songs over its network.

The music and motion picture industries sued Kazaa, as well as the rival file-sharing networks Grokster and Morpheus, in 2001, claiming that they facilitated the illegal distribution of copyrighted material.

Kazaa, which is operated by Sharman Networks in Australia, settled separate lawsuits by recording artists and motion picture studios in July, agreeing to pay a total of $115 million. That left one major case from 2001 still unresolved, the one filed by the association, which represents songwriters and their publishers.

The association notified the United States District Court in Los Angeles on Monday that the two sides had reached an agreement in principle. The terms of that agreement are subject to final court approval, and also must be approved by the board of the publishers' association and the individual plaintiffs.

"The anticipated settlement represents an important victory for songwriters, music publishers and music fans alike," said David Israelite, the publishers' association president and chief executive, in a written statement today. "It will be another key milestone in the ongoing transformation of the digital music marketplace to one that will allow legal services to thrive."

A spokeswoman for Kazaa in the United States said the company had no comment on the settlement or its terms.

The settlement underscores how the tables have turned in recent years on file-sharing networks, whose days of operating freely outside the realm of copyright law appear to be ending. When Kazaa settled the two lawsuits earlier this year, it also struck licensing deals with major record labels — Universal Music Group, Sony BMG, Warner Music and the EMI Group — to distribute their copyrighted material over its network and pay them royalties. It also agreed to employ filtering technology.

Napster, the pioneering file-sharing network that became a scourge of the record industry, earlier reached a similar agreement with the music industry, but not before it was forced to shut down operations.

The record industry's success in fighting Napster led to the growth of networks like Kazaa, Grokster and Morpheus, which allowed users to do similar things. Though they hoped to escape Napster's fate by using somewhat different technology, those networks eventually ran into the same legal issues that Napster had.

Last year, in the case Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios v. Grokster Ltd., the United States Supreme Court ruled that file-sharing services could be held liable for contributing to copyright infringement. That ruling gave the record companies and motion picture studios leverage to press the file-sharing services to reach settlements.

Grokster resolved all its suits with the industry and is no longer in operation. A federal court in Los Angeles last month found that Morpheus had assisted in copyright infringement; its operator, StreamCast, is in settlement talks with the movie and music industries.

LimeWire, another service that has been sued by the record industry, continues to allow users to download songs without the industry's permission, and Grokster, Kazaa or Morpheus, has indicated no willingness to settle. Instead, LimeWire has mounted an aggressive legal defense, and last month filed a counterclaim against the record industry.

Fate Of Canadian Steelmaker To Be Decided Soon (BSUN/BLOOM)

Bloomberg News

The Baltimore Sun, November 2, 2006

Mittal Steel Co., the world's largest steel producer, said the trust holding Canadian steelmaker Dofasco Inc. will likely make a decision by the end of this month on whether to sell the business to ThyssenKrupp AG.

DOJ_NMG_0089917

The Netherlands trust, created by Arcelor SA in April to try to thwart Mittal's hostile takeover bid, will likely decide whether to allow the sale by Nov. 28 to comply with an antitrust agreement with the U.S. Justice Department, Carlos Hernandez, Mittal's U.S. legal counsel, said Oct. 30.

Mittal must sell either Dofasco or one of two tin mills in Weirton, W.Va., or Sparrows Point, after the Justice Department said in May the merger between Mittal and Arcelor would lead to less competition in tin mill products in the Eastern United States. Mittal is required by the department to use its "best efforts" to try to sell Dofasco.

"We think we've done everything possible to make the sale of Dofasco," Hernandez said. "We are now awaiting on the trustees to say what they are going to do. We are fairly confident it will be before the 28th."

Luxembourg-based Arcelor agreed to buy Dofasco for $4.95 billion in January, giving it 10 percent of the North American automotive steel market. Rotterdam-based Mittal in January agreed to sell Dofasco to ThyssenKrupp if its takeover of Arcelor was successful.

The trustees are Allan Tuttle, a lawyer at Washington-based Patton Boggs LLP, former Arcelor board member Robert Hudry and Frederic van Bladel, who headed legal affairs at Arcelor.

"It still looks very difficult for them to sell Dofasco," Credit Suisse analyst Michael Shillaker wrote in an Oct. 18 note. "The ultimate legal decision is that of the Dutch stichting [trust], and why will the stichting agree as a value proposition to sell Dofasco at a lower price than Arcelor paid for it?"

No legal impediment prevents Arcelor Mittal from selling Dofasco to ThyssenKrupp if the directors of the trust agree, Hernandez said. ThyssenKrupp AG, Germany's largest steelmaker, expects to acquire Canadian steelmaker Dofasco from Arcelor Mittal "soon," Karl-Ulrich Koehler, the president of ThyssenKrupp's steel unit, said on Sept. 29.

Orthopedics Maker Is Said To Be In Talks To Buy A U.S. Rival (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

Smith & Nephew, the British maker of orthopedic products, is in early talks to acquire an American rival, Biomet, the nation's largest manufacturer of artificial hips, knees and other orthopedic devices, for more than $9 billion, people briefed on the negotiations said yesterday.

The preliminary talks come more than six months after Biomet hired Morgan Stanley to help consider "strategic alternatives focused on enhancing shareholder value."

Other suitors, including several private equity firms, have also expressed interest in Biomet, these people said. Rivals like Zimmer Holdings; DePuy, a subsidiary of Johnson & Johnson; and the Stryker Corporation have not participated in the auction, these people said, because of potential antitrust concerns.

Speculation has been rife in recent weeks that Smith & Nephew, which is based in London, had approached Biomet, and its shares rose more than 16 percent in the last month. Biomet's stock fell 44 cents yesterday, to $37.40 a share. Smith & Nephew has long been viewed as the natural buyer for Biomet, analysts said.

Biomet, which is based in Warsaw, Ind., is expected to fetch at least $10 billion, analysts suggest, though the company still could decide against selling and call off the auction entirely.

The auction was a result, in part, of a sluggish financial performance and the abrupt and unexpected resignation of Dane A. Miller, Biomet's longtime president and chief executive, in March.

Biomet's board responded to Mr. Miller's resignation by skipping over the two operating executives under Mr. Miller and naming Daniel P. Hann, Biomet's general counsel, as the company's interim leader.

One cloud hanging over Biomet is a Department of Justice investigation that started in June over possible criminal violations of antitrust regulations in the manufacturing and sale of orthopedic implant devices among the top companies in the industry.

Tribune To Weigh Offers For Parts Of Its Holdings Decision Follows Tepid Bids For All Of Media Company; A Prod To Private Equity? By SARAH ELLISON (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

Tribune Co., the big media company whose properties include the flagship Chicago Tribune, the Los Angeles Times and the Chicago Cubs baseball team, has told prospective bidders it is prepared to consider offers to sell off parts of itself after receiving lower bids than expected for the entire company, said people familiar with the situation.

The move raises the prospect that Tribune Co., whose current market value is $8.4 billion, could become the second large U.S. newspaper chain this year to drastically remake itself under investor pressure. The changes signal tectonic shifts in newspaper ownership in an age when readership and advertising, threatened by the Internet and other new technologies, are under siege. It also marks an about-face for Tribune management, which earlier this year rebuffed calls from its biggest shareholder, the Chandler family, to consider a sale or a breakup.

For the newspaper industry, the postwar era has been dominated by giant newspaper chains like Tribune and Gannett Co. snapping up regional newspapers and creating broad, publicly traded companies generating large profits even as circulation slowly declined. But the surge in online news, a steep drop-off in younger readers and the migration of advertising to the Internet has hammered profits and stocks for many media companies, which have been slashing costs and seeking other new strategies.

A breakup of part or all of Tribune would follow the full breakup earlier this year of Knight-Ridder Inc., which sold all of its 32 newspapers -- a portfolio which included the Miami Herald and the Philadelphia Inquirer -- to McClatchy Co. It turned around and sold 12 Knight-Ridder papers, some to local business interests.

Indeed, a slew of local owners like the investor group that purchased the Philadelphia Inquirer and Daily News from Knight-Ridder could be lined up to take Wall Street's place in the industry. Among others, former General Electric Co. Chief Executive Jack Welch has said he would be interested in buying the Boston Globe from the New York Times Co. with partners including Jack Connors, an advertising executive.

As Tribune's problems have deepened, a host of wealthy and well-connected prospective bidders have made public their desires to pick off a few of its 11 daily newspapers. Most coveted is the Los Angeles Times, for which at least three wealthy Los Angelenos have expressed interest: Entertainment mogul David Geffen, real-estate magnate Eli Broad and Ron Burkle, who made his fortune from supermarkets. The Times generates an estimated $250 million in annual earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation and amortization and could be valued at $2 billion or more.

Other groups have circled the Hartford (Conn.) Courant and Newsday on New York's Long Island.

Even while opening up the bidding, Tribune plans to continue discussions with private-equity groups that have expressed interest in the entire company, said people familiar with the matter. So far, four private-equity bidding teams have submitted nonbinding expressions of interest, putting a value on Tribune in the "low $30s," said a person familiar with the situation.

That's right around where Tribune stock has been trading. Shares yesterday closed down 71 cents at $32.62 in 4 p.m. trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Tribune declined to comment.

People familiar with the process said Tribune is unlikely to be disbanded into dozens of small pieces. If anything, these people said, shopping individual assets may be a way to flush out higher prices from the private-equity groups. As in any negotiation, these people said, each side is pushing for whatever advantages it can claim. Moreover, Tribune may resist offers for some properties, such as its flagship newspaper, and could ultimately decide to do nothing.

Still, it seems clear Tribune has been losing leverage in recent discussions with bidders. Earlier this week, the Audit Bureau of Circulations reported that nearly every major newspaper in the nation suffered a drop in circulation in the past six months. Tribune was among the worst hit.

DESKTOP NEWS ALERTS

1

Get alerts for breaking news -- such as Fed moves, major world events and big mergers -- delivered straight to your desktop. Alerts will appear in a small window on your screen, much like an instant-messaging window. See a sample and get more information.2

Total average weekday paid circulation at the Los Angeles Times, its biggest newspaper, dropped 8% in the past six months, to 775,766 as of Sept. 30. The Chicago Tribune's circulation fell 1.7% to 576,132, while Newsday was down 5% to 410,579.

DOJ_NMG_0089919

More broadly, Tribune has been disappointed by the overall tepid response of bidders so far. "I'm somewhat surprised," said John Miller, an analyst at Chicago-based Ariel Capital Management, one of the company's biggest holders with several million shares. Given recent sales prices for other newspapers, and valuable Tribune properties such as the Cubs and an interest in online jobs company CareerBuilder, he said, the prices being offered "seem too low."

That has forced Tribune to reconsider its reorganization plan, and could push the Chicago-based company to sell off assets it once considered untouchable. Such is the case with the Cubs, which the company acquired in 1981 for just $20 million. Today the Cubs are one of the most highly visible franchises in sports, despite their notorious losing ways. At least one analyst now estimates the team is valued at as much as $750 million.

Meanwhile, Tribune's TV stations as a group could sell for as much as $4 billion, according to industry estimates. Several recent television stations have sold for about 12 times cash flow, including WATL in Atlanta. Since the broadcast group raked in $436 million in operating profit in 2005, that would put their price tag at about $5.2 billion. But the price is likely to be lower than that because Tribune has sold three stations this year, and some stations -- such as two in New Orleans -- could be difficult to unload.

Almost all of Tribune's stations are affiliated with the upstart CW network, formed this fall by merging assets from the defunct WB and UPN networks. While audiences for the CW are slightly larger than those for the WB -- Tribune's CW stations were all former WB affiliates -- its future performance is unclear.

"Selling some of these stations is going to be a pretty steep hill for Tribune to climb because the CW is still an unproven asset," says Elliot Evers, managing director of San Francisco's Media Venture Partners.

Potential bidders for at least some stations include Belo Corp., Gannett, and CBS Corp., which already owns 11 stations that are CW affiliates. Although CBS's station portfolio reaches about 38% of the country -- 39% is the federal limit -- it could buy WPIX in New York and WGN in Chicago under rules allowing for one broadcaster to own two stations in a market under certain circumstances. CBS already owns a station in New York and one in Chicago.

A person familiar with the matter said CBS has looked at Tribune's New York and Chicago stations but cautioned that nothing is imminent and that the two sides were nowhere near agreement in valuation. A CBS spokesman declined to comment.

E.W. Scripps Co., which owns 70% of the Food Network, is the obvious buyer for Tribune's 30% stake in that cable channel, but the two remain far apart on price. "We continue to have an interest in acquiring Tribune's minority stake in Food Network, but at a price that creates value for our shareholders," said Scripps spokesman Tim Stautberg.

A big problem in any breakup plan would be taxes. Unlike a full corporate sale -- which would create minimal taxes -- Tribune would have to pay a tax bill on each individual divestment. That means that buyers will have to make highly attractive offers for each individual asset, covering both the tax costs and the value offered by the private-equity consortiums.

The Tribune's newspapers have a very low tax basis of about $2 billion to $3 billion, estimates Lehman Bros. corporate tax expert Robert Willens, and could likely fetch high prices that would trigger a big tax bill. However, he said, it would be relatively easy to get around that tax bill by spinning off individual newspapers into publicly traded subsidiaries. A potential buyer could then buy a controlling stake in the new subsidiary.

That could figure into another big part of this process: How the Federal Communications Commission will treat special exemptions previously awarded to Tribune allowing it to operate newspapers and television stations in the same market. The exemption -- from FCC rules that limit cross-ownership -- disappears once the assets are sold.

Private-equity firms apparently are comfortable with the asset questions, said people familiar with the matter. But getting new waivers may be timely and complicated, and could get wrapped into an always unpredictable political and legal process.

Earlier this year, Tribune had pursued a different approach to deal with pressure from the Chandlers and other shareholders. CEO Dennis FitzSimons opted for a $2 billion stock buyback and undertaking $500 million of asset sales. But pressure for more decisive action grew as Tribune's stock price weakened after the buyback was completed.

Even when the company announced it would explore alternatives to maximize value, Mr. FitzSimons insisted that the Los Angeles Times was not for sale. And while the latest move may be designed to test the market for individual assets, it may be hard for the board to resist momentum toward a breakup once offers start coming in.

DOJ_NMG_0089920

Besides reversing that approach, a breakup would seem to undercut the rationale behind the landmark $8 billion merger between Tribune and Times Mirror in 2000, which brought the Tribune and Times under one roof and established coast-to-coast marketplaces of newspaper and television stations.

At the time, John Madigan, then chairman and CEO of Tribune, said, "A major portion of the value creation opportunities from this combination will be derived from faster revenue growth in our media businesses."

But that growth never materialized. Times Mirror's biggest property, the Los Angeles Times, began to hemorrhage readers and advertisers, and the same thing happened to smaller Times Mirror papers. As the fortunes of those properties faded, tensions between Los Angles and Chicago grew, ultimately resulting in a rupture on Tribune's board.

The merger was announced six years ago at the height of the Internet boom, before the outlook on newspapers and broadcast stations had soured.

---- Brooks Barnes, Adam Thompson, Merissa Marr and Joseph T. Hallinan contributed to this article.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Justices Appear Divided In Case On Emission Rules (WSJ)

By Mark H. Anderson

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Several justices resisted pleas from environmental groups and the federal government for the Supreme Court to overturn a lower-court ruling that spared Duke Energy Corp. from having to install pollution controls on several power plants.

The outcome of the case wasn't clear, with the nine-member court appearing divided on how to rule.

Duke Energy and the Environmental Protection Agency have been fighting over whether the company was required to get federal permits before it modernized eight coal-fired power plants in North Carolina and South Carolina in a way that increased efficiency but let them run longer hours so as to emit more pollution. The utility has alleged the EPA, under the Clinton administration, wrongly altered longstanding emissions regulations allowing companies to skip permits for upgrades as long as the hourly rate of pollution doesn't increase.

The Fourth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va., agreed and ordered changes to the EPA regulations. A similar lawsuit in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia came out the other way, upholding the EPA.

The electric-utility industry says it is on the line for billions of dollars in upgrades if the EPA's current rules are upheld. Environmental groups counter that a Duke Energy victory would frustrate the Clean Air Act's goal of imposing tougher pollution standards on newer facilities.

But the case's impact may be limited because the Bush administration has proposed industry-friendly rule changes that would exempt power companies from new permits when retrofitting their plants as long as the hourly rate of emissions doesn't increase. After the EPA lost in the Fourth Circuit, the administration declined to appeal. The government appeared before the Supreme Court to defend the current regulation only after environmental groups, over the government's objection, persuaded the justices to hear the case.

At oral arguments yesterday, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Antonin Scalia and Samuel Alito expressed concerns the EPA altered its emissions regulatory scheme almost 20 years after implementing regulations mandated by Congress. "What I'm concerned about is companies can get whipsawed," Justice Scalia said. Chief Justice Roberts more than once cut off Sean Donahue, the attorney representing several environmental groups, questioning his arguments that the statutes support the EPA regulatory changes. "That's a tough sell, isn't it," he told Mr. Donahue.

At issue in the appeal is whether the EPA has regulatory leeway under the Clean Air Act to alter rules that apply when power plants make changes to existing facilities. Before the 1999 changes, some of the EPA's regulations required federal permits only if the hourly rate of emissions rose while other rules required a permit if total emissions would be raised.

Duke Energy has maintained that, while its plant upgrades will result in more pollution because the overhauled facilities will run longer, the hourly rate won't increase. A decision is expected by July 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0089921

Justices Challenge EPA's Arguments In Clean Air Act Case (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

Supreme Court justices took a skeptical view of an Environmental Protection Agency crackdown on air pollution from electric power plants yesterday as the court heard oral arguments in a major case on the authority of the federal government to punish violations of the Clean Air Act.

At issue is a wave of lawsuits begun by the EPA during the last two years of the Clinton administration in which the agency sought to force utilities to equip their refurbished older plants with state-of-the-art pollution control equipment. The EPA said it was enforcing its long-established view of the Clean Air Act's requirements. But companies objected, saying the EPA was unfairly imposing a new and stricter interpretation of ambiguous federal regulations.

At yesterday's argument, most of the justices who spoke up seemed to agree with industry's view.

"What I'm concerned about is that companies can get whipsawed," said Justice Antonin Scalia.

When Sean H. Donahue, a lawyer for Environmental Defense, a private organization defending the EPA enforcement actions, told the court that the agency's regulations were "clear on their face," Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. interjected, "That's an audacious statement."

At issue in the case, Environmental Defense v. Duke Energy , No. 05-848, is how to measure utilities' compliance with the Clean Air Act's "new source review" program, which governs emissions from plants that have been modernized or expanded.

Environmental Defense says that about 17,000 facilities are covered by the rules, and it cites studies that show 20,000 premature deaths per year traceable to pollution from coal-fired plants.

It says the EPA properly insisted that Duke Energy get a special permit and install new pollution-control equipment before reopening several coal-fired plants it had started renovating in 1988, because the plants' total emissions dramatically increased when they were brought back online.

But Duke, a North Carolina-based utility, countered that the proper standard was not the total amount of pollution its plants emitted, but the rate at which they emitted it. By that measure, the company said, its renovations had not changed the plants' capacity for pollution.

In June 2005, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, based in Richmond, ruled in Duke Energy's favor.

By that time, the Bush administration had promised to change EPA enforcement policy, announcing in 2002 that it would bring no new cases against utilities.

But the EPA continued cases that were pending when the administration took office in 2001, so the Bush EPA and Environmental Defense were on the same side in the 4th Circuit.

After that, the administration proposed new clean air regulations that echo the 4th Circuit's decision and would apply it nationwide. It then asked the Supreme Court not to accept Environmental Defense's request to intervene in the case.

The court's decision to take the case over the administration's objection was a surprise. Since the adoption of modern environmental legislation in 1970, the court had agreed to hear just two previous cases in which an environmental group was the petitioner.

Yesterday, the Bush administration was back on Environmental Defense's side of the case, defending the EPA's authority to press the last few cases against Duke and others.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg asked Thomas G. Hungar, a deputy solicitor general, about the impact of the administration's shifting positions. "Since the government is now taking the position that another Duke could do just what was done here and there's an enforcement action pending, would you, if you prevailed in that enforcement action, nonetheless enforce, though it goes against the current government policy?"

"Your Honor, the 2005 proposal that you're referring to is only a proposal. . . . It has not been adopted," Hungar replied. "So the rules as they exist today are the same as the ones we're talking about, although there was a modification in 2002."

A decision in the case is expected by July.

Groups Want Forest Rules Overturned (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0089922

By Terence Chea

AP, November 2, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — Environmentalists asked a federal judge Wednesday to overturn the Bush administration's rules for managing the country's 155 national forests, arguing that the regulations illegally weaken protections for wilderness and wildlife.

Issued in December 2004, the rules represented a major shift in how the government balanced conservation and commercial interests in its 192 million acres of forest land. The management plan gave regional forest managers more discretion to approve logging, drilling and other projects without lengthy environmental studies.

Wednesday's hearing in federal court in San Francisco was the first since a coalition of environmental groups sued the Bush administration over the changes in February 2005, a month after they took effect.

Lawyers for the environmentalists told U.S. District Court Judge Phyllis Hamilton that the rules do not include the safeguards for endangered wildlife and forests that federal law requires. The rules allowed forest management plans to be revised without environmental studies and repealed a requirement for forests to maintain "viable" populations of native wildlife.

They also argued that the administration failed to study adequately the environmental impact of changing forest management practices and did not give the public enough opportunity to comment on the revisions.

"The government must involve the public when it radically changes the management standards of our forests," said Peter Frost, an attorney for the environmental groups, Defenders of Wildlife, Sierra Club, the Wilderness Society, and Vermont Natural Resources Council.

Administration officials said the rules allow forest managers to respond more quickly to wildfires, invasive species and other emerging threats. The change shortened the time to get revisions made from as many as nine years to as few as two or three.

In court Wednesday, Cynthia Huber, a Justice Department attorney, defended the Bush forest rules. She said the administration provided 90 days of public comment when it issued its draft proposal to overhaul forest management rules in December 2002.

Huber also argued that environmental studies should only be required for specific projects that could impact forests and wildlife, not when management plans are revised.

The plan "definitely does not undermine protections of the forests" and complies with federal environmental laws, Huber said.

Judge Hamilton did not indicate when she might rule.

The lawsuit is one of several ongoing legal challenges to Bush administration policies for overseeing national forests.

Twenty environmental groups and four states sued the U.S. Forest Service last October when it repealed the "Roadless Rule," a Clinton-era ban on road construction in nearly a third of the nation's forests. In September, a federal judge reinstated the ban, ruling the agency failed to conduct necessary environmental studies before making the change.

U.S. Agency To Review Oil Royalties (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 1 — The Government Accountability Office, the watchdog agency for Congress, is beginning a broad investigation into potential deficiencies in how the government collects billions of dollars in royalties from companies that produce oil and gas on federal territory. The inquiry is being done at the request of the Republican-led House Government Reform Committee.

In announcing the investigation, Republican lawmakers said they had worries about the management of the entire royalty program by the Interior Department, including its regulations and enforcement practices and the accuracy of basic information.

“They don’t know how much oil is coming out of the ground,” said Representative Darrell E. Issa, Republican of California and chairman of the committee’s subcommittee on energy. “If an oil company were to give them the right number, they would take it. If they were to give them the wrong number, they would take it.”

DOJ_NMG_0089923

The investigation reflects a growing anger in Congress about the Interior Department's vast oil and gas leasing program, under which the government collects as much as $10 billion a year on oil and gas produced on federal land and in federal waters.

The Minerals Management Service of the Interior Departmet, which oversees royalty collections, has come under growing criticism from lawmakers in both parties for losing track of billions of dollars in royalties.

The agency has been under fire since February for errors on offshore leases that could cost the government more than $7 billion over the next five years, as well as for its sluggish response.

Four auditors responsible for scrutinizing royalties recently contended that their superiors blocked them from challenging millions of dollars in deliberate underpayments.

In September, the inspector general of the Interior Department, Earl C. Devaney, told lawmakers that top Interior officials had encouraged a culture of cronyism, ethical lapses and poor management. "Short of crime, anything goes," he testified.

Mr. Issa said the agency's numbers do not add up, that its systems for reporting production and royalty payments appear to be overwhelmed and that midlevel officials had come forward confidentially to describe wide-ranging weaknesses throughout the program.

Mr. Issa and Representative Tom Davis, a Virginia Republican who is chairman of the Government Reform Committee, said their staff had been "contacted numerous times regarding alleged deficiencies in M.M.S. management" and reporting by oil and gas companies.

In a statement on Wednesday, the Minerals Management Service said it welcomed the review and had nothing to hide. "We are confident the review will show that M.M.S. is accurately and efficiently collecting the royalties due to the federal government per existing statutes and regulations," the agency said. "We also welcome any constructive suggestions that we can use to further strengthen our program."

In their letter to the Congressional investigative agency, the lawmakers demanded that the inquiry examine the complex regulations for calculating royalties, the adequacy of the agency's information systems and the pace of its enforcement efforts.

As part of that, investigators will scrutinize a recent decision by the agency to drop claims that the Chevron Corporation had systematically underpaid the government for natural gas by inflating its costs for processing.

Democratic lawmakers have argued for months that the Interior Department under President Bush has been devoted almost entirely to serving the oil and gas industry, at the expense of American taxpayers.

Mr. Issa and other Republicans have become sharply critical as well.

The agency set off an initial round of investigations in February when it admitted that energy companies were likely to escape billions of dollars in royalties over the next five years because of mistakes in leases the government signed in the 1990s. The mistakes were made during the Clinton administration, but were not disclosed for another six years.

In July, Mr. Issa and Mr. Davis publicly accused the department of stonewalling their inquiry. "We believe the department may have deliberately withheld crucial information," the lawmakers wrote in a letter to the department.

In September, the two lawmakers expressed anger that the Bush administration had decided it would not try to recover about $2 billion that had already been lost as a result of the flawed leases.

"This is absurd," they wrote in a letter to Dirk Kempthorne, the interior secretary. "That money belongs to the federal government."

The new investigation will come on top of others already under way. The Government Accountability Office is already digging into the agency's accounting systems. The inspector general of the Interior Department is reviewing the agency's auditing and enforcement efforts; that report is expected by the end of December.

California Can Lead The Way (USAT)

By Carl Pope

USA Today, November 2, 2006

Voters want change and leadership that will take America in a dramatically different direction. One way many candidates across the country are demonstrating their commitment to change is by calling for the development of renewable energy sources. And this Election Day, Californians can help put the USA on the path to a saner, cheaper, smarter, more secure energy future by voting "yes" on Proposition 87.

DOJ_NMG_0089924

To most Americans, investing in smart energy solutions such as renewable solar and wind and other alternate fuel sources is a no-brainer. It's obvious to them that our nation's dependence on oil ties our fate to the most unstable parts of the world, makes consumers vulnerable to high gas prices, and increases the threat of global warming.

A monumental investment in new energy technologies ought to be a top political priority. Instead, federal spending for energy research and development is half what it was 25 years ago. Congress has handed over billions in new subsidies to oil companies, despite the fact that oil industry profits have tripled in the past three years.

California citizens can help the entire nation free itself from the grip of Big Oil by approving Proposition 87. This initiative would fund a $4 billion effort to reduce dependence on gasoline by 25% over 10 years. It would provide incentives to make alternative-fuel vehicles and renewable fuels more widely available and affordable to consumers. And it would fund research to bring clean, renewable energy and energy efficiency technologies to the marketplace more quickly.

Prop 87 is not a tax on residents. It would impose a minor assessment on the excess profits of California oil producers, something other oil producing states such as Alaska, New Mexico, Texas and Louisiana already have in place.

California has long been a leader in technological innovation, and our national economy and way of life are better for it. By supporting Prop 87 on Tuesday, California citizens can be leaders once again and make an important investment that will pay dividends for current and future generations.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Balco Grand Jury To Charge Graham (MERCN)

By Elliott Almond

The San Jose Mercury News, November 2, 2006

The track and field coach who ignited the Balco Laboratories drug scandal in 2003 is expected to be charged by the U.S. Attorney on Thursday with obstructing the investigation.

Trevor Graham, who has coached sprinters Marion Jones, Justin Gatlin, Tim Montgomery and other Olympic medal winners, will be indicted for making false statements to federal agents investigating the steroids case, the Associated Press reported Wednesday. AP cited two unidentified Justice Department sources.

In June, 2003, Graham sent the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency a syringe with traces of a steroid known as ``the clear" and fingered Balco as the source.

The Mercury News previously reported one of Graham's former athletes told the San Francisco grand jury investigating Balco that the Raleigh, N.C., coach sold the sprinter illegal drugs. Graham, who runs the Sprint Capitol USA team, has repeatedly denied wrongdoing.

His attorney, Joseph Zeszotarski, declined to comment Wednesday evening. He previously said Graham told the truth when interviewed by authorities in 2004.

The charges come two weeks after Graham's long-time assistant testified in front of the current grand jury handling the case. Randall Evans, a former sprinter from St. Augustine College in Raleigh, told the Mercury News two weeks ago at the courthouse, ``Trevor is my best friend. I was there the whole time. I know what happened."

He declined to say what he told the grand jury, or what prosecutors asked him. But Evans said, ``I had no choice. I wasn't going to take the rap. I told the grand jury the truth. I wasn't going to lie and then face perjury."

Evans, who said he wasn't sure if he would coach again, added that he planned to ``tell all. Maybe I'll write a book."

Evans, 36, might have provided damaging evidence against Graham because he is connected to Angel Guillermo Heredia, a former discus thrower from Laredo, Texas, and Mexico.

Heredia told the grand jury he supplied performance-enhancing drugs to Graham for his athletes, according to reports. Heredia's name surfaced in a letter written in 2003 by Balco founder Victor Conte Jr. about drug use by Sprint Capitol athletes.

DOJ_NMG_0089925

Conte never sent the letter to track officials but an Internal Revenue Service Agent leading the investigation of drugs and money laundering discovered it.

The charges against the coach likely stem from a 2004 interview with agents in which Graham denied knowledge of drug use among his athletes even though at least a half dozen had tested positive. His statement differed from one given about the same time by former shot putter C.J. Hunter, Jones' ex-husband.

Hunter told investigators that Graham introduced Jones to a drug regimen for the 400 meters, the Mercury News reported. It included the blood-boosting drug EPO. Hunter told authorities that Graham instructed Jones where to inject herself. Sources also told the Mercury News that Conte originally sent packages of drugs to Graham, according to Hunter's account.

The U.S. Olympic Committee banned Graham from its training centers in August because of the unusual number of his athletes convicted of drug violations. Last year, Montgomery was banned for two years based on evidence in the Balco case. Gatlin, the defending Olympic gold medalist in the 100 meters, tested positive for artificial testosterone in April.

Contact Elliott Almond at (408) 920-5865 or ealmond@mercurynews.com

BALCO Panel To Charge Track Coach (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Track coach Trevor Graham, who helped launch a three-year federal probe of steroid use by elite athletes, was expected to be charged by a grand jury as soon as today with obstructing the investigation, two Justice Department officials with knowledge of the investigation told the Associated Press.

Speaking on condition of anonymity because the charges had not been made public, the officials said Graham would be charged with making false statements to authorities investigating steroid use in sports.

Graham operates Raleigh, N.C.-based Sprint Capitol USA, a team of about 10 athletes that includes 100-meter co-world record holder Justin Gatlin, who tested positive for testosterone and other steroids in April.

Graham also coached sprinter Marion Jones, who won five medals at the 2000 Sydney Games, and her ex-boyfriend Tim Montgomery, suspended from competition for two years although he never tested positive for a banned substance.

Several of Graham's athletes, however, have tested positive for banned substances, and the coach is being investigated by a grand jury for lying to those looking into doping among elite athletes connected to the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, the now-defunct Burlingame supplement company that served as a front for a steroids ring.

Graham helped launch the federal investigation three years ago by anonymously mailing a vial containing "the clear," a previously undetectable steroid to the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency.

Neither Graham nor his attorney returned telephone calls and e-mail inquiries from the Associated Press. Graham steadfastly has denied ever providing banned performance-enhancing drugs to his athletes.

2 Suspects In Arson Cases Arrested (USAT)

By Keith Matheny, Marie Mccain And Erica Solvig

USA Today, November 2, 2006

BEAUMONT, Calif. — An auto mechanic in jail Wednesday in connection with two June arson fires is a “person of interest” in last week's massive wind-whipped wildfire that killed five federal firefighters, the Riverside County Sheriff's Department said.

Raymond Lee Oyler, 36, was arrested Tuesday after his home was searched Monday, Sgt. Earl Quinata said.

Quinata issued a news release Tuesday night that said Oyler was not a suspect in the Esperanza fire. He has not been charged in that fire.

Oyler, who is being held in the Riverside County Jail in lieu of $25,000 bail, is accused of igniting the two earlier fires near this rural town 20 miles west of Palm Springs. He is being arraigned today on charges related to those fires, the sheriff's department said.

Jason Walden, general manager of the auto center where Oyler has worked for four months, described him as a real workhorse. “They're climbing up the wrong tree,” said Walden, a former firefighter with the U.S. Forest Service. “He's not someone who is into fire.”

DOJ_NMG_0089926

Oyler uses blowtorches on the job, but "he doesn't get that gleam in his eye like a pyromaniac," Walden said.

Whoever is ultimately charged with last week's wildfire arson also will face murder charges and, potentially, the death penalty, said Sara Danville, Riverside County chief deputy district attorney for the Major Crimes Unit.

Firefighters on Monday were able to surround the wildfire that blackened more than 40,200 mostly uninhabited acres, the California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection reported. Firefighting costs reached $9.9 million.

The fire, which was started last Thursday, burned 34 homes and killed five firefighters. The five — Capt. Mark Loutzenhiser, 43, of Idyllwild; Jason McKay, 27, of Phelan; Jess McLean, 27, of Beaumont; Daniel Hoover-Najera, 20, of San Jacinto; and Pablo Cerda, 23, of Fountain Valley — will be honored in a memorial service in a large arena near San Bernardino on Sunday.

Cerda, who suffered burns over 90% of his body, died Tuesday at a hospital near San Bernardino.

A preliminary report from the U.S. Forest Service released Tuesday said the firefighters had only one escape route from a house they were trying to save. Their engine faced toward that escape route, but the fire overwhelmed them, the report stated, and they were not able to get to shelter.

At least three federal departments will investigate the scene separately.

"The objective of this safety investigation is to determine facts surrounding the incident, identify lessons learned, and develop recommendations for accident-prevention purposes," the preliminary report stated.

Local investigators Wednesday continued questioning people, including convicted arsonists, to try to determine who started the blaze.

The Riverside County sheriff announced shortly after the six-day blaze began that it was a case of arson. A reward leading to an arrest and conviction is $550,000 and growing. A fund for the firefighters' families also exceeds $500,000 and could eventually reach $1 million, Riverside County officials said.

Nationwide Dragnet Nabs Local Fugitive (TOLB)

Toledo Blade (OH), November 2, 2006

Ex-Toledoan accused of probation violation

A former Toledo man who was arrested last week on an 11-year-old outstanding warrant is among the fugitives nabbed in a nationwide law enforcement dragnet that will be the subject of a major announcement tomorrow by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Russell Johnson, 49, was wanted for an alleged probation violation that stems from a 1991 conviction in Lucas County Common Pleas Court for sexually assaulting an 11-year-old girl.

A resident of Florida, Johnson was arrested by officers with Northern Ohio Violent Fugitive Task Force on Oct. 22 at a mobile home park at 3510 Consaul St. in East Toledo.

Mark Herr, a Lucas County assistant prosecutor, said Johnson's arrest was part of a dragnet involving federal, state, and local authorities to apprehend suspects wanted in homicides, sexual assaults, gang-related crimes, kidnappings, major drug offenses, and crimes against children and the elderly.

"He is a very high-profile figure," said Mr. Herr, who was informed of the arrest by U.S. Marshals involved in the operation.

The Justice Department is planning to announce the arrest of Johnson and others tomorrow in Washington as part of an effort to track down and arrest fugitives from justice, Mr. Herr said.

Johnson appeared yesterday before Judge Frederick McDonald on the probation violation charge. The hearing was continued to tomorrow to allow the defendant to consult with a court-appointed attorney.

He was indicted in 1990 on 20 counts of sexual battery and convicted in December, 1990 on one of those felony offenses.

Judge McDonald sentenced him to the maximum two-year prison term in January, 1991, and released him about three months later on shock probation. He was placed on probation.

The arrest warrant was issued in October, 1995 after he allegedly failed to report to the court's probation department.

Multi-agency Sweep Nets Murray Man (MURRLT)

Murray (KY) Ledger & Times, November 2, 2006

A 19-year-old Murray man was arrested in a multi-agency round up of people who committed sex crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0089927

Brian Gryzmala, of Murray, was charged with distribution of matter portraying a sexual performance by a minor and possession of matter portraying a sexual performance by a minor, according to a release from the Kentucky State Police.

KSP and the Kentucky Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force announced Monday the results of Operation Harvest Moon. The effort aimed to arrest suspects involved in online child sexual exploitation crimes and non-compliant registered sexual offenders.

Operation Harvest Moon resulted in 11 federal indictments and three state arrests, including Gryzmala.

"The message is clear: Kentucky is and will continue to be a child-predator-free zone," U.S. Attorney for the Eastern Kentucky District said in the KSP release. "The message to child sexual predators should also be clear: Stay out of our state. These people are the lowest dregs of society and we will not allow them to harm our children."

Operation Harvest Moon began Oct. 23 and culminated months of investigations by KSP and other law enforcement agencies throughout the state.

The task force, which is located within the KSP Communications and Computer Technology Branch, and 14 other participating agencies spearheaded the online investigative component of Operation Harvest Moon.

The other agencies partnering with Kentucky ICAC include the FBI, U.S. Secret Service, U.S. Marshals Service, U.S. Attorney's Office, U.S. Postal Inspection Service, Louisville Metro Police Department, Lexington-Fayette Urban County Division of Police, Owensboro Police Department, Bowling Green Police Department, Morehead Police Department, Winchester Police Department, Franklin Police Department, Oldham County Police Department and Boone County Sheriff's Department.

"The Kentucky State Police led this effort to identify and round up those individuals engaged in criminal online activity and in non-compliance with House Bill 3," KSP Commissioner Jack Adams said in the release. "But the success of Operation Harvest Moon rests with the cooperation among law enforcement agencies throughout the state. The resources, time and energy invested by these officers, and their family with their populations and locales, are responsible for the effectiveness of the operation."

In addition to the online investigations, the KSP and task force identified those registered sexual offenders violating new residency restrictions. As of Monday, KSP troopers have charged 37 people for residing within 1,000 feet of restricted areas and another 58 arrests are pending.

The registry notification requires sex offenders to report any address change to their local probation and parole office before actually moving. If offenders move without following procedure, they are considered non-compliant and can be charged with a Class D felony punishable by one to five years in prison. House Bill 3 enhanced those conditions by requiring offenders to live at least 1,000 feet from schools, licensed day care facilities and publicly owned playgrounds and by making possession of child pornography a felony.

Fugitive In Sexual Assault Case In Colorado Arrested (LVRJ)

Las Vegas Review-Journal, November 2, 2006

A fugitive strike team arrested a 43-year-old North Las Vegas man late Monday on a warrant charging him with multiple counts of sexually assaulting an 11-year-old girl in Littleton, Colo.

Michael Pope, who once worked as a dealer in Las Vegas casinos in the late 1980s and early 1990s, was taken into custody without incident while trying to hide in a vehicle, according to task force commander Patrick Sedoti.

Advertisement

Pope's arrest stems from incidents that authorities in Jefferson County, Colo., said occurred between December 2004 and June 2005 when he was renting a room in Littleton and occasionally was the baby sitter for the girl, who lived in the home.

Pope had moved to North Las Vegas, where he lived with his sister until moving out recently to live near Fort Apache Road and Charleston Boulevard, said Fidencio Rivera, chief deputy of the U.S. Marshals' office in Las Vegas.

"When the case came in, we tracked him down to a girlfriend in the valley," Rivera said, noting that the strike team worked in cooperation with North Las Vegas police.

He said law enforcement officials in the Las Vegas area have no knowledge of Pope molesting any children locally.

Tips Sought On Missing Explosives (MUCHRONICLE)

By Theresa D.McClellan, CHRONICLE NEWS SERVICE

Muskegon Chronicle (MI), November 1, 2006

Missing explosives from a Ferry Township asparagus field has sparked the interest of federal authorities.

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives posted a $5,000 reward for information leading to an arrest and conviction in connection with whoever dug up and stole the materials buried about 3 feet deep on the 48-acre site.

The materials had been placed by Bay Geophysical Inc. of Traverse City. The company used them to create seismic charges while looking for gas and oil, having been doing gas and oil explorations "for a few years," Michigan State Police Trooper Stacy Baylis said.

The materials were eight 150-gram Pentalite seismic charges and nine electric cap detonators. When combined, each charger has the explosive power of a half stick of dynamite, police said.

"In a word, damage could be considerable. That could remove the front of a small building," said Sgt. Troy Fellows of Michigan State Police's Hart post.

The theft was discovered Monday. Company officials estimate it occurred between 6 p.m. Sunday and 11 a.m. Monday, police said.

While a security guard was posted on the wooded property off Baker Road, he did not see anything unusual, Baylis said.

"This is a federal case, the feds are investigating and we are making no other statement," said a company spokeswoman, who declined further comment.

The green explosives are about six inches long and four inches round with electric systematic detector caps.

"Theft of explosives is a top priority for ATF. The stolen charges and detonators are identified as high explosives and are dangerous," said ATF Special Agent Valerie J. Goddard.

"The public is cautioned not to handle or touch any of these explosives materials if they are located, and to immediately contact their local law enforcement agency or ATF for the safe removal of these items," Goddard said.

faxbox

Anyone with information about missing explosives from an Oceana County asparagus field taken sometime between 6 p.m. Sunday and 11 a.m. Monday is asked to call Michigan State Police's Hart post at (231) 873-2171; the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosive at (888) 283-2662 (ATF-BOMB); or Silent Observer at (888) 786-7271 (STOP-CRIME).

Drug Death Defendant Pleads Not Guilty (SLPD)

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, November 2, 2006

A St. Louis man pleaded not guilty Wednesday to charges connecting him with the "date rape drug" overdose death of a SIUE senior in 2002 — but he was unsuccessful getting a federal judge to issue a gag order in the case.

John F. Berger, 36, was arraigned Wednesday afternoon after being indicted on charges of possession with intent to distribute 1,4-butanediol (BD) with a resulting death; possession with intent to distribute BD for human consumption; cocaine distribution; and possession with intent to distribute BD for human consumption with death resulting. He surrendered Monday and has been released on $50,000 bond.

BD converts to Gamma-hydroxybutyric acid, or GHB, in the body. GHB is colorless, odorless and tasteless and depresses the central nervous system. It can cause drowsiness, nausea, loss of inhibition, amnesia and hallucinations and at higher does, it can cause unconsciousness, seizures, breathing trouble or death.

U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway said that investigators believe Berger supplied the drug that killed Tressa Gross on April 7, 2002. Hanaway announced the charges against Berger in a press conference Tuesday, complete with pictures of Berger and a plea for any potential victims or witnesses to come forward.

Berger's lawyer, John Rogers, cited Hanaway's press conference and the news reports that followed as reasons for a "gag order" on attorneys and staff on both sides and all parties involved in the case.

Rogers' filing called Hanaway's comments at the press conference "inappropriate" and "unfair" and said they could "poison" or manipulate jurors in a future trial.

DOJ_NMG_0089929

U.S. Magistrate Judge Thomas Mummert III, however, turned down the gag order and got Assistant U.S. Attorney Jim Delworth to promise that his office and the Drug Enforcement Administration will make no more public statements without discussing the issue with him.

In other developments, Delworth said that he had provided Rogers with some of the evidence in the case before the hearing. He handed Rogers an audiotape and videotape after the hearing.

Heroin Kingpin Convicted, Could Get Life Sentence (AP)

AP, November 1, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) _ An Irvington man who authorities say was a major heroin kingpin faces up to life in prison after a jury convicted him Tuesday of conspiracy, racketeering, drug, gun and money laundering charges.

Authorities said Charles "Black" Hamilton was the head of an operation that moved huge amounts of heroin _ about 20,000 doses a week _ from northern New Jersey to the Trenton area.

At the time Hamilton was arrested in 2004, authorities believed his operation was responsible for three-fourths of the heroin in Trenton.

Hamilton, 36, also had ties to the Bloods street gang, the Attorney General's office said.

His conviction came after a three-week jury trial in Trenton. While the sentence could be as stiff as life in prison, it will be up to a judge to decide Hamilton's exact penalty.

Two other men in the operation already are serving prison terms.

FEDS FINISH GIVING 'ICEBOX' EVIDENCE (TMT)

Tyler Morning Telegraph, November 1, 2006

EDITOR'S NOTE: The names of undercover law enforcement officers and confidential informants in this article are withheld to protect their identities.

The U.S. government presented the rest of its evidence Wednesday in the trial of three men involved in a large methamphetamine-distribution ring that spanned three states.

A confidential informant and co-defendant testified in the "Operation Icebox" case in U.S. District Judge Leonard Davis' court, along with law enforcement officials and forensic chemists.

Simon "BJ" Balderas Jr., 29, the alleged ringleader in the case, and brothers Jose (Joe) Zavala, 27, and Rene Zavala, 31, are on trial in Tyler federal court for allegedly conspiring to distribute more than 10 kilograms of meth in Tyler, Shreveport and Miami. Nineteen people were charged in the conspiracy. The three men on trial are each charged in at least 23 counts of the 26-count indictment and face up to life in prison for the conspiracy.

A confidential informant testified Wednesday that he bought "ice" meth from Jose Zavala, whom he called a "pretty large drug dealer in the Tyler area." He said Rene Zavala helped his brother distribute the meth and picked the drugs up in Dallas.

The CI said he and Jose Zavala went to Balderas' house a few times to buy meth. The jury saw video recordings of the CI buying meth from Jose Zavala and at Balderas' house. The jurors also heard an audio recording of a trip the CI took with Rene Zavala to Dallas to pick up 2 pounds of meth on Feb. 3.

He said 1 pound was given to Stanley "Drew" Burkhart and the other was given to Jose Zavala.

During one recording, Jose Zavala talked about a Dallas source he felt was "ripping them off" and said he had a "necklace full of teeth" for the man, which the CI said meant he would knock his teeth out.

One video showed the CI sitting with Balderas and Jose Zavala in the living room of Balderas' house. On the coffee table, Balderas weighed drugs and had a large bag of meth.

The CI had three felony charges against him in Rusk County dropped and was paid $2,100 for helping the government. He now has several felony cases pending in Smith County, including possessing 14 grams of meth, unlawfully carrying a pistol, burglary, failure to identify and theft charges, which he incurred after his work as a CI was completed, he said.

CO-DEFENDANT TESTIFIES

Stanley "Drew" Burkhart, 44, testified that he had been using meth for about 20 years when he met Balderas in 2004. Burkhart said he had been selling drugs since about 2003. He said he bought meth from Balderas, starting out at a couple of ounces and increasing to 1 pound per week. He said he estimated that he bought a total of about 10 pounds from Balderas.

After about four months, he said he began buying meth from Jose Zavala and he estimated he bought a total of 20 pounds from him. He said he also bought meth from Sam Leal, another co-defendant in the case.

He pleaded guilty to possessing with the intent to distribute more than 1 kilogram of meth. He was arrested Feb. 3 with the pound of meth he got from Rene Zavala. He said he paid him about $1,000 for the pound.

Smith County sheriff's Deputy Michael Strickland said he stopped Burkhart for a traffic violation on Feb. 3 and after found several small plastic bags of meth, as well as a large bag of meth, totaling 580 grams, and drug paraphernalia.

A Gregg County sheriff's deputy and DEA task force officer testified that he arrested co-defendants Gloria Medina and Manuel Escobar at a motel in Longview on Jan. 19. He said 10 ounces of meth were discovered there and drug paraphernalia and an assault rifle were found at Ms. Medina's Tyler residence.

An undercover Texas Department of Public Safety narcotics officer testified that a CI bought 2.7 grams of meth on Jan. 5 and 32 grams of meth on Feb. 15 from co-defendant Eduardo "Collette" Vasquez Jr.

He said another CI bought 28 grams of meth on Jan. 25 from co-defendant David Branch and introduced the officer to Branch. The officer said he developed a relationship with Branch about dealing Ecstasy and meth, and that his source was "BJ." On Feb. 8, Branch told the officer he sold more than 1,000 pills of Ecstasy in the last month and sold the officer 1 ounce of meth and 24 Ecstasy pills, he said.

SEARCHES, SEIZURES

A Smith County sheriff's deputy and DEA task force member testified that when officers searched Jose and Rene Zavala's residence on March 8, they found two handguns, ammunition, a container with suspected meth, two tubes with suspected steroids, two scales and more than $5,000 in cash.

A Palestine police officer and DEA task force officer testified that officials found two rifles, four pistols and $2,500 cash in a March 8 search of Simon Balderas Sr.'s home.

A DEA special agent testified that on March 8, law enforcement searched Vasquez's apartment and found marijuana in several small bags as well as six bricks, about 1 kilogram each. He said they also found 141 tablets of Ecstasy, three handguns, a fake shaving cream bottle with 2 ounces of meth and Ecstasy pills inside and a fake hairspray can with 1 ounce of meth inside.

He said officials searched the house of Zavala's parents and found scales and a collector's AR-15 assault rifle.

An ATF special agent testified that when searching a Tyler hotel room on March 8 where a woman and co-defendant Jacinto Martinez were located, officials found nearly $6,000 inside the woman's purse, $3,710 in Martinez's pocket and a safe with $200,000 cash and a drug ledger inside.

A DEA special agent testified that when officials searched Balderas Jr.'s house on March 8, they discovered digital scales, pictures of Balderas Jr. and others displaying guns and Nortenos signs, a safe containing pills and two pistols and another safe containing drug notes.

Two handguns were found in a garage behind Balderas Jr.'s and Balderas Sr.'s neighboring houses, he said.

DRUG TESTING

Two chemists testified about testing drugs in the case.

A chemist in the DPS' Tyler crime lab said he tested 14.1 grams of meth.

A forensic chemist for the DEA lab in Dallas said she tested 29 items, which totaled 1,315.5 grams of meth, 749.2 grams of Ecstasy, steroids and 5.19 grams of prescription medication. She said 1,000 grams equals 1 kilogram.

Two Smith County probation officers testified to Jose Zavala's and Balderas' prior felony convictions.

Jose Zavala was convicted in 1999 of possession of marijuana. Balderas was convicted in 1993 of aggravated assault. They are each charged with being felons in possession of firearms.

Paul Fazande has testified he sold up to 6 pounds of meth per week in Shreveport for Balderas. He was arrested in Shreveport in October 2005 and has pleaded guilty to drug charges. He was not indicted in Icebox.

DOJ_NMG_0089931

Samuel Leal Jr., 33, testified that he bought meth from Jose Zavala and Balderas. He said several sources in Dallas supplied Balderas with meth through the Zavala brothers but he met one man who claimed to be associated with a drug cartel who moved drugs to Dallas from Mexico. Leal said he began buying meth from the man and took the place of Joe Zavala with that drug source. Leal bought and supplied Balderas with the drugs, up to 10-15 kilograms per week, he said.

John Thomas Carroll, 24, testified earlier that he bought meth from Balderas Jr. and the Zavalas and sold it in Tyler. After he moved to Miami, Balderas' source had switched from the Zavalas to Leal and Jacinto Martinez, who began sending him shipments that increased from ounces to kilograms. He said at the peak of sales, he sold 5 kilograms per week in Miami.

Efrem Gonzalez Gamez was scheduled to go to trial with the others but pleaded guilty to the conspiracy charge.

Leal, Carroll, Gamez, Martinez, Balderas Sr., Escobar, Burkhart, Vasquez, Branch, Ms. Medina, Jeff Attaway, Mark Anthony Gomez, Tanya Smith, Joey Paup, and Brandy Rodgers, also known as Brandy McNinch, have all pleaded guilty to similar charges. Jamie Long was arrested in September and is set to go to trial in December.

Assistant U.S. attorneys Bill Baldwin and Mary Ann Cozby are prosecuting the case. Tonda Curry represents Balderas, Rex Thompson represents Jose Zavala and Jim Williams represents Rene Zavala.

The trial will resume with defense evidence on Thursday.

Border Guard Accused Of Accepting Bribes Released Pending Trial (AP)

AP, November 2, 2006

SEATTLE -- A U.S. border guard accused of accepting cash and sexual favors from a female drug smuggler was released Tuesday on a $20,000 bond, against the wishes of prosecutors.

Federal Magistrate Judge Mary Alice Theiler also agreed to let the guard, Desmone Bastian, continue living in Surrey, British Columbia, where he will be monitored pending trial, scheduled for Jan. 2. Bastian has pleaded not guilty to one count of accepting a bribe and another of importing controlled substances.

Bastian is accused of accepting an undisclosed amount of money as well as sexual favors from a female smuggler who told federal agents that she is also a madam. According to Assistant U.S. Attorney Susan Roe, the smuggler claimed that Bastian sometimes showed up at her house of prostitution wearing his U.S. Customs and Border Protection uniform.

In exchange for the money and favors, he would allow her to drive into the U.S. from British Columbia with OxyContin pills and marijuana, Roe said.

Bastian first raised suspicion last March, when he was seen leaving his post at the Blaine crossing to approach the smuggler's car, which contained 3,000 OxyContin pills, Roe said.

Investigators combed records and discovered that the woman had crossed the border numerous times in the past several years, often in Bastian's lane. He never referred her for a secondary inspection, Roe said.

Bastian's attorney, Michael Nance, argued against detaining him pending trial, noting that it was not a violent crime.

Ex-Mexican Drug Czar Faces More Charges (AP)

AP, November 1, 2006

MEXICO CITY — Mexico's former drug czar, already serving 71 years for drug trafficking and racketeering, has been ordered to stand trial on a new set of firearms and corruption charges, prosecutors announced Wednesday.

Jesus Gutierrez Rebollo is accused of handing out military weapons to corrupt government officials, the federal attorney general's office said.

The officials allegedly worked with a web of conspirators that protected and aided drug traffickers, the office said in a statement.

Gutierrez Rebollo, one of the highest-level Mexican officials to ever have been convicted, was expected to bring toughness and integrity to Mexico's war on drugs when he assumed the drug czar post in 1996.

But the next year, police arrested Gutierrez Rebollo after it was found he was staying in a luxury apartment owned by cocaine kingpin Amado Carrillo Fuentes.

Informants later alleged that the general was asking Carrillo Fuentes' Juarez cartel for a $60 million in exchange for sending soldiers to protect and support its smuggling operations.

DOJ_NMG_0089932

Gutierrez Rebollo was convicted of drug trafficking, racketeering and corruption and sentenced to 40 years in prison. He was later convicted of handing out military firearms to drug traffickers and sentenced to an additional 31 years and 10 months.

Ex-LCC Coach Given Probation In Drug Case (SDUT)

The San Diego Union-Tribune, November 1, 2006

SAN DIEGO – A former La Costa Canyon High School girls water polo coach who had cocaine and Ecstasy in his car when stopped in February was sentenced Wednesday to probation and ordered to register as a narcotics offender.

Steven Pierce Moyer, 43, pleaded guilty Sept. 11 to possession for sale and transportation of Ecstasy.

The married father of two also admitted an allegation that the drugs found in his car were not for personal use and that he intended to sell or distribute them.

The Carlsbad resident faced a maximum of four years in state prison under the plea bargain.

A U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent testified at Moyer's July 14 preliminary hearing that the defendant was overheard ordering cocaine and Ecstasy from a known drug dealer, Michael Cardosi.

Moyer left a voice mail message for Cardosi, indicating that he needed the drugs before a party he was hosting, according to court testimony.

On Feb. 23, Moyer was seen getting into the back seat of Cardosi's Mercedes-Benz in the parking lot of a Vons supermarket in Encinitas, but agents did not see any drugs change hands.

DEA agents tailing Moyer asked Carlsbad police to pull him over because they didn't want to jeopardize the larger investigation that had been going on since 2004, DEA Special Agent Helem Sosa testified.

Carlsbad police Sgt. Greg White testified that he stopped Moyer for speeding and was given permission to search his car, which yielded 10.2 grams of cocaine and 30 Ecstasy tablets.

Cardosi, 33, has been charged with evading a peace officer and drug offenses and will be back in court Dec. 12.

In sentencing Moyer, Judge David Danielsen agreed with prosecutor Cari Phillips that federal agents may have done Moyer a favor by arresting him and taking him out of his “party” lifestyle.

The judge suspended a one-year jail sentence so long as Moyer successfully completes three years on probation.

Danielsen told the defendant to put 100 percent of his effort into complying with all the terms of probation, because another judge might not react favorably to a violation considering the defendant's background.

Moyer, a walk-on, part-time coach at La Costa Canyon, resigned his position after he was charged in June.

He was the captain of Stanford's water polo team from 1982 to 1984 and played on the U.S. national team.

IMMIGRATION:

Federal Judge Blocks Town's Crackdown On Illegal Immigrants (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Rubinkam, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 2, 2006

(AP) - ALLENTOWN, Pennsylvania-A federal judge blocked the city of Hazleton from enforcing a pair of tough ordinances targeting illegal immigrants, just hours before the measures were to go into effect.

The measures, approved by City Council last month, would have imposed fines on landlords who rent to illegal immigrants and denied business permits to companies that give them jobs. They also would have required tenants to register with City Hall and pay for a rental permit.

U.S. District Judge James Munley ruled that landlords, tenants and businesses that cater to Hispanics faced "irreparable harm" from the laws and issued a temporary restraining order blocking their enforcement.

"We find it in the public interest to protect residents access to homes, education, jobs and businesses," he wrote in a 13-page opinion.

Hispanic groups and the ACLU sued Hazleton on Monday, contending the laws violate the Constitution because they trample on the federal government's exclusive power to regulate immigration.

DOJ_NMG_0089933

Mayor Lou Barletta, who spearheaded the law, has argued that illegal immigrants have brought an increase in drugs, crime and gangs to the city. The city's lawyers on Tuesday cited a 10 percent increase in crime between 2004 and 2005 as a reason why the ordinances should be enforced.

Munley, however, wrote that the city "offers only vague generalizations about the crime allegedly caused by illegal immigrants, but has nothing concrete to back up these claims."

Hazleton's crackdown, which was announced in June, has received national attention and spurred other towns to pass similar laws, saying that the federal government has not done enough about illegal immigration. Municipal officials view the Hazleton lawsuit and a similar one in Riverside, New Jersey, as test cases.

Witold J. Walczak, legal director of the ACLU of Pennsylvania, hailed Tuesday's decision as an important victory.

"I think what's important is the judge recognized that this ordinance has the potential to cause real harm by costing people their jobs, their houses and requiring children to leave schools," he said.

The judge's restraining order expires Nov. 14. He indicated that he will schedule a hearing on the ACLU's motion for a temporary injunction.

Barletta has said he is convinced the courts will ultimately uphold the law.

Bush May Find An Ally On Immigration (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

The Next Congress

Fourth of five parts

Immigration is the one major issue on which President Bush is likely to fare better next year if Democrats win control of Congress.

The issue is unfinished business to which all sides promise to return, after House Republicans this year prevented Mr. Bush from winning both a guest-worker program and citizenship rights for most illegal aliens.

Instead, House Republican leaders forced through a bill to construct 698 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border. Funding for the fencing and other border security measures will be the first test of the new Congress on immigration policy.

Democrats have an outside chance of taking complete control of Capitol Hill, but a better chance of winning one chamber, and in this series, The Washington Times is examining how such a transfer of power will affect U.S. policy and politics.

Neither House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, likely to be the speaker of the House if Democrats win that chamber, nor Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, the Democrats' Senate leader, would commit this week to funding the fencing if they gain control of Congress.

"What Leader Pelosi has said in the past is that we need to do comprehensive reform, and the fence could be part of that reform," said the California Democrat's spokeswoman, Jennifer Crider.

Jim Manley, spokesman for Mr. Reid, said the Nevada Democrat is working toward "solutions that are tough and smart, not political legislation designed to make for good election-year sound bites."

Republicans are questioning the Democrats' commitment. Last week, on the day Mr. Bush signed the fencing into law, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert issued a statement asking, "Would a Democrat majority support construction of a border fence?"

But Mr. Hastert won't commit to spending for the entire fence, instead focusing on "operational control" that could include less fencing but other measures, such as more Border Patrol agents and vehicle barriers.

"He'll commit to funding necessary to get operational control of the border, which goes far beyond a single line of fencing," said Lisa C. Miller, spokeswoman for the Illinois Republican.

For his part, Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, the Kentucky Republican likely to lead his party in the Senate with the retirement of Majority Leader Bill Frist, wants to see the funding through, his spokesman said.

"He sees border security as critical to our national and homeland security and believes the Congress should fund border security, including the border fence," spokesman Don Stewart said.

DOJ_NMG_0089934

Unfinished business

Spending aside, Congress still faces the four major immigration questions that it punted on this year -- how to secure the border, how to boost workplace enforcement, whether to create a new program for future foreign workers in addition to the existing work programs that hundreds of thousands of people already use; and what to do about the estimated 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens now in the country.

Mr. Bush, joined by almost all Democrats and some Republicans, wants action on all of those issues, and the Senate passed such a bill this year.

But House Republicans insist that the government must prove it can control the borders and enforce the laws before considering a new worker program, and many Republicans oppose legalization of illegal aliens altogether, arguing that it is amnesty for lawbreakers.

If Republicans retain control of Congress, that impasse is likely to remain, said Frank Sharry, executive director of the National Immigration Forum, which supports a path to citizenship.

"It has stalemate written all over it -- stalemate plus [passage of] appropriations, which I don't think would satisfy either group of partisans," he said.

But if Democrats win the 15 seats they need to snatch control of the House, the odds for a deal improve somewhat.

"If the House stays Republican, chances of a comprehensive bill being enacted in the next Congress are less than 10 percent. And if the House is taken by the Democrats, chances of a comprehensive bill passing in the next Congress are about 50-50," Mr. Sharry said.

He figures there are probably 160 to 175 House Democrats willing to vote for comprehensive reform, meaning between 45 and 60 Republicans would have to join them to reach a comfortable margin for passage.

Less depends on which party controls the Senate, because a bipartisan consensus appears to exist for some sort of broad bill. Still, the Senate could improve prospects for a final compromise bill if it acts first, putting pressure on the House to follow through.

That would be different from this year, when the Senate Judiciary Committee got bogged down on judicial nominations, renewal of the USA Patriot Act and detainee treatment, allowing the House to drive the enforcement-first side.

People power

Much also will depend on the personalities in the debate.

The biggest change would be the difference between Mr. Hastert and Mrs. Pelosi. While the Republican has focused squarely on enforcement, boosted by voters in his district who have driven that message home to him, the Democrat has supported legalization.

She has opposed many of the security-only provisions Republicans have put forth, calling some "awful" and others "OK." But she said in September that "all of them are more acceptable in the context of comprehensive immigration reform."

If the Republicans maintain control in the House, the Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee probably would be Rep. Lamar Smith, a Texan who is a strong advocate for enforcement and has argued that a guest-worker program hurts American workers. However, Rep. John Conyers Jr., the Michigan Democrat in line to become chairman if his party wins control, supports a broad legalization.

How much of a priority the issue is for Democrats remains to be seen. Although leaders say they want to find a solution, it has not played a major role as Democrats campaigned this year.

When House Democrats issued a 25-page position paper on their priorities for next year, immigration reform was not among them.

And in "The Plan," a manifesto-type book by Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel and Democratic Leadership Council President Bruce Reed, immigration rated one brief mention -- an attack on Republicans for using the issue for political gain.

Money matters

DOJ_NMG_0089935

But the opportunity to outspend Mr. Bush on homeland security might end up enticing Democrats to push for their own political gain on the issue, said Rikki Horton, government relations associate for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which opposes amnesty and calls for a crackdown on illegal immigration.

"Since the president doesn't fully fund some of these in his budget, I actually believe the Democrats would want to go against the president," she said. "I don't believe that everything will be fully funded but I do believe, in a scenario where the Democrats take over, I can see them wanting to use this to put the president in a bad light."

That happened two years ago, when just months after promising to increase the U.S. Border Patrol by 2,000 agents a year for five years, Mr. Bush's first budget included just 210 agents. Lawmakers from both parties used that move to criticize the White House and insist on bigger increases.

One of those lawmakers, Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, would have the chance to play a major role again should Democrats take control of the Senate.

He is in line to recapture the chairmanship of the Senate Appropriations Committee, and although he is not talking about specifics should Democrats win control, his record is clear.

"If we are truly serious about securing our borders -- and not just engaging in rhetoric and hot air -- then we will put real dollars where the rubber hits the road," he said earlier this year.

His spokesman, Tom Gavin, said Mr. Byrd supports the homeland security spending bill the president signed into law last month that included $1.2 billion for fencing, vehicle barriers, sensors, cameras and other infrastructure, and gives the Department of Homeland Security flexibility to decide what to spend where.

"Senator Byrd is supportive of that funding and the secretary's authority. No matter which party is in power, Senator Byrd will continue to work to make the improvements to border security that are critical to the safety of the United States," Mr. Gavin said.

The major decisions for the appropriations committees will be how much to increase the Border Patrol and to determine how many workplace enforcement teams and additional detention beds are needed.

Chances for an immigration agreement also will become entwined with presidential personalities and politics.

The Hispanic vote might play a much larger role in the presidential election than it has in House races this year, which could influence the way both parties handle it.

And Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican and a major backer of legalization, is a presidential contender on the Republican side, though other Republican candidates are likely to emerge taking a much stricter line on the issue. Just this week Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, who was the champion of the 700 miles of fencing, announced that he is exploring a run for president.

Part I

Democratic majority ready to go to war over Iraq

Part II

Democrats wait in the wings with subpoenas

Part III

Specter of tax man haunts Democrats

Lawsuit Says Latino Citizens Were Caught Up In Raids Seeking Illegal Immigrants (LAT)

By Jenny Jarvie

The Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

atlanta — A civil rights group sued the federal government Wednesday on behalf of five Latino U.S. citizens who say they were detained and harassed by agents carrying out raids targeting illegal immigrants in south Georgia.

The Southern Poverty Law Center said that U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents used "Gestapo-like" tactics as they fanned across three Georgia counties in September, breaking into homes and stopping people in their cars "because they looked 'Mexican.' "

The class-action suit seeks not only compensatory damages for the plaintiffs — who include a landlord whose property was damaged — but also a court order preventing the agency from conducting similar raids across the country.

DOJ_NMG_0089936

"This was a widespread sweep, based largely on racial and ethnic profiling, in violation of the 4th and 5th Amendments to the United States Constitution," Mary Bauer, attorney for the plaintiffs, said at a news conference here. Those amendments pertain to the right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure and the right to due process.

"Agents saw brown skin," Bauer said, "and made a presumption of illegality."

Marc Raimondi, an ICE spokesman, said the raids were conducted legally. "We don't conduct random sweeps," he said, noting that the agency had spent a month investigating the area and had compiled a targeted list of illegal immigrants who had worked at a poultry plant using fraudulent documents. "Race or ethnicity played no role," he said.

Federal agents searching for undocumented immigrants who worked at the Crider Corp. poultry plant in Stillmore, Ga., arrested more than 125 people in September. No U.S. citizens were arrested, but the suit claims that agents "trampled on" the constitutional rights of "every person of Hispanic descent unfortunate enough to get in the way."

Marie Justeen Mancha — a 15-year-old who was born in Texas and lives in Reidsville, Ga. — says she was in her bedroom getting dressed for school when she heard men inside her home yelling "illegals" and "Mexicans." In the living room, she says, she saw five men, one with his hand on his gun holster.

"My heart just dropped," she said.

Nearly two dozen armed agents roamed her house and yard without presenting a search warrant, the lawsuit said. Mancha's mother, Maria Christina Martinez, is a U.S. citizen who previously worked at the chicken plant.

According to the suit filed in federal court in Atlanta, agents stopped one plaintiff, Maria Margarita Morales, as she was driving home, repeatedly called her "Mexican," grabbed her arm and ordered her to get out of her vehicle. Agents also surrounded another plaintiff, Ranulfo Perez, outside his home, the suit said, grabbing him by the shirt, pressing a gun into his side and throwing him against his truck. Another plaintiff, Gladis Alicia Espitia, says agents broke down her front door and threatened to throw gas into her home if her family did not come out of a bedroom.

Georgia has the nation's fastest-growing population of illegal immigrants. According to the federal government, the number of undocumented immigrants in the state more than doubled, to 470,000 from 220,000, in the last five years. ICE's Atlanta office — which covers Georgia, South Carolina and North Carolina — arrested 4,633 suspected illegal immigrants in 2006, more than any previous year.

Bauer said the Southern Poverty Law Center filed the suit — which lists Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, six ICE administrators and 30 unnamed ICE agents as defendants — to warn federal agents against conducting similar raids.

"If immigration is a problem, this isn't the solution," she said. "We want to send out a strong message that if they do this in other communities, they are going to be sued."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Says Rumsfeld, Cheney Should Stay (AP-Y)

By Terence Hunt

AP, November 2, 2006

President Bush said Wednesday he wants Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney to remain with him until the end of his presidency, extending a job guarantee to two of the most-vilified members of his administration.

"Both those men are doing fantastic jobs and I strongly support them," Bush said in an interview with The Associated Press and others.

On the war in Iraq, Bush said the military has not asked for an increase in U.S. forces beyond the 144,000 already there. He said U.S. generals have told him "that the troop level they got right now is what they can live with."

On another international issue, Bush said he was determined that sanctions imposed against North Korea must be applied even though Pyongyang has agreed to return to six-nation nuclear disarmament talks.

The president spoke in the Oval Office, seated in a wing chair in front of a table with a bowl of roses. Six days before midterm elections, he steered away from political questions beyond saying he was confident that Republicans would defy the polls and hold control of the House and Senate. "I understand the pundits have got the race over. But I don't believe it's over until everybody votes," Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0089937

He refused to say whether he could work effectively with House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi or Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid if Democrats won either the House or Senate, or both.

Bush did take the opportunity to take another poke at Sen. John Kerry, in political hot water for a remark that the White House has characterized as a slam on U.S. troops in Iraq. Kerry has said he was making a joke critical of Bush, not the troops.

"It didn't sound like a joke to me," the president said.

Democrats and Republicans alike have called for Rumsfeld's resignation, arguing he has mishandled the war in Iraq where more than 2,800 members of the U.S. military have died since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003. Cheney has faced sharp criticism for his hardline views. In recent polling, less than 40 percent of respondents had a favorable view of Cheney and about a third had a favorable view of Rumsfeld.

Bush said he valued Cheney's advice and judgment.

"The good thing about Vice President Cheney's advice is, you don't read about it in the newspaper after he gives it," the president said. While Cheney was re-elected with Bush for four years, there has been recurring speculation that he might step down, perhaps for health reasons. As a practical matter, Bush could ask the vice president to leave if he wanted.

Bush credited Rumsfeld with overseeing wars in Iraq and Afghanistan while overhauling the military. "I'm pleased with the progress we're making," the president said. He replied in the affirmative when asked if he wanted Rumsfeld and Cheney to stay with him until the end.

Responding to Bush, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said, "With all due respect, the president just doesn't get it. We need a change in the Iraq strategy, but with Rumsfeld running the show we'll never get it."

Bush opened the interview by saying he was pleased that North Korea was returning to stalled nuclear talks. Although North Korea has a history of walking away from negotiations, Bush did not express doubts about the intentions of Kim Jong Il, North Korea's leader.

"It's his choice," Bush said. "I would hope he is sincere." He said that any deal with North Korea would have to be verifiable.

The president said he did not accept North Korea as a nuclear weapons state, even though it tested an atomic bomb three weeks ago. "Our objective is to see they're not a nuclear weapons state," the president said.

Bush said Robert Joseph, U.S. undersecretary of state for arms control and international security, and R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, will travel through the region to talk with allies about how to make progress.

"We're going to talk about making sure that the sanctions passed by the United Nations are effective," the president said. "Implementation of the sanctions will be on the table."

As for Iraq, the president expressed confidence in Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki despite apparent strains between Washington and Baghdad.

"I appreciate he's making hard decisions that he thinks are necessary to keep his country united and moving forward," Bush said. "I didn't find many differences of opinion when I talked to him. We both want Iraq to be able to govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself. We both want there to be benchmarks — Iraqi developed and designed benchmarks — that show the Iraqi people and the American people that this young democracy is making progress."

Bush said that "there's no question that October was a tough month. We lost 103 soldiers. It was a tough month because we were on the offense, the enemy was on the offense — the enemy was trying to affect us. And it was a tough month because of Ramadan. ... Our troops and Iraqi troops killed or captured over 1,500 people during this period of time."

Bush refused to comment on Cheney's assertion that a "dunk in water" of terrorist suspects was a "no-brainer" if it would save American lives. "We don't discuss the techniques we use," Bush said.

On other questions, Bush said:

_He will send Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson to Capitol Hill after the election to determine what can be achieved in the way of overhauling Social Security and Medicare.

_He understands the anxieties of some Republicans who have distanced themselves from his Iraq policies. "People will run the race they need to run," he said. Bush said Democrats "don't have a plan for victory."

DOJ_NMG_0089938

_"It's hard for me to tell" if U.S. troops will still be in Iraq when he leaves office in January 2009.

Kerry Offers Apology To Troops (WP)

By Peter Baker And Jim VandeHei

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) issued two apologies for remarks that seemed to impugn U.S. troops and abandoned his public schedule yesterday, but he denounced what he called the "campaign of smear and fear" against him as the surreal sequel to the 2004 presidential election echoed across the campaign trail.

The White House and Republican allies orchestrated a cascade of denunciations throughout the day to keep the once and possibly future presidential candidate on the defensive and force other Democrats to distance themselves. Kerry canceled plans to appear with several candidates and returned home to avoid becoming "a distraction to these campaigns."

Republican strategists appeared almost gleeful over the contretemps because it revived a favorite target at a time they need to motivate core supporters to vote in Tuesday's midterm elections. GOP officials have tried to make the elections not a referendum on President Bush but a choice between two parties with competing visions over taxes, terrorism and Iraq, but they have struggled to find a symbol for Democrats. Kerry's comments have allowed Republicans to make him again the face of his party and cast 2006 as a rerun of Bush vs. Kerry.

Democrats were irritated to lose two days in the homestretch that they would rather have devoted to Bush's troubled Iraq policy, and they pressed Kerry to apologize and get out of sight. Hoping to change the subject, Democrats seized on comments by Bush, who told reporters he wants Vice President Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to remain in their jobs for the final two years of his administration.

To reassert their main message, Democrats planned a blitz of final-weekend television advertising assailing Bush for his management of the war; Republicans, meanwhile, poured more money into once-safe districts in a sign that the field of competitive races may still be expanding. Polls and strategists in both parties indicate that the Democrats are in position to win the House and are running neck-and-neck to take the Senate.

Republicans decided to make a last-minute bid to help save two GOP senators who had been almost given up for lost. Sens. Conrad Burns (Mont.) and Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.) trail Democratic challengers but appear within striking distance, according to GOP strategists. Democrats need to all but sweep the most competitive Senate races to win control.

But much of the day's political conversation centered on Kerry. His return to the national spotlight provided a new opening to Republicans, who have been battered through much of the fall by the political fallout from the escalating violence in Iraq, the House page scandal and new corruption probes.

Speaking to an audience in California on Monday, Kerry said: "Education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. And if you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

Kerry said yesterday that he meant it as a dig at Bush, and his office released a copy of the prepared remarks he was supposed to deliver: "I can't overstress the importance of a great education. Do you know where you end up if you don't study, if you aren't smart, if you're intellectually lazy? You end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq. Just ask President Bush."

Rejecting the explanation, Republicans quickly developed a Web ad demanding that he apologize and issued statement after statement attacking and mocking him. One released by House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (Ohio) included a picture that appeared to show soldiers in the desert holding up a banner: "Halp Us Jon Carry -- We R Stuck Hear N Irak."

Bush for the second day took aim at his old foe as well. "It didn't sound like a joke to me," he said in an interview with news services. In a separate interview with radio host Rush Limbaugh, Bush said, "Anybody who is in a position to serve this country ought to understand the consequences of words, and our troops deserve the full support of people in government."

Cheney also jumped into the fray, his office so eager that in a rare move it sent out advance excerpts from a speech given later in the day. "Senator Kerry said he was just making a joke and he botched it up," Cheney said. "I guess we didn't get the nuance. Actually, he was for the joke before he was against it."

DOJ_NMG_0089939

Around the country, Republicans pressed Democratic opponents to respond to Kerry's remarks. "Whatever the intent, Senator Kerry was wrong to say what he said," said Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. (D), who is in a tight Senate race in Tennessee. "He needs to apologize to our troops."

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) likewise condemned the remarks. "What Senator Kerry said was inappropriate," she said at a Veterans of Foreign Wars post. She added: "We don't need to be reciting the 2004 election, as much as President Bush would like that to happen. This election is about him and his policies."

Kerry tried twice to explain himself yesterday. After a Democratic candidate asked the senator not to campaign with him, Kerry canceled the rest of his schedule and called in to the Don Imus radio talk show, which is simulcast on MSNBC. Kerry said it is Bush who owes the nation an apology, for a botched war.

"They're trying to change the subject," Kerry said. "It's their campaign of smear and fear. . . . This is Swift boat stuff all over again."

Asked why not apologize for the misunderstanding, Kerry said: "Of course I'm sorry about a botched joke. You think I love botched jokes? I mean, it's pretty stupid."

Imus reflected Democratic anxieties by asking Kerry to stop talking publicly because it might "ruin" the party's election chances.

"I love you, but just stop it," Imus said. "I'm begging you."

"Well, I think it's important to talk about Iraq," Kerry said.

"I'm begging you," Imus said.

"I hear you," Kerry said. "You do not have to beg. You're my friend. I understand what you're saying. But I'm telling you, I'm not going to let these guys lie and smear."

"Stop now, stop now," Imus said again. "I'm begging you."

"You got it," Kerry said.

Kerry's apology did not satisfy critics, so by day's end, he issued a written apology: "I sincerely regret that my words were misinterpreted to wrongly imply anything negative about those in uniform and I personally apologize to any service member, family member or American who was offended."

Heading into the final days before the elections, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee plans to run an advertisement over the weekend that hits Republicans for not holding Bush accountable on the Iraq war, but the ad buy is small and is scheduled for CNN alone. More than half of Democratic candidates in close races for the House and the Senate are planning ads criticizing Bush for his management of the war.

Republicans, meanwhile, are spending a lot of money protecting GOP seats. The National Republican Congressional Committee launched a $200,000-plus ad to help Rep. Charles H. Taylor (N.C.), who trails Democrat Heath Shuler. As part of its effort to limit losses, the NRCC is spending heavily in Idaho to win an open seat in a conservative part of the country. Rep. Melissa Hart (Pa.), who was not considered in much trouble a few weeks ago, is also getting last-minute help from the NRCC.

Both sides are making last-ditch efforts at long-shot races as well. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee plans to run $1 million in ads against Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.). Republicans are making a play for Michigan, where polls show Democratic Sen. Debbie Stabenow with a steady lead.

Bush Stands By Cheney, Rumsfeld (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

washington — President Bush reached out Wednesday to conservative audiences, delivering pared-down versions of his campaign speech in interviews with radio talk show host Rush Limbaugh and Pat Robertson's Christian Broadcasting Network.

And, in a separate interview with news agencies, he gave a vow of support for Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, two heroes to conservatives, and said he wanted them to remain in their posts.

DOJ_NMG_0089940

With control of the Senate and House at stake in Tuesday's election, the president has focused on delivering a sharp-edged message intended to draw contrasts between Republicans and Democrats and energize his most loyal conservative voters to get to the polls.

Rumsfeld and Cheney have become focal points for critics of the administration's policies in Iraq. Democrats, and some Republicans, have called in increasing numbers for Rumsfeld's removal as the death toll in Iraq has climbed.

Bush told news services Wednesday that "both those men are doing fantastic jobs, and I strongly support them," the Associated Press reported. When he was asked whether he wanted them to remain until the end of his term, he said yes.

The president also said he did not anticipate an increase in the approximately 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, saying that U.S. commanders there had assured him that "they've got what they can live with."

In the interview with Limbaugh, Bush said the fundamental issue in the campaign was whether voters would elect a Congress that supported him on national security issues.

"People come up to me all the time and say, 'Thank you for protecting us,' " Bush said. "And my answer in this campaign is, 'I'm going to continue to protect you, but I need a Congress that understands the stakes.' "

In its interview, the Christian Broadcasting Network asked Bush: "What's your prayer for the country?"

"My prayer is that this world be peaceful so that children can grow up understanding the benefits of freedom," the president said.

Bush Works To Solidify Base With A Defense Of Rumsfeld (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 1 — With less than a week before the election, President Bush sought to rally Republican voters on Wednesday with a vigorous defense of the war in Iraq and a vow to keep Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld in office until the end of Mr. Bush's term.

Mr. Bush appeared on Rush Limbaugh's radio program, whose audience is a reservoir of conservative voters, to criticize Democrats as lacking a plan for victory in Iraq.

Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney also spent another day going after Senator John Kerry, the Democratic presidential nominee two years ago, for remarks that Republicans say insulted the intelligence of American troops in Iraq.

"Anybody who is in a position to serve this country ought to understand the consequences of words," Mr. Bush said, "and our troops deserve the full support of people in government."

Mr. Kerry said in a statement issued on Wednesday by his office that his "poorly stated joke at a rally was not about and never intended to refer to any troop."

As Mr. Bush worked to solidify his base, Democratic and Republican Party committees were making some of their final moves on the electoral chessboard. The Republican Senate committee reported spending nearly $1 million on television advertisements in Maryland and more than $800,000 in Michigan. The Senate seats in those states are held by Democrats and have generally been considered safe, but the investments by Republicans suggested a hope of making them competitive.

Democrats sought to expand the contest for the Senate as well by buying air time in Arizona to rattle, if not defeat, Senator Jon Kyl, a Republican thought to be headed for relatively easy re-election. Democratic officials would not disclose how much they were spending.

Mr. Bush, in an interview with wire service reporters on Wednesday, said he intended to keep Mr. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon and Mr. Cheney in the vice presidency until he leaves office in 2009. Both are controversial figures, even among some Republicans, but they are also popular with conservatives who form the foundation of Mr. Bush's political and electoral strategy.

With polls showing a majority of Americans unhappy with the course of the war and many Republican candidates distancing themselves from Mr. Bush on it, the White House was taking a gamble on making Iraq the central subject of discussion in the final week of the campaign. His embrace of Mr. Rumsfeld carried particular risk, since some Republican candidates have joined nearly all Democrats in seeking his dismissal.

DOJ_NMG_0089941

Democrats responded to the Republicans' efforts with new advertisements accusing Mr. Bush and Mr. Rumsfeld of botching the war and making the United States less safe. A television spot from the Democratic Congressional committee said, "The White House is in denial as top generals warn that Iraq may be sliding into full-scale civil war."

A veterans group released an advertisement on Wednesday in which Iraq war veterans and Gen. Wesley K. Clark, who is retired and who was a Democratic presidential candidate in 2004, criticize the war. "Because of Iraq, there are more terrorists in the world," one veteran says.

Democrats also criticized Representative John A. Boehner, the No. 2 Republican in the House, as seeming to shift responsibility for problems in Iraq from Secretary Rumsfeld to the uniformed military.

"Let's not blame what's happening in Iraq on Rumsfeld," Mr. Boehner said in an interview on CNN on Wednesday afternoon. "But the fact is, the generals on the ground are in charge, and he works closely with them and the president."

Seeking to a draw a parallel to the flap over Mr. Kerry's comments, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the minority leader, demanded that Mr. Boehner apologize to the generals.

"John Boehner ought to be ashamed," Mr. Reid said in a statement. "He's blaming our troops for failures in Iraq."

Republican leaders hoped to buck up morale among conservative Christians, a normally reliable source of Republican votes. A sizeable number of such so-called values voters have told pollsters that they are unhappy with Mr. Bush and the Republican-led Congress and might stay home on Election Day or vote for Democrats.

James C. Dobson, founder of Focus on the Family and an influential voice among evangelical Christian voters, said on his radio program this week that Democrats and the news media were trying to suppress the conservative vote by reporting on unhappiness among evangelicals.

Mr. Dobson also warned that a Democratic takeover of Congress would bring "crippling setbacks in the battles against abortion and gay marriage."

In recent days, Mr. Bush and his surrogates have sought to rally Republicans by raising the specter of what they call unreconstructed liberal Democrats leading powerful committees if the Democrats regain control of Congress. Mr. Cheney took aim at one of them, Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York, who is in line to become chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, which writes tax laws.

Mr. Cheney said late last week that Mr. Rangel knew nothing about the American economy and would raise taxes as soon as he took over the committee.

Mr. Rangel responded by using a profanity to question Mr. Cheney's parentage. He said in an interview Wednesday that he was sorry for his choice of words, but not for the thought. He said he hoped that if the Democrats won control of Congress the nasty language on both sides would cease.

"I can take a political shot," Mr. Rangel said. "But my family and friends and constituents deserve better from the vice president of the United States."

Bush Seeks To Minimize Burden Of Iraq On Republican Candidates (BLOOM)

By Richard Keil

Bloomberg, November 2, 2006

Nov. 2 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush sought on several fronts yesterday to minimize what he acknowledged was the political burden of Iraq on Republicans in the Nov. 7 congressional elections.

The president, in an interview at the White House, reiterated his firm support for two of the officials most closely identified with U.S. policies there, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney, and predicted his party would hang on to its majority in Congress.

Bush also took another jab at one of his chief critics, Democratic Senator John Kerry, for remarks that have been interpreted as a criticism of U.S. troops. Kerry last night apologized for what he said was a ``botched" attempt at a joke aimed at Bush.

``It didn't sound like a joke to me," Bush said before Kerry issued his apology. ``More importantly, it didn't sound like a joke to the troops."

DOJ_NMG_0089942

With six days until the midterm election, Bush is attempting to rally core Republican voters to counter what polls show is widespread dissatisfaction with Congress and his handling of the presidency. He said he understood why some of his party's candidates are distancing themselves from his administration.

``People will run the race they need to run," Bush said. Still, he said he was confident Republicans would prevail.

``This is not my first campaign," Bush said. ``When people get in that booth, they'll ask two questions: Who best to protect us, and how best to keep the economy going."

In the final days before the election, Bush has been granting interviews with news organizations and stumping for candidates across the country.

Iraq

One of the biggest hurdles for Republicans is growing public sentiment that the war in Iraq was a mistake. A New York Times/CBS News poll released last night found 64 percent of Americans disapprove of the way Bush is handling the war. Other than Bush, Cheney and Rumsfeld are the two officials who draw the most criticism on the war.

Democrats and some Republicans have called for Rumsfeld to resign over the U.S. failure to head off an insurgency and sectarian strife that has increased the level of violence in Iraq. There were 99 U.S. military personnel killed in combat in Iraq during October, the biggest monthly toll since November 2004, when 126 were killed as U.S. forces were driving insurgents from the city of Fallujah. Another six died in accidents and from other causes last month, bringing the total death toll to 105.

`Fantastic Jobs'

Bush said he values Cheney's counsel and said Rumsfeld has steered the U.S. through wars in Iraq and Afghanistan while also undertaking an effort to transform the military's approach to warfare.

Both men ``are doing fantastic jobs," he said, adding that he wants them to remain in place for the rest of his presidency.

The president's comments about Rumsfeld were immediately seized on by Senator Charles Schumer of New York, who is heading Democratic Senate Campaign Committee.

``The president just doesn't get it," Schumer said in a statement. ``We need a change in the Iraq strategy, but with Rumsfeld running the show we'll never get it."

The furor over Kerry's remarks, made Oct. 30 during a campaign event in California, gave Republicans a rare opportunity to go on the offensive about Iraq. Kerry told his audience that those who fail to study hard ``could end up getting stuck in Iraq."

Regrets

Bush and other Republican demanded an apology for what they said was a slam against U.S. troops. Last night they got it.

``I sincerely regret that my words were misinterpreted to wrongly imply anything negative about those in uniform, and I personally apologize to any service member, family member, or American who was offended," Kerry said in a statement.

Some Republicans suggested Kerry's apology would lay the matter to rest. House Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio said the apology was ``good enough." White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said ``it was the right thing to do."

Still, the Republican National Committee said the party would continue using Kerry's gaffe in campaign material.

``It is getting a significant amount of local coverage," said Danny Diaz, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee in Washington. ``Republicans are on the offensive. Democrats are defensive."

Minimal Effect

Steve Hess, a presidential scholar at the Washington-based Brookings Institution, said any effects weren't likely to carry over to Election Day. ``I can't really imagine anybody going into the voting booth on Tuesday who is going to change their mind or even be there because John Kerry said something stupid," he said.

Bush acknowledged that Iraq hangs over the political landscape and is impeding his efforts to tout the growth of the U.S. economy since he took office and lower income tax rates passed by the Republican-controlled Congress.

``No question about that," he said. ``People ask me, `If the economy is so good, why aren't people celebrating.'" The rising cost of health care and energy are among the reasons, he said. So is Iraq.

``The war has overshadowed a lot," Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0089943

Looking past the election, Bush said he would send Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson to Capitol Hill to solicit ideas from Democrats and Republicans on restructuring entitlement programs such as Medicare and Medicaid, which face funding shortfalls.

`Willing to Listen'

``I am willing to listen to anything," Bush said. ``But I recognize it's going to take a bipartisan approach."

Another initiative the Bush wants to revive is revamping the Social Security program. Bush said that must be done without increasing taxes. Some Democrats, including former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin, have said taxes must be part of the equation in discussions about entitlement programs.

``Everyone knows my position: I believe we can solve this problem without raising taxes," Bush said. ``It's going to be important for people, if they are interested in going forward, not to put any preconditions on it."

Bush To Hit GOP Campaign Trail (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- On voters' minds though not on the ballot, President Bush is defiantly embracing the issue that has made him both unpopular and a possible liability for Republican congressional candidates this year: unyielding support for the war in Iraq.

As he heads out for a campaign-closing tour through the weekend—starting out West on Thursday and carrying him to Iowa and Missouri on Friday—the president is stumping with the fervor of someone whose own office is at stake. And in many ways it is, considering the impact on the remaining two years of his presidency if the Democrats take control of the House and possibly the Senate.

Insisting that this contest is "far from over," Bush has escalated his campaign-trail rhetoric about the war with a warning: "However they put it, the Democrats' approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses."

As Florida Gov. Jeb Bush put it, "My brother loves a fight. He enjoys to be underestimated. He has defied the pundits in the last three election cycles. He will take risks on behalf of his cause."

The risk of putting so much behind support for the war in Iraq in the face of so much distressing news from the battlefront is that public opposition to the war will take the same toll on some of his party's candidates that it has taken on Bush's own public approval ratings. They have been below 40 percent for months.

Yet analysts say the president's resolve for fighting the war against terrorism remains his strongest suit politically and represents his best chance for stirring conservative turnout Tuesday in taut races, such as Missouri's contest between Sen. Jim Talent (R-Mo.) and Democrat Claire McCaskill.

As unpopular as the war in Iraq has become, they say, the president cannot run from it—so he is running with it.

"All other issues are taking second fiddle to Iraq," said Philip Hughes, a communications consultant who served on the National Security Councils of the previous Bush and Reagan administrations. He said flatly that the current Bush administration "has really done a lousy job of communicating its policy" on Iraq.

"There is nothing that seems to be so quite in the minds of Americans—not gay marriage… not taxes. There is nothing that overshadows Iraq," Hughes said. "The president, it seems to me, has no choice but to defend his policy, to defend Iraq. It seems to me this is the only option, the only play."

Playing to the issue that has carried his party through the last two elections, the president is portraying the GOP as the party prepared to protect Americans from terrorism and Democrats as the party ready to "cut and run" from the fight in Iraq.

"You can't win a war unless you're willing to fight the war," Bush said as he campaigned for a Republican House candidate in Sugar Land, Texas, this week. "Retreat from Iraq before the job was done would embolden an enemy and make this country more vulnerable to attack."

Democrats complain that the president is tarring critics of the war in Iraq by waging a campaign of "fear."

DOJ_NMG_0089944

The administration is "massively overstating" the threat that terrorism poses to the United States, according to John Mueller, a professor of political science at Ohio State University and author of a new book, "Overblown: How Politicians and the Terrorism Industry Inflate National Security Threats, and Why We Believe Them."

Yet for Bush, Mueller said, campaigning on a perceived threat of terrorism following any failure of the U.S. mission in Iraq remains "his strongest suit. … In politics, what you always do is play to your strong suit."

The Republicans also have found fresh fodder for their argument that Democrats don't understand the stakes in Iraq with Sen. John Kerry's "botched joke" this week. If "you study hard … you can do well," Kerry said. "If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq." Kerry said he botched a prepared line about Bush getting stuck in Iraq, but Bush and fellow Republican leaders accused Kerry of insulting the intelligence of American troops.

"Of course, now Sen. Kerry says he was just making a joke, and he botched it up," Vice President Dick Cheney said at a campaign rally in Montana on Wednesday. "I guess we didn't get the nuance. He was for the joke before he was against it."

Kerry apologized Wednesday to "any service member, family member or American" offended by his comment and said he regretted that his words were "misinterpreted to imply anything negative about those in uniform."

In another pointed effort to turn out conservatives, the president also is campaigning for passage of several state proposals to ban same-sex marriage.

Having failed to win congressional support for a constitutional amendment defining marriage as the union of a man and woman, Bush has raised the issue anew in recent days, since the New Jersey Supreme Court ruled that the state must give gay and lesbian couples the same legal rights as it affords married couples.

"For decades, activist judges have tried to redefine America by court order," Bush said, campaigning in Georgia this week. "Just this last week in New Jersey, another activist court issued a ruling that raises doubt about the institution of marriage."

Twenty states have enacted constitutional amendments banning gay marriage, and voters in another eight states face amendments on Tuesday—including Tennessee and Virginia where Republicans are fighting to turn out the vote in close races that could determine the balance of partisan power in the Senate.

"It's really a base-mobilization argument," said John Green, a political scientist at the University of Akron. "The issue had lost some of its immediacy.… What the New Jersey Supreme Court ruling did was make it possible to talk about the return of that urgency. It may indeed help mobilize conservative Christians."

Campaigning on the war, too, can help mobilize conservatives disenchanted with the president's stance on other issues, such as deficit spending, Green said. "These are people who nonetheless care a great deal about national security," he said.

Keeping the spotlight focused on Iraq is not without risk in elections where many Democrats are trying to frame them as a referendum on Bush in general, and the war in particular.

This is the case, Green said, "because Iraq is becoming less and less popular—even within his own party. On the other hand, he doesn't have much alternative.… It's a variation on [Secretary of Defense Donald] Rumsfeld's comment that you go to war with the army that you have…. You go into the last week of a campaign with the policies that you have."

IGs Probe Allegations On Global Warming Data (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

Inspectors general at two agencies have begun an investigation into whether the Bush administration has suppressed government scientists' research on global warming, officials at NASA and the Commerce Department confirmed yesterday.

Prompted by a request this fall by 14 Democratic senators, the IGs are examining whether political appointees have prevented climate researchers at NASA and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration from conveying their findings to the public.

The issue of global warming has emerged as one of the most contentious scientific debates within the administration. In the past year, several federal climate scientists, including James Hansen, director of NASA's Goddard Institute for Space Studies, have accused the administration of muzzling them, a charge the White House has denied.

DOJ_NMG_0089945

Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.), a member of the Environment and Public Works Committee and author of the Sept. 29 letter to the two inspectors general, said yesterday in an interview that he was pleased about the investigation. "It's extremely important, because the evidence is so obvious that they've tried to block the presentation of information on this in an unbiased fashion," Lautenberg said.

The probe's results should become public early next year, a Lautenberg aide said.

Officials at NASA and the Commerce Department, which oversees NOAA, pledged to cooperate with any inquiry but defended their media policies.

"We support and encourage a process of open, peer-reviewed science, and the role of our public affairs office, like any other organization, is to coordinate and ensure that media get timely, accurate and thorough information," said Richard Mills, spokesman for Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez.

NASA spokesman Dean Acosta, whose agency came under intense media scrutiny once Hansen aired his allegations in January, noted that since then: "NASA clarified its policy ensuring free and open communications of scientific and engineering data with the public and across the agency. The revised policy was widely distributed and widely reported upon. It is working well."

Senate Environment and Public Works Committee Chairman James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.), who has called the idea of human-induced climate change a "hoax," questioned why government officials would be investigating the matter. "This is purely eleventh-hour election-year politics," he said.

Some federal scientists interviewed yesterday said they welcomed the probe because they had encountered problems in speaking to reporters about their work.

Tom Knutson, a climate research scientist at NOAA's Geophysical Fluid Dynamics Laboratory in Princeton, N.J., said he could not speak in his official capacity, "but as a private citizen, I think it's a good idea they're looking into that. There should be open lines of communication between scientists and the media, and some of what I experienced did not meet that standard."

A year ago, Knutson said, Bush administration officials twice blocked him from discussing with television reporters a possible connection between global warming and hurricanes.

An Oct. 19, 2005, e-mail exchange between Commerce Department spokesman Chuck Fuqua and NOAA spokesman Kent Laborde, concerning a possible CNBC interview with Knutson, details Fuqua's concern that Knutson is less willing to discount the connection than two other government researchers. "Why can't we have one of the other guys on then?" Fuqua asked Laborde. The exchange was posted on the Web site of Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.).

Democrats Say Hunger Report Stalled (AP-Y)

By Libby Quaid, Ap Food And Farm Writer

AP, November 2, 2006

Democrats are accusing the Bush administration of holding up a report on the number of people going hungry in the United States.

Since 1999, the number of people struggling with hunger has risen from 31 million to 38 million in 2004. The Agriculture Department report has generally been released in October, a month after annual poverty figures are released by the Census Department.

Democrats said the delay appears political. Competitive elections across the country will decide next Tuesday whether President Bush's party keeps control of Congress.

USDA officials said the report has long been set for a mid-November release and that the delay is not political.

Rep. Anthony Weiner, D-N.Y., compared the delay to a recent IRS decision to hold off collections of back taxes from last year's hurricane victims.

"It seems like a pattern is emerging where the administration simply tries to bury bad information the closer they get to the election," Weiner said.

"The professionals in these agencies who want to do their work in this administration are being thwarted, because it's all politics, all the time," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0089946

Rep. Rosa DeLauro, D-Conn., said the administration "continues to put politics ahead of hunger in America." She is the top Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee's farm spending subcommittee.

Weiner sent a letter about the delay Wednesday to Karl Rove, the president's chief political strategist.

A department spokeswoman, Terri Teuber, said officials decided some time ago to issue the report in mid-November because analysts haven't always been able to finish it by October.

"There has been absolutely no political pressure to hold this report," Teuber said.

Done by the department's Economic Research Service, the report details the number of people with food insecurity, meaning they don't have enough money or resources to get food.

It is possible the report will show the number of hungry people has stopped climbing. That is what the Census Bureau reported on this year's poverty figures. Last year there were 37 million people still living below the poverty line, about the same as 2004.

Regardless of the reason for the delay, anti-hunger advocates just want to see the numbers.

"Our real concern is that so few people are talking about the problem and proposing ways to address that struggle with hunger that 38 million people constantly face," said Jim Weill, president of the Food Research and Action Center.

That goes for the administration, for both parties in Congress and for the private sector, Weill said.

"If we ought to be able to do anything as a country, it's that we ought to be able to get enough adequate, decent food to everybody," Weill said.

OTHER NEWS:

Economy Displays More Signs Of Slowing (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — There is little doubt the economy is slowing. What is unclear is how long the decline will last or how deep it will be.

The latest evidence of a slowing economy came Wednesday in reports showing a dip in the rate of growth in the manufacturing sector and a further decline in housing construction.

Also on Wednesday, Merrill Lynch warned clients that its “recession-risk indicator” is now pointing to a 51% chance of a recession in the next year, the highest such odds since the last recession in 2001.

The indicator has only twice hit the 51% line without being followed by a recession, Merrill Lynch chief North American economist David Rosenberg said in a report titled, “On a Knife's Edge.”

The question of whether there will be a recession is “still a tough call,” he says. But “what the indicator represents is, at a minimum, a significant slowing in growth.”

Joel Naroff of Naroff Economic Advisors says there are still enough factors in the economy's favor to keep it afloat. In particular, job growth is still solid, and wages are rising while interest rates are low, historically speaking. But that doesn't mean the economy is poised for a big takeoff.

“I'm not concerned about a recession at all, but I do think that we could be looking at (subpar) growth … this quarter and the first half of next year,” he says.

But Sue Burnett of Houston-based Burnett Staffing Specialists, says hiring in Texas is still strong, particularly for engineers, accountants and call-center operators.

“We think that the economy is doing fine,” she says. “We see that people are optimistic, that they are hiring people. We haven't seen any layoffs or any cutbacks.”

Growth in the manufacturing sector in October eased to the slowest pace since June 2003, the Institute for Supply Management said. Measures of orders, production and order backlogs all declined, while employment grew.

Norbert Ore, who heads the ISM factory survey, says one of the “big worries” was that manufacturers on average said their clients' inventories were “too high” last month, the first time that has happened in more than five years. That's significant, because if firms have large inventories on hand, they will not need to order more goods, potentially leading to a drop in manufacturing activity.

DOJ_NMG_0089947

AGCO, a farm equipment manufacturer and distributor, said Wednesday that net sales in 2006 are expected to be down 2% to 3% vs. 2005, “based on lower industry demand and planned dealer inventory reductions,” the Duluth, Ga.-based firm said in a statement accompanying its latest earnings report.

In another report, the Commerce Department said construction activity declined for the third-consecutive month in September to the lowest level since January. An increase in non-residential construction was more than offset by a decrease in home building.

Weak U.S. Manufacturing Data Signal Slowdown In Economy (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

The latest data on manufacturing activity offered little support for the idea that the U.S. economy will rebound quickly from a slow third quarter.

The Institute for Supply Management, a purchasing managers' trade group, said its manufacturing index fell to 51.2 in October, from 52.9 a month earlier. The new-orders component of the index, which offers a glimpse of potential manufacturing activity, fell to 52.1 from 54.2. Any number above 50 suggests expansion, but the October readings indicate that the manufacturing sector, which makes up about a fifth of the economy, was losing momentum as it entered the current quarter.

"It's an indication that we've peaked and the rate of growth is slowing or will disappear for the short term," said Norbert Ore, who oversees the manufacturing survey and also serves as procurement director at Georgia-Pacific Corp. One bright spot, he said, was a sharp drop in the "prices paid" portion of the survey -- a sign that inflation pressures are easing along with energy prices.

Economists said the deceleration in manufacturing suggests that slowdowns in both the housing and automobile sectors are spreading to the broader economy, as a drop in home and auto construction translates into fewer orders for factories. Mr. Ore named wood products, appliances, plastics and fabricated metals among the sectors that had seen the sharpest declines in October.

"I think I hear the footsteps of housing construction going up the supply chain," said Jim Meil, chief economist at Eaton Corp. in Cleveland.

The ISM report added to investor concerns about the U.S. economy's ability to recover from a tepid third quarter, during which its annualized, inflation-adjusted growth rate fell to an estimated 1.6% -- the slowest pace since 2003.

Recent data have shown significant declines in housing and housing-related industries. Last week, the government estimated that residential investment fell at an annualized, inflation-adjusted rate of 17% in the third quarter -- the largest quarterly drop since 1991. Yesterday, the Commerce Department reported that overall construction spending fell 0.3% in September from a month earlier, and the National Association of Realtors said its index of pending home sales slipped 1.1% in September from August. Also in September, production in several housing-related sectors -- such as wood products and furniture -- dropped more than 1%, according to the Federal Reserve. All the data are seasonally adjusted.

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

1

WSJ's Jon Hilsenrath explains how today's economic indicators2 fit together to give a big picture of the economy's state, with more indications of a slowdown.

"We're going to be down compared to the recent cycle," said Richard Kelley, operations manager at Knoxville Drywall Inc., which does contracting mainly for residential housing projects in and around Knoxville, Tenn. "It's coming back to a more sustainable level." He said his orders for drywall were about flat in October compared with a year earlier, after rising more than 10% the year before.

Some economists argue that any downturn in manufacturing will be short-lived, because consumer demand remains healthy. Data on September personal income and consumption, for example, suggested people have money and are willing to spend. Drew Matus, an economist at Lehman Brothers in New York, says many company executives are probably holding back not because they can't find customers, but because they're wary of investing in production until they have a better idea of the depth of the downturn in housing.

DOJ_NMG_0089948

Write to Mark Whitehouse at mark.whitehouse@wsj.com3

Catching Breath: Dow Industrials Ease For 4th Day (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

Reports showing surprisingly weak manufacturing and construction activity in the U.S. bumped the Dow Jones Industrial Average lower. The pullback extended the Dow's losing streak to four days, the longest since early August, immediately before the blue-chip indicator began a run to fresh records.

The Dow shed 49.71 points, or 0.4%, to end at 12031.02, up 12.3% on the year. Among the blue-chip indicator's weakest component companies were United Technologies, which fell 2.2%, and Alcoa, which fell 1.5%.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.7%, or 10.13 points, to 1367.81, up 9.6% on the year. The tech-stock-focused Nasdaq Composite Index fell 1.4%, or 32.36 points, to 2334.35, up 5.9% on the year.

The Institute for Supply Management said its index of U.S. manufacturing activity for October fell 1.7 points to 51.2, the lowest level in more than three years and well below analysts' expectations for an October reading of 53.5.

Bond prices rose and the 10-year Treasury yield fell to its lowest level in a month, as traders interpreted the data as a signal inflation remains in check in the U.S. economy.

At the same time, the drop wasn't enough to rekindle investors' fading hopes that the Federal Reserve will cut its key interest-rate target this year to spur economic growth, said Conrad DeQuadros, senior economist at Bear Stearns.

He pointed out that any ISM reading above 50 signals growth, which means that even if the numbers released yesterday were below expectations, they still mean factory activity is rising. By contrast, when the Fed started its last cycle of rate cuts in 2001, the ISM index was below 44, Mr. DeQuadros said.

"The economy is still fairly solid," he said. "If anything, I think this is the type of report that the Fed might welcome."

Separately, the Commerce Department reported U.S. construction spending fell 0.3% in September, worse than the 0.1% decline Wall Street had expected.

Gold rose, as investors flocked to the yellow metal because of its historical role as a haven from economic difficulties. Futures rose $12.50, or 2.1%, to $616.60 a troy ounce, up 19.2% this year.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell; bonds rose. The 10-year note gained 12/32 point, or $3.75 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.565%.

The dollar strengthened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 117.04 yen, compared with 116.96. The euro fell to $1.2755 from $1.2763.

Write to Peter A. McKay at peter.mckay@wsj.com1

Kerry Sorry For 'Stuck In Iraq' Remark (AP-Y)

By David Espo

AP, November 2, 2006

Fearful of damaging his own party in next week's elections, Sen. John Kerry apologized Wednesday to "any service member, family member or American" offended by remarks deemed by Republicans and Democrats to be insulting to U.S. forces in Iraq.

Six days before the election, the Democrats' 2004 presidential nominee said he wanted to avoid becoming a distraction in the final days of the battle for control of Congress. He added he sincerely regretted that his words were "misinterpreted to imply anything negative about those in uniform."

DOJ_NMG_0089949

In a brief statement, Kerry attacked President Bush for a "failed security policy." Yet his apology, issued after prominent Democrats had urged him to cancel public appearances, was designed to quell a controversy that party leaders feared would stall their drive for big gains on Nov. 7.

With polls showing the public opposed to the war in Iraq, Democrats have expressed increasing optimism in recent days that they will gain the 15 seats they need to win control of the House. Democrats must pick up six seats to win the Senate, a taller challenge, and both parties made last-minute efforts to increase the number of competitive races.

For the Democratic senatorial committee, that meant pumping about $1 million into an Arizona race long thought out of reach. For the counterpart Republican committee, it meant a foray into Maryland, also viewed as an unlikely state to pick up a seat.

Kerry beat a grudging retreat in his return to the national campaign spotlight. Earlier, on the radio program "Imus in the Morning," the Massachusetts senator said he was "sorry about a botched joke" about Bush. He heaped praise on the troops, adamantly accused Republicans of twisting his words and said it was the commander in chief and his aides who "owe America an apology for this disaster in Iraq."

Democrats cringed, though, at the prospect of the Massachusetts senator becoming the face of the party for the second consecutive national campaign. "No one wants to have the 2004 election replayed," said Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., like Kerry, a potential contender for the 2008 nomination.

Congressional candidates in Iowa and Minnesota swiftly made plain that Kerry was no longer welcome to appear at scheduled rallies, and the senator scrapped an appearance in Philadelphia.

"It was a real dumb thing to say. He should say sorry," said Democrat Claire McCaskill, running in a tight Senate campaign in Missouri.

The White House accepted Kerry's statement. "Senator Kerry's apology to the troops for his insulting comments came late but it was the right thing to do," said Dana Perino, deputy press secretary.

With Bush showing the way, Republicans had worked energetically to turn Kerry into an all-purpose target in a campaign that has long loomed as a loser for the GOP — much as they ridiculed him two years ago on their way to electoral gains.

"Anybody who is in a position to serve this country ought to understand the consequences of words. ... We've got incredible people in our military, and they deserve full praise and full support of this government," Bush said in an interview with conservative talk-radio personality Rush Limbaugh.

"Of course, now Senator Kerry says he was just making a joke, and he botched it up," Vice President Dick Cheney said in remarks prepared for a campaign appearance in Montana. "I guess we didn't get the nuance. He was for the joke before he was against it."

The jab was designed to recall Kerry's inartful comment from the last election that he had voted for $87 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan before he voted against it.

Two days ago, Kerry stirred controversy when he told a group of California students that individuals who don't study hard and do their homework would likely "get stuck in Iraq." Aides said the senator had mistakenly dropped one word from his prepared remarks, which was originally written to say "you end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq." In that context, they said, it was clear Kerry was referring to Bush, not to the troops.

The speed with which party leaders and candidates shoved Kerry aside underscored the difficulty he will face running for the nomination after leading the party to defeat in 2004. He also had the misfortune of being disinvited from an appearance in Iowa — the state whose caucuses will begin the delegate selection process for the White House race.

Party leaders were far more focused on the election in six days time, rather than the one two years away.

Democratic officials said the leaders of the party's campaign committees had relayed word to Kerry for him to avoid becoming a distraction. Aides to Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., and Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., chairmen of the Senate and House campaign committees, said they would not comment on any possible telephone conversations that had occurred.

Democrats have privately told outsiders they have locked up 10 of the 15 GOP-held seats they need. Polls indicate several dozen additional races are competitive, far more than appeared possible at the outset of the campaign, and too many for Republican comfort at a time of opposition to the war and low presidential approval ratings at home.

DOJ_NMG_0089950

In the Senate, Democrats claim they are on track to defeat four Republican incumbents, including Sens. Mike DeWine in Ohio, Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania, Lincoln Chafee in Rhode Island and Conrad Burns in Montana. Republicans tacitly concede DeWine and Santorum appear headed for defeat, but the party's senatorial committee has launched television commercials in the campaign's final week in an attempt to save Chafee and Burns.

Barring a dramatic shift in opinion in the campaign's final days, that leaves only a handful of races in significant doubt, principally three Republican-held seats in Tennessee, Missouri and Virginia.

Unlike 2004, when Bush rallied the country to his side by asking "who do you trust" in wartime, public opinion polls now show the conflict in Iraq is unpopular. Increasingly, Republican candidates have found it politically necessary to emphasize their differences with Bush on a struggle that has dragged on for nearly four years and cost more than 2,800 American lives.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee unveiled a web video during the day, hoping to turn discontent with the war into opposition to Republican lawmakers who have backed the president. Bill Burton, a spokesman, said it would air on cable television nationally, although he provided no details.

The ad features scenes of carnage and an ominous soundtrack, while the announcer says, "With the White House in denial, while top generals warning that Iraq might be sliding into a full scale civil war, tell Congress it's long past time to put down their rubber stamp and ask the hard questions about Iraq."

Flubbed Joke Makes Kerry A Political Punching Bag, Again (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 1 — He's back.

Senator John Kerry had been carefully and quietly building himself back up after his failed 2004 presidential run, campaigning for Democratic candidates in places where he could forget about his sometimes strained relationships with his peers back in Washington.

But with a single word — or a single word left out of what was supposed to be a laugh line directed at the president — Mr. Kerry has become a punching bag again, for Republicans and for his own party.

"Please stop it," Mr. Kerry's friend, Don Imus, the radio talk show host, urged him on his morning broadcast. "Stop talking. Go home."

But even as Mr. Kerry seemed to follow that advice, retreating to Washington, he was not going away.

For Republicans and the White House, Mr. Kerry's "botched joke" Monday was manna from Massachusetts, that reliable redoubt of liberal caricatures. The White House, which had been struggling for ways to make President Bush less of a liability in the election, seized on Mr. Kerry's comments, with the president, vice president and spokesmen blanketing radio and television to blast him for impugning the troops.

For Democrats, Mr. Kerry became a headache, as Republican candidates in tight races across the country demanded that Democrats return money they had taken from him or call on him to apologize.

Three Democratic challengers announced they had canceled plans to campaign with him — leaving one, Tim Walz in Minnesota, without a prominent surrogate while his opponent campaigned with Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, who called Mr. Kerry unsupportive of the troops.

National leaders calculated that the comments would probably not affect the elections. But Mr. Kerry's sudden center-stage appearance in the last days of the campaign revived grumblings about his putting his own political future ahead of the party's.

Mr. Kerry's advisers were trying to figure out the damage as he considers a 2008 run.

The long-term problem was not so much that he appeared to be insulting the troops — although that did not help, when his message rests so much on his military service and concern for veterans. It was more that his remarks left a segment of his own party, and perhaps the electorate, wondering if he has the agility and political skill to compete at the highest level.

"Do you need to go to joke school?" one reporter asked him.

"Sure," Mr. Kerry replied — a notably concise answer for a senator who typically speaks in paragraphs.

DOJ_NMG_0089951

His advisers lamented the senator's inability to get out of his own way, as much as they attacked Mr. Bush and others for trying to raise doubts about Mr. Kerry's patriotism when they had never gone to war.

"It's the skill of the flak machine to make him the target of ridicule when on everything else he's been doing, he has been really tough, he's been really clear, he's been really on," said one of Mr. Kerry's advisers. "You can imagine how frustrating this thing is to all of us. And him in particular."

Mr. Kerry's camp took heart as some bloggers applauded his feisty rebuttal to the president and Mr. McCain on Tuesday night — in comparison to his sluggish response to the attacks by the Swift boat veterans that helped torpedo his 2004 campaign.

"Wow, much to my total shock, yes folks, there IS a live pulse in Senator Kerry's body," wrote Gun Toting Liberal, a blogger. "I think this may just be the first time I have ever listened to the elitist from Massachusetts and felt a compelling interest to lean forward and listen to what the man had to say."

Mr. Kerry's prepared remarks to California students on Monday called for him to say, "Do you know where you end up if you don't study, if you aren't smart, if you're intellectually lazy? You end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq. Just ask President Bush." In his delivery, he dropped the word "us."

Democrats came out strongly against him. Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., who is running for an open Senate seat in Tennessee, said Mr. Kerry was "wrong to say what he did," and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York called Mr. Kerry's remarks inappropriate.

After canceling his appearances, Mr. Kerry called several fellow Democrats to tell them he would apologize, and by the end of the day he issued this statement:

"As a combat veteran, I want to make it clear to anyone in uniform and to their loved ones: my poorly stated joke at a rally was not about, and never intended to refer to any troops. I sincerely regret that my words were misinterpreted to wrongly imply anything negative about those in uniform, and I personally apologize to any service member, family member, or American who was offended."

He blamed Republicans for preferring to "talk about anything but their failed security policy."

"I don't want my verbal slip to be a diversion from the real issues. I will continue to fight for a change of course to provide real security for our country and a winning strategy for our troops."

Representative Edward J. Markey of Massachusetts, one of the Democrats Mr. Kerry reached out to, said: "The country wants to hear what the president intends to do to correct this disastrous Iraq policy. If the president chooses instead to talk about misinterpreted jokes, shame on him."

Other Democrats insisted the episode revealed little.

"If the issue is whether or not John Kerry can tell a joke and tell it well," Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa, who campaigned for Mr. Kerry in 2004, said in an interview with Radio Iowa, "I could have told you the answer to that question was no a week ago."

Kerry Apologizes For Iraq Remark (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. John Kerry apologized Wednesday for a "botched joke" that suggested U.S. troops in Iraq are uneducated, as Republicans continued to assail him and one Democrat returned a political contribution.

"I personally apologize to any servicemember, family member, or American who was offended," the Massachusetts Democrat said in a statement. Kerry, his party's 2004 presidential nominee, is a decorated Vietnam War veteran.

As the parties argued about Kerry's words, strategists debated how they might affect Tuesday's elections that will determine control of Congress. Republicans such as pollster Frank Luntz said the flap could increase GOP turnout on Nov. 7, while Democrats such as consultant Jenny Backus said any discussion of the Iraq war can only help them.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino called Kerry's apology "late," but "the right thing to do."

Democrats such as Rep. Harold Ford, who is in a Senate race in Tennessee, had called on Kerry to apologize.

Former congressman Baron Hill, a Democrat trying to reclaim a U.S. House seat in Indiana, returned a $1,000 political contribution from Kerry, saying he was "disturbed and disappointed" by the Massachusetts senator's remarks.

DOJ_NMG_0089952

The firestorm began Monday when Kerry told a college crowd that if they studied hard and made “an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq.”

Kerry said he meant to refer to President Bush and the administration's handling of the war. He accused the White House of deliberately distorting the statement to distract voters from failures in Iraq.

Kerry's office said he canceled campaign events in Pennsylvania, Minnesota and Iowa because he did not want candidates there to become “proxies” in a “distorted spin war.”

In an interview Wednesday with wire service reporters, Bush said the comment “didn't sound like a joke to me. More importantly, it didn't sound like a joke to the troops.”

Bush also criticized Kerry on Rush Limbaugh's radio program. The president is spending the last week of the campaign trying to rev up GOP turnout. Party officials said Kerry's joke should help with conservatives who are essential to their efforts to keep Congress.

Republican Party spokeswoman Tracey Schmitt said Kerry's comments should remind all voters that Democratic leaders have “a fundamentally flawed perspective about both the honor of our troops and the importance of their mission.”

Luntz said the flap is “not a huge deal, but it does matter.” He said it “sets a tone” for voters, including those who are undecided about whether to cast a ballot. “It could boost GOP turnout,” he said. “That could make a difference in a tight race.”

The flap may end Kerry's hopes for another White House bid in 2008, said New York political consultant Hank Sheinkopf. He added that Kerry may now be seen as someone “who lost once and couldn't control what he said the next time.” Kerry has said he will disclose his plans after the Nov. 7 elections.

Sheinkopf said Kerry's comments could hurt Democrats' efforts to attract Americans who respect the military.

Backus said the Republicans may be overplaying their hand with voters worried more about the war than arguments between politicians. “Anytime the battle is fought on the issue of Iraq, the Republicans lose,” she said.

Kerry Apologizes For Insulting Troops (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

Sen. John Kerry bowed to bipartisan pressure yesterday and apologized for insulting U.S. troops earlier this week when he suggested that a lack of wits and poor academic performance had landed them on the front lines of Iraq.

"I sincerely regret that my words were misinterpreted to wrongly imply anything negative about those in uniform, and I personally apologize to any service member, family member, or American who was offended," he said in a statement issued yesterday after both Democrats and Republicans rebuked him for the comments.

The apology came after Democratic campaign events with the 2004 presidential nominee were abruptly scrubbed in Philadelphia, Minnesota and Iowa. Democratic legislators Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Robert Menendez of New Jersey and Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. of Tennessee also criticized Mr. Kerry. Even Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, no stranger to gaffes, criticized the remark.

"Senator Kerry's remarks were poorly worded and just plain stupid," said Jon Tester, a Democrat running in a tight race against incumbent Sen. Conrad Burns in Montana. "He owes our troops and their families an apology."

Mr. Kerry, who lost in 2004 to President Bush, says he's still considering another run for the White House in 2008 and had been campaigning heavily for Democrats across the country running for Congress. In one sentence, Mr. Kerry managed to change the national conversation from the Republican handling of the war in Iraq to demands that he apologize to the troops.

"You know," Mr. Kerry said Monday at Pasadena City College in California, "education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

Radio host Don Imus, who had Mr. Kerry on his program yesterday morning, implored him to sit out the rest of the election, which most observers predict will be a boon for Democrats.

"Please stop it, stop talking," he said after introducing the junior senator from Massachusetts. "Go home, get on the bike, go windsurfing, anything. Stop it. You're going to ruin this."

DOJ_NMG_0089953

Mr. Kerry insisted that the campaign events were canceled at his urging, but at least one candidate -- Bruce Braley in Iowa -- said he asked Mr. Kerry to pull out.

"I'm coming back to Washington today so that I'm not a distraction," Mr. Kerry said. "I don't want to be a distraction to these campaigns.'

No matter whose idea it was for Mr. Kerry to retreat, said one delighted Republican on Capitol Hill, "He's cutting and running from the campaign trail, after learning he was for his comments before he was against them."

Mr. Kerry said the insult was the result of a "botched" joke.

"If that's joking, he needs to work on his punch line," said James H. Webb Jr., the Virginia Democrat running for the Senate.

White House spokesman Tony Snow also was skeptical.

"Senator Kerry's words were pretty straightforward," he said in response to repeated questions from reporters. "If you listen to the tone of voice in which he said them, it's hard to construe them as a joke. He didn't sound like he was trying to make funnies."

In yesterday's apology, Mr. Kerry said he intended to take a swipe at Mr. Bush for getting the U.S. "stuck in Iraq."

But Mr. Kerry's initial response was to attack his attackers as "right wing nut-jobs." At a press conference in Seattle, he angrily said, "I apologize to no one for my criticism of the president and of his broken policy."

When the "right wing nut-jobs" were joined by many Democrats out campaigning, Mr. Kerry switched tacks.

A Kerry spokeswoman said the senator's prepared remarks had called for him to say: "Do you know where you end up if you don't study, if you aren't smart, if you're intellectually lazy? You end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq. Just ask President Bush."

That particular approach is one that he and other Democrats generously employed during the 2004 campaign, portraying Mr. Bush as an intellectual lightweight who didn't belong in the Oval Office.

But academic records obtained last year by the Boston Globe revealed that Mr. Bush actually had a higher grade point average than Mr. Kerry did during their time at Yale. In his freshman year, Mr. Kerry got four D's in the ten courses he took.

•Jerry Seper and Christina Bellantoni contributed to this article, which is based in part on wire service reports.

Analysis: Iraq War Dominates Campaign (AP-Y)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, November 2, 2006

Iraq has dominated the 2006 campaign — and could end up costing Republicans control of Congress.

The GOP once viewed the war as a political asset. Now, Republicans are hastily distancing themselves from President Bush as Democrats fiercely challenge the administration's policies amid signs that voters trust them more than the GOP on Iraq.

"People will run the race they need to run," the president said Wednesday, playing down Republican defections on Iraq. "My attitude is that the way you win is you say to the American people, we have a plan for victory, which we do. And the opponents don't have a plan for victory."

Days before Tuesday's election, however, polls show voters aren't inclined to buy that line.

So, in the final week of the campaign, the White House has sought traction on Iraq by seizing on a remark by Democrat John Kerry — the president's 2004 rival — in which the Massachusetts senator appeared to suggest that those who don't get an education "get stuck in Iraq."

Under fire, the senator initially characterized the comment as "a botched joke" about Bush's Iraq policies and then eventually apologized to "any service member, family member or American who was offended" by the remark.

Fellow Democrats, meantime, fought to stay on message, with the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee airing a television ad that lays out the party's closing argument of why voters should fire Republicans now in power: "Tell Congress it's long past time to put down their rubber stamp and ask the hard questions about Iraq."

With the campaign drawing to a close, the GOP faces the stark possibility of losing seats in the House and Senate — and, perhaps, control of Congress — as voters decide whether to send the president and his party a searing message about the conflict. It has cost nearly $380 billion and led to the deaths of more than 2,800 Americans in less than four years.

"Clearly it's a referendum on the president and the war," said Gary Jacobson, a congressional scholar at the University of California at San Diego, who called Iraq "the key problem" for the GOP in this election.

DOJ_NMG_0089954

"It's very hard for Republican congressional candidates to say everything's just fine, we stay the course and it's going to work," he added.

How times have changed.

Just two years ago, the president and Republicans used the Iraq war to make their case that the GOP was the party that would best protect the country. Voters agreed, re-electing Bush over Kerry and giving Republicans two more years at the helm of the House and Senate.

At the time, Democrats maneuvered delicately around the war for fear of being called unpatriotic. Kerry and the minority party sought a balance between supporting the troops and assailing the administration's handling of the situation.

Over the past two years, public support for Iraq has slid steadily — and the political tables turned. The war became a liability for Republicans and a potential opportunity for Democrats.

The latest Associated Press-AOL News poll showed Democrats with a clear advantage on Iraq — a 15-percentage-point margin over Republicans — compared with the slight edge Bush had over Kerry at the same point two years ago. Since then, men, young people, those whose highest level of education is high school, and suburbanites have moved to Democrats.

Polls also show that more Americans — now a clear majority — have come to see the war as a mistake and far fewer support how the president has handled the war, shifts that took place all in two years' time.

"When the promises of accomplishment proved empty, than you really began to get a swing in sentiment," said Thomas Mann, a scholar at the Brookings Institution, a Washington-based think tank. "It really has been striking."

Democrats became more emboldened and Republicans more hesitant.

With public support on their side, Democrats have freely hammered Bush on Iraq and now are attacking Republicans with gusto in the campaign homestretch. They hope the intense frustration among voters will usher in an era of Democratic control of Congress.

"George Bush and Mike Fitzpatrick have no idea how to fix this mess," Democrat Patrick Murphy says in a television commercial airing against Fitzpatrick, a Republican congressman from a suburban Philadelphia district.

In a Tennessee Senate race, Democratic Rep. Harold Ford Jr. says in his own ad assailing his Republican opponent: "I support our troops and I voted for the war. But we shouldn't stay the course as Mr. (Bob) Corker wants."

As for Republicans, splinters in the GOP began to show earlier this year and only widened as 2006 dragged on and the election drew closer. Fearing the political consequences of standing with the president, Republicans gradually started backing away from him and many now are staking out their own stances on Iraq.

"President Bush isn't getting our frustrations. It's time to be decisive. Beat the terrorists. Partition the country if we have to, and get our troops home in victory," says Mike McGavick, the Republican trying to unseat Sen. Maria Cantwell in Washington, in a campaign ad.

Two-thirds of the way across the country, GOP Rep. John Hostettler reminds Indiana voters in a commercial that he was one of the few Republicans to vote against the war 2002.

"It wasn't a popular vote, especially with members of my own party," says Hostettler, who is locked in a tight race with Democrat Brad Ellsworth. "In fact, it can get lonely when you take a stand."

Democrats are banking on voters doing just that.

___

EDITOR'S NOTE: Liz Sidoti covers politics for The Associated Press

Bush's Nostalgia (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe And Holly Bailey

Newsweek, November 2, 2006

Nov. 1, 2006 - There's no fight like an old fight. And this week's emotional exchanges between President George W. Bush and Sen. John Kerry were nothing if not old. Kerry screwed up what he called a "botched joke" about Bush's brainpower when it comes to Iraq; Bush pounced by challenging his ex-rival's commitment to the troops.

DOJ_NMG_0089955

Memo to Bush and Kerry: neither of you are on the ballot next week. And while it may be satisfying to rehash the last election, you both run the risk of looking totally out of touch.

The risks for President Bush are greater than they are for Senator Kerry, who may have suffered the deep embarrassment of falling into a familiar self-made trap. But he leads nothing inside his party, sets no strategy and the Democrats can easily disown him—as several candidates have done by canceling events with him this week.

President Bush, on the other hand, enjoys no such luxuries. In fact, the concerted attack on Kerry—complete with White House and Republican National Committee press releases—threatens to undermine a central premise of the party's strategy. For months on the campaign trail, GOP candidates have insisted the election isn't a referendum on Bush or national politics; it's a choice between two local contenders. The president may have diverted attention back onto Democrats, but he also turned the focus back on himself and the war.

Neither subject is a winning issue for GOP candidates—and that is precisely why the Bush-Kerry fracas is so outdated. Bush's approval rating in the most recent NEWSWEEK poll stood at 37 percent—10 points lower than the last poll before the 2004 elections, and fully 33 points lower than 2002.

On the two big issues that Bush wants to debate, the political world looks nothing like 2004, as measured by NEWSWEEK polls. Two years ago, Bush held an 11-point lead over Kerry on Iraq, and an 18-point lead on terrorism. Today, the GOP is trailing the Democrats on Iraq by 12 points and is leading on terrorism by just 1 point.

Based on those numbers, it's easy to see why President Bush is vastly happier campaigning like it's still 2004. His rhetoric on the campaign trail reflects those relatively comfortable days much more than the somber statements he has recently issued from the White House.

Just last week, at his press conference in the East Room, the president told how the violence in Iraq started with a sophisticated insurgency, fueled in part by Al Qaeda. But more recently the killing turned into "sectarian reprisals" and what he called "the cycle of violence."

But on the campaign trail, there is no room for the insurgents or sectarian death squads. There are only terrorists, and their apparent friends, the Democrats. "However they put it, the Democrat approach comes down to this: the terrorists win and America loses," Bush told a rally in Perry, Ga., on Tuesday. "And that's what's at stake in this election. The Democrats want to get us out of Iraq, and the Republican goal is to win in Iraq."

In fact, given the choice between the Democratic and Republican strategies—as described by the president—voters seem to prefer his opponents' approach. According to the most recent NEWSWEEK poll, 61 percent want to see a timetable set for withdrawal from Iraq—and that includes 39 percent of Republicans.

That's not the only stark comparison with elections past. When President Bush goes to Missouri on Friday to stump for GOP Senate candidate Jim Talent, it will be four years—almost to the day—since he did the same thing.

On Nov. 4, 2002, in the final hours of the hotly contested midterm elections, Bush was the star attraction at a rally to drive up voter enthusiasm for Talent's first Senate campaign. The circumstances weren't much different back then: a dead-heat Senate race in an influential swing state and a president fighting to retain his party's majority in Congress.

Recently, Bush has explained his optimism for his party's political chances this year by reminding reporters how many people predicted the GOP's demise in 2002. "A lot of pundits didn't get the election right," Bush said in an interview with Fox News earlier this week. "In 2006, there is a lot of predictors saying that, you know, the Democrats will sweep the House and maybe take the Senate … I just don't see it that way."

Yet 2006 is not like 2002. Four years ago, Bush and the GOP were not weighed down by worries over Iraq or ethical scandals. The White House has worked hard to squelch talk that Bush's low poll numbers have made him politically radioactive on the campaign trail. But the numbers don't lie.

In 2002, Bush hit 17 cities in 15 states in the final five days of the campaign. This year, a tentative schedule released by the White House has Bush working at half that pace: eight cities in seven states between now and Election Day.

In 2002, Bush devoted the final days of the campaign to helping his party's most vulnerable candidates—a list that included four Senate candidates, nearly a dozen House races and a handful of Republican gubernatorial candidates. His itinerary included public rallies in states like Tennessee, Missouri, Minnesota, Illinois, Florida and Iowa.

DOJ_NMG_0089956

Today most of those stops are scheduled in what has been traditionally regarded as Bush country, a list that includes Iowa, Kansas, Montana and Texas. This week alone, Bush held rallies in what should be friendly territory—including Tom DeLay's old congressional district in Texas and two straight days of campaigning in Georgia.

Administration officials have said they are keeping Bush's schedule flexible to aid any last-minute political maneuvering, so additions to his itinerary may yet come.

But Missouri is a case in point: a conservative state that has become ground zero in the fight to control the Senate. A series of polls puts Talent in a dead heat with Democrat Claire McCaskill. Yet Bush's visit is hardly a slam dunk for the GOP. Bush has visited the state twice this year to raise money for Talent's campaign, but the Republican candidate has not appeared publicly with the president. On Friday, that will change: Talent is scheduled to travel with Bush to rallies in Springfield and Joplin to, in his words, "get people enthusiastic in the last stretch."

On that basis, the GOP may be writing off independent voters who have fallen out of love with the president. That might also explain the curious decision to campaign back home in Texas the day before the election. On Monday, Bush is scheduled to headline a rally in Dallas for a roster of Lone Star Republicans, including Gov. Rick Perry—who looks safely on his way to a third term.

Two years ago, Bush wound up his re-election campaign with a last rally in Dallas, where thousands of people turned out to cheer the president onto a second term. This time around, the mood is different. Asked about the Perry rally during an interview with the Dallas Morning News last week, Bush seemed to have mixed feelings. "It'll be a nostalgic moment for me," Bush said. "It's the last time I will be at the head of the ticket, and I'm looking forward to it."

Bush may be feeling nostalgic about the campaign. But judging by the polls, voters are ready to move on.

First Lady: World Listening To Iraq Talk (AP-Y)

AP, November 2, 2006

First lady Laura Bush cautioned Wednesday that Americans discussing the war in Iraq — especially politicians — should be careful what they say because other countries are paying attention.

"The right to have these conversations is part of what makes our country great and our democracy strong. We must be mindful that people around the world are listening to these discussions," Laura Bush said at a suburban Columbus recreation center during a campaign appearance with Rep. Deborah Pryce.

"Responsible candidates understand that the men and women of our military are risking their lives for us, and that we must conduct our debate here at home in a way that does not jeopardize our troops in harm's way," she said, calling for "conversations conducted with civility and respect."

Bush did not mention her husband's 2004 election opponent, Sen. John Kerry, but her comments came on the day the Democrat apologized for telling a group of California students that individuals who don't study hard and do their homework would likely "get stuck in Iraq."

Aides said the senator had mistakenly dropped one word from his prepared remarks, which was originally written to say "you end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq." In that context, they said, it was clear Kerry was referring to Bush, not to the troops.

Pryce is in a close fight for her Ohio seat against Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy.

Party Shuns Kerry After Iraq 'Joke' (FT)

By Caroline Danielin Washington

Financial Times, November 2, 2006

Democrats yesterday moved swiftly to distance themselves from John Kerry's "botched joke" that appeared to disparage US troops.

Three candidates have cancelled campaign events with the losing 2004 presidential candidate amid dismay that his verbal gaffe has handed Republicans a chance to paint the Democratic party as weak on national security.

In Iowa, Bruce Braley, a House candidate, cancelled a campaign event. Harold Ford, who faces a tight race for the Senate in Tennessee and has received $100,000 (£53,000, €78,000) from Mr Kerry's leadership political action committee, joined Republican calls for an -apology.

DOJ_NMG_0089957

"Whatever the intent, Senator Kerry was wrong to say what he said. He needs to apologise to our troops," he said.

Just as Dennis Hastert's recent handling of a cyber-sex scandal involving Mark Foley, a Republican congressman, rendered the Speaker politically toxic on the campaign trail, Mr Kerry conceded he was becoming a distraction.

He cancelled appearances at rallies in Minnesota and Pennsylvania. "I'm not going to go to some place that a congressman's going to get embroiled in this, because I want them to win," he said.

The furore started on Monday when Mr Kerry told students in Los Angeles that if "you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't you get stuck in Iraq". Yesterday he defended his comment as a joke about President George W. Bush's lack of research. "Look, everybody knows I botched a joke," he said.

Republicans have seized on the comments, calling the idea that US troops were uneducated "insulting and shameful", and linking it to the wider theme of Democratic spinelessness.

"He is a liberal, a leftist and this is the typical attitude they have toward our military," said John Boehner, House majority leader. "What they want to do in Iraq is they want to give up and pull our troops out."

Despite fears about the immediate electoral fallout, several Democratic strategists said the gaffe could be most damaging to Mr Kerry's ambition to put himself forward again to become the 2008 presidential democratic nominee.

Kerry Issues Apology After Iraq 'joke' (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Washington

Financial Times, November 2, 2006

Senator John Kerry, the losing 2004 presidential candidate, on Wednesday issued a formal apology for what he called "a botched joke" that was mistaken as an attack on the intelligence of US troops.

"As a combat veteran, I want to make it clear to anyone in uniform and to their loved ones: my poorly stated joke at a rally was not about, and never intended to refer to any troop. I sincerely regret that my words were misinterpreted… and I personally apologise to any service member, family member, or American who was offended," he said.

Several Democrats moved swiftly to distance themselves from Mr Kerry after Republicans eagerly exploited his comments to galvanise voters in the last days of the congressional midterm elections.

Three Democratic candidates have cancelled cancel campaign events with Mr Kerry, including Bruce Braley, a House candidate, in Iowa. Harold Ford, who faces a tight race for the Senate in Tennessee and has received $100,000 from Mr Kerry's leadership PAC, had earlier in the day called on him to apologise.

"Whatever the intent, Senator Kerry was wrong to say what he said. He needs to apologise to our troops," Mr Ford said.

Just as Dennis Hastert's recent handling of a cyber-sex scandal involving Mark Foley, a Republican congressman, rendered the Speaker politically toxic on the campaign trail, Mr Kerry conceded he was becoming a distraction.

He cancelled appearances at rallies in Minnesota and Pennsylvania. "I'm not going to go to some place that a congressman's going to get embroiled in this, because I want them to win," he said.

The furore started on Monday when Mr Kerry told students in Los Angeles that if "you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't you get stuck in Iraq". On Wednesday he defended his comment as a joke about President George W. Bush's lack of research. "Look, everybody knows I botched a joke," he said.

Republicans have seized on the comments, calling the idea that US troops were uneducated "insulting and shameful", and linking it to the wider theme of Democratic spinelessness.

"He is a liberal, a leftist and this is the typical attitude they have toward our military," said John Boehner, House majority leader. "What they want to do in Iraq is they want to give up and pull our troops out."

Kerry's Remark Puts Presidential Bid At Risk (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Ever since he came within 118,000 Ohio votes of winning the presidency, Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts has refused to give up the idea that he could try again. He kept much of his 2004 finance team together and campaigned aggressively this year for dozens of fellow Democrats who could turn around and help Kerry make a comeback in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0089958

But with one botched joke this week in Pasadena, Calif., Kerry not only sapped some momentum from his party in the final week of a competitive election, he dealt a damaging blow to his own White House aspirations.

Under pressure from many Democrats, Kerry issued an apology late Wednesday, two days after appearing to tell college students that if they did not get an education, "you get stuck in Iraq." In a written statement, Kerry lamented that his words were "misinterpreted to wrongly imply anything negative about those in uniform, and I personally apologize to any service member, family member, or American who was offended."

Earlier in the day on the Don Imus radio show, Kerry said: "Everybody knows that I botched a joke," explaining that he was trying to say that President Bush did not do his homework and therefore, "got us stuck in Iraq." But for a politician striving to prove that he had become a better candidate than he was when GOP attacks derailed his White House campaign in 2004, the damage was done.

It could not have come at a worse time for Kerry, who has been rebuilding his national campaign structure and hoping to capitalize on the political goodwill he amassed by raising more than $12 million for 2006 candidates and campaigning in 35 states. With the recent decision by former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner not to run for president, Kerry was hoping to position himself as the top challenger to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., for the party's nomination, although early surveys suggested he faced an uphill struggle.

Fellow Democrats now worry that Kerry's words made their party's candidates vulnerable to accusations of insensitivity toward the troops in the final week of an election in which Democrats seemed to be benefiting from voters' distaste for the Iraq war.

Moreover, the flap allowed the GOP to remind voters why they chose Bush in 2004 over a Democrat who was portrayed as a flip-flopper. It was enough to make some wish that Kerry would just go away for a while.

"Nothing against John Kerry, but this election is not about John Kerry," said Gordon Fischer, chairman of the Democratic Party in Iowa, where one congressional candidate canceled a scheduled appearance this week with the Massachusetts senator.

Fischer, whose home state caucuses play a central role in choosing a presidential nominee, said Kerry's gaffe would "undoubtedly" hurt his chances in two years -- a sentiment echoed Wednesday by several other Democrats.

Burton Cohen, the former New Hampshire state Senate majority leader and a key Kerry backer in 2004, said the botched joke could rival former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean's famous Iowa scream in terms of media exposure and political damage.

"It's getting played over and over again," Cohen said. "You just need one instance that can define a campaign. This may be one of those things, and if that's the case, I hope John Kerry likes staying in the Senate."

Kerry canceled upcoming appearances in Minnesota and Pennsylvania, while his office confirmed that he called off an additional stop this weekend in New Hampshire, home of the first-in-the-nation presidential primary and a state that would be crucial for another run at the nomination.

"I don't want to be a distraction to these campaigns," Kerry told Imus Wednesday morning after calling the show to blast the White House for "disgraceful" tactics.

Republicans were delighted to make Kerry a central theme of the campaign's closing days. Conservatives moved quickly to elevate the controversy in order to further mobilize the core voters that White House strategists believe could help the GOP retain majorities in Congress.

The Drudge Report, the popular conservative Web site that first posted audio and video of Kerry's original comments, hyped the story all day Wednesday, listing Democrats who were disinviting Kerry and displaying a photograph depicting troops in Iraq hoisting a sign -- full of spelling errors -- that said they were stuck "hear in Irak."

The Republican National Committee helped fan the flames, distributing talking points to sympathetic radio hosts and bloggers; Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and his wife, Lynn Cheney, and White House press secretary Tony Snow also addressed the senator's remarks.

Bush, who on Tuesday called Kerry's words "shameful," reiterated criticism Wednesday during interviews with conservative radio host Rush Limbaugh and The Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0089959

Worse for Kerry, Democrats joined the GOP's demands that the Massachusetts senator apologize.

Clinton called his remarks "inappropriate," while Rep. Harold Ford, Jr., who is in a tight race for Senate in Tennessee, told MSNBC that the comment "offended some people" and that Kerry should apologize and let everyone "move on." Larry Grant, an Idaho congressional candidate, welcomed Kerry's apology but added: "He shouldn't have tried to make a joke about it in the first place."

Kerry's contrition followed two days in which he tried to fight back, ridiculing Snow at one point as a "stuffed suit" and noting that his White House critics had not served in the military. Kerry appeared to be exorcising the ghosts of 2004, when even he acknowledged he did not fight back in time against a group of pro-Bush veterans who accused Kerry of misrepresenting his record as a Vietnam War hero.

"This is swift boat stuff all over again," he told Imus. "The controversy is based on a lie."

But Democrats worried he was only making matters worse.

"He was applying the swift boat lessons of 2004 to the wrong set of facts in 2006," said party strategist Chris Lehane, who once worked for Kerry. "He's not on the ballot this time."

To Kerry supporters, the episode has been frustrating.

"There isn't a soul in America that is either being quoted or privately talking to the press that honestly believes that John Kerry was insulting the troops of this country," said Kirk Wagar, a Miami lawyer and top fundraiser for Kerry's 2004 campaign. "Anybody who questions that out loud is doing nothing but parroting a Republican talking-point lie that they're trying to use to change the subject."

There was some evidence of a possible silver lining for Kerry, with increasingly influential liberal bloggers defending him and bashing the media for enabling the GOP spin machine.

David Wade, a Kerry spokesman, predicted that Democrats would "respect someone who fights like hell against a broken policy in Iraq and has the guts to offer a real change in course that honors our troops."

To find success in 2008, though, Kerry will need to overcome sentiments like those expressed by Imus, who echoed the feelings of many Democrats when he told the senator repeatedly on Wednesday: "Stop it. Stop talking. Go home . . . . You're going to ruin this."

Job From Hell Dept. (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, November 2, 2006

With his “botched joke” about dumbos serving in Iraq, Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) may have joined Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) in becoming a (part-Jewish) former ’08 presidential hopeful. As Republicans pummeled Kerry and Allen aides beat the daylights out of a heckling blogger, we wondered: Who had a worse day Tuesday, Kerry or Allen? And whose job sucked more: that of Allen’s press staff, or Kerry’s?

We took an informal poll and got some amusing answers, which, as you might have guessed, varied depending on party affiliation. Our survey showed a majority of Republicans staunchly defending Allen and his heavies, while Democrats were generally willing to sail their failed 2004 presidential nominee down the river.

“You expect Allen to surround himself with thugs, and you expect Kerry to trip over his own words,” said one senior Senate Democratic aide who, rather than choosing who screwed up more, suggested it was just another day at the office.

Veteran GOP spinmeister Terry Holt, who now has his own public relations firm, said Kerry’s flub was definitely more damaging than Allen’s latest mishap. “Team Allen might not be able to block, but at least they didn’t throw an interception for a touchdown,” he said.

Another Senate Democratic leadership staffer who requested anonymity didn’t hesitate to choose Allen as having the worst day, while still taking a jab at Kerry. “John Kerry’s a moron, but he’s not running for anything [in ’06]. And there’s no way he’d lose his Senate seat.”

But as to the question of who had the tougher job, Kerry spokesman David Wade pulled nary a punch.

DOJ_NMG_0089960

"Any day working for George Allen is worse because, um, you work for George Allen. Fortunately, no one will be working for him after Nov. 7. John Kerry is a tough son of a bitch and I'd follow him anywhere. He was right about Vietnam and he's right about Iraq. That's more honor than George Felix Allen will ever have."

Wow! Now we know why those other Democratic wusses were scared to go on the record.

Then again, Republican political consultant and blogger Rich Galen countered that Kerry definitely had a worse day because "like every day, he has to wake up and be John Kerry. The Allen campaign is like that old country song: If it weren't for bad news they'd have no news at all." Plus, he said, "Kerry has already lost. Allen will probably win."

The Allen camp was too busy (presumably roughing people up) to respond to our request for comment.

No matter whose day was worse, one Democratic consultant, noting the shared Jewish heritage of Allen and Kerry, noted, "If you put both screw-ups together, you'd have a day of real tsuris." That's Yiddish for "calamity."

Beat-up Blogger Goes On the Air.Speaking of the blocking and tackling display at the Allen event, blogger Mike Stark, the man Allen aides knocked down Tuesday, has been hired by Air America's "The Young Turks" show to be a reporter.

The show's co-host, Cenk Uygur, announced Wednesday afternoon in a posting on HuffingtonPost.com that Stark — who considers himself a "citizen journalist" — is joining the show.

"Mike is smart, tough, well-educated, dedicated and obviously courageous. This country needs more reporters like Mike Stark. ... If the mainstream press won't ask the questions, then we will," Uygur said.

Stark told HOH on Wednesday that he wasn't as black-and-blue as you might imagine considering three Allen aides essentially kicked his butt when he showed up at that Allen event asking the inflammatory question, "Why did you spit on your first wife?"

"Nah, I'm tough," the former Marine and first-year law student at the University of Virginia said. He said Tuesday was the third time he'd shown up at an Allen campaign event, but the first at which he was beaten up. (He filed charges afterward.)

Stark, whose Web site, CallingAll Wingnuts.com, details his many exploits as a heckler, confirmed he was the same guy who showed up at a taping of the Fox News show "Hannity & Colmes" and held up a sign behind host Sean Hannity that read "HANNITY SUCKS ASS."

He also made his start as an activist in politics by dialing into right-wing radio programs and heckling guests, including former Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) and Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.).

Republicans Go GooGoo. Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.) showed some down-home Southern hospitality by shipping out about 300 packages of GooGoo Cluster candies across the country to Republican incumbents and candidates.

The chocolate-marshmallow-caramel-peanut concoctions are a staple of Blackburn's home state, and like any proper Southern lady, Blackburn included an effusive note in her candy-grams saying how much she was looking forward to working with the recipients in the 110th Congress.

"For years, my campaign team and I have relied on a Tennessee treat to provide the energy boost we all need to complete those last days of phone banking, sign planting, and door knocking," she wrote. "Enjoy these Goo Goos, a Grand Ole Opry tradition, and best of luck for a well deserved victory."

Blackburn added, "Please do not hesitate to contact me or my campaign if we can be of any assistance to you."

It should be noted that the sweet little gesture comes as Blackburn is on the verge of announcing an expected bid for House Republican Conference chairwoman in the 110th Congress. Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) currently has the job, and Blackburn will challenge Pryce, and possibly others, if the Ohio Republican manages to win her own tough re-election bid and return to the House next year.

And yes, Pryce's campaign also received the GooGoos. No word on whether they've asked Blackburn for campaign assistance.

The Great Divider (NYT)

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0089961

As President Bush throws himself into the final days of a particularly nasty campaign season, he's settled into a familiar pattern of ugly behavior. Since he can't defend the real world created by his policies and his decisions, Mr. Bush is inventing a fantasy world in which to campaign on phony issues against fake enemies.

In Mr. Bush's world, America is making real progress in Iraq. In the real world, as Michael Gordon reported in yesterday's Times, the index that generals use to track developments shows an inexorable slide toward chaos. In Mr. Bush's world, his administration is marching arm in arm with Iraqi officials committed to democracy and to staving off civil war. In the real world, the prime minister of Iraq orders the removal of American checkpoints in Baghdad and abets the sectarian militias that are slicing and dicing their country.

In Mr. Bush's world, there are only two kinds of Americans: those who are against terrorism, and those who somehow are all right with it. Some Americans want to win in Iraq and some don't. There are Americans who support the troops and Americans who don't support the troops. And at the root of it all is the hideously damaging fantasy that there is a gulf between Americans who love their country and those who question his leadership.

Mr. Bush has been pushing these divisive themes all over the nation, offering up the ludicrous notion the other day that if Democrats manage to control even one house of Congress, America will lose and the terrorists will win. But he hit a particularly creepy low when he decided to distort a lame joke lamely delivered by Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts. Mr. Kerry warned college students that the punishment for not learning your lessons was to "get stuck in Iraq." In context, it was obviously an attempt to disparage Mr. Bush's intelligence. That's impolitic and impolite, but it's not as bad as Mr. Bush's response. Knowing full well what Mr. Kerry meant, the president and his team cried out that the senator was disparaging the troops. It was a depressing replay of the way the Bush campaign Swift-boated Americans in 2004 into believing that Mr. Kerry, who went to war, was a coward and Mr. Bush, who stayed home, was a hero.

It's not the least bit surprising or objectionable that Mr. Bush would hit the trail hard at this point, trying to salvage his party's control of Congress and, by extension, his last two years in office. And we're not naïve enough to believe that either party has been running a positive campaign that focuses on the issues.

But when candidates for lower office make their opponents out to be friends of Osama bin Laden, or try to turn a minor gaffe into a near felony, that's just depressing. When the president of the United States gleefully bathes in the muck to divide Americans into those who love their country and those who don't, it is destructive to the fabric of the nation he is supposed to be leading.

This is hardly the first time that Mr. Bush has played the politics of fear, anger and division; if he's ever missed a chance to wave the bloody flag of 9/11, we can't think of when. But Mr. Bush's latest outbursts go way beyond that. They leave us wondering whether this president will ever be willing or able to make room for bipartisanship, compromise and statesmanship in the two years he has left in office.

A Taxing Time For The GOP (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

NEW BRITAIN, Conn. -- In the waning days before Tuesday's election, Republican leaders are holding the issue of taxes out like a life raft to struggling congressional candidates. Few have grabbed it with greater enthusiasm than Rep. Nancy L. Johnson.

A 24-year incumbent from Connecticut who sits on the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, Johnson has run at least three television ads on fees and taxes, accusing her Democratic challenger, Chris Murphy, of raising "our taxes 27 times." She presses the point in speeches, telling voters that while Murphy was hiking taxes as a state lawmaker in Hartford, she was helping President Bush cut taxes on Capitol Hill.

But it's not clear the tax boat is going to float in this western Connecticut district, where Johnson, like Republicans nationally, is having trouble turning the economy into a winning issue. Murphy, 33, a lawyer and state senator, has opened a narrow margin in the polls by painting Johnson as a pawn of big business and attacking administration policies -- including the tax cuts -- as giveaways to millionaires.

DOJ_NMG_0089962

Across the nation, taxes have become a battleground in competitive House races, as Republican candidates charge their Democratic opponents with voting for more taxes, voting against tax cuts or harboring plans to raise taxes. Political analysts say the tactic is designed to turn attention toward tax relief, which Republicans credit with spurring an economic recovery, and away from the Democrats' favorite topic, the unpopular war in Iraq..

President Bush talks about taxes nearly as much as terrorism these days, a message intended to rally the Republican faithful and assuage conservatives upset about the expanding cost of government. On Saturday, he devoted his weekly radio address to the topic. And at a fundraiser Tuesday in Georgia, Bush called taxes "a fundamental issue in this campaign," declaring that "if the Democrats take the House, your taxes are going up."

Ed Patru, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said Republicans are "pounding Democrats all across the country" on taxes because it is "always a winning issue."

"To the extent that there's a sour mood among the electorate because of issues like the war, that sour mood has dampened" the political value of a record Dow Jones industrial average, falling gas prices and low unemployment, Patru said. Focusing on taxes turns the tables and puts Democrats on the defensive, he said, adding, "People do appreciate the good economy, so they're upset when they hear Democrat proposals that threaten economic growth."

Democrats argue that economic growth is not benefiting many ordinary Americans, whose wages are barely keeping pace with the costs of fuel and health care. The Bush tax cuts haven't offered much relief, they contend. The richest 1 percent of Americans are assuming a slightly greater share of the overall tax burden thanks to cuts enacted from 2001 to 2005, but Democrats like to point out that the wealthy are doing far better in absolute dollars under Bush's tax policies than the working class.

A new analysis by the Tax Policy Center, a joint project of the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution, shows that more than 60 percent of savings from the Bush tax cuts are going to families that earn more than $100,000 a year. Put another way, a working-class family earning between $30,000 and $40,000 will save an average of $747 this year thanks to the cuts, while a family earning between $200,000 and $500,000 will save an average of $7,609.

"Financial pressure on the middle class is a big issue," said Stanley Greenberg, a Democratic pollster who has encouraged Democratic candidates to run on the economy. "What you talk about is middle-class squeeze and the fact that Republicans have done nothing for the middle class."

Republicans note that middle-class families are getting more relief in percentage terms. According to the Tax Policy Center, that $747 represents a 12.8 percent tax cut for the working-class family, while $7,609 represents a 9.4 percent cut for the wealthier family. Still, some Republican strategists acknowledge that Democrats are gaining traction on the issue.

"We've been screaming for months that we need to talk about the economy and we need to make it meaningful to the guy who drives the F-150 pickup in Indiana," said Greg Casey, president and chief executive of the Business Industry Political Action Committee, which supports mainly Republican candidates. "Despite the good story Republicans have to tell about the economy, if you look at people's perceptions right now, the Democrats have the upper hand."

In Connecticut, a relatively affluent state where unemployment is running about even with the national average of 4.6 percent, three veteran Republican lawmakers are fighting for their seats. Polls show Rep. Christopher Shays and Rep. Rob Simmons tied with Democratic challengers. This week, a poll by the Hartford Courant and the University of Connecticut found Murphy with 46 percent support and Johnson with 42 percent among likely voters.

As Murphy knocked on doors last week in Cheshire, a prosperous town about 25 miles south of Hartford, no one asked about the 27 tax hikes, a figure Murphy contends is exaggerated. But voters did express frustration with Republicans in Washington, saying the positive economic indicators have meant little in their lives.

"Good economy for whom? It's a good economy for people who already have a lot of money," said Kathleen Viereg, a family physician who was tending her lawn. Viereg said she has patients who postpone treatment because they can't afford rising deductibles and co-payments -- and those are the ones with insurance.

A political independent and undecided voter, Viereg said talk of tax relief leaves her cold when so many people are struggling financially. "The voodoo economics of these tax cuts doesn't add up," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0089963

A block away, Joe Norcross, an assistant school principal, said Murphy has his vote because Republicans "want to take care of the wealthy." As for the tax cuts, Norcross remembered getting a check for $300 a few years ago, but "we sent it right into the credit card company."

Murphy attacks Johnson on a range of economic issues, from Social Security to a new drug benefit for Medicare recipients. If elected, Murphy says he will "absolutely" work to repeal cuts in the dividend and capital gains tax rates, calling them "tax breaks for the richest 1 or 2 percent of Americans."

Johnson seems to sense a shift in public sentiment. At a Rotary Club luncheon last week, she spent most of a 15-minute speech explaining how the tax cuts have created jobs and helped poor people.

"You can increase revenue by increasing taxes, and that gives you more money, at least for a while," she said. "Or you can increase revenue by growing the economy. That gives you more taxpayers."

Johnson said dozens of small businesses in her district hired extra workers thanks to a tax credit for equipment purchases. And she challenged the claim that the cuts benefit only the rich, noting that the rate for the lowest tax bracket was cut from 15 percent to 10 percent.

Many Rotarians said they planned to support Johnson. Several praised her long record of constituent service, saying she had increased government payments to their nursing homes and won money to redevelop New Britain's Polish business district. Rotary president Ken Slater, a Democrat, said he was voting for Johnson because "her heart's in the right place and she works very, very hard."

No one mentioned taxes.

Later, Johnson said there was "some truth" to the notion that she wins support from voters who like her personally, while Murphy wins among voters motivated by broad themes such as the economy.

"People know me, trust me and they're behind me," she said. "I feel very upbeat."

Is GOP Confidence For Real? (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON

"We're going to win," President Bush asserted confidently in his latest press conference, when asked about the midterm elections.

Vice President Dick Cheney tells interviewers he is "optimistic" about the Republican Party's ability to hold on to control of both the House and the Senate.

But the voice that gives Democrats the biggest chills - days before an election that by most public indications favors the Democrats in their quest to win their first House majority in 12 years - is that of Karl Rove, the architect of GOP victories in the past three elections. Mr. Rove has seen the private polls from individual races, he tells interviewers, and the data point "strongly" in one direction: a Republican House and a Republican Senate.

Is this a classic bluff, designed to psych out the opposition and energize demoralized Republicans who might be tempted to sit out the Nov. 7 vote? Or do Rove and his bosses really know something that's not knowable by the rest of us?

"No matter what the polls say or the mood of the country, no president rolls over and plays dead in midterm elections and lays himself open to the charge of surrender to the opposition," says John Gizzi, political editor of the conservative weekly Human Events.

The rock-solid pronouncements of Rove, who cites not just internal polls but also the GOP's advantage in fund-raising and organization, buttress the predictable positive outlook from the president and vice president, and feed into a reputation for success running campaigns built over decades.

"Rove is relying on the Rove mystique," says John Pitney, a political scientist at Claremont-McKenna College in Claremont, Calif. "A lot of Democrats are paranoid about it. ... Conversely, Republicans also have the same belief, and that's what gives them hope and confidence and keeps them working. If they thought they were surely going to lose, they wouldn't work as hard."

DOJ_NMG_0089964

The idea that there are polls suggesting an outcome wildly different from what most political analysts - including many Republican strategists - are saying may not be such a big stretch, Mr. Pitney says. The difference may be in interpretation: It's possible, he says, someone looking at the same numbers might come to a different conclusion.

The answer on who was right, it can be argued, will be known only after the actual votes are cast - but even then, if the Democrats do manage to take over at least the House, Bush's advisers could still say that a week or two earlier, the data pointed in the Republicans' favor.

Among those who make a living looking at each race with as nonpartisan an eye as possible and predicting the outcome, the Democrats do appear on track to retake control of the House, maybe by just a few seats. In the 435-seat House, the Democrats need to make a net gain of just 15 seats. As of Oct. 30, one such prognosticator, Charlie Cook, sees "no ebb in the wave" favoring the Democrats and predicts that, barring a dramatic event, the GOP will lose at least 20 to 35 seats in the House and at least four in the Senate, with "five or six most likely." For the Democrats to retake the 100-seat Senate, a bigger leap than retaking the House, they need a net gain of six seats.

Stuart Rothenberg, another nonpartisan handicapper, projects Democratic gains in the House of 18 to 28 seats - or more. For the Senate, he projects Democratic gains of four to seven seats. Larry Sabato, political scientist at the University of Virginia, Charlottesville, says the Democrats will gain well more than the 15 seats needed for the House and is on the edge of taking over the Senate.

Still, no pundit makes predictions without a caveat. The latest bump for the Democrats came Monday with a comment by John Kerry, the Democrats' 2004 presidential nominee, that was interpreted as a slight against US troops in Iraq. Sen. Kerry said, "Education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. And if you don't, you get stuck in Iraq." Kerry called it a botched joke.

The controversy has put Kerry back in the middle of GOP campaign rhetoric at a time when Democrats would rather be focusing on Republicans vulnerabilities. But at least, some Democrats say, it keeps the focus on Iraq - the No. 1 issue for voters and a net negative for Republican candidates.

Ultimately, Republicans point to several factors that could make the difference on election day: The Democratic "wave" has been a long time in building, and no Republican incumbent can be caught off guard - unlike in 1994, when the Democrats were swept out of power in Congress in a wave they did not see coming. Republicans maintain a funding advantage. At the end of August, in 30 of the most competitive races, Republicans had $33 million cash on hand versus $14 million for the Democrats, says Rove. The Republicans also tout their so-called 72-hour turnout operation. There have been reports of greater early-voting turnout by Republicans than by Democrats.

"Those are all the strengths of a Republican team," says GOP pollster Whit Ayres. "They have not said the climate is favorable or that the odds favor them or that there's not a bigger challenge ahead." But, he adds, if the Democrats don't retake the House next Tuesday, "they should hang it up as a political party. If they can't win in this climate, when can they win?"

Democrats' Foreign Policy Pickle As Iraq And Terror Top Agenda (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Democrats, anticipating a possible victory in Congress, are brimming over with proposed cures in one of the Republicans' main areas of weakness: foreign policy.

But if they triumph Tuesday, Democrats will first have to figure out how to get their ranks to hew to a core foreign-policy theme that both helps the country and positions the party well for the 2008 presidential election.

Republicans have for decades painted the Democrats as soft on national security. That is an image that the Democrats are now eager to shed, especially as they look toward a presidential campaign that is sure to dwell largely on issues of terrorism and the Iraq war.

Democrats see this election -- and 2008, to an even greater degree -- as pivotal to their bid to take on a tougher, but also wiser, foreign-policy husk. Some propose implementing tougher port and border security. Some key voices are also promoting a softer line toward North Korea and Iran, including the need for one-on-one talks.

DOJ_NMG_0089965

Yet the challenge the Democrats face is how to take on an image of steeliness while also pushing, as most in the party now are, to get out of Iraq as quickly as possible.

Wresting control of Congress would still leave the party with limited leverage to force change. Party leaders, fearing a potential backlash, may have to scramble to mute some of the party's harshest Bush critics, who could push for impeachment hearings or long investigations into the war. Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry's gaffe on uneducated troops getting "stuck in Iraq," for which he apologized yesterday in a statement, also shows how vulnerable Democrats remain on the issue.

Democrats had hoped to base their congressional campaign largely on deepening unease over the Iraq war but without offering many specifics. Now, they are pushing much more explicitly for a radical shift in Iraq policy.

"The principal argument that Democrats must make is that Bush policies have undermined U.S. national security [by inciting more hatred against America and increasing the terrorist threat], and that we are determined to fix that," said Zbigniew Brzezinski, a former national security adviser to President Carter. Mr. Brzezinski has proposed that the U.S. and Iraq jointly announce a date for a U.S. pullout of forces.

The Democrats have scurried in recent months to give cohesion to their many and sometimes contradictory critiques of the current Iraq policy. Last month, 12 top congressional Democrats, including Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California and Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada, sent Mr. Bush a third letter in as many months calling on him "to change course" and "join with us to develop a policy that will work." A September version laid out a five-point plan for quitting Iraq, which included firing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

"This is a very conscious and coordinated effort to come together on a message and stick to it," said John Podesta, President Clinton's former chief of staff and now president of the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank.

New groups and initiatives are being launched almost monthly to give coherence to this push, among them the National Security Network, a brain-trust of Democratic foreign-policy officials and thinkers, and the just-launched "New Direction for Real Security," a package of ideas that Ms. Pelosi has portrayed as the Democrats' "tough and smart national security policy."

Even if most Democrats favor disengagement, plenty of divisions remain. Mr. Biden, who as ranking member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee stands to become its chairman if the Democrats retake the Senate, is pushing for slicing Iraq into three "largely autonomous regions," followed by a pullout by 2008. Mr. Brzezinski calls that approach "suicidal," saying "if we do that, everyone will hate us." Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York has only recently endorsed the Democrats' "redeployment" push, after having taken a less-critical stance toward the war for much of the year.

Another possible hindrance to Democrats' ambitions for changing Iraq policy is President Bush, who so far has been firm that withdrawal from Iraq isn't an option that he would consider. And he told the Associated Press yesterday that he plans to keep on Mr. Rumsfeld until the end of his term. A Democratic majority in Congress would have limited authority on either issue.

Rep. Tom Lantos, a California Democrat who would chair the House International Relations Committee under a Democratic majority, said public opinion could force the president's hand. "If we take one or both houses, then the administration will have to take into account that the mainstream public view is that we are very off course in Iraq," he said.

Democrats may get significant help from congressional Republicans, whose mounting unease over the Iraq war could turn to more open rebellion during Mr. Bush's last two years in office as the party seeks to position itself for 2008.

A Democratic majority could also seek to put more attention back on Afghanistan, which many view as central to the battle against terrorism. They are likely to urge Mr. Bush to devote more effort and money to assuring that early gains there don't wither away.

On other issues, from China to Iran and including Iraq, the Democrats are likely to push for a more multilateral and cooperative approach on the international scene. But they are hardly united. Democrats have turned sharply protectionist in recent years, a stance that could color U.S. ties with China, although most prominent voices within the party don't want to ruffle relations with Beijing.

Mr. Lantos, for his part, said he would use his possible new perch to advocate policies that would be "dramatically more multilateral and dramatically more respectful of other countries' views."

He envisions a series of hearings in the spring that call to Capitol Hill all former secretaries of state and national security advisers to weigh in on "the U.S. national security predicament." He also hopes to travel to North Korea, Iran and Syria.

DOJ_NMG_0089966

"I strongly believe in the need for dialogue with people that you strongly disagree with," he said, adding that the Democrats' first stop, postelection, should be the White House.

Cantor Pushes For Reforms (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, November 2, 2006

House Chief Deputy Majority Whip Eric Cantor (Va.) has no interest in discussing his own future ambitions, but he has begun outlining a framework for what he says is much-needed soul-searching on the future of the House Republican Conference and the party's agenda.

"I am committed to the House, and I want us to continue to build and strengthen our majority," Cantor said in an interview Tuesday with Roll Call reporters and editors when asked about his future plans.

Pressed on whether he would run for an elected leadership position if the field opens up after Election Day, he said, "I don't want to answer that."

Cantor maintains that Republicans will retain the House majority next Tuesday and that the current leadership slate will stay largely intact — although as a member of leadership he has little leeway to say otherwise — but he freely offers that Republicans need to start changing the way they do business.

"We will hold the House, I think obviously it's going to be by a reduced margin," Cantor said. "At that point what I would like to see is for us to take a breather."

Cantor advocates postponing the scheduled Nov. 15 leadership elections for two reasons. First, he said Members need to know the outcome of the ongoing Committee on Standards of Official Conduct investigation into the activities of former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) because current leaders — including Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.), Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) and National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) — as well as several senior leadership aides have been involved in the investigation.

"I don't think [Hastert] knew, I don't think anybody knew about the lewd e-mails," Cantor said. "So the real question is then, what did they know and what did his office know? The Speaker says he doesn't recall having any conversations about it, and I absolutely take that as his word and believe that."

Cantor said he was supportive of how leaders immediately handled the Foley situation when the story first broke Sept. 29 about his sexually explicit communications with minors, but he also noted his own role in calling for an investigation.

"I think I was probably the first Member to go and call for an FBI investigation," he said. "I did it unilaterally without talking to anybody because I think that's what needs to be done, and that's what happened."

But more broadly, Cantor said House Republicans need to meet and discuss the game plan for the 110th Congress.

"We really need to try and address things in a little different way. My desire would be for us to take a few days and meet as a Conference ... to take stock of where we are," he said. "I think at the end of the day the fact that we have not delivered on some of the things we set out to do [means] we need to come out of the gate in the next Congress with a recipe for success. There are plenty of times you can give excuses as to why we don't produce, but the electorate doesn't stand for it."

Cantor said the rash of ethical scandals that dogged Republicans in the 109th Congress is unacceptable and the House needs to take serious action to put mechanisms in place to try to prevent future scenarios.

"Good Lord, you can't just keep doing the things the way we've been doing them," he said. "We've got to have some accountability and we've got to put in place, if at all possible, mechanisms that will pre-empt that from happening."

Cantor cited as an example the use of information technology audits in the private sector and some local governments, in which employees are aware of periodic audits of communications sent from their offices. He said that kind of mechanism may have prevented Foley from using e-mail and Instant Messenger to inappropriately contact pages.

Cantor is mulling introducing his own legislative proposal, which has not been hashed out, that would include what he calls "internal control mechanisms." He said Republicans need to take serious reform actions to address how some Members abused the system for their own gain.

DOJ_NMG_0089967

Citing the actions of incarcerated former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) and Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), Cantor said more needs to be done to address earmark reform and oversight of federal dollars.

"We have some divide in our Conference over what the Appropriations Committee ought to be doing and ought to be transparent about," he said. "I fully support transparency on that, to me, that's a little step."

Cantor noted that the increased spotlight on the earmark process caused a 37 percent drop in earmark requests this fiscal year.

"The American public expects us and our base expects us to exercise oversight over how federal dollars are spent and to exercise oversight onto ourselves," he said. "To me, there has to be a way to ensure that we have in place" some new practices.

Echoing a message employed by Boehner in his successful campaign for Majority Leader earlier this year, Cantor said Republicans need to plot a solid legislative agenda for the upcoming Congress and move beyond scandals and internal disputes.

"We have to get off this distraction and get back to the vision," he said, adding that Republicans need to reinforce in the electorate's mind that the GOP is "the party of ideas" and that Republicans should do more to appeal to independent and suburban voters.

While Cantor acknowledges that the party needs some recovery time, he downplayed suggestions that the turmoil in the ranks is signaling the end of the 12-year Republican majority.

Cantor noted that the NRCC's Battleground fundraising program, which he chaired this cycle, is poised to break the $25 million mark and set a new record for the GOP. He said the majority of that money came from individual members opening up their campaign chests to help the party.

"If that isn't an expression of confidence that we are going to stand together and weather this storm, I don't know what is," he said.

Word To The Wise: Don't Ignore Independents This Year (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, November 2, 2006

While all of us following this year's midterms are spending most of our time talking about the GOP's "base" problems and speculating about whether conservatives and evangelicals will stay home next month, we are missing a story that could turn out to be as big, or even bigger: independents.

Of course, fewer Americans vote in midterm elections than in presidential years, and much of the drop-off can be attributed to independents and weak partisans. Partisan voters historically make up the bulk of the midterm electorate, which is why we all pay so much attention to each party's base voters, whether they are African Americans, conservative evangelicals, liberals or opponents of legalizing abortion.

Obviously, if conservatives and Republicans stay home on Nov. 7, it will be a long, long night for the GOP. Republican candidates in all kinds of districts would be in trouble — even if those districts gave President Bush 65 percent of the vote two years ago.

But even if Republicans turn out, GOP candidates could find themselves in hot water in dozens of districts that they ordinarily should hold. That's because independent voters are not acting the way they normally do.

Independents may not turn out at the same rate as strong partisans in midterm elections, but for dozens of Republicans trying to hold their seats in a potentially strong Democratic wave — particularly those running in marginal districts — independents will be plentiful enough at the polls to separate winners from losers. In Connecticut, for example, independents (unaffiliated voters) constitute a plurality of all state voters.

Normally, independents break roughly evenly between the two parties. In the 2000 presidential election, independents went for then-Texas Gov. Bush over Al Gore, 47 percent to 45 percent. Four years later, Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) bested Bush 49 percent to 48 percent among independents.

This year, that's not close to being the case. "There just aren't any independents this year," joked one Republican strategist I talked with recently. "There are Republicans, Democrats and soft Democrats."

DOJ_NMG_0089968

In poll after poll, independents are behaving like Democrats, whether it is in their distaste for Bush and the GOP-run Congress or in their vote choice in dozens of races around the country.

Nationally, a recent Cook Political Report/RT Strategies survey found a mere 33 percent of independents approving of the job Bush is doing. Those same independents favored Democrats, 49 percent to 30 percent, on the generic ballot. A Fox News/Opinion Dynamics poll found Democrats with a 9-point generic advantage among independents.

In a recent Mason-Dixon Polling & Research Inc. survey of Ohio's gubernatorial race, independent voters broke for Democrat Ted Strickland over Republican Ken Blackwell by an astonishing 22 points — 51 percent to 29 percent.

A recent series of Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg surveys in Senate races found the same thing. In the Virginia Senate race, Jim Webb (D) held a 9-point advantage among independents over incumbent Sen. George Allen (R). In Ohio, Rep. Sherrod Brown (D), the challenger, held a 12-point lead over incumbent Sen. Mike DeWine (R). And in Tennessee, Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D) held a 10-point lead over Republican Bob Corker among independents.

A rare exception was in New Jersey, where Republican state Sen. Tom Kean Jr.'s anti-corruption, pro-change message was allowing him to split independents with Democratic Sen. Bob Menendez.

Taking Stock of This Year's Midterms

It's almost over. So it's time to see where we are, and finally to put to rest two of the questions that continue to be asked most often even though they were answered months ago, and a newer question.

Question 1. Have these midterms been nationalized, or are they about local issues?

It has been obvious for months that most voters see the upcoming elections as a referendum on Bush and on the Iraq War, which is why Democratic House candidates across the country are running as well as they are.

Does anyone really think that Democrats Nancy Boyda (Kansas' 2nd district), Paul Hodes (New Hampshire's 2nd) and Jerry McNerney (California's 11th), each of whom lost badly two years ago, suddenly are doing well because of local issues? Would they have any chance of winning were it not for the national mood this time?

Republicans still are trying to localize their races so that voters see those contests less as a referendum on the president and more as a choice between GOP incumbents and the Democratic challengers. But so far that hasn't happened to the extent that Republicans hope and need.

Question 2. Are this year's midterm elections a referendum on President Bush?

If you have to ask, you haven't been paying attention and probably don't even care. Of course they are about the president and his Iraq policy.

Question 3. Did the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) expand the field?

Yes, but not by a lot. Republican seats held by Foley and Reps. Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) and Deborah Pryce (Ohio) certainly were affected by the scandal, and the scandal undoubtedly aided the Democratic message about corruption and change. But the page scandal isn't the reason Republicans are likely to lose the House. It just added to the GOP's pre-existing woes.

What It's Like Being Caught Up In A Wave: I've Been There (RC)

By Dan Glickman

Roll Call, November 2, 2006

The last time Congress flipped, I was flipped as well. It was 1994. I had been a House Member for 18 years. I thought I had done a good job.

In the year leading up to Election Day, I had been the key sponsor of legislation creating product liability protection for small plane manufacturers — no coincidence for a Member whose Wichita district is home to Beech, Cessna and Learjet. The bill had been passed. The bill had been signed into law.

My opponent was a relative unknown with a substantially smaller campaign war chest. I was 30 points ahead of my opponent on Labor Day. In short, I was in political hog heaven.

Yet in November 1994, I was beaten by Republican Todd Tiahrt.

It was a bellwether of the nation — and it reflected the national conversation and the influence it had on individual races. This year, there are similarities. Predictions and speculation about 2006 being another 1994 are on everyone's minds.

DOJ_NMG_0089969

In fact, a few months ago, The Wichita Eagle wrote an article about my loss to Tiahrt, who has served the 4th district now for 12 years, and whether he could be unseated by a Democratic opponent — an underdog not unlike the one he was back in 1994.

As Margaret Thatcher once said, "The wisdom of hindsight, so useful to historians and indeed to authors of memoirs, is sadly denied to practicing politicians."

So I offer a couple of thoughts about what I didn't do in 1994, at the nexus of a national referendum.

For starters, Democrats in 1994 didn't see the wave coming. My loss was a surprise. I was not on any target list. I was not viewed as a Member in trouble.

This year, I think Republicans are more prepared financially and from an organizational standpoint. On the other hand, if the public is sufficiently disenchanted with policy and the times, it is hard for money or organization to fight that.

But there are things candidates can do to help themselves.

First, I didn't work hard enough. I realized too late that I had rested a little bit on my laurels. I was a nine-term Congressman with a long track record of success. I was chairman of the House subcommittee with jurisdiction over most federal farm programs — a huge issue in my state. I was chairman of the Intelligence Committee. I was the incumbent.

But I guessed that people knew about all the great things I'd done. I didn't do a good enough job telling people my story.

Second, I didn't understand until too late what issues were motivating voters and how they were energizing the base of the Republican Party. Politics is important, but you cannot forget the issues. Issues can galvanize and organize the public. They can create zealous constituencies. A financial advantage in politics is not as important as the intensity of how people feel about the issues, your opponent and you.

I will never forget the day when the issues were spelled out for me.

It was 6 a.m. about two weeks before the elections, and I was working the plant gate at Cessna. I was a prodigious worker of plant gates at airplane companies in Wichita.

I was standing outside (cold) with a cup of coffee (hot), when a guy walked straight over to me and said, "Good job on that product liability bill, Glickman. But I'm not voting for you this time."

"Why?" I asked, mildly taken aback.

And he said, "Three reasons: guns, abortion and NAFTA."

In the previous two years, I had voted for the crime bill with gun restrictions, against most restrictions on abortion and for the North American Free Trade Agreement. And because of health care reform and other issues, then-President Bill Clinton was not popular in my district.

My opponent did a good job tying me to him and exploiting my votes on the crime bill and NAFTA in particular. This jeopardized my relationship with my aircraft worker constituency.

It struck me, as my hot coffee turned cold: I didn't realize I had lost my base. He abandoned me because he felt I had abandoned him.

I don't regret my votes on those issues. But I do regret that I didn't work harder to explain them and to motivate my supporters.

Finally, as someone who in 1976 ran against the establishment, I realized I now was perceived as being with the establishment and no longer as someone railing against the system. And that was something the public was looking for.

Hindsight is good for seeing where you've been, but it can't always tell you where you ought to go. However, take it from this 1994 roadkill: You can learn a lot of lessons from running a winning campaign, but you can learn a lot more from running a losing campaign.

Succeeding in local politics through the storm of a national referendum is possible, particularly if you can see a wave coming. Work hard. Operate as if you're going to lose. Understand what is motivating your constituents. In many cases you can fight the wave. But sometimes you can't, and you just have to accept the inevitable.

It helps to understand that there is always a bright lining. Life after losing a Congressional race can lead to other opportunities — in my case, a Cabinet post, or heading a leading trade organization.

I enjoyed Congress. It is still the greatest job in the world. But life after Congress is pretty good as well.

DOJ_NMG_0089970

Dan Glickman, a former Democratic Member of Congress from Kansas, is chairman and CEO of the Motion Picture Association of America.

With Iraq Driving Election, Voters Want New Approach (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And Megan Thee

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 1 — A substantial majority of Americans expect Democrats to reduce or end American military involvement in Iraq if they win control of Congress next Tuesday and say Republicans will maintain or increase troop levels to try to win the war if they hold on to power on Capitol Hill, according to the final New York Times/CBS News poll before the midterm election.

The poll showed that 29 percent of Americans approve of the way President Bush is managing the war, matching the lowest mark of his presidency. Nearly 70 percent said Mr. Bush did not have a plan to end the war, and 80 percent said Mr. Bush's latest effort to rally public support for the conflict amounted to a change in language but not policy.

The poll underlined the extent to which the war has framed the midterm elections. Americans cited Iraq as the most important issue affecting their vote, and majorities of Republicans and Democrats said they wanted a change in approach. Twenty percent said they thought the United States was winning in Iraq, down from a high this year of 36 percent in January.

Even beyond the war, the Times/CBS News poll, like most other polls this fall, contained worrisome indicators for Republicans as they go into the final days of a campaign in which many are bracing for a loss of seats in both the House and the Senate.

In a year when there are many close races, Democrats were more enthusiastic than Republicans about voting and more likely to say they would support their party's candidates, although Republicans were slightly more likely to say they would actually vote.

Fifty percent of independent voters, a closely watched segment of the electorate in such polarized times, said they intended to vote for the Democratic candidate, versus 23 who said they would vote for a Republican.

Among registered voters, 33 percent said they planned to support Republicans, and 52 percent said they would vote for Democrats.

As a rule, generic questions like those, while providing broad insights into the national mood, are often imprecise as a predictor of the outcome of hundreds of Congressional races, where local issues and personalities can shape the result.

Voters said neither Democrats nor Republicans had offered a plan for governing should they win on Tuesday, the poll found.

Yet Americans have some clear notions of how government may change if Democrats win control of Congress.

Beyond a quicker exit from Iraq, respondents said they thought a Democratic-led Congress would be more likely to increase the minimum wage, hold down rapidly rising health and prescription drug costs, improve the economy and — as Republicans have said frequently in these closing days of the campaign — raise taxes.

By a slight margin, more respondents said the threat of terrorism would increase under Republicans than said it would increase under Democrats.

Notwithstanding the clear expectation among members of both parties that a Democratic-led Congress would produce a change in Iraq policy, it was not clear how much influence that might have on Mr. Bush, who as commander in chief would retain the final say.

In addition, while Democrats have coalesced around a general position of finding a way to reduce or end American involvement in Iraq, there is substantial disagreement among Democratic Congressional leaders and candidates about exactly how to accomplish that.

Nearly 75 percent of respondents, including 67 percent of Republicans and 92 percent of Democrats, said they expected that Americans troops would be taken out of Iraq more swiftly under a Democratic-led Congress.

Forty-one percent of respondents said they expected that troop levels would decrease if Democrats won control, while 40 percent said the party would seek to remove all troops. Forty-one percent said they expected troop levels to remain the same if

DOJ_NMG_0089971

Republicans won, while 29 percent said they thought the United States would send more troops if the Republicans continued to control Congress.

Those findings cut across party lines, but the poll found that Democrats were more likely to say Republicans would increase American troop strength while Republicans were more likely to say Democrats would remove all troops.

Follow-up interviews found clear expectations about the policies each party would pursue in Iraq, even if there was disagreement about which course was correct.

"If the Republicans continue in power, they would probably just want to keep doing what we're doing and doing it longer and harder because the president is Republican and he's the one who sent the troops there in the first place," said Ashley Robertson, 20, a Democrat from Minnesota. "But right now I think it's a bad thing to bring them all home because it's like we went in there to try to help and we're leaving them high and dry and saying clean up our mess."

Pat Atley, 73, a Republican from Florida, said she expected Republicans to press for more troops in Iraq if they stayed in power, although she said she hoped they would not.

"I've always felt we were never going to do any good over there," Ms. Atley said, adding, "I don't think we should increase our troops because increased troops aren't going to do anything except put more of our men and women in jeopardy."

Mr. Bush's overall approval rating was 34 percent, unchanged from a poll three weeks ago, an anemic rating that explains why many Democrats are featuring him in their final advertisements, as well as why some Republican incumbents do not want him at their side.

That approval rating is 9 points below where former President Bill Clinton's was in October 1994 — the election in which Republicans surprised Democrats by taking control of the House — and 28 points below where Mr. Bush's approval rating was on the eve of the 2002 midterms.

In this latest poll, 56 percent of respondents said Mr. Bush's campaigning on behalf of candidates had generally hurt them, as compared with 26 percent who said a campaign visit by Mr. Bush helped.

There was a slight increase, to 38 percent from 34 percent three weeks ago, in respondents who said they approved of how Mr. Bush was managing the economy. Similarly, there was a slight increase, to 44 percent from 40 percent in July, in respondents who said they approved of how Mr. Bush had managed the situation with North Korea.

In a year marked by corruption scandals, 58 percent of voters said corruption was widespread in Washington; 35 percent said the Republican Party had the most corrupt politicians, compared with 15 percent who said the Democratic Party did.

The poll found that the intensity of Democratic support for Democratic candidates was slightly greater than Republican support for Republican candidates, which could give some solace to Democrats who have been concerned that the Republican Party's formidable get-out-the-vote operation would help them eke out victories in close Congressional races. Ninety percent of Democratic voters are planning to vote Democratic, while 83 percent of Republicans said they would support Republican candidates.

In addition, 50 percent of Democrats said they felt more enthusiastic about voting in this election than in previous ones, compared with 39 percent of Republicans.

But 93 percent of Republicans said they were definitely or probably going to vote next Tuesday, compared with 89 percent of Democrats.

Democratic Leader Put To Work As G.O.P. Campaign Star (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Nov. 1 — Representative Melissa Bean of Illinois, a Democrat, has a Republican opponent in next week's election, but he does not appear in the advertisement that skewers her. Instead, that role is being played by a fellow Democrat, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the minority leader.

Judging by some of the political name-calling in the final days before the elections, Ms. Pelosi seems to be in the thick of campaigns for Congress from Illinois to Georgia and several places in between. She is the unwitting star of at least a half-dozen television spots — and countless radio spots, direct-mail campaigns and candidate debates —warning voters that if they choose their local Democrat for Congress, they are also casting a vote for Ms. Pelosi.

DOJ_NMG_0089972

The problem with the tactic, Democrats and some Republican strategists say, is that many voters have no idea who Ms. Pelosi is. That can make the advertisements sound more desperate than menacing, or at the least, confounding.

"It's awful hard to make a boogeyman out of someone no one knows," said Ed Rollins, a Republican political consultant. "The reality is, no one is going to vote for a Republican congressman because they are afraid of Nancy Pelosi."

A spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee suggested that Ms. Pelosi fell into the same category of unknowns as Representative J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, the Republican speaker.

"We don't run Denny Hastert ads because he is speaker of the House and no one knows who he is," said Sarah Feinberg, the spokeswoman. "People know who the president is, and that is why we have used him in more than 90 ads in 35 districts."

In a New York Times/CBS News poll conducted last week, 55 percent of those polled said they had not heard enough about Ms. Pelosi to form an opinion about her, compared with 10 percent who viewed her favorably and 17 percent who viewed her unfavorably. Other polls released in the last month have yielded similar results.

Still, many Republicans are betting that the prospect of Ms. Pelosi replacing Mr. Hastert as speaker should the Democrats take control of Congress will scare undecided voters into voting Republican.

"Nancy Pelosi is like kryptonite in Republican districts," said Ed Patru, a spokesman for the Republican National Campaign Committee, which is paying for some of the advertisements. "We'd be more than happy to fly Nancy Pelosi in to those districts."

Here she is in one of the group's advertisements against Ms. Bean: "Melissa Bean follows liberal Nancy Pelosi 83 percent of the time," growls the announcer, over images of the Golden Gate Bridge and some not-particularly-flattering snapshots of Ms. Pelosi, who represents San Francisco. "Melissa Bean. Just a Nancy Pelosi wannabe."

Mr. Patru said that the committee is encouraging candidates in "overwhelming red states" to invoke the specter of a Speaker Pelosi in their campaigns. The tactic mirrors one employed by Democrats in 1996, when the speaker, Newt Gingrich, became an antagonist in advertisements attacking Republican candidates.

"She'll reward illegal aliens with welfare, food stamps and free education," warns the announcer in an advertisement for Mac Collins, a Republican who is seeking to unseat Representative Jim Marshall in Georgia.

In one of the most fiercely contested races in Indiana, a Republican incumbent, Representative John Hostettler, has broadcast a commercial linking his Democratic challenger, Brad Ellsworth, to Ms. Pelosi. A radio spot went even further: "Pelosi will then put in motion her radical plan to advance the homosexual agenda, led by Barney Frank," the narrator says.

Representative Charles H. Taylor, the Republican incumbent in North Carolina's 11th District, goes for an even broader approach, linking his Democratic opponent, Heath Shuler, to Ms. Pelosi; Howard Dean, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee; and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton.

The television advertisements tend to share three features: images of Ms. Pelosi looking angry, startled or slightly bug-eyed; the words "liberal" and "San Francisco"; and dire tones reminiscent of the films shown to seventh-graders, warning of the dangers of marijuana.

The Republican National Campaign Committee even has a quiz on the home page of its Web site: "Which Nancy Pelosi quote do you find most disturbing?"

Ms. Pelosi is also used as a bat with which to beat on Democrats in debates and interviews. In Indiana, for example, Chris Chocola, a Republican incumbent, repeated Ms. Pelosi's name throughout a debate with his Democratic challenger, Joe Donnelly. In Utah's Second Congressional District, the Republican challenger, LaVar Christensen, has brought up her name incessantly on the campaign trail.

Among the many issues that surface in the advertisements — abortion, taxes and national security — immigration appears to be the most potent in Republican districts.

For example, an announcer in one advertisement produced by the campaign for Van Taylor, who is challenging a Democratic incumbent in Texas, warns over the sounds of a pounding kettle drum that his opponent, if elected, would pair up with Ms. Pelosi to raise taxes and offer welfare to immigrants. Voters are encouraged to "stop them" by voting for Mr. Taylor, to "protect our conservative values."

DOJ_NMG_0089973

Variations of the anti-Pelosi advertisements have appeared in past campaigns, but unlike in this case, the targets had already become speaker.

In addition to the Gingrich advertisements in 1996, the Republicans produced an advertisement in 1980 about Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., then the Democratic speaker, in which Mr. O'Neill refused to yield to warnings that his car was out of gas, intended as a metaphor for his party.

Mr. Gingrich's spokesman, Rick Tyler, answered an e-mail message requesting comments about the anti-Pelosi advertisements with his own e-mail message: "Sorry. No interest here on that topic."

In a recent interview, Ms. Pelosi said she was unconcerned about the advertisements because, she said, they had no traction with voters.

"The American people don't know me," she said.

But some Republicans running in close races are counting on her being wrong.

"Nancy Pelosi does not represent the values of middle Georgia," said Ted Prill, the campaign manger for Mr. Collins, who is seeking a seat in the Third District. "There is a case to be made that a vote for a Democrat in Georgia is a vote for Nancy Pelosi."

Pelosi's War Blunder (WT)

By Jack Kingston

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

In a stunning performance on "60 Minutes," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi proved again why she cannot be trusted to keep America safe from the threat of global terrorism and Islamic extremists.

Mrs. Pelosi demonstrated that she does not understand the global nature of the threat when she stated flatly "the war on terror is the war in Afghanistan." She may think the war is limited to Afghanistan, but where does al Qaeda believe the war is? Al Qaeda's No. 2 man, Ayman al-Zawahiri, in a letter to the leaders of al Qaeda in Iraq, was clear about the location of the global jihad and the importance of victory in Iraq:

"Victory of Islam will never take place until a Muslim state is established in the manner of the Prophet in the heart of the Islamic world ... As for the battles that are going on in the far flung regions of the Islamic world, such as Chechnya, Afghanistan, Kashmir, and Bosnia, they are just the groundwork and the vanguard for the major battles which have begun in the heart of the Islamic world."

Zawahiri reminds Iraqi terrorists, like Abu Musab Zarqawi, that God has blessed them "with the splendor of the spearhead of Jihad." Translation: Islamic fascists led by al Qaeda are fighting a global jihad to establish a Muslim caliphate from Egypt to Iraq. They will attack anyone, anywhere, with any means, that will further their violent cause.

Tourists in Indonesia, embassy workers in Africa, commuters in Spain and London, schoolchildren in Russia, office workers in New York and Washington, and 40 Americans on a plane over Pennsylvania could all tell Nancy Pelosi where the war on terror is, if their voices had not been silenced.

For Mrs. Pelosi, Iraq is not even part of the war on Islamic terrorism, while for our terrorist enemies Iraq is "the spearhead of jihad." Zawahiri's letter details a four-part strategy for global jihad starting with Iraq; "the first stage: expel the Americans from Iraq." In this first stage at least, Zawahiri seems to have found his "useful idiot" in Mrs. Pelosi.

She acknowledges that there are terrorists in Iraq, but naively submits that "they'll stay as long as we're there. They're there because we're there." What Mrs. Pelosi doesn't say is where she thinks the terrorists will go if we leave Iraq to fall into chaos. According to Mrs. Pelosi, our presence created the terrorists and when we leave they will put down their suicide belts and IEDs. She might want to read the rest of al Qaeda's plan before she is so sure:

"The second stage: Establish an Islamic authority ... over as much territory as you can to spread its power in Iraq ... in order to fill the void stemming from the departure of the Americans ... The third stage: Extend the jihad wave to the secular countries neighboring Iraq ... The fourth stage: It may coincide with what came before: the clash with Israel."

Our actions to liberate Iraq from the butcher of Baghdad did not cause Islamic terrorists, but our premature departure will surely embolden them. Zawahiri's letter exhorts his followers to learn the lessons of history as "things may develop faster than we imagine. The aftermath of the collapse of American power in Vietnam and how they ran and left their agents is noteworthy... we must take the initiative and impose a fait accompli upon our enemies."

DOJ_NMG_0089974

While we may not have entered Iraq to defeat al Qaeda, there is no doubt that al Qaeda has entered Iraq to defeat us and begin the defeat of all nations in the region who do not share their extreme view of an Islamic caliphate, under strict Sunni rule, stretching across the entire Middle East. Like Osama bin Laden's fatwas declaring war on the United States and the civilized world, Zawahiri points to American retreat from Vietnam for inspiration. Maybe Mrs. Pelosi can answer how giving al Qaeda what they want in Iraq will keep Americans safe and secure from Islamic terrorism in the future.

Al Qaeda knows that they are in a war with many fronts. Zawahiri concludes that "more than half of this battle is taking place in the battlefield of the media ... we are in a media battle in a race for the hearts and minds of our umma (people)." Part of the battle against terrorism is taking place in our media as well. Last week, Mrs. Pelosi lost one battle for our side. America cannot take the risk that she will lose the war.

Rep. Jack Kingston, Georgia Republican, is vice chairman of of the House Republican Conference and a member of the Defense Appropriations Committee.

Scandals Alone Could Cost Republicans Their House Majority (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

Indictments, investigations and allegations of wrongdoing have helped put at least 15 Republican House seats in jeopardy, enough to swing control to the Democrats on Tuesday even before the larger issues of war, economic unease and President Bush are invoked.

With just five days left before Election Day, allegations are springing up like brushfires. Four GOP House seats have been tarred by lobbyist Jack Abramoff's influence-peddling scandal. Five have been adversely affected by then-Rep. Mark Foley's unseemly contacts with teenage male House pages. The remaining half a dozen or so could turn on controversies including offshore tax dodging, sexual misconduct and shady land deals.

Not since the House bank check-kiting scandal of the early 1990s have so many seats been affected by scandals, and not since the Abscam bribery cases of the 1970s have the charges been so serious. But this year's combination of breadth and severity may be unprecedented, suggested Julian E. Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University.

For more than a year, Democrats have tried to gain political advantage from what they called "a culture of corruption" in Republican-controlled Washington. Republican campaign officials insist the theme has not caught on with the public, but even they concede that many individual races have been hit hard.

"So many different kinds of scandals going on at the same time, that's pretty unique," Zelizer said. "There were scandals throughout the '70s, multiple scandals, but the number of stories now are almost overwhelming."

At least nine GOP seats have been affected by scandals and are highly vulnerable to Democratic takeover next week. Foley's abrupt resignation has jeopardized a Florida House district that had been on no one's radar screen. Under indictment and amid a swirl of ethics investigations, former House majority leader Tom DeLay (Tex.) resigned from Congress earlier this year, forcing Republicans to mount a long-shot write-in campaign for their chosen candidate. Rep. Robert W. Ney's guilty plea last month on corruption charges still hangs over the Ohio campaign of his would-be Republican successor, Joy Padgett, especially because Ney still has not resigned from Congress.

The GOP has all but abandoned longtime Rep. Curt Weldon (Pa.), as federal investigators examine charges that he steered lobbying contracts to his daughter. Weldon went on television yesterday with an ad featuring actors pleading, "Would you give a friend the benefit of the doubt? . . . Today, Curt Weldon needs our support."

Republican campaign strategists fear they have also lost the seat of Rep. Don Sherwood (Pa.), who has been dogged by the settlement of a lawsuit filed by a mistress who charged that Sherwood had throttled her.

Congress watchers once saw the swing seat of Rep. Rick Renzi (R-Ariz.) as a missed opportunity for Democrats. But now, as the U.S. attorney's office in Phoenix examines his role in a land deal for a business partner and political benefactor, Renzi's race with political neophyte Ellen Simon (D) has tightened.

DOJ_NMG_0089975

Farther west, Rep. Jon Porter (R-Nev.) has had to contend with charges lodged last month by a longtime former aide, Jim Shepard, that the lawmaker made dozens of illegal fundraising calls from his congressional offices. And two reliably Republican districts in California are under assault by Democrats because Reps. Richard W. Pombo and John T. Doolittle have been linked to Abramoff, the lobbyist who pleaded guilty in January to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials.

Beyond those nine jeopardized GOP seats, four other Republicans have been tainted by the Foley page scandal. Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.) chose to issue a public apology after he admitted that he had known about inappropriate contact between Foley and a former page this spring. Democrats have repeatedly hit Rep. Deborah Pryce (Ohio), the House Republican Conference chairman, for inaction on the Foley matter. And Democrats have tried to hold two former members of the Page Board, Reps. Sue W. Kelly (N.Y.) and Heather A. Wilson (N.M.), accountable for Foley's actions.

Meanwhile, new allegations continue to spring up. Vern Buchanan, a Republican running for the Florida seat vacated by Rep. Katherine Harris (R), was the target of local media reports this week detailing his use of business entities in Caribbean tax havens to reduce levies on his auto dealerships. The Albany Times Union published an article yesterday charging that the wife of Rep. John E. Sweeney (R-N.Y.) called police late last year to report that her husband was "knocking her around" during a late-night argument.

And Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.), who made his name pushing campaign finance changes and governance reforms, was confronted with media reports alleging that a 2003 trip to Qatar -- partly funded by a group loosely tied to Abramoff -- had not been properly disclosed.

"The corruption issue plays in two ways: It contributes to the sour mood of the country and to the low job approval of Congress, and it particularly plays in races directly touched by allegations of scandal," said Republican pollster Whit Ayers. "And in those races, it plays a significant role."

House Democrats have had to deal with investigations of their own, involving Reps. William J. Jefferson (La.), Alan B. Mollohan (W.Va.) and Jane Harman (Calif.), but none of those cases have put Democratic seats in jeopardy.

In the Senate, a federal inquiry into Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.) and his ties to a nonprofit community agency that paid him more than $300,000 in rent while receiving millions of dollars in federal assistance has provided his Republican challenger with a strong issue and has kept that race close. But the seat of Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) may be in even more jeopardy, primarily because of Burns's ties to Abramoff.

Recent polling suggests that the issue of corruption is beginning to stick. A CNN poll last month found that "half of all Americans believe most members of Congress are corrupt" and that "more than a third think their own representative is crooked."

And where the issue has hit directly, Democrats and their allies have been playing up charges to the hilt. Just yesterday, Christine Jennings, the Florida Democrat running for Harris's House seat, held a news conference to attack Buchanan's alleged offshore tax dodges.

Even the most peripheral contact with a scandal has not gone unnoticed. "Those that knew got to go," Albuquerque's Democratic mayor, Martin J. Chavez, thundered at a rally last month against New Mexico's Wilson, citing her role on the Page Board during Foley's misconduct. "Those that didn't know need to explain why they didn't."

Picking Up The Pace (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

In the closing days of campaigns, itineraries can be telling barometers of political strategy. Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, is making 12 stops in Missouri this week, hoping to increase Republican turnout in a too-close-to-call race between Senator Jim Talent, a Republican, and Claire McCaskill.

“We are literally hitting every media market of the state,” Mr. Mehlman said in a telephone interview from Sedalia before flying nearly 300 miles to Cape Girardeau. By week’s end, Mr. Mehlman is scheduled to hit top races in at least 10 states.

The Democratic outlook, however, cannot be as easily divined by studying the travel schedule of its party chairman, Howard Dean, who has been at odds with Congressional leaders throughout the midterm campaign. Mr. Dean held a news conference yesterday in Burlington, Vt., where he was governor, before flying to Chicago for a campus get-out-the-vote rally. Then, he was off to Pennsylvania, Ohio and Michigan.

DOJ_NMG_0089976

"Governor Dean is crisscrossing the country raising money and rallying supporters," a spokeswoman, Stacie Paxton, said.

Not included on his itinerary are many top Senate or House races that Democrats are concentrating on. JEFF ZELENY

Winning Small (NYT)

By Brian Mann

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

Saranac Lake, N.Y.

WITH the midterm election just a few days away, Republicans face a toxic political environment, fouled in large part by growing bitterness over the handling of the war in Iraq. By almost every measure, voter discontent is deeper than it was in 1994, when Democrats lost nine seats in the Senate and 54 in the House.

Surely, the Republican Party is facing an electoral drubbing. And yet, President Bush and Karl Rove baldly assert that Republicans will retain control of Congress. The rationale?

Majorities in Congress aren't formed by the national zeitgeist, as Mr. Rove cheerfully points out. They are built one race at a time. And in dozens of close contests this fall, the outcome will be determined largely by one often-overlooked minority group: the mostly white and mostly conservative voters who live in America's small towns.

Residents of rural areas make up only a fifth of the country's population. That's a little less than African-Americans and Hispanics combined. But unlike voters in those minority groups, small-town whites are often kingmakers in national politics.

In 2004, they voted for George W. Bush by nearly a 20-point margin. Newspapers ran headlines that baffled their urban readers: "Rural Values Proved Pivotal," "Conservatives in Rural Ohio Big Key in Bush Victory," and "G.O.P. Won With Accent on Rural and Traditional."

This year, those same right-leaning small towns make up a major voting bloc in a half-dozen make-or-break Senate races, like those in Missouri, Montana, Tennessee and Virginia. They also dominate battleground House districts throughout the country, from Idaho to northern New York. If rural America embraces Republicans with the same fervor it did two years ago, Democrats will almost certainly be denied a majority in the Senate and may fall short in the House.

In part, the electoral importance of small towns reflects a profound rural bias hardwired into our political system. The Constitution grants two Senate seats to each state regardless of its population. As a consequence, a majority of senators are elected by voters in 26 sparsely settled states that together contain less than 18 percent of the country's population.

A few decades ago, this uneven distribution of power didn't matter, because rural states regularly divided their votes between the two major parties. But in recent years, low-population states like Alaska, Kansas and Wyoming have voted as a conservative bloc, favoring Republican candidates by overwhelming margins.

Today the Republican Party holds an 11-seat Senate majority, but Republican senators represent 4.5 million fewer people than their Democratic colleagues, who tend to come from urban states like California, Illinois and New York. In the 2004 elections, Democratic candidates for the Senate captured nearly 10 percent more votes than Republicans nationwide, thanks to landslide support among urbanites. Yet the Republicans still managed to gain four seats, due to victories in rural states like South Dakota and South Carolina.

A similarly skewed outcome is possible this year. Democrats are widely expected to gain seats in Ohio and Pennsylvania. If they do, Democratic senators will represent some 10 to 20 million more Americans nationwide than Republican senators. But if rural voters in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia swing conservative, the Republicans will cling to the narrow majority Mr. Rove has promised.

In the House, Republican leaders, including Speaker Dennis Hastert and his former deputy, Tom DeLay, have worked to create a similar small-town bias. They redrew district lines to systematically fracture the voting power of urban and suburban neighborhoods in half a dozen states, including Florida, Ohio and Texas.

In 2003, The Washington Post published an analysis of this scheme by a Texas political operative, Joby Fortson: "This has a real national impact that should assure that Republicans keep the House no matter the national mood," Mr. Fortson wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0089977

Naturally, the Republicans' rural strategy only works if small towns vote Republican by wide margins. This year, that might not happen. A bipartisan poll conducted last week for the Center for Rural Strategies found that the loyalty of rural voters has been deeply shaken by Iraq and the Mark Foley page scandal.

Since September, rural voters moved from a four-point advantage for Republicans to a four-point advantage for Democrats in Senate races, the Rural Strategies report concluded, and from evenly divided to a 13-point advantage for the Democrats in House races.

Worse yet for Republicans, a growing number of Democrats have awakened to the fact that small towns matter. In Missouri, Claire McCaskill's Senate campaign has focused so intently on small-town voters that The St. Louis Post-Dispatch described it as an "apparent obsession." And nationwide, Democrats are fielding centrist candidates who can compete in rural districts like Idaho's First, Indiana's Second, and New York's 24th.

If Democrats succeed in increasing their rural vote, they could decisively sweep Republicans from power. But as the Center for Rural Strategies has pointed out, most of these races will be decided by razor-thin margins. And the Republicans are working feverishly to mollify and re-energize their rural base with talk about same-sex marriage, abortion, gun rights, public Christianity, terrorism and immigration — all issues that play brilliantly in small towns. The Republican National Committee has cranked up its sophisticated get-out-the-vote machine, combining phone and mail prompts, pastor-and-pulpit networks, conservative talk radio and door-to-door canvassing.

On Election Day, millions of urban Democrats will go to the polls expecting victory and dramatic change in Washington. But beware: Mr. Rove's sunny forecast isn't just spin. He and his party are counting on small towns to send a very different message, and to give the Republicans two more years to get it right.

How Big Will The Democratic Wave Be? Use This Formula (RC)

By Louis Jacobson

Roll Call, November 2, 2006

How big might the Democratic wave on Nov. 7 be? In one sense, there's an easy answer: Just look at the Congressional results, and if there's a Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and maybe a Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) on Nov. 8, that will be evidence enough.

However, to truly measure the intensity of a Democratic wave means probing a little deeper. Does the wave accelerate longer-term trends of geographic realignment? Does it carry Democrats to victory even in "red" areas? Is it strong enough to rescue weak Democratic incumbents? And does it reach down below the Congressional level to governors, legislatures and attorneys general?

Here are some questions that address these issues. We've provided a scoring system for each one that, when aggregated after Nov. 7, should suggest just how far-reaching the Democratic wave of 2006 was.

1. How many New England Republicans — Senators, House Members and governors — will be left standing after Election Day?

Currently, 14 Republicans hold one of these three offices in Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Vermont. Of these, six are either not up for election this year or seem safe bets to win again.

The races that are in play are the seats held by New Hampshire Reps. Charles Bass and Jeb Bradley; Connecticut Reps. Nancy Johnson, Christopher Shays and Rob Simmons; Rhode Island Sen. Lincoln Chafee; Rhode Island Gov. Don Carcieri and the seat being vacated by Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

Scoring:

Seven or fewer Republicans survive: 8 points

Eight or nine survive: 6 points

10 or 11: 3 points

12 to 14: 1 point

2. Is there a correlation between Democratic Senate candidates and Democratic gubernatorial candidates in the same state winning, or are voters willing to ticket-split?

DOJ_NMG_0089978

This question only concerns states where both races are considered competitive: Ohio, Rhode Island, Maryland and Minnesota.

For any seat where Democrats win both contests: Add 2 points.

For any seat where each party wins one seat: Add zero points.

For any seat where Republicans win both: Subtract 2 points.

3. How many Democratic-held House seats can the GOP flip on Election Day?

No seats: 8 points

One or two seats: 6 points

Three or four seats: 3 points

Five or more seats: 0 points

4. How many Republican-held House districts that voted for Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) in the 2004 presidential race will still be held by Republicans after Election Day?

There are 18 such districts. Of those, four Republicans are likely to hold their seats — Reps. Mike Castle (Del.), Charlie Dent (Pa.), Mark Kirk (Ill.) and Jim Leach (Iowa).

The other 14 are considered competitive. The seats are held by Bass; Johnson; Simmons; Shays; Michael Fitzpatrick (Pa.); Jim Gerlach (Pa.); Anne Northup (Ky.); Dave Reichert (Wash.); Clay Shaw (Fla.); Jim Walsh (N.Y.); Curt Weldon (Pa.); Heather Wilson (N.M.); and the seats being vacated by Reps. Bob Beauprez (Colo.) and Jim Nussle (Iowa).

Four or fewer seats: 8 points

Five to eight seats: 6 points

Nine to 11 seats: 4 points

12 to 14 seats: 3 points

15 to 18 seats: 1 point

5. How far ahead of Bush's 2004 vote percentages will Republicans run in blue-state Senate races?

There are seven competitive races in this category. The Republicans running are Mike Bouchard in Michigan, where Bush won 48 percent; Chafee in Rhode Island, where Bush won 39 percent; Tom Kean Jr. in New Jersey, where Bush won 46 percent; Rep. Mark Kennedy in Minnesota, where Bush won 48 percent; Mike McGavick in Washington, where Bush won 46 percent; Sen. Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania, where Bush won 48 percent; and Michael Steele in Maryland, where Bush won 43 percent.

39 or more aggregate percentage points ahead of Bush: 0 points

30 to 38 aggregate points ahead: 2 points

20 to 29 points: 3 points

10 to 19 points: 5 points

1 to 9 points: 7 points

0 or fewer points: 8 points

6. How far ahead of Kerry's 2004 vote percentages will Democrats run in red-state Senate races?

There are six competitive races in this category. The Democrats running are Rep. Sherrod Brown in Ohio, where Kerry won 49 percent; Rep. Harold Ford Jr. in Tennessee, where Kerry won 43 percent; Claire McCaskill in Missouri, where Kerry won 46 percent; Jim Pederson in Arizona, where Kerry won 44 percent; Jon Tester in Montana, where Kerry won 39 percent; and Jim Webb in Virginia, where Kerry won 45 percent.

40 or more aggregate percentage points ahead of Kerry: 8 points

30 to 39 aggregate points ahead: 7 points

20 to 29 points: 5 points

10 to 19 points: 3 points

1 to 9 points: 2 points

0 or fewer points: 0 points

7. Will voters in blue states elect weakened Democratic candidates who have relatively low approval ratings, just to prevent the GOP from gaining ground?

DOJ_NMG_0089979

The candidates in this category are Maine Gov. John Baldacci, Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich, Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle, Michigan Gov. Jennifer Granholm, Rep. William Jefferson (La.), Oregon Gov. Ted Kulongoski; Sen. Bob Menendez (N.J.) and Rep. Alan Mollohan (W.Va.).

Seven or eight of these candidates win: 8 points

Five or six of them win: 6 points

Three or four win: 2 points

Two or fewer win: 0 points

8. Which ballot initiatives have better success, those that would raise the minimum wage or those that would ban same-sex marriage?

Minimum-wage hikes are on the ballot in Arizona, Colorado, Missouri, Montana, Nevada and Ohio. Same-sex marriage bans are on the ballot in Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin. And one measure in Colorado would establish domestic partnerships.

Any same-sex marriage measure is defeated: 2 points per measure

Colorado's domestic partnership measure passes: 2 points

All minimum-wage measures pass: 2 points

Any minimum-wage measure loses: Subtract 2 points per measure.

9. How many in-play legislative chambers do the Democrats control after Election Day?

This year, 21 legislatures are rated as competitive by the Rothenberg Political Report. The 10 Democratic-held chambers that are in play are the Colorado House and Senate; the Maine House and Senate; the Montana Senate; the North Carolina House; the Oklahoma Senate; the Tennessee House; and the Washington House and Senate.

The nine Republican-held chambers that are in play are the Indiana House; the Iowa House; the Minnesota House; the Nevada Senate; the Ohio House; the Oregon House; the Pennsylvania House; the Tennessee Senate and the Wisconsin Senate. The two tied chambers are the Iowa Senate and the Montana House.

The Democrats end up controlling 18 to 20 of these competitive chambers: 8 points

The Democrats control 14 to 17: 6 points

Nine to 13: 4 points

Five to eight: 2 points

Four or fewer: 0 points

10. How many strong Republican candidates in competitive races for state attorney general win this year?

The candidates are: Chuck Poochigian in California; Ferris Wharton in Delaware; Bill McCollum in Florida; Phill Kline in Kansas; Scott Rolle in Maryland; Jeff Johnson in Minnesota; Jim Bibb in New Mexico; Jeanine Pirro in New York; Betty Montgomery in Ohio; and J.B. Van Hollen in Wisconsin.

No Republicans on this list win: 8 points

One to three win: 6 points

Four or five: 4 points

Six or seven: 2 points

Eight to 10: 0 points

Now, for the final ratings, add up the points from each question and use the scale below to gauge how strong the Democratic wave was.

70-80 points: Massive Democratic wave

55-69 points: Strong Democratic wave

45-54 points: It'll do

30-44 points: Underwhelming

11-29 points: Big disappointment

0-10 points: Democrats, find another line of work.

DOJ_NMG_0089980

Behind The Gridlock (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

On the eve of another national election, the terms "gridlock" and "polarization" have become staples of the political vocabulary -- so much so that the reality behind them often goes unexamined.

Remedying that oversight is what motivates the unusual collaboration of two think tanks, the Hoover Institution at Stanford University and the Brookings Institution in Washington, in a forthcoming volume titled "Red and Blue Nation? Characteristics and Causes of America's Polarized Politics."

I have not read all the essays that more than 15 scholars have contributed to the volume, but the lead piece by William Galston and Pietro Nivola, both of Brookings, offers a modest bit of cheer to those who despair of our democracy in this season when we are swamped by nasty, negative campaign ads.

They acknowledge that polarization is real -- certainly in Congress and in some respects in the country as well. The parties are more sharply defined and constituencies are more distinct -- philosophically and to some extent geographically.

But when it comes to weighing the consequences of these divisions, Galston and Nivola offer some useful counters to the prevailing pessimism.

In one powerful paragraph they set forth their refutation of the notion that polarization produces gridlock. "Whatever else the overall legislative record of recent years may show, sclerosis has not been a distinguishing characteristic," they write.

"Reform of the welfare system, substantial tax reductions, big trade agreements, a great expansion of federal intervention in local public education, important course corrections in foreign policy, reorganization of the intelligence bureaus, a significant campaign finance law, new rules governing bankruptcy and class-action litigation, a huge new Cabinet department, massive enlargement of Medicare -- for better or worse, all these milestones, and others, were achieved despite polarized politics."

Beyond these specific measures, they find signs of convergence between the parties -- at least in some ways. Republicans, they note, have become far more comfortable with "big government" programs such as Medicare drug benefits. And Democrats have swallowed tax cuts and trade agreements they originally opposed -- and now make no noises about repealing them.

"There has been enough partisan convergence (albeit selective, tenuous, opportunistic or episodic) to secure pieces of legislation," they write. The implication I draw from this is that despite the failures on Social Security, immigration and other issues, the possibility exists that the new Congress can accomplish some things.

But even these relatively upbeat scholars acknowledge certain dangers in the degree of polarization we are seeing. First, it makes it far harder to address long-term challenges such as the underfinanced condition of our Social Security and Medicare systems and the needs of the retiring baby boomers.

Second, because the divisions no longer stop at the water's edge, it becomes far more difficult to maintain a steady course in foreign policy. The partisan nature of the Iraq debate underlines that risk.

Third, the polarization is particularly hard on the third branch of government, the judiciary. Hearings on judgeships -- especially the Supreme Court -- have become full-scale political campaigns, with all the nastiness we have come to expect in those races. And some Republicans have made whipping boys of sitting judges.

Finally, there is the damage that polarization does to the whole structure of trust on which any system of representative government must rest.

The authors write: "If polarized parties are what can get 120.3 million Americans to cast ballots -- the largest number in U.S. history -- why worry? Because a healthy civic culture ought to do more than bestir voters; it should build their trust in the nation's political institutions. It is in this respect that, alas, querulous partisanship can become corrosive."

As we come to the end of another down-and-dirty campaign, that is the damage we must contemplate. It matters little which party controls Congress if the people think Congress is made up of knaves and rascals, or even of well-intentioned men and women corrupted by special interests and the constant pursuit of campaign cash.

Nothing that comes out of such a Congress will be accepted as genuine or worthwhile by the citizenry. That is a lesson that campaign consultants and candidates who indulge in relentlessly negative campaigns forget.

DOJ_NMG_0089981

In the end they not only demean their opponents, they also damage the very institution in which they hope to serve. What kind of victory is that?

Republican Seems To Rally In Run For Seat Foley Quit (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

STUART, Fla., Nov. 1 — When Mark Foley resigned from Congress in disgrace five weeks ago, his Democratic challenger seemed headed for one of the easiest victories of the election season.

But in this least predictable of states, Joe Negron, the Republican choice to run as Mr. Foley's replacement, is getting powerful help as the clock runs down, and now appears to be running almost neck and neck with Tim Mahoney, the Democrat.

With the National Republican Congressional Committee pouring nearly $2 million into the race and Gov. Jeb Bush campaigning at his side, Mr. Negron, a member of the Florida House, is hoping that even the misfortune of having Mr. Foley's name on the ballot instead of his own — a consequence of the last-minute nature of the change — can be turned to his advantage. Republicans are posting signs urging voters to "Punch Foley for Joe," a reminder that a vote in the Foley column is actually a vote for Mr. Negron.

"I know this district, and we are not going to allow ourselves to be defined by the disgraceful actions of our former congressman," Mr. Negron said in an interview Wednesday. "I feel this tremendous momentum and energy among Republicans and conservative Democrats to keep this district in the Republican column."

The numbers are on his side: 42 percent of voters here in the 16th Congressional District, which spans the state from Palm Beach to Charlotte County, are Republicans, and 36 percent Democrats. President Bush won here comfortably in 2000 and 2004, and most of the district (its boundaries were redrawn in 2002) has not sent a Democrat to Congress since the 1970's.

Nationally, the chief political benefit of the Foley furor to Democrats was that it knocked Republicans off their tax and terrorism message in the crucial weeks after Congress adjourned at the end of September. It also ensnared several leading Republicans associated with Mr. Foley, while limiting Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's political drawing power.

But in a reflection of the race in Mr. Foley's own district, his lewd e-mail messages to House pages seem to have had little lasting effect on Congressional races around the country. One Democratic strategist said the party had never expected more than a few races to be influenced significantly by Mr. Foley's conduct.

Yet Mr. Mahoney has made a strong showing, especially given that he is a newcomer to politics who was virtually unknown before the Foley scandal drew spotlights to the race. A financier recruited by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee to run against Mr. Foley, he is more conservative than many of his party's other newcomers, a self-described fundamentalist Christian who opposes same-sex marriage and tighter gun control. He has painted himself as an outsider who would act independently in Congress, and Mr. Negron, a state lawmaker since 2000, as an ineffective partisan.

"I find myself running against Dennis Hastert, Karl Rove and the Republican leadership in Washington," Mr. Mahoney said after rallying campaign volunteers here. "They picked somebody to run for this seat that is publicly on record as supporting the failed policy of this administration for the last six years."

A poll conducted in mid-October for The South Florida Sun-Sentinel showed Mr. Mahoney leading Mr. Negron by 48 percent to 41 percent, with 11 percent undecided. But this week two nonpartisan Congressional handicappers, Stuart Rothenberg and Charlie Cook, changed their assessments of the race from "leans Democrat" to "tossup."

Mr. Rothenberg said voters seemed to have gotten past any confusion about the ballot, perhaps because news organizations had closely covered the race since Mr. Foley quit on Sept. 29. He also noted that Mr. Mahoney had begun attacking Mr. Negron by name in television advertisements — a sign, he said, that Mr. Mahoney is worried.

Mr. Mahoney said a new internal poll showed not only that he was still ahead, but that the margin was widening.

"What's going to put me over the top," he said, "is I'm getting virtually all the Democrats, the vast majority of independents and about 20 percent of the Republicans to vote for me."

Mr. Mahoney entered the race about a year ago and says he has been traveling the vast district ever since. It includes a few wealthy Palm Beach County towns, the growing exurbs of Martin and St. Lucie Counties, rural interior regions of cattle and citrus farms, and Punta Gorda and Port Charlotte on the Gulf Coast. He owns a ranch in Highlands County, the backdrop for advertisements in which he shoots a gun, saddles a horse and barbecues slabs of meat.

DOJ_NMG_0089982

Mr. Negron, a lawyer from Stuart, heads the powerful budget committee in the Florida House. He ran for attorney general this year, but was lagging and dropped out of the primary.

On Wednesday he issued a news release criticizing Mr. Mahoney for planning to attend a fund-raiser in New York with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, accusing him of taking his marching orders from her. Asked about the fund-raiser, Mr. Mahoney said he needed to "reach out to Democrats on a nationwide basis."

But his spokeswoman, Jessica Santillo, said later that he had never planned to attend. He will participate by teleconference from Florida, she said.

Luring Lapsed Democrats In Kentucky (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

BARDSTOWN, Ky., Oct. 27 — When Ron Lewis, a Republican, won an upset in a special election here in the spring of 1994, he replaced a Democrat who had represented the district in Congress for four decades before he died. Mr. Lewis's victory in an overwhelmingly Democratic area came to be seen as a harbinger of the Republican sweep that followed that fall.

Now, Democrats are hoping that Mr. Lewis's first tight race in a decade could be a bellwether of a Democratic tide this year.

His opponent, Mike Weaver, has come increasingly close to Mr. Lewis in the polls by running as a conservative Democrat on a slogan of "Faith, Family, Freedom." He has emphasized his military background in signs urging people to vote for "Colonel Mike Weaver." And if the Democrats win a majority, he says he will not vote for Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader whom Republicans have caricatured as the symbol of all things California and liberal, for House speaker.

With widespread unease about the war in Iraq, even in a region that includes the Fort Knox Army base, many Democrats who have supported Mr. Lewis are now saying that Mr. Weaver seems like the kind of Democrat who could bring them back to the party.

"What I hear when I go out in the district is, 'Thank goodness we have a Democrat we can vote for,' " Mr. Weaver said.

The race here in the Second District is one of three Congressional contests in Kentucky that have become unexpectedly competitive in the last days of a campaign where Democrats are hoping to win the 15 seats they need to gain a majority in the House.

Signs here say, "Had enough? Vote Democratic!" and it seems many people are willing to do just that.

At a luncheon for retired teachers here, Mr. Weaver, a state legislator, fielded questions about taxes and Social Security. But most of the questions focused on abortion, stem cell research and religion. He reassured the audience, "I am pro-life." And he repeatedly mentioned his family, the lessons of his humble upbringing on a farm and what he calls moral values.

"The Mark Foley scandal just kind of shattered the attitude that in order to stand for faith and freedom and family that you had to be of one political party," he told the teachers. "My faith and family values are as strong as anyone's. They were taught and nurtured at home and in a school system, and earned in a foxhole. I think you elect people based on their own individual values, family values, moral values, not on their political party."

But, one woman pressed him nervously, wouldn't he have to vote with Ms. Pelosi?

"I don't think she has truly looked at the Democratic Party to see what the Democratic Party stands for," Mr. Weaver replied. He opened his arms wide to describe what he sees as the party's philosophy. "It incorporates all of the United States, all of Kentucky, all of the Second Congressional District," he said. "There's room for everybody there."

He told the crowd that he had already joined the Blue Dog Democrats, a group of about 40 conservatives in Congress, as well as the anti-abortion group Democrats for Life, with about 29 lawmakers.

"That's 69 of us who won't necessarily agree" with the liberal wing of the party, he said.

Mr. Lewis, a former Christian bookstore owner who has risen in Congress to become a member of the powerful Ways and Means Committee, was seen as a long shot when he won in 1994.

DOJ_NMG_0089983

But in 12 years, the state and the district have increasingly leaned Republican, even if many people retain their registration as Democrats. And Mr. Lewis doubts that Mr. Weaver will be able to persuade enough voters to elect a Democrat.

"Voters are concerned, no matter if it is a conservative Democrat, what the party will look like in D.C., with Nancy Pelosi in charge," he said. "They see the Democrat Party as being controlled by very strong liberal leadership, and that makes people here in the Second District very nervous, no matter who is their nominee."

Still, he acknowledges that this will be much tighter race than his last, when he won by about 30 points. To prepare, he raised more money than he ever has before.

Mr. Lewis said he expected to win by 15 points. Republicans declined to release polling data, but Democratic surveys have shown the two pulling about even.

Mr. Lewis put up an advertisement this month attacking Mr. Weaver as displaying "disgraceful conduct" as a member of the state's National Guard Retention Board in the early 1990's, when the board fired 24 officers. Many of the officers later said they had been fired for refusing to contribute to the Democratic governor.

Investigations cleared Mr. Weaver of any wrongdoing. Factcheck.org, a nonpartisan organization that assesses political advertising, concluded, "The only 'disgraceful conduct' we see here is the ad itself."

Mr. Weaver called it the move of a "desperate individual." But Scott Lasley, an assistant professor of political science at Western Kentucky University, said it signaled the threat to Mr. Lewis, and a sharp departure from previous races, when he could not recall Mr. Lewis even putting up a Web site.

Mr. Lewis has declined to appear at several debates with Mr. Weaver, or to appear with him at any forum that might look like a debate. Some debate organizers left an empty chair to signify his absence.

"When you're the incumbent and you have a good lead, a lot of people don't debate," Mr. Lewis said, "because you're letting your opponent have some exposure on your time."

But the move has cost him some voters.

"I think he is running scared," said Margaret Sims, who had organized the teachers' luncheon and said she was disappointed when Mr. Lewis's office declined several pleas for him to attend. "And he needs to. I think this is going to be the year of the Democrat."

Ms. Sims is a registered Democrat who has repeatedly supported Mr. Lewis, but says she will vote for Mr. Weaver. Peggy Horton, another retired teacher, was once a Democrat but is now a registered Republican.

"The Democrats left a lot of the values I put a lot of stock in," Ms. Horton said.

She is still undecided. But after asking Mr. Weaver questions about taxes and religion, she said this might be the year that she votes for a Democrat again.

Politics That Go Against The Grain (WP)

By Lynne Duke

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

DUBUQUE, Iowa -- On Main Street in this Mississippi River town, the bar at Mario's Italian Restaurant is a hothouse of politics these days, a place where folks such as Cheryl Walser Kramer, a Republican, and Frank Frost, a Democrat, hurl sharp-tongued barbs across party lines.

"She's probably packing heat," Frost, 71, jokes when Kramer says she's a member of the National Rifle Association.

Kramer teases back, "I'm gonna get a bumper sticker: 'I only shoot Democrats.' "

Debbie Gau, the bartender, glides through the friendly fire, filling Frost's glass with whiskey, Kramer's with beer, and letting them carry on the rhetorical war here in Iowa's 1st Congressional District. It is one of the super-close races that could decide whether the Republicans lose control of the House of Representatives -- and Gau, it turns out, could be part of the reason why.

Though she keeps quiet about her politics when her regulars are revved up, she's got some distinct views of her own.

Gau, 52, a Democrat, supported the war. She thought Iraq had attacked the United States, and she thought it right that the United States should hit back. But then the war dragged on. The death toll rose. She's got a brother working as a civilian contractor over there and worries about him every day.

DOJ_NMG_0089984

"I just don't think we should be over there," she says. "We should just leave."

The war looms large in this year's midterm elections, so the pollsters say, and sentiments such as Gau's are the reason why: the drift of support away from war, the struggle to find a rationale for continuing a war in which U.S. troop deaths mount and the chaos deepens.

In Iowa's 1st, which has sent only Republicans to the House since 1978, the open-seat race pits Democrat Bruce Braley against Republican Mike Whalen. But in several interviews on Main Streets around this district, it becomes clear that people are focused less on the candidates and far more on the big issues of the day: corruption, scandal and polarized politics; the cost of health care, the quality of education, the economy and the war above all.

People are cynical about politics, at least about the other party's politics, and so Democrats especially believe that things have gone off the rails in Washington.

Gau, for one, is not even sure she'll vote. She's disaffected from politics altogether.

"I just think politics is crooked," she says. "The rich pay to get what they want from the people in office. . . . It's like the Mafia, with laws. They get to run what they want, when they want. They don't mean nothing that they say."

* * *

Over in the tiny town of Anamosa, about 60 miles southwest of Dubuque, Sue Postel, 61, watches the comings and goings of Main Street from her perch at the cash register of the National Motorcycle Museum, which features bikes dating back to 1910. It's the main draw of an otherwise sleepy town.

Ask what's eating her these days about politics and Postel lets loose not about the war, but about her monthly health-care premium. It's risen from $25 a month to $394 a month in the five years since she retired.

She's a Bushie -- voted for him twice -- though she's a registered Democrat and also voted for Bill Clinton. A bona fide ticket-splitter, she is not sure which candidate will get her vote, though she definitely will vote, she says, because "that gives me my chance to bitch."

"This war is another thing," she says, shaking her head. "But there's nothing you can do about it. We're stuck, honey. How are we going to get our troops home?"

Her angst about the war is related to her distaste about politics and the direction of the country -- a solid mound of discontent with many component parts.

Politics, she says, "is dirty, it's nasty. I don't like to watch it. I switch [the TV] when ads come on. I can't take the slammin'."

Of late, the ad that's had blood boiling among Democrats in the district was one in which the Whalen campaign tried to suggest that Braley would defund the troops in Iraq. The ad depicted a soldier removing his armor, helmet and weapon and standing defenseless in a T-shirt.

* * *

Down in Maquoketa, 35 miles south of Dubuque, cigarette smoke clouds the air as Peter Carlson talks politics in the Main Street Cafe, as he does most Saturday mornings in this spot-on-a-map town.

His muscular arms on the table, Carlson leans in close, lowers his voice and says matter-of-factly, "I hate Bush with a passion."

Carlson, 27, wears a Harley jacket and heavy boots. His fingernails are dirty, for he's a man who works with his hands on a machine shop floor, who lives on 28 acres of timberland with his wife and toddling son.

Carlson can cite chapter and verse of what's wrong with American politics. The war; the corruption of influence and power; the creation of wedge issues to polarize people, "making issues out of non-issues," such as stem cell research.

"I have no belief that that's important whatsoever," Carlson says of the stem cell debate.

He's sick of it. Sick of accusations that folks who criticize the war are undermining the troops.

"I do support soldiers," he says. "They're employees. They do their jobs. But it's obvious that Iraq was not the place we should have gone into. . . . They had nothing to do with 9/11."

So he'll vote for Braley. But really, Carlson will be voting against Bush, against the Republicans.

"Now is kind of the time to put all your cards in," he says. "I'd like to see us win back the House."

* * *

DOJ_NMG_0089985

Sometimes it is something quite personal that sparks political activism. Something such as watching your father suffer with Parkinson's disease and then hearing a public figure mock the disease's symptoms.

And so it was, back in Dubuque, that Stratis Giannakouros was overheard at a Braley campaign office one night last week offering to volunteer.

Giannakouros, 27, says he was deeply offended when he heard Rush Limbaugh ridicule the actor Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease, for shaking so wildly in a campaign ad supporting federal funding for stem cell research. Seeing his father suffer in the same way, Giannakouros says, he was outraged at the mockery.

Though already a Democrat, he had not been active. Limbaugh was his spark. Giannakouros volunteered to canvass Democratic voters, "to make sure that this state doesn't go Republican," because he believes that Limbaugh wasn't just speaking for himself.

"He is the Republican mouthpiece," says Giannakouros. "He represents that party."

But it's more than Parkinson's. Something more, he says, is wrong. In politics, he hears the rhetoric of compassion, but he doesn't see it in policy, he says, citing cuts in education funding and the Mark Foley scandal.

He is reluctant to opine on the war, saying he doesn't feel he has enough facts.

"I'm against the misinformation" is all he'll say, adding that the misinformation comes from both sides in the political debate.

* * *

Back at Mario's, they're throwing down the spirits and talking terrorism and the war and politics.

"I think the president has his [eye] on the ball," says Kramer, the Republican, who works in health-care administration. "I think he totally understands that the people who came here on 9/11 plan to come back."

"There are evil people in the world," says James Darling, her companion, an optometrist and a Republican who describes himself as a libertarian.

He adds, "If you don't appear strong, you appear weak and people will take advantage of you."

Frost, the Democrat, agrees. Though he is against tax cuts for the rich and believes the country is better off with Democratic leadership, he offers, "I have a little more hawkish opinion than most Democrats."

In fact, he calls himself "a bit of a warmonger." Rather than pull troops out of Iraq, he'd like to see more troops sent in. He's a Korean War vet who sat on the demilitarized zone more than 50 years ago and is aghast that the United States still is dealing with the North Korean threat after all these years.

"If Truman had let MacArthur A-bomb Korea, we wouldn't be here," he says.

When it comes to enemies, his philosophy is: "We've got to stomp somebody's [butt]." He believes the Democrats know this, too -- that all the talk about pulling troops out of Iraq is just politics.

"I think the Democrats are trying to use it against [Bush] to get elected, but it don't mean nothing," says Frost, who will vote Democratic and who last voted Republican in 1968.

Frost describes himself as "very liberal."

"I don't think you're very liberal at all," Kramer interjects.

There is a quiet confidence about her, some might call it smugness. All this talk in the media about Republicans being in trouble? On the way out of power? Reaping what they've sown? She's not so sure.

"No vote's been cast, and they're already predicting the demise of the Republican Party," she scoffs.

She nods her head crisply, warning, "Republicans will turn out."

Republicans In Uphill Slog In Colorado (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, November 2, 2006

WHEAT RIDGE, COLO.

In an unmarked suite around the corner from Rick O'Donnell's campaign headquarters here in suburban Denver, the Republican National Committee has had its get-out-the vote "victory office" in operation since March. Volunteers man phone banks. The foyer showcases a wall of unflattering photos of Democrats in line to head key congressional committees should that party take back the House. A banner reads: "In case you need another reason to volunteer!"

DOJ_NMG_0089986

In a normal year, the fabled GOP operation might be enough to tip the balance in a congressional race that, until September, was billed as one of the nation's most competitive. But with an unpopular war, an unpopular president, and corruption scandals, the GOP has seen Mr. O'Donnell's Democratic opponent take a double-digit lead in the polls.

So last week, the national party confirmed that it had shifted resources from this race in Colorado's Seventh District to help shore up Republicans in two other districts once considered safe: incumbent Rep. Marilyn Musgrave in Colorado's Fourth and conservative Doug Lamborn in the Fifth, where Republicans have an advantage of up to 14 percentage points in voter registration. Cautiously optimistic, Democrats now aim to pick up in Colorado as many as three of the 15 seats they need to take back the House.

"Colorado is more Republican than the nation but tends to follow national politics closely," says Bob Loevy, a political scientist at Colorado College in Colorado Springs. "If the national Democratic tide continues to run right through Election Day, it will affect Colorado and should put both the Fourth and Fifth districts in play."

The shift of resources means more money for TV ad buys and a get-out-the-vote drive in a fast-breaking political environment.

"From the vantage point of today, it looks good for the Democrats, but the situation is very fluid," says pollster John Zogby.

Democrats, too, are shifting resources to take advantage of new opportunities. After a Denver Post poll showed Musgrave leading by 10 points last month, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) pulled some $630,000 it had reserved for her Democratic rival, Angie Paccione, although it still includes her in a program for its most competitive candidates. A political-issue group picked up the slack.

Both Republicans are getting high- profile help from the top. On Friday, Vice President Cheney flies into Colorado Springs to stump for state Senator Lamborn. On Saturday, President Bush will be in Greeley, Colo., with two-term Representative Musgrave as well as GOP gubernatorial candidate Bob Beauprez.

Best known nationally as the lead sponsor on the constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage in 2003, Musgrave faces strong competition from Democratic state Representative Paccione. A former professional basketball player and teacher, she says that Musgrave is out of the mainstream and too conservative for the district.

In a race driven by negative ads from both camps, Paccione got a recent boost from some $750,000 in issue ads by Coloradans for Life, a nonprofit political-issue group (known as a "527" because of its tax-code category). The group is funded largely by Fort Collins heiress and Democratic activist Pat Stryker. The Musgrave campaign calls the ads "malicious," and the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) has already spent some $1.7 million to counter them.

"The liberal 527s went after Marilyn in 2004, and they're doing it again. When you have outside groups spending literally millions of dollars trying to knock out a Republican member, then the committee has to step in to level the playing field," says NRCC spokesman Jonathan Collegio.

Democrats are bringing in their own heavy hitters like former President Clinton and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois.

It's time to "knock off bedroom slippers and put on marching shoes," the senator told a fist-pumping crowd in Aurora, Colo., last week. Not that Democrats need much firing up in the Seventh District.

Early on, this race in the inner Denver suburbs was considered wide open because the incumbent, Mr. Beauprez, opted to run for governor. Now, former state Sen. Ed Perlmutter (D) has built a strong lead in the polls. "Sometimes it's better to be lucky than to be smart, and we're at a time when people want a change," Mr. Perlmutter told the crowd in Aurora.

His GOP rival, O'Donnell, makes a similar point in an interview. "I picked a hell of a year to run as a Republican," says the former higher education commissioner.

While it's rarely clear how much big names like Obama or Mr. Bush actually contribute to turnout, it is a sign that unlike most midterm elections, this one is being slugged out on national themes.

"The fact that these national figures are going around the country shows that it's a nationalized race," says Rhodes Cook, a political analyst in Annandale, Va. "There are some 80 [congressional] races still on the radar screen, that's double or triple the number we had two and four years ago, and races had to be nationalized to produce that great an expansion of the field."

DOJ_NMG_0089987

O'Donnell says his biggest liability is the perception that he walks in lock step with Bush and the national Republican Party. "I made a strategic mistake: I flew back [to Denver] on Air Force One," he adds. That photo was Exhibit A for a flood of negative ads, "all of the president getting off the plane with me and waving." An ad sponsored by the DCCC uses that scene for an ad that ends with the line: "Rick O'Donnell: Radical ideas and another vote for George Bush's agenda." The DCCC has spent more than $1.3 million for Perlmutter in this race.

In fact, O'Donnell says there's a lot he doesn't like about Republican politics in Washington, such as big spending and all those pork projects added to bills in the dead of the night. A policy wonk who wrote his own platform, O'Donnell says that he also disagrees with the president on immigration and thinks the House GOP is "out to lunch" on healthcare. "It's not enough to beat up on trial lawyers or create new health savings accounts. That in itself doesn't tackle our problems," he says.

Mr. Collegio, the NRCC spokesman, says that the transfer of get-out-the-vote resources to other districts does not mean that the GOP has given up on the Seventh District. But analysts say that this fabled micro-targeting operation may be swamped by a national Democratic tide in this election. A recent Zogby poll gives the Democrat Perlmutter a 14-point lead. Another puts it at 6.

"In a year when you had a motivated base on each side and the race is one or two points either way, that [ground game] matters a lot. But that's not what the Colorado 7 race is about now," says Amy Walter, who handicaps House races for the Cook Political Report. "There's a less motivated Republican base, a more motivated Democratic base, and independents are increasingly negative [toward the GOP]," she adds.

Why Economy Is Key In Indiana Election (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, November 2, 2006

SOUTH BEND, IND.

Evelyn Salyer is the kind of voter Republicans desperately need to hang onto this fall.

In 2004, her vote helped push a Republican House member toward a narrow reelection win in this northern Indiana district. Now, with a new election just days away, she hasn't made up her mind.

The candidates are the same two men who ran last time. Their battle for blue-collar voters is lug-wrench tight. And Ms. Salyer cites economic concerns among the mix of issues that make her reluctant to commit her vote.

Although Iraq comes first, immigration and her own cost of living are close behind.

"We should be taking care of our people here" rather than spending abroad, says Salyer, who worked for years at a local bank and lives mostly on Social Security.

It's a refrain echoed by many voters in this region where bedrock jobs in heavy industry are being shaken anew by the current downsizing of US automakers.

"People who live in the Midwest are more negative about the economy" than voters in other regions are, says Scott Keeter, who directs voter surveys at the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press in Washington. Tight races in the region "could certainly be affected by this."

Nationwide, voters who are concerned about the economy are likely to vote Democratic in this election, says Mr. Keeter.

Their ranks are sizable. In a late-October Pew survey, 20 percent of registered voters said the economy is the most important issue in their vote for Congress, second only to the 27 percent who cited the situation in Iraq.

Indiana's Second Congressional District, anchored by the city of South Bend, exemplifies how economic concerns have emerged as significant in some races. It is among a relative handful of contests on which control of the House of Representatives could hinge. Democrats need a gain of 15 seats, out of 435 total, for control.

In the Second District, Democratic challenger Joe Donnelly is leading GOP Rep. Chris Chocola 48 percent to 45 percent, according to a poll from RT Strategies released last week.

"Bad and getting worse," is how Juli Tate, who works as an administrative assistant University of Notre Dame, describes the local economy. "We're losing jobs," she says. "Young people are dropping out of school."

As she walks near the campus's gold dome, she says she'll vote for Mr. Donnelly. Representative Chocola is "not doing anything for Indiana as far as I can see," she says.

DOJ_NMG_0089988

South Bend has more than its share of boarded-up storefronts, and the city's jobless rate is 5.1 percent, above the national rate of 4.6 percent. The city has been adapting to the loss of automotive jobs since the 1960s, when Studebaker closed an assembly line here.

But conditions aren't all bleak. Several medical centers, and Notre Dame just north of the city, have provided service sector jobs.

Indiana's automotive sector is doing better than Michigan's. The state has had success luring foreign manufacturers such as Honda. The AM General plant next door to South Bend, in Mishawaka, continues to crank out Humvees for the US military, even though $2-a-gallon gasoline has crimped demand for the civilian Hummer.

Still, this area feels the pressure of pocketbook issues. People complain about a spike in property taxes. And at a time of concern about global competition, they're angry that the state recently moved to lease a key toll road to a foreign consortium. Mr. Chocola had no direct say on either of those matters, but that doesn't mean he can escape voter frustration.

In the nearby city of Kokomo, at the southern edge of this district, auto-parts giant Delphi plans to shed hundreds of workers soon. To emerge from bankruptcy, the company says it will have to cut worker pay.

Such challenges make the economy a big issue for Dale Cooper, who retired from a union job at Bendix, a brake manufacturer, which was once one of South Bend's biggest employers.

"You have many people working, but they're making less money," he says. "It's almost a necessity for both [spouses] to work."

Similar worries are common in industrial centers throughout the Midwest. The economy isn't the only issue, or even the main issue but every bit of pessimism weighs against Republicans. "It's a sour mood that is driven in part by Iraq, that's driven in part by economic anxiety," says Robert Schmuhl, a political analyst at Notre Dame.

In Ohio, these concerns are helping Democrat Sherrod Brown in his challenge to Sen. Mike DeWine (R). In Michigan, Republican Dick DeVos has tried to use it in his bid to unseat Gov. Jennifer Granholm (D), but still trails in polls.

In this election, the economy provides fodder for both parties. The GOP record on tax cuts appeals to many here. "I'm a big anti-liberal.... I vote Chocola," says Travis Hessey, who runs his own plumbing business in town.

He says times are pretty tight. His gasoline bill has soared even as local customers can't afford to pay big fees. But to him, the best way to keep the economy going is to keep taxes low and for US workers to keep boosting their skills. "I don't look for ways that the government can help," he says.

Nationwide, many Republican candidates hope to reap some tailwind from a good job market, low taxes, and a recent dip in gasoline prices. But a housing slowdown and rising personal debt weigh against those positives.

"It's hard for voters to make sense of the economy," says Elizabeth Bennion, a political scientist at Indiana University's branch campus here.

Only 35 percent of Americans rate the current economy as "excellent" or "good," according to the Pew survey, and just 25 percent of Midwesterners feel that way.

Concentration Of Competitive Races Puts Ohio At Center Of Midterm Battle (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Oct. 31 — Mary Jo Kilroy is an awkward, stumbling speaker. John Cranley is a baby-faced 32-year-old whose campaign biography still highlights his election as student body president in college. Dr. Victoria Wulsin has never held elected office.

But, reflecting the political drift of this bellwether state a week before the midterm elections, all three of these Democrats are in competitive races to unseat once-safe Republican members of Congress. With polls showing Democrats running well ahead in Ohio races for senator and governor, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has recently begun spending money to help Dr. Wulsin unseat her opponent, Representative Jean Schmidt, adding Ms. Schmidt to its list of three other Republican targets in the state.

DOJ_NMG_0089989

Republicans, meanwhile, are scaling back their support for State Senator Joy Padgett in her fight against Zack Space, a Democrat who is the city attorney in Dover, for the Congressional seat being vacated by Representative Bob Ney, a Republican who pleaded guilty to corruption charges.

That puts four Republican seats in play. Strategists for both sides say Mr. Ney's seat is the Democrats' best chance while Ms. Schmidt is the least vulnerable of the four Republicans.

Ohio has been a central battleground of the midterm elections because of the unusual concentration of competitive races. The Senate seat, now held by Senator Mike DeWine, is one of a half-dozen or so that will determine control of the chamber. The 4 House seats are among about 40 that will decide control of that body. And winning the governorship of Ohio can give a party a big assist in carrying the state in a presidential election.

Discontent with the war in Iraq, the limping regional economy and a corruption scandal in the Republican-controlled statehouse tilted the table in favor of the Democrats from the start of the campaign. But in the final days before the election, Republicans are fighting hard to hold on.

"It's not over yet — it's too early to wrap things up!" Representative Deborah Pryce said in a telephone interview Monday on her way back from an event in Maryville.

Ms. Pryce, the fourth-ranking member of the House Republican leadership and a moderate on many social issues, is facing her first competitive contest in a decade against Ms. Kilroy, a local county commissioner. Ms. Pryce is closing the race by reminding voters, in television commercials and campaign appearances, of the federally financed projects she has helped bring to the area.

"We have to do something pro-active and not just bad-mouth and be negative," Ms. Pryce said in an interview Tuesday on a Columbus public radio station, WOSU. "My solid record of bringing jobs to this community is exactly what we need to do."

Still, Ms. Pryce's anxiety is showing. In a reversal of the customary ritual between incumbent and challenger, Ms. Pryce recently stood with a bullhorn outside Ms. Kilroy's office demanding that Ms. Kilroy participate in another debate. Ms. Kilroy has refused.

"She has come up with any excuse not to," Ms. Pryce said in the interview.

"Every time she says the president's name she says mine too," she added with frustration, saying she believed voters would see through the efforts to tie her to President Bush.

Ms. Kilroy, in turn, is criticizing Ms. Pryce for describing the current national economy as "storybook," arguing that she is out of touch with Ohio voters affected by the region's doldrums.

"Two hundred and twenty thousand jobs were lost in a six-year period here in Ohio," Ms. Kilroy said Tuesday, also in an interview with WOSU. Like Republican candidates a decade ago, she called for reducing the federal deficit by requiring offsets for any new spending or tax cuts.

In Cincinnati, Representative Steve Chabot is a staunch conservative first elected in the Republican landslide of 1994. Mr. Chabot's campaign is running commercials stating: "Some people want you to think that I've changed. I've lived in the same house for 21 years, with my wife of 33 years. I still cut our grass, and drive the same old '93 Buick. More important, I've never wavered in our fight to cut spending, stand up to the special interests and protect Social Security."

The advertisement is a response to a refrain of his opponent, Mr. Cranley, that "Washington changed Steve Chabot." Mr. Cranley, a city councilman, is running as a fiscal conservative, pledging not to accept a raise until the federal budget is balanced. Accusing Mr. Chabot of having abandoned his commitments to a balanced budget, Mr. Cranley recently won the endorsement of The Cincinnati Enquirer, which picked Republicans for most other races.

Mr. Cranley is also attacking Mr. Chabot over his support for the Iraq war, reminding voters that Mr. Chabot recommended making Saddam Hussein "a principal target" shortly after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11 and that he once praised Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's job performance as "exemplary." (Mr. Chabot says he, too, has some criticisms of the conduct of the war.)

In the governor's race, polls show that Representative Ted Strickland, the Democratic candidate, has a commanding lead over J. Kenneth Blackwell, the Republican who is Ohio's secretary of state. Representative Sherrod Brown, the Democrat who is running for Senate, is also ahead of the Republican incumbent, Mr. DeWine, and the National Republican Senatorial Committee has stopped spending to support Mr. DeWine.

DOJ_NMG_0089990

The Democrats received an additional boost this week when the actor Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease, campaigned with Mr. Brown to highlight Mr. DeWine's opposition to embryonic stem cell research. Mr. Fox became famous playing the conservative son of liberal parents in a television show set in Columbus, and his appearance dominated television news coverage around the state that day.

Reverse Swiftboating (WT)

By Brendan Conway

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

MORGANTOWN, W.Va. -- Can you call what backers of West Virginia Democratic Rep. Alan Mollohan are doing to Republican challenger Chris Wakim "swiftboating?" Here's the evidence. The media, the ethics-challenged Mr. Mollohan and his supporters are questioning whether Mr. Wakim can justifiably call himself a Persian Gulf War veteran when he never served in that military theater. This Swiftee-reminiscent move knocked a previously surging Mr. Wakim off message, at which time deep-pocketed Swiftboat-funder Bob Perry intervened, this time on behalf of the targeted.

At minimum, this is an echo of the scrutiny John Kerry's military service received in the last presidential election. Except now, Democrats are doing the scrutinizing. Merits aside, this should raise hope that Democrats now can agree that a candidate who claims military accomplishments on the stump should be challenged if the claims don't tell the whole story.

Whether you think a fact-check is warranted in this case depends on your definition of "Gulf War veteran." It all started earlier this year when Mr. Wakim -- a West Point graduate, 11-year Army officer and disabled vet -- characterized himself that way on the stump. His opponents pounced. Mr. Wakim, who sustained back, elbow and knee injuries while serving, spent the war on active duty at Ft. Devens, Mass., 35 miles outside Boston. This paralleled a controversy over whether Mr. Wakim had trumped up a Harvard master's degree by calling it a credential in "public policy" (It was actually in liberal arts).

It didn't take Mollohan backers long to start touting Swiftee-like local vets who accused Mr. Wakim of stretching his military resume. "He led soldiers to the bus, but never made it to the Gulf War," one anti-Wakim vet says in a particularly nasty commercial from a 527 group. (Last week the Wakim campaign filed a Federal Election Commission complaint against the group, West Virginia Values, alleging illegal coordination with Mr. Mollohan.)

No wonder Mr. Mollohan's supporters went negative: A strong-campaigning Mr. Wakim had been gaining quickly in a conservative-trending district and Mr. Mollohan's swirling ethics questions were threatening to make this year his last in the House. He is currently under investigation in connection with $202 million in earmarks to nonprofits he helped found which employ some of his campaign donors. Earlier this year he stepped down as ranking member of the House Ethics Committee.

The anti-Wakim line of attack literally boils down to which medals the Republican has -- and it infuriates him. "The crux of the issue is pretty simple," Mr. Wakim told me recently. "Alan Mollohan is trying to discredit the fact that I am a West Point graduate, that I am a Gulf War veteran, that I served in the infantry for over 11 years, that I am a disabled vet. He doesn't understand how the Army works...What happens in one end of the front is the same thing -- is all related to what happens on the other."

So, who's right? Technically speaking, the law is on Mr. Wakim's side. The U.S. Code defines a veteran of a given conflict as "any veteran who served in the active military, naval, or air service during a period of war." If you served, you helped the war effort, and according to 38 U.S.C. 101(12) you can call yourself a veteran of that conflict.

But perception is a different matter. The man on the street can be forgiven for thinking that a Gulf War vet -- just like a Vietnam vet in Vietnam -- would need to have spent time in Iraq or Kuwait or another Middle Eastern country to earn that designation. It's also true that the Veterans of Foreign Wars stipulates that members must hold one or more foreign-theater campaign medals or badges to join. That's more than enough ammunition for Mollohan backers.

Of course, the fact that the issue is even being discussed means that the Mollohan camp has used some variant of "swiftboating" to cut down a challenger. It was probably quite effective: Election handicappers have started calling the race a likely Democratic retention.

DOJ_NMG_0089991

This should quiet some of the more histrionic Democratic indignation over the questioning of Mr. Kerry's military service. Last month at Washington's Phoenix Park Hotel, for instance, I listened to a visibly angry Paul Bucha, board chairman of the liberal veterans' group VETPAC, vow: "Let no person think that they have been anointed in such a way as to question the validity of service and patriotism of anybody who has had the courage to don the uniform of this great country." The context was the effort to question Mr. Kerry's Purple Hearts.

This gets things precisely backward. If a candidate wants to use his military biography to seek high office, why shouldn't people be allowed to corroborate his self-portrayal for the voting public? In a democracy, elections are one of the few things more hallowed than Mr. Kerry's or anyone else's service. There are no free passes.

Brendan Conway is an editorial writer at the Washington Times and a 2006 Phillips Foundation journalism fellow.

GOP Closing Gaps In A Couple Of Key Races (USAT)

USA Today, November 2, 2006

In a campaign in which they have often been on the defensive, Republicans got some good news in a pair of state polls Wednesday and learned that an effort to register Hispanic voters in Democratic-leaning districts fell well short of its goal.

The news comes as President Bush and first lady Laura Bush continued to push hard to help Republicans keep control of Congress in Tuesday's elections.

“We'll win this election,” President Bush said in a radio interview Wednesday.

Democrats have assailed Republicans for weeks for not doing enough to curb violence in Iraq or to investigate charges of improper contact between Republican Rep. Mark Foley and congressional pages.

House Democratic Whip Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland said Republican missteps will make his party a winner Tuesday.

“Democrats believe that we must take our nation in a new direction. And we believe that it is long past time that the United States Congress conduct meaningful, bipartisan oversight of the Bush administration rather than serve as a rubber stamp for it.”

Bush's upbeat tone in an interview with conservative radio talk show host Rush Limbaugh coincided with polls showing gains for the GOP in Tennessee and Maryland.

In Tennessee, an Opinion Research Corp. survey found Republican Senate candidate Bob Corker, a former Chattanooga mayor, leading Democratic Rep. Harold Ford, 52%-44%. The margin of error was +/-4 percentage points. Earlier polls had found the race closer.

Tennessee is one of several states where Democrats hope to win seats in order to take the Senate from GOP control.

In Maryland, a poll by The (Baltimore) Sun found a virtual tie in the governor's race. Democrat Martin O'Malley, the mayor of Baltimore, leads Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich 47%-46%. A Washington Post poll published three days earlier showed Ehrlich trailing by 10 percentage points.

Meanwhile, a drive to register Hispanic voters, who tend to vote Democratic, has fallen short of expectations. The campaign to register 1 million foreign-born voters signed up 146,000 people, said Germonique Jones of the Center for Community Change. The registration drive followed large protests by Latinos this summer angered by proposed House legislation to stem illegal immigration.

“People were waving signs, ‘Today we march, tomorrow we vote,' but that may not be something that's literally tomorrow,” said Lionel Sosa, a Republican political strategist who heads Mexicans & Americans Thinking Together, a Web-based group.

As first lady Laura Bush campaigned in Kentucky and Ohio for Republicans, President Bush voiced optimism about the elections in an interview with Limbaugh. Limbaugh asked about the consequences if Democrats win House or Senate majorities.

“I really don't think about the idea of having a Democrat-led House and Senate because I don't think it's going to happen,” Bush said.

“I believe if our candidates continue to talk about the strong economy, based upon low taxes, and an administration and a Congress that was willing to give professionals the tools necessary to protect (citizens from terrorism), we'll win this election,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0089992

When asked about Democratic critics of the Iraq war, Bush said: “My answer to them is listen to Osama bin Laden who says, ‘Our objective is to defeat America,' which will embolden the terrorists, which will then enable (al-Qaeda) to have safe haven, just like they had in Afghanistan. And we're not going to let them do it.”

Parochial Issues Come To The Fore In Tennessee Senate Race (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, November 2, 2006

NASHVILLE, Tenn. - The Iraq war and racism form the raw bookends of the tight U.S. Senate race in Tennessee, which could be historically significant and could make or break the Democrats' campaign to take over the upper chamber of Congress.

Iraq is the dominant issue, voters told a recent McClatchy-MSNBC poll. And the Democratic candidate, Rep. Harold Ford Jr., 36, would be the first black U.S. senator from the South since Reconstruction. He says U.S. policy in Iraq isn't working and endorses splitting the nation into three semi-autonomous regions - for Sunni Muslim Arabs, Shiite Muslims and Sunni Kurds - with a weak central government.

Republican Bob Corker, 54, is a white businessman and former Chattanooga, Tenn., mayor. He favors staying the course in Iraq until the mission is complete.

Ford couldn't have gotten so close without a public backlash against the war and President Bush, political analysts here say. But if Corker wins, several voters said, they'll blame latent, if not overt, racism for Ford's defeat.

Still, it's not that simple. If the voting next Tuesday is as close as polls suggest, parochial issues below the headline topics of war and race could spell the difference. The candidates' personal weaknesses, their parties' records on gay rights, health care and taxes, and the changing makeup of voters in the state could tip the outcome.

Many voters said this week in interviews in and around Nashville that they were turned off by Ford's large and politically influential Memphis family, which has been dogged for years by corruption investigations. An uncle who was a state senator is awaiting trial on bribery charges even now.

"I just don't think the acorn falls far from the tree," said Mike Shackleford, 47, a businessman who voted early for Corker. Ford "may be a fine person, but I don't know enough about him."

Ford's more charismatic than Corker, but the congressman, who's single, has a reputation as a Casanova and somewhat of a policy lightweight. Flanked by screen actress Ashley Judd and Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., at a "Women for Ford" event this week, he meandered through several policy questions and frequently deferred to Landrieu.

When Judd championed monogamy, saying, "It's useless, by the way, if only one partner is being faithful," Ford perked up. "Let me write that down," he quipped. Asked about his faith, he said he renewed his commitment to prayer after his uncle's indictment.

Both candidates tout their Christianity and applaud traditional family values.

The Republican Party has had a big statewide advantage in Tennessee since the 1990s, when white conservative Democrats switched parties. Retiring Sen. Bill Frist won his last election, in 2000, with 65 percent of the vote. And a proposed gay-marriage ban for the state on this year's ballot could help Corker by boosting Republican turnout.

If Ford wins, factors beyond Iraq that could help him include voters' desire for more affordable health care, on which Democrats are regarded as more sympathetic. Charlie Miller, 69, a retired salesman, said he prefers Corker on other issues, but that "it'll be close . . . everybody needs insurance."

Ford can appeal to moderates by citing his 2002 race against liberal Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., to become House Democratic leader, his support for school prayer and his devotion to his faith. He's never positioned himself as a liberal.

His candidacy is likely to prompt high turnout among blacks, who compose 16 percent of the state's population. A McClatchy-MSNBC poll earlier this month showed that blacks split for Ford by 86-4 percent, but that whites tilt to Corker by 53-36 percent. Women split about evenly between Ford and Corker, while men tilted toward the Republican by a 5-point margin.

Although analysts here suggest that it may not be happening fast enough to help Ford, Tennessee's favorable business climate is gradually changing the population by bringing in voters from traditionally more liberal states. Nissan moved its California headquarters to a suburb south of Nashville last summer, for example.

DOJ_NMG_0089993

Kristi Weiner, 40, a consultant whose husband works for Nissan, can't vote because she's still registered in Los Angeles. If she could, she said, "I'd probably vote for Ford."

Voters also debate the effect of a television ad that was paid for by the Republican National Committee and pulled down after cries of race-baiting. In it, a bare-shouldered white woman flirts, "Harold, call me."

Some black voters, such as Wanda Graham, 53, a retired Army lieutenant colonel and local Democratic activist, worry that the ad could hurt Ford by recalling traditional Southern cultural taboos against interracial sexuality. But some younger white voters who want to distance themselves from stereotypes said it could hurt Corker.

Rachel Deering, 28, said she and her husband usually voted Republican, but that this time - because of the ad - they planned to stay home in protest.

Clinton Campaigns For Ford In Memphis (USAT)

USA Today, November 2, 2006

Former president Bill Clinton told a Memphis church congregation Wednesday that if Democratic Rep. Harold Ford wins next week's Senate election, it will represent a "victory of going beyond race." Clinton spoke in Ford's hometown at the predominantly black Temple of Deliverance Church of God in Christ. "You know what it will mean if Harold gets elected on Tuesday," Clinton said at the 4,500-seat church. "It won't mean that it's a victory of race; it will be a victory of going beyond race."

Ford, 36, hopes to become the first black senator elected from the South since Reconstruction. Ford, a five-term congressman, and Republican Bob Corker, a former Chattanooga mayor, are vying to replace Sen. Bill Frist, who is retiring.

McCaskill: Bush's Mo. visit won't help Talent

Democratic Senate challenger Claire McCaskill dismissed President Bush's visit to Missouri on Friday in support of GOP Sen. Jim Talent as an example of Talent's too-close ties to Washington. Bush and Talent will appear at stops in Springfield and Joplin.

Bush's appearance will mark his first public campaign event with Talent this year, although the president has helped raise money for Talent. Bush spokesman Tony Snow headlined a Talent fundraiser Monday, and Talent campaigned Tuesday with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist. "The last week of Sen. Talent's campaign is about Washington, D.C.," McCaskill said. "The last week of my campaign is about Missouri."

Talent spokesman Rich Chrismer said, "We're doing what successful campaigns do in the final week, which is energize our supporters and get out the vote."

Strayhorn: Gov. Perry's ad is sexist

Independent gubernatorial candidate Carole Keeton Strayhorn claimed Wednesday that Republican Texas Gov. Rick Perry's radio ad is sexist because it suggests a woman is incapable of holding the office. "The implication is certainly … that a woman is not tough enough to be governor," Strayhorn, the state comptroller, told about 40 supporters in Waco. The ad, which began airing Tuesday, calls Strayhorn "Mrs. Corrupt Comptroller Politician Woman," much like another Perry ad calls Democrat Chris Bell "Mr. Way Too Liberal For Texas Guy." Strayhorn said the ad is "sad. I thought that was gone decades ago, and here he is talking 'politician woman.' " Perry campaign spokesman Ted Royer said he found it curious that Strayhorn was complaining about the word "woman" and not "corrupt."

Settlement reached on Ohio voter-ID law

Lawyers for the state and groups that opposed Ohio's voter identification rules reached a settlement that suspends the law for absentee voters and clarifies and expands it for voting in person. The plaintiffs had argued that county elections boards were disenfranchising voters by inconsistently applying the law.

The settlement stopped short of declaring any aspect of the law unconstitutional, preventing further court wrangling from disrupting the election, said Mark Anthony, spokesman for the state attorney general. The settlement allows voters without ID to use Social Security numbers, and it expands the definition of government documents that can be used as ID to include those from local and county governments, state universities and public community colleges.

Coulter may face charge of voter fraud

DOJ_NMG_0089994

Conservative columnist Ann Coulter has refused to cooperate in an investigation into whether she voted in the wrong Florida precinct and may be prosecuted for voter fraud, Palm Beach County Elections Supervisor Arthur Anderson said. He said that his office has been looking into the matter since the Feb. 7 Palm Beach Town Council election and that he would turn over the case to the state attorney's office by Friday.

Knowingly voting in the wrong precinct is a felony. Anderson, a Democrat, said a letter was sent to Coulter on March 27 requesting that she clarify her address for the voting records "or face the possibility of her voter registration being rescinded." She and her lawyer have yet to respond to several inquiries, he said.

Beating Around The Bush (WSJ)

By Brendan Miniter

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

CLINTON, Mo. -- If Democrat Claire McCaskill wins her Senate race in Missouri next week, her victory won't rest, for the most part, on any policy proposal or characteristic particular to her -- precisely as she intended from the start of her campaign. Nor has she made the focus of the race Jim Talent, the incumbent Republican she is trying to unseat. Instead, she's running against George W. Bush.

Ms. McCaskill's strategy, like that of Democrats across the country, has been to "nationalize" the election by making it a referendum on the president. She spends a considerable amount of time blurring the boundaries between the unpopular Republican in the White House and a Republican-controlled Senate. Along the way she's even displayed a little wit: "Talent votes with President Bush more often than I agree with my husband," she quipped at a recent campaign rally in this small town, four hours west of St. Louis.

She's run a credible, competitive campaign, and is now deadlocked in a virtual tie -- all polling differences within the margin of error -- for a post that has changed party hands twice in the past six years. Give her credit, at least, for rallying the flagging morale of the state party and raising the hopes of Democrats nationwide. Depending on what happens in Ohio, Montana, Rhode Island, Tennessee and Virginia next week, she may hand her party the sixth seat it needs to take control of the Senate.

Sen. Talent, for his part, has not been caught up in scandal or made gaffes. He has been attentive to home-state voters. He has championed laws on apple-pie issues such as curbing the use of methamphetamines and supporting research into sickle-cell anemia, a disease that afflicts African-Americans acutely. He promotes breast cancer awareness by having St. Louis's 630-foot-tall Gateway Arch lit pink one night each year.

By taking care of smallish issues, and not screwing up, Mr. Talent has ensured that the race will focus on larger, more controversial topics. Thus the Missouri race is a relatively pure expression of the Democratic attempt to make the election a referendum on the Bush administration. And it may illustrate the flaws in the strategy of putting few substantive ideas on the table and instead counting on discontent with the Republican Party. Voters clearly aren't happy with the status quo, but neither do they seem convinced that the alternative is any better.

Here, Mr. Talent enjoys the advantage of clarity. On national security, he wants to isolate North Korea and preserve a "credible" deterrent to Iran's nuclear ambitions, which in his view includes the possibility of air strikes. Asked if he wants to "stay the course" in Iraq, the senator responded emphatically. "I don't want to stay anything," he told me on a recent blustery afternoon in St. Louis. "I want to win. And Missourians want to win."

Ms. McCaskill's positions are more carefully hedged. Currently the state auditor, she's a former prosecutor who promises to be tough on terrorists and voices unequivocal support for building missile defenses. "Absolutely," she told us before noting the weapon system her party has spent more than two decades deriding as a waste of money "will work." Yesterday, she called on Sen. John Kerry to apologize for disparaging those who serve in the military.

When it comes to elaboration, however, the positions she takes don't so much straddle the political divide on national security as occupy both sides of it. On Iraq, she doesn't support a timetable for withdrawal, but told us that the Bush administration should "privately" tell the Iraqi government the U.S. will pull out, eventually. On North Korea, she opposes rewarding Kim Jong Il with bilateral talks, but blasts the president for a general "aversion" to direct talks. On terrorist surveillance, she supports wiretapping international calls of suspected terrorists, just not the way President Bush has gone about it. And so on.

DOJ_NMG_0089995

Keeping the focus off Ms. McCaskill, Missouri Democrats have also taken a page out of the conservative playbook to depend on two hot-button issues on the ballot increasing liberal turnout. The first would create a $6.50 state minimum wage, more than a dollar higher than the federal mandate. The second is a contentious amendment to the state constitution regarding embryonic stem-cell research, drafted as a rebuke of the president's federal funding policy. Ms. McCaskill supports the amendment, has run ads on it, and welcomed actor Michael J. Fox to the state to campaign for its passage.

The irony, though, is the amendment may also increase turnout for the Republicans. Sen. Talent, social conservatives and other opponents fear the 2,000-word document will legalize human cloning at taxpayer expense. To ensure that that doesn't happen, Marjorie Dannensfelser, head of the Susan B. Anthony List, a national right-to-life organization, has identified some 200,000 "casual voters" in the state and says she's working double time to convince as many of them as possible to vote.

Mr. Talent won his seat in 2002 in a special election by a razor-thin margin of just 21,000 votes, so just a fraction of Ms. Dannensfelser's list could tip the scales in his favor. Ms. McCaskill is likewise dependent on turnout. In the governor's race two years ago, she lost 90 out of 97 counties to now-Gov. Matt Blunt, but the outcome was quite close, 51% to 48%.

The partisan divide in Missouri, then, is close to even. The state has a nearly unblemished electoral history -- stretching back to Teddy Roosevelt -- of siding with winning presidential candidates, breaking in the last two elections for President Bush. The unknown aspect here is intellectual. Ms. McCaskill doesn't want this election to be about her ideas. But next week's outcome will depend on whether those who head to the polls will see her as running on almost the same campaign platform on which the Democrats lost in 2002 and 2004. Will voters make this election in part about Ms. McCaskill?

Virginia's Tight Senate Campaign Turns On Personal Attacks (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, November 2, 2006

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. - In its final week, the U.S. Senate campaign in Virginia came down to this:

A liberal blogger tried to ask Republican Sen. George Allen about the most urgent issue he could think of - whether Allen had spit on his first wife. Then Allen's aides put the man in a chokehold and threw him on the floor.

That episode Tuesday, captured on video by a local news crew, summed up how one of the races that could determine which party controls the Senate has degenerated into bitter name-calling and personal attacks instead of a debate over the issues that matter most to voters.

It started very differently, as a clash over the Iraq war between Allen and Democrat James Webb, a former secretary of the Navy under Ronald Reagan. Allen supports the war; Webb's vehement opposition prompted him to switch parties from Republican to Democratic and to challenge Allen.

The campaign changed when Allen unleashed a firestorm over the summer by calling a dark-skinned Webb volunteer a "macaca," which Democrats labeled a racial slur. Allen soon was inundated with stories accusing him of using racial slurs as a college student.

He was losing support fast when he pleaded to change the subject.

"Virginians expect to hear us address the real issues you care about," the Virginia Republican said in a primetime TV appearance in early October. "Over the past several weeks, that hasn't been the case. Some of this I brought on myself. But the negative personal attacks and baseless allegations have also pulled us away from what you expect and deserve."

Yet Allen responded by launching counterattacks on Webb for including sex scenes in his best-selling war novels, attacks that have continued into the final week of the campaign. National Republicans also launched ads ripping Webb for criticizing women in the military 25 years ago and calling a 1991 investigation of Navy pilots for abusing women a "witch hunt."

On a recent campaign swing through Portsmouth, Va., Allen insisted that all the dirt has come from Webb and that his attacks on sex scenes in Webb's novels are the kind of serious issue he wanted the campaign to address.

DOJ_NMG_0089996

"My opponent does say he's proud of being an author and a novelist. Those passages, people have found demeaning to women," Allen said during a stop at the Virginia Sports Hall of Fame, standing beside a display case featuring the short shorts and sequined halter top of a Washington Redskins cheerleader. Allen's father coached the Redskins in the 1970s.

Allen also brushed aside demands from Democrats that he explain why his name is listed without any detail in a 1974 Virginia court docket. Aides have said he was cited for unpaid parking tickets and for fishing without a license. National Democrats suggest that his name could be listed for anything ranging from parking tickets to assault, but they offer no evidence of any crime.

Webb, too, insisted that he's refused to participate in the name-calling and character attacks.

"We haven't done that. . . I have declined to go after George Allen when he was in trouble," he told supporters at a University of Virginia rally.

"I don't think you'll find an attack ad with my name on it," he said afterward. "I've been talking about the issues every day."

In his rally, Webb did talk at length about the Iraq war, praising the soldiers fighting there and criticizing Allen for not asking hard questions before supporting the war.

But it was Webb's campaign that set off the "macaca" brouhaha by releasing the video of Allen and the Webb aide. And it's been liberals and national Democrats talking about Allen's divorce or his court record from 32 years ago.

Voters said they didn't like the nasty campaign and wished it would return to more substantive issues. But many saw that through partisan lenses: The attacks on their candidate are nasty and trivial; the attacks on the other side are deserved.

"All the negative ads turn me off," said Bev Graeber, a Republican who singled out anti-Republican ads from the liberal group Moveon.org as particularly offensive. "They make me sad. I wish it was back on the issues."

Barbara Barton, a Democrat, said the criticisms of Allen were justified. "The macaca stuff really irritated me," she said. "Allen picked on the only dark face in a crowd of white faces. That IS substantive."

Polls show the Allen-Webb race is a toss-up. Voters decide Tuesday.

For more on the campaigns, go to www.georgeallen.com and www.webbforsenate.com

Allen Suggests Webb Behind Heckler Incident (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

Sen. George Allen yesterday suggested that his Democratic opponent, James H. Webb Jr., has a connection to a heckler who accosted him Tuesday, while Mr. Webb said the incident exemplifies what is wrong with politics.

Mr. Allen referenced the incident during which liberal blogger Mike Stark confronted him in Charlottesville, prompting the Republican's supporters to tackle him.

"What the people of Virginia deserve in the last few days of the campaign is my opponent to say to these allies and people associated with him that this is not appropriate," Mr. Allen said during a campaign stop at a business park in Fairfax.

The Webb campaign says it has no link to Mr. Stark.

Mr. Webb, who was campaigning in Richmond yesterday, said the incident shows that the two parties are at each other's throats because of the "emotional" election.

"It's one of the frustrations in dealing with the political process right now -- we've become so antagonistic," Mr. Webb said as he began a discussion with Virginia Commonwealth University (VCU) students in Richmond.

"For the good of the country, I don't think we should be engaging in that sort of conduct," he said. "We can have healthy debate and we can talk about differences without having to have the kind of confrontation that happened [Tuesday]. We don't need that."

Mr. Webb did not specify whether he was talking about Mr. Stark's behavior or the assault. Mr. Stark, a University of Virginia student, said Tuesday that he planned to file charges, although no charges were filed as of yesterday.

Mr. Stark told Washington Post Radio yesterday that he was "baiting" Mr. Allen, who has been known to lose his cool on the campaign trail.

DOJ_NMG_0089997

In August, Mr. Allen singled out a Webb volunteer taping his campaign event in Southwest Virginia, calling the Indian-American man "macaca," a term considered derogatory in some cultures.

Since then, Mr. Allen has faced accusations that he used the "N-word" in the 1970s. He also has struggled through questions about his Jewish heritage.

Mr. Webb has said he could have used such incidents against Mr. Allen, but chose not to because they are "not relevant to what I'm trying to do."

Mr. Allen, standing beside Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, said the election on Tuesday should be focused on issues that affect voters "rather than encouraging this sort of disruptive, provocative behavior."

"This is typical of what my opponent has done, and his allies, trying to provoke incidents," Mr. Allen said. "I wish he would try to rein that in."

Both men have said the other is engaging in "vicious" personal attacks, while polls show that voters are irritated by negative campaigning.

Mr. Webb, who spent the day with Richmond Mayor L. Douglas Wilder, told VCU students that he "never really wanted to run for public office," but was forced to act out of frustration over the handling of the war in Iraq and Hurricane Katrina, among other issues.

"Looking at all those things, I just said, 'Well, I either have to shoot my TV or try to do something about this,' " he said.

In Northern Virginia, Mr. Allen discussed taxes. "I think we should give the death penalty to the death tax," he said.

On Tuesday, Mr. Stark loudly asked Mr. Allen whether he ever spit on his first wife, alluding to a rumor that has been floating on liberal blogs.

Mr. Allen, who was campaigning with Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, who is serving as chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee, ignored Mr. Stark as an Allen campaign volunteer blocked him.

"You're going to need to leave now. Get out the door," the Allen volunteer said as another man held Mr. Stark in a headlock.

Other Allen supporters tackled Mr. Stark, saying: "Now you're getting personal."

Mrs. Dole called the incident disturbing and asked Mr. Webb to apologize. "An ally of James Webb's campaign shouted diatribes in a sleazy attempt to create a political incident," she said.

When told about Mrs. Dole's request yesterday, Mr. Webb said: "I don't even know what happened [Tuesday]. I certainly regret the conduct of certain people there."

Meanwhile, most jurisdictions in Virginia are reporting slight to sizable increases in the number of requests for absentee ballots. Most officials attribute the increase to an aggressive campaign to encourage voters to use such ballots.

James Alcorn, a policy adviser with the state elections board, said yesterday that 101,852 requests for absentee ballots had been made as of last week, slightly higher than normal during congressional election years. The number of requests is comparable to that of 1994, he said.

Some local elections officials attribute the increase to the Senate race and the constitutional marriage amendment proposal.

Steele Gains Key Support Beneath The Surface In PG (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

Prince George's County Democrats say they expect Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, a Republican running for the U.S. Senate, to receive a surprising number of votes in the majority black, heavily Democratic county.

"A lot of people don't want to disclose who they're voting for," said state Sen. Leo E. Green, who is retiring in January. "A lot of my African-American friends are voting for Steele. I know that, but quietly, not publicly."

Mount Rainier Mayor Malinda Miles, a lifelong Democrat, said that many of her friends "are really supporting Steele, and it doesn't matter that they're Democrats."

"I'm not talking about what's in the newspapers. I'm talking about where people are at," Miss Miles said. "I think Prince George's is probably going to go Steele."

DOJ_NMG_0089998

Anngelique Carroll, 27, a legal secretary from Upper Marlboro, said she and many of her friends are voting for Mr. Steele.

"He's for small business. He is for minorities," said Ms. Carroll, a black Democrat. "Throughout his political career with Governor [Robert L.] Ehrlich, his progress has been good."

Throughout the campaign season, most polls have shown Mr. Steele, the first black to win a statewide office in Maryland, trailing Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, the Democratic nominee. But SurveyUSA and other recent polls have pegged the Senate contest a dead heat.

Prince George's County, which has the state's largest concentration of Democratic voters, has become a battleground.

Race has become a key issue. Black Democrats, especially in Prince George's, have complained that party leaders have been neglecting them for years.

On Monday, former Prince George's County Executive Wayne K. Curry, five fellow black Democrats on the County Council and several other black Democratic leaders endorsed Mr. Steele and criticized their party.

"I think it's a close race," said County Council member David Harrington, one of those who endorsed Mr. Steele. "Turnout is key. If it's low turnout, then he's not going to do well."

The election outcome is uncertain, especially in Prince George's, because of blacks' longtime loyalty to the Democratic Party.

"It's so close. So many people, among African-Americans, there's things they like about Steele, but there's some things where he agreed with President Bush," said J. Aaron Warren, 38, a county police officer and co-founder of Minority Building Industry Association Inc. in Upper Marlboro.

"But with Ben Cardin, the only really negative thing I hear is that people didn't really know him because he's from Baltimore," Officer Warren said.

Damiean Williams, 31, a technician, travel agent and real estate agent in Prince George's, said he has heard too many negative things about Mr. Steele to vote for him.

"If I do vote, it would probably be for Cardin. ... I've heard [Mr. Steele is] a 'yes man,' " Mr. Williams said. "A lot of his ads look phony."

Cherelle Gray, 38, of Fort Washington, who works as a manager at Linens-n-Things, is undecided.

"I'm not getting [Mr. Steele's] explanations for anything. He hasn't convinced me yet. But I'm open," Mrs. Gray said.

Winning Prince George's is essential for Mr. Cardin. He has scheduled a press conference for today with Rep. Albert R. Wynn and County Executive Jack B. Johnson, black Democrats who are supporting his campaign.

Maryland has about 900,000 registered Republicans and 1.7 million registered Democrats, of which an estimated 700,000 are black. Blacks represent more than 65 percent of the population in Prince George's, which has more than 320,000 registered Democrats.

Although Mr. Cardin won the statewide primary, he was trounced in Prince George's by Kweisi Mfume, former president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Mr. Mfume received 74,637 votes to Mr. Cardin's 19,824 in the county.

The tight Steele-Cardin contest is no surprise to Delegate Marvin E. Holmes Jr., Prince George's Democrat.

On primary day in September, Mr. Holmes said that "if Ben Cardin wins [the primary], Steele wins [the general election]."

A black Democrat in the state Senate, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said more recently: "It would have been probably better for the Democratic Party to come around Mfume. They would have had a better chance ... if they were serious about the black vote."

Arizona, Maryland Senate Races Targeted (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, November 2, 2006

The national parties sought to shake up Senate races in two states Wednesday, with Democrats pumping about $1 million into Arizona and Republicans spending about the same in Maryland.

DOJ_NMG_0089999

Less than a week before the election, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee is spending money to help defeat Republican Sen. Jon Kyl, once considered a favorite to win re-election in Arizona, officials from both parties said.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee put its money on Maryland's Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele to win the Senate seat held by retiring Democrat Paul Sarbanes, the longest-serving senator in the history of the state.

Until this week, the parties had narrowed their primary battlegrounds, with both spending millions on ads in New Jersey, Tennessee, Missouri and Virginia. The DSCC already was spending money in Maryland, as well as Montana and Rhode Island. The NRSC this week also bought more than $880,000 in ads in Michigan in an effort to defeat incumbent Democrat Debbie Stabenow.

The moves and countermoves by the two party organizations reflect the fluid nature of the closing days of the midterm election campaign. Both parties have money to spend, but it was unclear Wednesday whether the commitments in Arizona and Maryland were based on perceived opportunities or a desire to force the opposition to spend money where it hadn't planned.

Kyl, a 12-year veteran of the Senate, is being challenged by millionaire Jim Pederson, a former state Democratic chairman who had spent millions of his own money on the campaign. The state has long leaned Republican, but in this election Democratic challengers are in close contests in three of the state's eight congressional districts.

"This contribution is a small return on the millions Pederson has contributed to the Democrat party," Kyl spokesman Andy Chasin said. "We're surprised they didn't pay him back earlier. Now they're doing it at a point when it won't do much good."

In Maryland, most polls show Steele behind Democratic Rep. Ben Cardin. But Steele, who is black, has been winning the support of some Democratic African-American elected officials in the state.

Meanwhile, in Tennessee, Republican Bob Corker gave his campaign $2 million of his own money for the final week of the race. It was the second time the millionaire and former construction company executive has put $2 million toward his election effort.

The loan would trigger the so-called "millionaire's amendment," and campaign finance law provision that allows his opponent, Democratic Rep. Harold Ford Jr., to raise more money from individual donors.

Ohio Voters Unmoved By Incumbent's Bipartisan Reputation (FT)

By Edward Luce In Toledo, Ohio

Financial Times, November 2, 2006

Mike DeWine, a Republican senator for Ohio, may be an unfortunate victim of what some pundits predict will be a "tsunami" against his party in the US mid-term congressional elections next Tuesday. Whether or not that wave of votes materialises at the national level for the Democrats (many Republicans remain confident their "get-out-the-vote" machine can reproduce past magic), Mr DeWine's prospects still look bleak.

A moderate Republican, Mr DeWine's breed of politics does not fit the bitterly partisan narrative of America's 2006 election campaign. But in Toledo, a small industrial town that borders the auto-state of Michigan, few voters are paying much attention to Mr DeWine's plea for the politics of the centre-ground.

Once a thriving hub of America's industrial mid-west, Toledo is now a symbol of the country's expanding rustbelt. "Every year my revenues fall by about 25 per cent," says Rida Hazimah, the Lebanon-born proprietor of Dennis Market, a blue collar café that serves beer and steak. "If you listen to the customers at lunch time all they talk about is job losses. I am not sure how much longer I can keep this place open. Maybe another year or two."

Opinion polls give Sherrod Brown, Mr DeWine's Democratic challenger, a lead of between 10 and 12 percentage points. Last month the Republican National Committee, which raised almost $200m (€157m, £105m) for the final weeks of the campaign, withdrew funds from Mr DeWine's race in order to target resources on closer senatorial races in Tennessee, Virginia and New -Jersey.

But Mr DeWine can still tap the loyalty of the few wealthy Republicans who live in Toledo as well as their more numerous counterparts in more conservative parts of the state. He can also draw on the star attraction of John McCain, his fellow Republican senator, whose probable presidential bid for 2008 would almost certainly be built on his own reputation for bipartisanship.

DOJ_NMG_0090000

"I am here because Mr DeWine is a friend and also somebody for whom I have the greatest respect," said Mr McCain, having flown in on a private jet to Toledo's small airport. "It is no secret that the Republican party is facing a very tough election because of our record on spending [which has risen sharply] and on ethics [several Republican lawmakers are either on trial for corruption or facing investigation]. At times like this we should appreciate the value and public service of people like Mike DeWine."

Mr McCain's words clearly had an impact on the small group of donors that had gathered at the home of a wealthy Republican in Toledo. Altogether they donated enough for Mr DeWine to air another bout of state-wide television advertisements contrasting his bipartisan reputation with what he bills as the "far left" record of Mr Brown.

But even if Mr DeWine could afford to blitz all the channels in the few remaining days of campaigning, the state of Ohio seems almost certain to go Democrat by embracing Mr Brown as well as Ted Strickland, the Democratic candidate for governor. With an unemployment rate of 7 per cent - way above the national average of 4.6 per cent - and the certainty of more lay-offs in the pipeline, Ohio's voters are disaffected.

Even Republicans wonder what the future holds. "What Ohio needs is some kind of jump start to get the economy going again," said Stephen Taylor, general manager of the Kia showroom in Toledo's outskirts, whose business is booming partly because the South Korean vehicles are so much cheaper than their US counterparts. "Although I am a Republican, I can tell this isn't a very good year for my party."

Meanwhile, Mr McCain, whose senate seat is not up for contest in this election, is unlikely to be damaged by a poor Republican performance. Unlike George W. Bush, whose low approval ratings have largely meant he has had to stay away from the hustings during the campaign, Mr McCain's ability to appeal to middle ground might be in greater demand if one or both houses of Congress turn Democrat next week.

"If you look at the problems America faces - for example our system of Social Security, which is going bust - these problems can only be fixed if both parties work together," said Mr McCain. "It is that kind of co-operation that most Americans are looking for."

Clawing For Votes, Chafee Steers Race Toward Gutter (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

CRANSTON, R.I. -- Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R-R.I.) always sounds so polite and sincere, even when he's wrapping his hands around his opponent's throat.

"Eight years as a top law enforcement official in Rhode Island and not a single successful conviction of a public official," Chafee said during a debate Monday night with his Democratic challenger, Sheldon Whitehouse. "He's always looking after the power brokers and his own political career."

The attack left the former state attorney general seething. Chafee is "just making this stuff up entirely out of whole cloth," Whitehouse shot back. A similar onslaught knocked Stephen Laffey off course in the final weeks before the GOP primary, forcing the Cranston mayor to deny that he had taunted firefighters and doctored his rÃ©sumÃ©. Robert A. Weygand got a dose of nice-guy negativism in 2000, when Chafee accused the Democratic former congressman of "embroidering the truth" about the age of his dog.

What happened to the affable fellow who drives a hybrid and studied classics at Brown University? Well, his political career is on the line, and the gutter seems the best hope for salvation. Chafee has slogged through two tough campaigns this year, against a conservative primary opponent and now in the general election against Whitehouse. He survived the first round. Next week, polls suggest, he may not be so lucky.

Whitehouse led Chafee in every poll published in October. Many political observers say that despite the vaunted Chafee name, the national climate has become too hostile for a Republican to survive in one of the most Democratic states. President Bush's approval rating here is 22 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0090001

"He's very much the underdog and has been forced into an attack strategy," said Darrell West, a Brown political science professor and pollster. "I can't imagine he's happy about it, but he has to do it. He's being bogged down by Bush's high negatives, and unless he can raise the negatives of his opponent, then he loses."

The candidates agree on just about every major issue: expanded federal support for embryonic stem cell research, gun control, legalizing marijuana use for medical purposes. Both are well-born, with deep roots in this tiny state. Their children attend the same school. Their fathers were roommates at Yale. Without the trash talk, this race would be a snoozer, a battle of the bores.

Whitehouse's message is a simple one: Chafee may be the Senate's most moderate Republican, but he's still a Republican. "To change Washington, we have to change the Senate," reads the tagline of one Whitehouse ad. In another, an image of Chafee fades into a grainy photo of Bush, Vice President Cheney and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). "Think about it," the announcer warns.

For a while this summer, it wasn't clear whether Chafee would survive the primary, and he needed extensive help from national Republicans. After seven years of bucking his party on major issues, Chafee drew close to the GOP at exactly the wrong time. Whitehouse, who faced a nominal primary challenge, was waiting in the wings, saving his money and savoring the political reverberations of Chafee's survival strategy.

Chafee was appointed to the Senate in 1999 upon the death of his father, the immensely popular senator John H. Chafee, and is known as a cautious and stubbornly independent lawmaker. Despite his pedigree, he is low-key. Barry O'Brien, a wastewater operator, has worked for every Chafee campaign since 1990, when Chafee lost his first run for Warwick mayor, and speaks of the senator as a family member. "He got elected because he was a good guy, an honest guy," O'Brien said. "That means something in Rhode Island."

Although Chafee rarely seeks out the spotlight, he doesn't mince words when it finds him. In 2004, he confessed that he had written in the name of George H.W. Bush as a protest vote against the former president's son. But when asked during the debate Monday whether he was proud of the current president, Chafee declined to say. "I'm opposed to much of his agenda," he responded carefully.

"All the time people tell me, 'Linc, I really like you, but I want to send Bush a message,' " Chafee says in his most recent ad. Seated in front of a model sailboat, he reminds viewers that he was the only Senate Republican to vote against the Iraq war. "I've always stood for principle," Chafee asserts, "even if it meant standing alone."

But to win, Chafee must woo Democrats and left-leaning independents away from Whitehouse. And if he has to bring the former attorney general down a notch, so be it.

Chafee's accusations against Whitehouse revolve around the Democrat's tenure as a crime fighter, a sensitive post in a state with a history of widespread institutional corruption. In one ad, Chafee accuses Whitehouse of failing to investigate corruption allegations at a Providence medical center because of possible ties to Democratic power brokers. Two hospital executives were later convicted in the case. "When corruption in Providence was out of control, Sheldon Whitehouse did nothing," the announcer rumbles. "He put his ambition over duty."

The attacks have infuriated Whitehouse, a 20-year public servant in Rhode Island who has been attorney general and a U.S. attorney. He noted in the debate that the Chafee family has been in Rhode Island public life for 30 years and "has never been involved in conduct like this." Whitehouse described Chafee's tactics as "straight out of the Karl Rove playbook. Pretty soon a candidate like me is playing follow the falsehood."

"I always look at my opponent's record," Chafee responded mildly. "When I see shortcomings, I bring them to the voters' attention."

Republican Is A Political Force, Despite Party Baggage (WP)

By Michael Grunwald

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

WINTER PARK, Fla. -- At a recent fundraiser in this ritzy Orlando suburb, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D) was handicapping governor's races with the air of a gambler who liked his odds: "No matter where you go, there's good news for Democrats."

DOJ_NMG_0090002

Colorado, Maryland, Massachusetts, New York and Ohio all looked like pickups, with strong Democratic threats in Minnesota and even Arkansas.

And then there was Florida, where Vilsack had traveled to help Rep. Jim Davis, the Democratic nominee to succeed term-limited Gov. Jeb Bush (R). In a supposedly Democratic year, in a supposedly bellwether state, polls showed Davis 15 points behind his GOP opponent, Charlie Crist, the state attorney general.

"Well, Florida will get competitive," Vilsack said.

It has, but Crist is still the front-runner, with an 11-point lead in two statewide polls and single-digit leads in the others. Along with California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, he is hoping to show Republicans across the country how to survive a Democratic wave.

Crist is an exuberant retail politician who puts the "glad" into glad-handing, a Reagan-style optimist with a made-for-TV tan, a made-for-TV shock of white hair and a made-for-radio baritone. He is a genial moderate who is nevertheless known as "Chain Gang Charlie" for his hard line on crime. He is a close ally of the governor, who is far more popular in Florida than President Bush, but he has shown an independent streak by supporting stem cell research and same-sex civil unions and by refusing to intervene in the Terri Schiavo case.

He is also a relentless fundraiser who has outdistanced Davis by more than $12 million, which seemed to discourage many of the Democrats at developer Jim Pugh's Winter Park estate. "Charlie's raising an ungodly amount of money, and he's a terrific campaigner," Pugh said. "It's going to be tough to overcome all that."

Crist has cut into the Democratic base by focusing on civil rights and the environment, choosing a trial lawyer as his running mate, and saturating the airwaves before Davis could respond.

Now that Davis is airing a few ads, some independents seem to be tilting his way. In recent weeks, Crist has changed his positions on property insurance, testing in schools and voting rights for felons, moving left every time, but his Republican label still seems to be a drag. Even though Republicans enjoy comfortable majorities in both houses of the state legislature, GOP leaders are nervous about losing three congressional seats here, including the one vacated by Mark Foley, and incumbent Bill Nelson (D) is dominating Rep. Katherine Harris (R) in the Senate race.

And Davis is happy to have a D after his name this year. "The Republican Party is a money machine in this state -- fueled by the insurance industry and the special interests -- but there's an awful lot of discontent out there," he said.

Ever since the 2000 recount, Florida has been known as the ultimate swing state, but it is really a unique mix of voting blocs, with a slightly Republican trend that swept President Bush to victory in 2004. North Florida is like a small Southern state, with fast-growing Republican exurbs. The southwest part of the state is booming with GOP-leaning snowbirds from Midwestern Kiwanis clubs. Southeast Florida is still jammed with Democratic-leaning retirees from Northeastern states, but many of its residents are dying or moving to the Carolinas to escape the crowds.

The Republican tilt also has a lot to do with the governor, who is almost universally admired for his leadership during hurricanes and is widely respected as a principled conservative -- even by many Floridians who have disagreed with his strong stands on testing schoolchildren, revamping Medicaid and having the government intervene in the Schiavo case. Crist has highlighted his alliance with him, while the Davis campaign has mostly attacked the president and spotlighted issues on which the governor has disagreed with Crist.

"I don't think Jeb's popularity rubs off on Charlie," said Van Church, a political coordinator for the Service Employees International Union. "He's just a politician."

To watch Crist on the campaign trail is to see that he is not just a politician; he's a natural politician. On a recent visit to a printing company in a Miami suburb, Crist bounded out of his car with the joy of a child who had just arrived at Disney World. He hugged his host, Manuel Fernandez, as if he were a long-lost brother: "It's so wonderful to see you!" The two men had never met.

Fernandez then told Crist his story: He arrived from Cuba in 1961 and started working at the company as a $2-an-hour janitor in 1965, when it had only six employees. Now he is the owner, and the firm has 50 employees, including his three children.

DOJ_NMG_0090003

"That's America!" Crist shouted with delight. He told Fernandez about his grandfather, Adam Christodoulos, a Greek immigrant who shined shoes when he arrived in the United States and eventually opened his own shoeshine parlor: "It's the same story: the power of the American dream!"

Crist then introduced himself to Fernandez's 90-year-old mother: "Mamacita! You can't possibly be 90 years old!" Next, he kissed Fernandez's 7-month-old grandson: "You're Florida's future!" He praised the rest of the Fernandez clan with a playful slap at Davis, who missed a lot of congressional votes during the campaign: "Such a wonderful work ethic. You know, my opponent doesn't always show up to work."

"I thrive on this," Crist said in an interview. "I love people. And I love Florida. It's got such great weather, such tremendous diversity. Wonderful fishing. What's not to like?"

Florida has a history of boosterism -- not just shady speculators selling swampland, but visionary leaders seeking tourism, immigration and development. Crist fits into that tradition; when it comes to Florida real estate, for example, he sees nothing but smooth sailing ahead. "I'm telling you, it's not just going to be a boom -- it's going to be a sonic boom!" he said.

The Davis campaign has tried to portray Crist as a lightweight who floats with the political winds. But the charges seem not to have stuck. Crist may be swimming against a Democratic tide, but even his opponents think he is a powerful swimmer.

"I think Charlie's fabulous, just a great guy," said Jimmy Goff, a Democratic businessman at the Davis fundraiser. "I think this race will turn around, but it won't be easy."

On Election Night, Networks Plan To Proceed With Caution (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

"Mathematically," CBS Senior Vice President Linda Mason says of the election coverage, "you could know by 10 for the House and 11 for the Senate." But, she says, "it could go on until all hours of the early morning."

"We have learned from past mistakes," says NBC anchor Brian Williams. "I start from the assumption I will wake up with a sore back on my couch" after an all-nighter.

"There's likely to be a lot of hedging," says ABC's George Stephanopoulos. "You may know it, but you can't say it."

If the Democrats capture the House, television anchors won't be able to project that until they are sure the party has locked in a 15-seat gain. Fortunately for them, 35 of the 53 closest races, as handicapped by analyst Charlie Cook, are in states where polls close by 8 p.m. Eastern time.

In the Senate, with fewer seats in play, the math is simpler. If one or two of the most vulnerable Republicans -- in Virginia, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Tennessee and Missouri -- win decisively, the networks will know fairly early that the Democrats won't be able to reach their magic number of six needed to take control. But even if the Democrats sweep those races -- and hold New Jersey, which is in doubt -- the networks still won't be able to forecast a Democratic takeover until enough votes are counted in Montana, where polls close at 10 p.m. Eastern. The Democrats would have to unseat Montana's embattled GOP senator, Conrad Burns, to gain control.

The biggest behind-the-scenes change in network coverage involves what has been dubbed the Quarantine Room. Determined to avoid a rerun of recent years, when its exit polls leaked out by early afternoon to the Drudge Report, Slate and other Web sites, a media consortium is allowing two people from each of the networks and the Associated Press entree to a windowless room in New York. All cellphones, laptops and BlackBerrys will be confiscated. The designated staffers will pore over the exit polls but will not be allowed to communicate with their offices until 5 p.m.

The consortium, called the National Election Pool, is conducting no surveys for House races. The exit polling will take place for Senate and gubernatorial contests in 32 states with competitive races.

The recent track record with such polling has been pockmarked with failure. There was, of course, the debacle of election night 2000, when the networks used polling data from Florida to prematurely award the presidency, twice, within hours. In 2002, the network consortium's predecessor, Voter News Service, suffered a computer meltdown and pulled the plug on its exit polls. Two years ago, its sample was so skewed that the group's surveys showed Sen. John Kerry beating President Bush well into the night.

DOJ_NMG_0090004

Williams is acutely aware of that history. "I called Florida for Al Gore, too," he says, recalling his anchoring role on MSNBC. "It was a horrible moment." Now, he says, "we have all kinds of fail-safes built into the system."

All the networks are using what are called "precinct models" -- taking into account such factors as a district's voting history and level of absentee ballots -- in gauging whether it is safe to make projections based on partial vote counts.

Much of the action will be on cable news. The broadcast networks are limiting themselves to hour-long specials at 10 p.m. (plus ABC's "Nightline" at 11:30 p.m.), along with news cut-ins and updated specials (mainly for West Coast audiences) at 1 a.m. "It's going to be a long night," says Marty Ryan, executive producer at Fox News, which is doing some exit polling to supplement the network pool surveys. "House races are notoriously difficult to call. How do you call 50 House races? The fact of the matter is, you don't. You have to wait until a lot of returns are in."

"Frankly," says Sam Feist, CNN's political director, "we're not in any rush to call individual House races. Our mantra is simple: It's better to be right than to be first. We're going to be extremely cautious."

As always, the networks will be looking for early bellwethers. Three Republican House members are considered in jeopardy in Indiana, where polls close at 7 p.m. If one or more go down, that will affect the tone of the coverage.

If the dominoes aren't falling the Republicans' way, there may be broad hints about how it's "shaping up to be a big Democratic night" well before any network makes an official projection.

But if the races are tight, network analysts say, the outcome in the House might not be known until Thursday -- or days after that if recounts are involved. Another complicating factor would be delayed counting in Oregon and Washington state, which rely almost entirely on mail ballots.

A big political wave can wash away much of the drama. During the Republican sweep of 1994, the networks began talking of a GOP takeover of the House as early as 8:45 but made no official predictions until hours later.

With the level of public interest -- and the volume of television coverage -- much greater than in a typical midterm election, the networks are turning to some of their veterans. At CBS, former anchor Bob Schieffer will join Katie Couric, who will be headlining election night for the first time. At NBC, longtime anchor Tom Brokaw will join Williams on the set.

"This won't have the moment of a presidential night," says Williams. "But it's a little more than Olympic trials."

Howard Kurtz hosts CNN's weekly media program, "Reliable Sources."

Elections Rake In Big Bucks For Media Outlets (USAT)

By David Lieberman

USA Today, November 2, 2006

NEW YORK — There's a bonanza for media companies in this year's unusually large array of hotly contested election campaigns: Candidates and activists will end up spending a record $3.1 billion getting their messages out, according to research firm PQ Media.

The total is 14.5% higher than 2004, even though that year included more than $1 billion for the presidential race.

“The presidential election was very focused in 17 battleground states, and there weren't that many contentious House and Senate races,” says PQ Media Vice President Leo Kivijarv.

But this year political spending is up in 90% of the USA's 210 media markets. Those seeing the biggest percentage increases are Cedar Rapids, Davenport, Ottumwa and Sioux City — Iowa communities with contentious House races — and Lansing, Mich.

About half of the total dollars go to broadcast TV, followed by direct mail, which accounts for 23%.

The most noticeable change is in gubernatorial races, where spending will exceed $1 billion for the first time. With 36 contests, many considered close, campaigns are on pace to spend $1.1 billion — up 757% vs. 2004, when there were just 11 races.

House candidates will spend $744 million, up 38%, while Senate contenders are spending $705 million, up 40%.

The Senate race in New Jersey, where Democrat Robert Menendez faces Republican Thomas Kean Jr., may end up being the most costly. To reach all of the state's voters, the candidates must buy airtime on TV stations in New York City as well as Philadelphia.

DOJ_NMG_0090005

Yet the media seeing the biggest sales jumps from 2004 are radio stations, newspapers and billboards — all of which target local voters. That local focus kept Web services from growing as much as they did 2002 to 2004.

"You don't have local search, and online isn't known as a local medium," Kivijarv says. He notes, though, that some of the dollars attributed to newspapers may be for ads on their websites.

There's also less targeting this year of specific groups, such as Hispanics. Only two states, Arizona and Colorado, have ballot initiatives about immigration.

PQ Media says the focus on local races should help companies such as CBS, Fox, MediaNews and Clear Channel.

The 2006 dollar record may not last long. "Somebody's got to replace President Bush in 2008, and if the Democrats take both houses of Congress, then the Republicans will put a lot of money in" to retake key seats, Kivijarv says. "It will probably break $3 billion again."

Stem-cell Issue Gains Momentum In Homestretch (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

The debate over embryonic stem-cell research surged onto the scene in several political races in the final weeks before the election, spurred in part by actor Michael J. Fox's ads on behalf of some Democratic candidates.

But Democrats say they've been chipping away at the issue for more than a year, betting it will make a difference with voters in middle America.

"Stem-cell research has been an issue that we have focused a lot of attention on -- ads, e-mails, mail, Web ads -- for a good 18 months. We have always believed this would be an important issue, particularly in suburban districts," said Sarah Feinberg, a spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

"Democrats see this as their 'marriage' issue, their wedge," said Tom McClusky, vice president for governmental affairs at the Family Research Council. The fight is on "to prove them wrong," he said.

In July, President Bush issued his first veto to block a bill, approved overwhelmingly by both chambers, that would have overturned his limits on federal support for embryonic stem-cell research. Democratic candidates subsequently have accused Republican opponents of standing in the way of life-saving cures from such research.

Mr. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease, recorded ads for Democratic Senate candidates Claire McCaskill in Missouri and Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin in Maryland, as well as Wisconsin Gov. James E. Doyle, who is running for re-election. The ads caused more ruckus when conservative talk-show host Rush Limbaugh said Mr. Fox had stopped taking medication to worsen his symptoms for the camera's benefit. Mr. Limbaugh has since apologized.

Republican candidates nationwide have said that their position is being distorted and that they support research that uses adult stem cells but does not require the destruction of embryos.

"The false impression that's trying to be made is that Republicans don't support stem-cell research or are looking to somehow outlaw it. It's simply not the case," said Dan Ronayne of the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

In a recent "Meet the Press" debate, Maryland Republican Senate candidate Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele said Mr. Cardin's ad makes it seem that Mr. Steele doesn't support stem-cell research. "I do," he said. "Where I have drawn the line is federal funding for research that destroys an embryo."

Mr. Steele, like other Republicans, fought back with his own ad on the issue.

The issue likely will have the biggest effect in Missouri, which will vote on a ballot initiative to create a state constitutional right to engage in embryonic stem-cell research. Democrats also have raised the issue in House races in Illinois, Florida, Ohio, Colorado and Pennsylvania. It has emerged in the Maryland governor's race and New Jersey Senate race.

Democrat Patrick Murphy in Pennsylvania has accused Republican Rep. Michael G. Fitzpatrick of flip-flopping by backing Mr. Bush "in opposition to this life-saving research." Mr. Fitzpatrick's chief of staff said he has mailed explanations that he has strongly supported research on adult stem cells and cord blood.

Similar attacks have come from House Democratic candidates in Iowa and Illinois.

DOJ_NMG_0090006

Maryland's Republican governor, Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., is running an ad saying that he has made the state a national leader in stem-cell research, though the ad did not specify which kind.

Republican pollster Whit Ayres said this "can be a very effective issue" for Democrats. A Republican operative said it "hasn't moved numbers" as Democrats had hoped.

But Sean Tipton, president of the Coalition for the Advancement of Medical Research, said it's clear that Republicans who side with Mr. Bush know they're in trouble because most Americans favor the bill he vetoed. "They know it's a political loser" to support Mr. Bush's policy, he said of Republicans. "I see no one running ads saying, 'I stood with Bush.' "

In a Newsweek poll last week by Princeton Survey Research Associates, 50 percent said they favor using tax dollars to fund research using stem cells obtained from human embryos and 37 percent said they oppose it. At the same time, the issue ranked low among voters' priorities, trailing matters such as Iraq, the economy, health care and terrorism.

Local Issues Mirror National Ones, But The Special Effects Occasionally Stand Alone (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

The election season is getting punchier in places far from the national political spotlight — even in Eden, N.C., where 16 candidates are slugging it out for the five available seats on the Rockingham County School Board.

One of them produced a television advertisement suggesting that the school system turned children into automatons. It is shot against a backdrop of a Pink Floyd video showing children coursing through an assembly line to the lyrics: “We don’t need no education. We don’t need no thought control.”

Another candidate shows himself brandishing a light saber as a “Star Wars” Death Star blows up a little red schoolhouse. The message: the federal government, a “cosmic bully,” meddles too much in education.

The advertisement of a third contender, riffing on a “new sheriff in town” theme, shows a sheriff being killed in “The Terror of Tiny Town,” the 1938 all-dwarf musical Western.

Not every local race is quite as entertaining, but the Rockingham County election shows how national issues like education, the economy, crime and ethics have been localized.

And the effort invested in contests for school board, city council, sheriff and state legislatures is emblematic of how much stock voters, interest groups and political parties are placing on local elections.

“I sort of argue it’s the hidden election,” Tim Storey, an election analyst with the National Conference of State Legislatures, said of the local races. “It’s very localized, but in a strange way it’s more important. It’s how good your school is, how good your road is, how good the hospitals are.”

Some of the races, especially those for state legislatures, have attracted the national political parties. Partisan interest groups have also paid for advertisements in some races.

In Colorado, for example, immigration issues have been highlighted in advertisements in the State Senate contest in Jefferson County between Betty Boyd, the Democratic incumbent, and Matt Knoedler, a Republican state representative, and in the State House race between the incumbent, James L. Riesberg, a Democrat, and his challenger, David T. Owen, a Republican state senator.

“Special interests have discovered that if you want to get something done, you’re going to have to work with legislatures and governors, because you’re not going to get anything done in Congress,” Mr. Storey said. “They are doing television, doing very targeted walk-the-precinct strategies. State legislative groups are able to raise more money than ever before.”

Some issues mirror national ones writ smaller. Take ethics. Several races have local parallels with national scandals. In San Jose, Calif., the mayor’s race is being run against the background of the indictment of the current mayor, Ron Gonzales, on corruption charges.

Mr. Gonzales is not seeking re-election, but the two candidates running to succeed him have cast aspersions about ethics against each other.

DOJ_NMG_0090007

In Alaska, an F.B.I. investigation into ties between lawmakers and a major oil field services company could influence several legislative races. Only one of the six legislators whose offices were searched by federal investigators is running for re-election, but some polls suggest that the investigation has created a wave of n anti-incumbent sentiment.

In North Carolina, Speaker Jim Black, a Democrat, is seeking re-election amid a federal and state investigation of people connected with his office. Mr. Black has not been charged, but three people have been convicted, including Mr. Black's first appointee to the state lottery commission, his former political director, and a former state representative who said he took $50,000 from a Democrat to support Mr. Black.

The investigation is being used as political fodder, not only by Mr. Black's Republican opponent, Hal Jordan, but also by Republicans in other statehouse races who are trying to link their opponents to Mr. Black or to paint Democrats as ethically questionable.

In other elections, crime has taken local permutations. The mayor's race in Little Rock, Ark., is a four-way contest over ways to deal with a surge in violent crime and the overflowing Pulaski County Jail.

In South Carolina, Sheriff Steve McCaskill of Kershaw County, a Republican, has been criticized by his opponent, Sammie Tucker Jr., a Democrat and former highway patrolman, for not issuing an Amber Alert in the case of a 14-year-old girl who was kidnapped and held in an underground bunker for 10 days. Sheriff McCaskill has said the girl's case did not meet Amber Alert criteria because law enforcement officials did not have a suspect, a description of a car, or even a clear idea that the girl had been abducted.

In the Massachusetts governor's race, the Republican candidate, Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, has made an issue of the fact that her Democratic opponent, Deval Patrick, had advocated the release of Benjamin LaGuer, who Mr. Patrick believed had been wrongly convicted of rape. Mr. Patrick withdrew his support of Mr. LaGuer when a DNA test linked Mr. LaGuer to the crime.

Ms. Healey has repeatedly raised the rape issue, producing an advertisement showing a woman walking in a dark parking garage and Mr. Patrick in a television interview describing Mr. LaGuer as "eloquent" and "thoughtful."

The advertisement says: "If anyone you knew actually praised a convicted rapist, what would you think?" and concludes, "Deval Patrick. He should be ashamed, not governor."

Polls, however, suggest that the advertisement has not drawn voters to Ms. Healey, and Mr. Patrick is considered comfortably ahead.

Not every state or local election is turning on a larger national issue. In Pennsylvania, voters are angry over a raise approved last year by state legislators. It was retracted, and 17 lawmakers were defeated in the May primary. But the issue could still reverberate.

Indiana has two issues found nowhere else. One is the decision to lease the Indiana Toll Road to a private Spanish-Australian group, and the other is daylight saving time, which the state imposed last year on Indiana's patchwork of time zones.

Both issues have resulted in anger at Gov. Mitch Daniels, a Republican, and the Republican-controlled legislature.

Although some Indianans welcome the money from the lease, others are rankled that a state highway is being controlled by foreign investors.

And as Indianans turned their clocks back one hour on Sunday for the first time in 30 years, many business owners are grateful to be in step with other parts of the country, but some are angered by a new pattern of confusion.

A public employees union paid George Schricker $150 to write a song about the controversy:

I'm losing track of time.
Yes, I'm losing track of time.
I'm living in two time zones.
I think I've lost my mind.
I'm late for my appointments,
like a clock that's full of grime.
I come from Indiana, where we're losing track of time.

Voting For Judicial Independence (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0090008

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

Nearly obscured by the struggle for control of Congress, there is another important battle in a handful of states over measures aimed at punishing judges for their official rulings and making them more captive to prevailing political winds. These measures all hide behind the superficially appealing but profoundly misleading banner of judicial accountability. And, taken together, they add up to an assault on a fair and independent judiciary.

In Colorado, voters will decide the fate of a far-reaching state constitutional amendment designed to kick a huge percentage of top sitting judges off the bench by setting a term limit of 10 years and applying the cap retroactively. A measure on the ballot in Oregon would create new geographic districts from which appellate judges could run, as a backdoor way to oust judges from the Portland area.

In Montana, conservative groups tried to force voters to confront Constitutional Initiative 98, an attempt to "rein in" judges by establishing new recall elections and making it easier to remove judges for specific rulings. Fortunately, the state's high court ruled this misbegotten initiative invalid because of what it called "pervasive fraud" by out-of-state paid gatherers of signatures.

But the wackiest and potentially most far-reaching of the judge-bashing schemes is still on the ballot, South Dakota's Jail 4 Judges initiative. The brainchild of Ronald Branson, an antigovernment activist from California operating at the political fringe, this reckless exercise seeks to keep judges in line by amending the state Constitution to eliminate judicial immunity from lawsuits by disgruntled plaintiffs and others. Immunity is a time-honored way of preserving an independent judiciary.

This radical measure would create a special grand jury with a rotating membership and loose rules — in effect, a fourth branch of government. This new entity would be vested with the power to punish judges for their decisions, or, for that matter, school board members or any other local public official who had the bad luck to fit under the amendment's broad definition of judicial power. Writing in The Wall Street Journal, the former Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor correctly blasted the initiative as a bald attempt at judicial intimidation.

By rejecting Jail 4 Judges, South Dakota voters can send a message of support for a strong and independent judicial system — without which democracy cannot function — that will resound nationwide.

Life, Liberty And Property Rights (USAT)

By Mary Zeiss Stange

USA Today, November 2, 2006

"They paved paradise, and put up a parking lot."

The refrain of Joni Mitchell's old hit might as well be the theme song of a steam-rolling property rights movement in the West. Initiatives have made their way onto this November's ballot in six Western states — Arizona, California, Idaho, Montana, Nevada and Washington — that would sharply limit the concept of eminent domain and bar government seizure of private property without just compensation. Until recently, these initiatives have drawn little attention, but planners and policymakers around the country are beginning to take note of them, and for good reason.

On the face of things, this "anti-takings" movement makes sense. Supporters cite last year's U.S. Supreme Court ruling in Kelo v. New London (Conn.), in which by a 5-4 vote the court upheld the seizure of a handful of private homes standing in the way of a large development project on the grounds that it would serve the larger "public purpose" of creating jobs and generating tax revenue.

In a vigorous dissent, then-justice Sandra Day O'Connor objected that "nothing is to prevent the State from replacing any Motel 6 with a Ritz-Carlton, any home with a shopping mall, or any farm with a factory." This argument strikes a chord with voters, especially when coupled with images of Susette Kelo displaced from the only home she had ever known. Surveys suggest that as many as 90% of Americans disapprove of the seizures allowed by the Kelo ruling. Polls also point toward substantial public support for the anti-takings initiatives.

With such strong public sentiment in favor of these measures, what is not to like about them?

Actually, a lot. The property-rights movement is just the latest incarnation of the "wise-use" movement of the 1990s — except without the pretense of being wise. On their face, these initiatives are about preventing government from the "physical takings" allowed by the Kelo ruling. Hence their innocuously worded titles: "Protect Our Homes," "The Home Owners Protection Effort," the "People's Initiative to Stop the Taking of Our Land," and so on. But they actually amount to "Kelo-plus."

DOJ_NMG_0090009

Their goal is to block "regulatory takings," says Leonard Gilroy, a senior policy analyst at the public policy research group Reason Foundation, based in Los Angeles.

Translation: These initiatives would gut local and state abilities to enact or enforce virtually any regulations affecting private land use and development.

And more: They would require government to compensate property owners for the worth, in the form of lost property value and/or lost potential income, of any restrictions imposed upon them. The cost to municipalities of enforcing commercial and residential zoning regulations, environmental quality laws, and so on would be devastating. The Washington State Green Party rightly calls that state's anti-takings initiative a "Trojan horse" in terms both of its environmental and economic consequences.

Like the original Trojan horse, this one comes from outside. Despite a concerted effort to portray the property rights movement as a grassroots phenomenon, all six initiatives made it onto the ballot thanks to large infusions of out-of-state cash — lots of it from one man, New York real estate developer Howard Rich.

Rich's two advocacy groups, the Fund for Democracy and Americans for Limited Government, alone have funneled about $4 million into the petition process of getting these initiatives onto state ballots. Much of the money has gone to professional signature-gatherers, most of whom travel from state to state pushing innocuously worded petitions and are paid by the signature. Prices range from $1 a pop in California to $3 for every name collected in Arizona.

The High Country News, a non-profit news magazine covering issues in the West, quoted one such signature-gatherer, Eric Dondero: "This is a statewide petition to protect our property rights. To keep that new eminent domain law from coming to Montana and taking our homes away." Spoken by an itinerant professional petition-pusher from Texas, this hardly amounts to prairie populism. On the contrary, it represents a calculated effort to deceive voters about the likely consequences of property rights initiatives.

In Montana, the strategy might not have worked. In September, a Montana District Court judge invalidated the petitions gathered in support of Interstate 154, on the grounds that there was clear evidence of fraud in the way signatures were obtained. The state supreme court has upheld the ruling.

Voters in the other five states, however, will in a few days confront an issue of devastating simplicity. Vote "No" and you are, supposedly, giving up your rights to life, liberty and property. Vote "Yes" and the backyard in which the next "in-fill" housing development or Wal-Mart breaks ground could well be your own.

Mary Zeiss Stange teaches at Skidmore College and ranches in Montana. She is a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

Loose Change Lawmakers Tap PAC Money To Pay Wide Array Of Bills Funds For Candidates At Risk Also Cover Hotels, Meals And Gifts For Big Donors $5,000 For A Texas Funeral By BRODY MULLINS (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

Harry Reid, the Senate's top Democrat, makes frequent trips to his home state of Nevada. Over the past four years, his bills at Caesars Palace, Mandalay Bay and other Las Vegas establishments have totaled more than $125,000, according to PoliticalMoneyLine, a nonpartisan organization that tracks money in politics.

Mr. Reid charged these expenses to a special campaign account called a leadership political-action committee, or leadership PAC. The primary purpose of such accounts is to funnel money to other congressional candidates in need of campaign cash, especially those in close races.

But in recent years, leadership PACs on both sides of the political aisle have spent an increasing portion of their money for things other than contributions to candidates, the records show. Those expenses ranged from hotels and meals for the lawmakers who set up the PACs to flowers and jewelry for political supporters, the records indicate.

DOJ_NMG_0090010

This shift in spending is notable in an election cycle that features so many closely contested races. With only a few days remaining before next week's elections, many candidates have run short of funding for all-important television advertising, and every additional dollar contributed by leadership PACs is important.

On average, the leadership PACs of Republicans and Democrats in the House contribute 40 cents to candidates for every dollar they raise, an analysis of the spending data shows. In the Senate, Republicans contribute about 30 cents for every dollar they raise, and Democrats contribute about 20 cents.

Leadership PACs aren't subject to the same campaign-finance rules as the re-election accounts of individual congressmen. Election law, for example, bars politicians from using their own campaign funds to cover personal expenses. Those rules don't apply to leadership PACs, campaign-finance lawyers say.

Lawyers say there are few limits on what leadership PACs can pay for. "If a lawmaker wanted to pay his or her mortgage out of their PAC, they could do it," says Jan Baran, a campaign-finance lawyer with Wiley Rein & Fielding in Washington.

A spokesman for Mr. Reid says all expenses the senator charged to his leadership PAC were appropriate and were related to campaign or fund-raising business, including meals in Las Vegas with political supporters. Lawmakers with leadership PACs contend that, regulations aside, donors would never tolerate the use of money for personal expenses.

But critics say the rules that apply to PACs, which chiefly govern the size of contributions, aren't rigid enough, and give the lawmakers too much latitude over how money is spent.

"My impression is that a lot of people use leadership PACs as a slush fund," says Rep. Joel Hefley, a Colorado Republican and former chairman of the House Ethics Committee, who is retiring at year's end. Lawmakers use their accounts, he says, to pay for "all kinds of things that can be justified, but certainly are questionable." Mr. Hefley, who says he believes congressmen spend too much time raising money, introduced a bill this year to outlaw leadership PACs. So far, no other lawmakers have endorsed it.

Nearly half of the 535 members of Congress, in both parties, have leadership PACs. Through Aug. 30 of this election cycle, 260 leadership PACs have raised about $100 million and have disbursed about $33 million to colleagues' election campaigns, analysis of the PoliticalMoneyLine data shows.

Both the number of leadership PACs and the money they have contributed to candidates have increased by 20% since 2002. But their operational costs -- the money spent on staff salaries, fund raising, flights, meals, everything other than campaign contributions -- have doubled to $53.3 million over that period, analysis of the data shows.

Leadership PACs have been around for a couple of decades, but until recently, only a few congressional leaders operated them. In the mid-1990s, Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas, who left Congress this year, founded a leadership PAC and began encouraging other Republicans to do the same. He urged his colleagues to use the PACs to funnel political contributions into competitive elections their party needed to win to retain their congressional majority.

Lawmakers who want to give money to a vulnerable colleague are barred by law, under most circumstances, from sending more than $4,000 from their own re-election accounts per two-year election cycle. By setting up a leadership PAC, lawmakers can dole out as much as $10,000 per cycle to a candidate. Corporations can donate up to $10,000 per election to the PACs. Those limits are more than twice the legal limits for conventional re-election accounts.

GROWING EXPENSES

LPAC data show sharp rises in some expenses.

*Through Aug. 30, 2006

Note: Does not include PACs run by lawmakers who are considering running for president.

Source: PoliticalMoneyLine

Lawmakers in safe seats often direct money to colleagues who are struggling. In many cases, the grateful recipients support these donors in subsequent congressional votes on leadership posts.

For example, when House Republicans voted to replace Mr. DeLay as majority leader earlier this year, most backed the candidate who had given them the most leadership-PAC money, records indicate. Republican Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, who was voted the new majority leader, had donated more money to his Republican colleagues than did his opponent, Missouri Rep. Roy Blunt, according to a study by the Campaign for a Cleaner Congress, a congressional watchdog group.

DOJ_NMG_0090011

This year, with only a few days remaining before the elections, some candidates on each side of the aisle don't have the money they need for the final push, and they aren't getting as much as hoped for from leadership PACs.

Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, the Senate's third-ranking Republican, spent nearly $1,500 over the past six years at fast-food restaurants, according to PoliticalMoneyLine, which analyzes Federal Election Commission records. Records show his PAC paid $22 at a Burger King in Virginia, $6 at a Boston Chicken in West Chester, Pa., and $15 at a Subway in Pittsburgh. In addition, it paid for $600 of Starbucks coffee.

"I'll be on a trip for a candidate and I'll stop in to buy a cup of coffee or a sandwich," he said in an interview yesterday. "I don't eat at fancy restaurants, so when I'm traveling I just eat at cheap places. We don't have $500 restaurant bills at Charlie Palmer's.... That's not how you spend donors' money."

Mr. Santorum has handed out to other candidates 20 cents of every dollar his leadership PAC has raised over the past four years. The account, called Fight PAC, raised $3.5 million and distributed $700,000 to Republican candidates and causes.

Records show that over the past six years, Mr. Santorum's PAC has paid $1,900 for limousines, $3,000 for flowers, $4,100 for art and framing.

Robert Traynham, the senator's spokesman, says the PAC's goal is to elect more Republicans to Congress, and that it is permissible for Mr. Santorum to bill the PAC for "reasonable administrative expenses."

Rep. Tom Reynolds, who is in charge of organizing the Republican party's effort to retain a House majority, has dipped into his leadership account to pay $650 for stationery design and $447 for a dinner meeting for his staff at an Irish bar on Capitol Hill.

Steny Hoyer of Maryland, the House Democratic whip, spent $2,315 on L.L. Bean shaving kits for political supporters, staff and other politicians, and $405 on flower arrangements for several funerals, according to PoliticalMoneyLine. A spokeswoman for Mr. Hoyer says his PAC is one of the most efficient, having given away $1.1 million of the $1.9 million it has raised so far this year.

Sen. Bob Menendez, the New Jersey Democrat facing a tough re-election battle, dined a dozen times over the past two years at Morton's. The bills, which totaled $3,197, were paid by his PAC. A spokesman for Mr. Menendez says the bills were either "fund-raisers for the PAC or donor prospecting."

The leadership PAC of Rep. Joe Barton, a Texas Republican, paid $5,000 to the Blessing Funeral Home in Mansfield, Texas, for a funeral in June 2004. Larry Neal, an aide to Mr. Barton, said the funeral expense was for "the burial of a young staff assistant in Texas who left behind a devastated widow and their one-year-old child after committing suicide at home one awful summer night."

Republican Rep. Mike Oxley of Ohio, who is retiring, paid for $30,000 worth of going-away parties for himself from his leadership PAC. His spokeswoman declines to comment.

Several lawmakers have family members on the payrolls of their leadership PACs. Mr. DeLay's wife, Christine, was paid more than $170,000 by his PAC over the last four years for fund raising and political consulting. His lawyer says the payments were appropriate. The wife of California Republican Rep. John Doolittle worked as a fund-raiser for his PAC, keeping 15% of the contributions she brought in as payment. And California Democratic Sen. Barbara Boxer's PAC is run by her son, a lawyer, who has been paid $80,000 so far this election cycle.

The PACs can remain in place even after lawmakers retire. In September 2004, New York Rep. Jack Quinn started a leadership PAC a few months before his planned retirement from the House. Mr. Quinn said the account would allow him to donate leftover campaign funds to other Republican candidates. Since then, he has donated about $100,000 to candidates and has used another $115,000 to pay for expenses ranging from liquor for a Christmas party with political allies to insurance on a 2004 Ford Taurus he once used as a campaign vehicle.

Mr. Reid, the Senate minority leader, travels frequently to Las Vegas to raise money and meet with political supporters. Many of his bills there are paid by his Searchlight Leadership PAC, named after his hometown in Nevada. In June, for example, his PAC paid $3,800 for hotels and fund-raisers at Caesars, Mandalay Bay and the MGM Grand. In August, it paid another $660 for meals and hotels during a pair of Las Vegas trips.

DOJ_NMG_0090012

Jim Manley, a spokesman for Mr. Reid, says the expenditures are legal and appropriate. Some of them, he says, cover costs incurred by the minority leader's staffers, since Mr. Reid often stays at his home about 50 miles outside the city. "These expenditures are not especially large by Las Vegas standards," he says.

The Searchlight PAC was set up to support Democratic candidates, he says, and all its expenses "are directly related to fund raising, donor prospecting and donor maintenance, activities that are the core of the fund's permissible activities."

During the 2006 election cycle, Mr. Reid's PAC raised $2.2 million and distributed $447,000 to Democratic candidates and political parties, or about 21 cents of every $1 it raised, according to PoliticalMoneyLine. For the 2002 election, it raised $1.1 million and contributed $350,000 to candidates. During that election cycle, it spent about $14,000 on salaries, overhead and other expenses. Through Oct. 18 of this cycle, it has spent $1.2 million.

"There's no mystery about why the leadership fund is spending more money," Mr. Manley says. "It is the right way for a Senate leader to help elect other Democrats consistent with federal election law." He added that Mr. Reid also has contributed $845,000 to Democratic candidates and political parties from his separate re-election account.

Between December 2005 and March 2006, Mr. Reid's PAC paid $3,367 to cover stays by his guests at the Ritz-Carlton in Georgetown, where Mr. Reid has a condominium. Over the past two years, it paid another $3,000 for meals and to set up meetings at the hotel. Mr. Manley says the expenditures in Washington were for fund-raising events or for feeding and lodging "special guests" who attend them.

The PAC also spent $21,000 on gifts for political supporters, including $3,082 for bracelets and cuff links, $1,000 for art, $1,592 for chocolates, $803 for a pair of iPods, and hundreds of dollars for merchandise at Barnes & Noble and Amazon.com. "These types of expenses are a normal part of every fund-raising operation," says Mr. Manley. "They are designed to thank donors for their past efforts and to strengthen their future commitment to helping to elect Democrats."

Stinging From Scandal, Tribes Trim Donations (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — Indian tribes have cut back this year on political contributions to congressional candidates after a lobbying scandal that ensnared some tribes.

Contributions from 216 tribes are nearly 30% lower so far in the 2005-06 election cycle than they were at this point in 2003-04, ending six years of sharp increases, according to PoliticalMoneyLine and the Center for Responsive Politics, non-partisan groups that track campaign money.

The decline reflects caution by tribes after the January guilty plea of Jack Abramoff, a lobbyist who admitted directing tribal clients to give lawmakers millions to sway legislation and policy. The tribes were not implicated in the criminal probe but were stung by the scrutiny of their politicking.

“Tribes are saying, ‘We're going to stay away from this; everybody is focusing on how much we're contributing,' ” said Ron Allen of the National Congress of American Indians, an advocacy group.

For example, the Grand Traverse Band of Ottawa and Chippewa Indians in Michigan ceased giving any money to federal candidates and political parties after Abramoff's plea, even though the tribe had no dealings with Abramoff.

“This election we're just sitting it out,” said George Bennett, vice chairman of the tribe, which gave $108,000 in 2003-04. “The (tribal) council took a position that we're sick and tired of getting a black eye over that issue.”

Several lawmakers, including Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., and Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., returned thousands in campaign contributions from six tribes. The business dealings of Abramoff, his associate Michael Scanlon and those six tribes were the subject of a Senate Indian Affairs Committee probe this year.

The returned political contributions — $159,000— account for part of the overall decline in tribal giving.

The six Abramoff clients had been leading Indian political donors. They gave $3.9 million from 2001 to 2004, or about 20% of all tribal donations, according to PoliticalMoneyLine. They've given nearly $900,000 for next week's elections.

“Members of Congress are less willing to accept contributions from tribes,” said Scott Dacey, a Washington lobbyist who represents several tribes. Tribes, in turn, are more careful about making donations.

DOJ_NMG_0090013

"Tribes have become smarter political givers, focusing on supporters of tribal issues and not simply candidates who happen to call or fax a request," said Wilson Pipestem, a lobbyist for 11 tribes.

Charles Bunnell, chief of staff of the Mohegan Tribe of Connecticut, said tribes have curtailed large donations to political party organizations. Instead, they are directing money to home-state lawmakers and those who oversee Indian-related issues. "Tribes are continuing to give, but it's far more targeted," Bunnell said.

Tribes gave little money — just $4,400 in 1989-90 — until the mid-1990s, when Indian gambling flourished, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Abramoff admitted bilking tribes out of millions of dollars as he purported to be defending their gambling interests. Tribes also lobby for federal grants for education, bridges, housing and other things.

Abramoff was sentenced in March to five years and 10 months in prison for the fraud and conspiracy conviction, which stems from a deal to buy a fleet of casino ships in Florida.

He awaits sentencing on separate charges in a federal probe of corruption in Congress and federal agencies. Under a plea deal, Abramoff admitted giving lawmakers and government officials meals, trips and campaign donations in exchange for favors. He is cooperating in the investigation.

Tribal leaders said they don't expect to lose influence as their political contributions decline. "We're probably stronger than we've ever been because of the contact we keep with folks in both the House and the Senate," said Michell Hicks, principal chief of the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians of North Carolina, whose contributions are down this year. "We have good relationships, and we try to maintain those."

PodestaMattoon Said To Be Ready To Split Up (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, November 2, 2006

PodestaMattoon, the bipartisan K Street powerhouse, is splitting up, according to several sources close to the firm.

The two name partners, Republican Dan Mattoon and Democrat Tony Podesta, have agreed to separate while retaining a strategic partnership, the sources said. The break is set to become effective by Jan. 1.

Further details of the split were unavailable because principals at the firm did not answer several requests for comment. Several clients of the firm contacted for this article said they were unaware of the impending change.

At a time when the influence industry is bracing for the outcome of the midterm elections, the news adds another question mark to a pair of K Street's heaviest hitters.

Podesta, who's currently chairing the re-election campaign of Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell (D), is widely regarded as one of the best-connected Democratic strategists inside the Beltway. Mattoon, likewise, is known for his reach in House Republican leadership circles, due in particular to his longtime friendship with Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.).

The firm has maintained healthy growth over the past few years, hovering around the 15th spot in Roll Call's semiannual rankings of top lobbying firms by revenue. For the first half of this year, PodestaMattoon brought in $6 million in revenues, an 11 percent bump, even as some other large firms struggled to sign up new business.

In addition to nonprofit and appropriations-related clients, the firm's roster includes corporate titans such as Google, BellSouth, Tyco and the National Association of Broadcasters.

Podesta founded Podesta Associates in 1988 with his brother John, who later became White House chief of staff for President Bill Clinton. Through the 1990s, Podesta operated under the tech-friendly banner of podesta.com. But the name changed in 2001, when Mattoon agreed to come aboard after 15 years of in-house work for BellSouth.

Both men have held key positions of power in the party. Podesta headed the Pennsylvania campaigns of both President Clinton in 1996 and Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) in 2004. At Hastert's request, Mattoon headed up the House Republican's campaign arm for the 2000 cycle, and he led the outside coalition whipping a major trade bill in 2001.

When Mattoon joined the firm, the move marked a union of two outsized personalities, and those close to the situation said it was not always a happy marriage.

"Personality issues were part of it," said one source with knowledge of the firm, with some observers pointing to Podesta's jet-setting and focus with his wife on collecting contemporary art as one clear point of contrast with the more low-key Mattoon.

DOJ_NMG_0090014

But others said the two name partners maintained a solid professional front.

"Maybe over time it drove a wedge, but I just never saw it," said another source close to the firm. Nevertheless, several sources said at various times over the past two years, they heard rumors that a split was imminent.

The firm has had some success inking new contracts and most recently it signed up Alcatel North America and Novartis Vaccines and Diagnostics, as well as the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, a group for whom PodestaMattoon already has done some work.

Besides the name partners, the firm has roughly a dozen lobbyists on staff, including Hastert's son, Josh, plus several more associates who work for its public affairs arm.

An Election On Drugs (WP)

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

ONE OF the Democrats' election talking points is a promise to revamp the Medicare prescription drug benefit. They paint the 2003 legislation as a sellout to pharmaceutical firms: Rather than having Medicare officials use the government's bargaining power to keep drug prices down, the law left the job of negotiating prices to private insurers. The Medicare drug benefit has actually turned out to be cheaper than projected, and most beneficiaries say they are satisfied with it. But the House Democratic leader, Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), nonetheless accuses Republicans of "putting pharmaceutical companies and HMOs first at the expense of America's seniors."

The Democrats rightly point out that the federal health program for veterans uses its purchasing power to secure drugs at prices lower than the average obtained by the private insurers that administer the Medicare benefit. But this is not a fair comparison. The veterans program keeps prices down partly by maintaining a sparse network of pharmacies and delivering three-quarters of its prescriptions by mail, a policy that might not appeal to retirees who want a local pharmacist. Moreover, the program for veterans is in a position to negotiate hard with drugmakers because it can credibly threaten not to buy from them: Its plan excludes many new medicines. More than a third of retired veterans have signed up for Medicare drug coverage, suggesting that while the veterans program is cheaper, its restricted pharmacy network and formulary render it less attractive.

Setting the veterans comparison aside, could Medicare officials save money by negotiating directly with drug companies? In theory, yes: Once a drug has been invented, the cost of manufacturing pills is low, so a huge purchaser such as Medicare could demand large discounts and still find willing sellers. This is what governments do in most other rich countries. But lower prices might reduce drug companies' incentive to invest in research, and although it is infuriating that Canadians and Europeans get discounts while Americans finance pharmaceutical advances, slowing that advance may not make the world better. Moreover, having the government set drug prices is a sure way of flooding the political system with yet more pharmaceutical lobbyists and campaign spending.

The best way to make the difficult trade-off between affordable drugs and incentives for new research is not to stage a showdown in Gucci Gulch but rather to heed signals from consumers. The existing Medicare drug benefit may ultimately generate such signals. Retirees have a choice of insurance plans with wildly varying costs, and some are faced with decisions on how much to spend out of pocket. If they choose to pay top dollar for branded medicines, the incentives to invent new medicines will rise; if they prefer to save money, incentives for innovation will decline a bit. Either way, a balance will be struck that reflects broad social preferences.

It's fair to object that consumers may not be equipped to make smart decisions; the market signals they send may reflect the success of gauzy drug commercials rather than clinical evidence. The attraction of the market-based model depends on consumers being guided more by science-based Web sites created by universities or other groups. It's an open question whether consumers, led perhaps by their insurers, will learn to make sophisticated drug choices, but the fact that Medicare patients already buy more generic medications than other Americans is an encouraging sign of the capacity for smart purchasing. A switch to government purchasing of Medicare drugs would choke off this experiment before it had a chance to play out, and it would usher in its own problems. For the moment, the Democrats would do better to invest their health-care energy elsewhere.

Wiring Development (NYT)

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090015

The Inter-American Development Bank announced last month that Latin American migrants working in the United States will send a record $45 billion to their families back home this year. At that level, remittances represent the largest and most direct poverty reduction program in the region, topping by far the amounts of foreign aid provided by the United States. Most of the cash arrives in monthly wire transfers of about $300 apiece, and is spent on basics like food, shelter and health care. But not all of it. Development bankers estimate that some $10 billion of remittances could be saved or invested — if people had access to banks and were encouraged to use them.

By banking part of their remittances, recipient families could earn interest, establish credit and provide money for local investment. The result would be more resources to help pay for schooling, starting small businesses or home ownership. Such saving and investment lead to economic growth. And growth at the bottom of the economic scale is the surest way to actually lift people out of poverty.

As it is now, most banks in Latin America that receive remittances simply dole out the sums to recipients, after collecting part of the fee paid by the sender. They make no attempt to turn the recipients into bank customers. Bank officials and the politicians that oversee them need to do more to educate the poor about banking and to offer them services. Banks need to be reminded that such lending can be profitable — and will further broader national goals for economic growth. To that end, remittances deserve a more prominent place on the agenda at the meetings of the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and the Group of 8 leading industrialized nations. Unless those billions in remittances are banked, money that could fight poverty will be left on the table.

North Korea Wants Bank Accounts Unfrozen (AP)

By Burt Herman

AP, November 2, 2006

North Korea said Wednesday it would return to nuclear disarmament talks in an effort to get access to frozen overseas bank accounts, a vital source of hard currency for the impoverished and isolated communist nation.

The North's Foreign Ministry make only indirect mention of its headline-grabbing atomic test last month, saying in a statement that it hoped to resolve U.S. financial restrictions by going back to six-nation arms talks that it has boycotted for a year.

Confirming U.S. and Chinese reports of the agreement Tuesday, the North's Foreign Ministry said Pyongyang decided to return to the arms talks "on the premise that the issue of lifting financial sanctions will be discussed and settled between the (North) and the U.S. within the framework of the six-party talks."

Washington had banned transactions between American financial institutions and Banco Delta Asia SARL — a bank in the Chinese territory of Macau — saying it was being used by North Korea for money-laundering.

U.S. officials also sought to rally other countries to prevent the North from doing business abroad, saying all transactions involving Pyongyang were suspected of being involved in counterfeiting and money laundering.

The Macau ban is believed to have blocked the North's access to some US$24 million (euro18.9 million), and is thought to have hit the country's leadership in particular, who indulge in luxury goods like cognac and fine wines while the vast majority of North Koreans live in poverty.

In Seoul, South Korean Vice Foreign Minister Yu Myung-hwan said Wednesday he expects leaders of the countries involved to discuss the issue when they gather in Vietnam for an Asia-Pacific summit in mid-November and that the six-party talks were expected to take place after that. He did not indicate when.

However, South Korea's Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon was quoted as saying by Russia's ITAR-Tass news agency that the talks could resume as early as this month.

Ban, who will be the next U.N. secretary-general, also said sanctions against the North would remain in place until the six-nation talks make progress, and that Pyongyang must halt all nuclear testing activity and invite inspectors to examine its nuclear program, ITAR-Tass reported.

According to Interfax, Ban also said the international community should provide North Korea with security guarantees and economic aid.

DOJ_NMG_0090016

The North barely alluded to its Oct. 9 nuclear test in the statement carried by the official Korean Central News Agency, and didn't say whether it remained committed to an earlier agreement to abandon its nuclear ambitions — a possible sign that negotiators could be facing another round of frustrating dialogue when the talks resume.

North Korea also emphasized that a direct meeting with the U.S. during previously unpublicized negotiations Tuesday in Beijing, had made the diplomatic breakthrough possible. U.S. President George W. Bush, who has long shunned direct talks with Pyongyang, credited China's mediation for the agreement.

"Bilateral and multilateral contacts took place in Beijing on Oct. 31 with (the) main emphasis on the contact between the DPRK (North Korea) and the U.S," it said.

The North only briefly noted that the country "recently took a self-defensive countermeasure against the U.S. daily increasing nuclear threat and financial sanctions against it."

The nuclear talks — which include China, Japan, Russia, the United States and the two Koreas — reached an agreement in September 2005 where the North pledged to abandon its nuclear program in exchange for aid and security guarantees, but there was little progress toward implementing the accord.

The U.S. had previously maintained that the financial issue was a matter of law enforcement separate from the nuclear talks. But in Beijing on Tuesday, the chief U.S. nuclear envoy, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, said Washington agreed to take up the matter in the revived arms negotiations.

However, there were conflicting signals from the United States. White House press secretary Tony Snow later insisted the United States made no promises to link the financial dispute to the nuclear one, but only agreed that "issues like that may be discussable at some future time."

Hill said Tuesday that the nuclear talks could resume as easy as November or December, but acknowledged the negotiations still had a long way to go.

In Washington, Bush cautiously welcomed Tuesday's deal and thanked the Chinese for brokering it. But he said the agreement would not sidetrack U.S. efforts to enforce sanctions adopted by the U.N. Security Council to punish Pyongyang for the nuclear test. Those measures ban the North's weapons trade and other items such as luxury goods.

In Tokyo, Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuhisa Shiozaki said Japan will maintain sanctions on the North until it abandons its nuclear development.

South Korea's Yu also told lawmakers Wednesday in Seoul that "just coming to the talks itself won't affect the level of Security Council sanctions" against North Korea.

South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun announced a shake-up Wednesday of top Cabinet security positions, naming a new foreign minister, unification minister, defense minister and spy chief.

The reshuffle was triggered by the appointment of the current foreign minister, Ban Ki-moon, as the next U.N. Secretary-General and last week's resignation by the unification minister, who offered to step down to apologize for policy failures after the North's nuclear test. Two other top-level officials also handed in their resignations last week citing separate reasons.

N. Korea's Bank Accounts Targeted (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — For three years, the Bush administration has waged a campaign to choke off North Korea's access to the world's financial system, where U.S. officials say the nation launders money from criminal enterprises to fuel its trade in missile technology and its efforts to build a nuclear arsenal.

That effort has started to pay off.

U.S. pressure forced Macao this year to freeze North Korean assets in one of its banks, then foiled North Korea's panicky attempts to find friendly bankers in Vietnam, Mongolia, Singapore and Europe. And after North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test, China ordered some of its major banks to cease financial transactions with the country.

The cash crunch appears to have played a key role in North Korea's decision Tuesday to return to six-nation talks over its nuclear ambitions. North Korean officials said that as part of the talks, they wanted to raise the issue of lifting financial sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0090017

"They're not coming back because they want to give up nuclear weapons," said David L. Asher, the U.S. State Department's point man on North Korea until last year. "They are feeling the financial pressure and the cutoff from the international financial system, so they are trying to make nice."

But the U.S. effort still faces two enormous obstacles: Russia and China.

North Korea continues to have access to banks in both countries, according to current and former U.S. officials who say that without those nations' cooperation, the U.S. effort will be largely ineffective.

Both major powers have historically been more concerned about protecting their strategic interests than in joining U.S. efforts to sanction their neighbor.

Stuart Levey, the U.S. Treasury undersecretary in charge of investigating terrorist financial webs, has traveled to Russia and China, including a trip to Moscow last week. Levey said he had "constructive discussions" with his Russian counterparts, but declined to say whether they would act. A Russian Foreign Ministry official said they had "agreed to further cooperation."

U.S. officials believe that both countries will continue to resist American appeals for a further crackdown in part because of their "historic ties to North Korea," said a senior counter-terrorism official, who spoke about the U.S. campaign on condition of anonymity.

Evidence gathered over the decades by Washington indicates that North Korea has become what some U.S. officials call a "Soprano state." The government in Pyongyang used its embassies to coordinate illegal activities, its ships to move heroin and other contraband, and its factories to make counterfeit $100 bills and bogus brand-name cigarettes, U.S. officials say.

Kim Jong Il, the North Korean leader, used the profits to fund his nuclear program, U.S. officials say, but also to import Mercedes-Benzes, pricey cognacs and other luxury items to buy loyalty.

Washington fears that North Korea could decide to use its well-worn trafficking networks to sell Iran or others the hardware or know-how to make weapons of mass destruction.

So administration officials decided in 2003 to attack by unconventional means. They created the Illicit Activities Initiative, a classified, multi-agency effort aimed at curbing North Korea's black-market networks.

A year ago, the United States moved on one of North Korea's bankers, officially designating the small Banco Delta Asia in Macao as a "primary money-laundering concern" under the Patriot Act.

Pyongyang, U.S. authorities found, banked much of its criminal proceeds in the former Portuguese colony, a freewheeling gambling haven, which became an autonomously governed Chinese territory in 1999.

"Banco Delta was just a thumbtack against their skin," said Asher, who headed the Illicit Activities Initiative. "We knew that behind the skin was a central artery. When we pricked it, blood was going to start coming out fast."

The Treasury action created a run on Banco Delta, which lost a third of its deposits in six days, and forced the government to seize control, sending an unmistakable message to bankers about the consequences of dealing with the North Koreans.

Assets frozen

In February, local officials froze at least $24.million in North Korean accounts at the bank. Pyongyang officials protested and have repeatedly cited the action as justification for abandoning the nuclear bargaining table for the last year.

But Treasury officials went further. Privately, they threatened to go after much larger banks in Macao, including the Bank of China, the second-largest Chinese bank, which eventually froze some North Korean accounts.

Pyongyang then looked elsewhere for a financial safe haven.

Using spies, cooperative bankers and law enforcement agents, Washington followed the North Korean money trail. Levey and other senior Treasury officials visited Vietnam, Hong Kong, Singapore and Mongolia this year. They say they persuaded government officials and bankers to shun financial relationships with North Korea.

"Because of the way North Korea operates, it's very difficult for financial institutions to differentiate between its licit and illicit activities. And so, a lot of banks have decided that as long as North Korea is engaged in illicit activity, they don't want to take any chances of being associated with it," Levey said. "As a result, the North Koreans have had a very difficult time."

Nonetheless, Russia and China have common reasons for treading softly with North Korea on the financial front. Both fear that a financial crackdown could destabilize or even bankrupt North Korea. And both are jockeying to someday collaborate with a friendlier North Korea on economic and military issues.

DOJ_NMG_0090018

"They are willing to hold their nose and live with North Korea as it is in exchange for stability on the [Korean] peninsula," said Peter Brookes, the Bush administration's former deputy assistant secretary of Defense for Asian and Pacific affairs.

Also, North Korea is able to continue to deal with Russia and China because both countries are riddled with political corruption and organized crime, and because it is willing to pay huge commissions to banks, U.S. and Asian authorities have found.

Officials in Russia and China would not talk about North Korea's use of their banks. North Korean officials also declined to comment, but have called on the U.S. to "immediately give up its anachronistic hostile policy."

In recent months, intelligence has pointed to Russia as the place where North Korea has turned to stash its cash and tap into international financial markets, according to U.S. officials and money-laundering experts.

South Korea's intelligence service recently identified Sberbank, the biggest bank in Russia, as one of the institutions doing business with North Korea, according to lawmakers in Seoul who have seen the report. Russian and Japanese media have reported that at least 10 North Korean accounts have been opened in Moscow, including at state-owned Vnesheconombank, to circumvent U.S. sanctions.

Several current and former U.S. law enforcement and banking officials confirmed the broad outlines of those reports. Neither bank responded to requests for comment.

The senior U.S. counter-terrorism official said Russia was not being cooperative because Treasury officials had spent little time lobbying Moscow. "Russia, I think, is still very much up in the air. I genuinely think the jury is still out," he said.

By contrast, U.S. officials have lobbied the Chinese government for years. Levey and Daniel Glaser, a senior Treasury official who oversees anti-money-laundering efforts, have each traveled to Beijing this year to press authorities to cut off North Korea.

Within the last year, Beijing has started to respond.

But current and former U.S. officials say China's recent moves are not enough to stop the illicit money flow between the countries. "Are they doing everything that we want them to be doing on the targeted financial sanctions? No," said the U.S. counter-terrorism official.

'Window dressing'

Raphael Perl, a Congressional Research Service analyst, agreed.

"The efforts by Chinese banks in this regard are often privately referred to within [Bush] administration circles as more 'window dressing' than substantive," he said.

Some former U.S. officials also worry that completely uprooting North Korea's illicit financial network might be unwise, forcing the secretive nation to resort to tactics that could hamper U.S. efforts to spy on it.

"If you crack down in certain areas, it is like squeezing the balloon. It may pop up in an area we can't monitor," said John Cassara, a former Treasury and CIA money-laundering specialist.

The financial crackdown already appears to be forcing North Korea into closer arrangements with organized-crime syndicates with ready access to the international financial system.

That is particularly worrisome, the officials said, because these criminal outfits have a well-entrenched presence in the United States and are better at clandestinely moving money, illicit goods -- and, potentially, weapons of mass destruction -- than terrorists.

"That's why it's absolutely critical for us to crack down much harder on North Korea's ties to organized crime globally," Asher said. "It's going to be a much bigger challenge in my mind than even tracking terrorist finances."

Money May Underlie North Korea's Return To Talks (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea -- North Korea's decision to reopen nuclear-disarmament talks may have simply come down to money.

DOJ_NMG_0090019

During nearly seven hours of talks with U.S. and Chinese diplomats Tuesday, North Korean officials repeatedly asked that a restart of the six-nation talks include a discussion of the financial straitjacket imposed on the impoverished country and its dictatorial regime. It was the North's sole request, the U.S. envoy to the talks said, and an indicator of the pressure the country is facing after being practically cut off from the world's banking system.

Yesterday, the North Korean government raised the matter again in its own announcement about the talks, saying it decided to return to negotiations "on the premise that the issue of lifting financial sanctions will be discussed and settled." The statement, issued by North Korea's foreign ministry, characterized its Oct. 9 nuclear test as "a self-defensive countermeasure against the U.S. daily increasing nuclear threat and financial sanctions against it."

NUCLEAR AMBITION

See continuing coverage1 of developments in the standoff with North Korea, including a Q&A with North Korea experts2 and an interactive look at who has nuclear power3. • Standoff With North Korea: Chronology of key events4

North Korea's banking woes are due not to direct financial sanctions but instead to decisions by foreign banks that feared continuing business with North Korea. The foreign banks suspended their ties with North Korea following the U.S.'s move to blacklist a Macau bank that did business with Pyongyang. It is unclear whether the U.S. can do something in the six-party talks to change North Korea's financial isolation.

U.S. diplomats are likely to create a special working group within the six-nation talks, which North Korea had been boycotting for a year, to discuss financial issues. "Of course, addressing it will require the cooperation" of North Korea, said Christopher Hill, the U.S. envoy to the talks. He noted North Korea is suspected of engaging in money laundering and counterfeiting of U.S. dollars. The other parties involved in the talks are Russia, China, Japan and South Korea.

North Korea's financial troubles have arisen in part because of steps it began taking in 2002 to introduce market changes to its centrally planned economy. These included greater use of international banks for borrowing, investing and trade. The isolated regime of dictator Kim Jong Il apparently didn't realize such steps would ultimately provide outsiders with another means to pressure the country.

"The alarming thing for North Korea was to find that any assets they held around the world were liable to be frozen" if it was accused of criminal activities, said Tony Michell, managing director of Korea Associates Business Consultancy in Seoul and co-founder of the first international business-consulting company in Pyongyang, North Korea's capital.

The inability to conduct international banking "has made it extremely difficult for ordinary businesses to send money to North Korea and to receive money from North Korea," Mr. Michell added.

The trouble began in September 2005 when the U.S. put Banco Delta Asia in Macau, China, on a blacklist -- which essentially banned U.S. financial institutions from doing transactions with the bank -- for allegedly assisting North Korea in money laundering. That action created a run on the bank, a criminal investigation by Macau and a freeze of 40 North Korea accounts with assets of about $24 million.

Banco Delta Asia, which has since folded, has called the U.S. allegations "totally unfounded," and bank executives say they alerted U.S. officials of one instance in which counterfeit U.S. currency was put into a North Korean account. Macau's policy and bank regulator have been investigating the case since then.

North Korea immediately called for its money to be unfrozen. Nine of the accounts belonged to individual North Koreans, including some people believed to be high-ranking officials in the Kim regime. The remaining accounts belonged to 20 North Korean banks and 11 trading companies.

A bigger problem soon developed, as other foreign banks that were North Korea's chief conduit to the global banking system cut the country off, worried that a mere threat of U.S. penalties would cripple them, too. Officials at four Chinese commercial banks stopped moving funds in or out of North Korea after last month's nuclear test. Those banks said yesterday they were continuing that restriction.

North Korean authorities have for months repeatedly called for an end to the virtual cutoff from global banking, but they have never described the financial effects of the freeze. The country's banks disclose no information, not even their size or asset base. The only foreign-owned bank in North Korea, Daedong Credit Bank, reported in April that its revenue had been cut in half as a result of the inability to transact with banks outside the country. A Hong Kong investment company owns 70% of the bank, while a North Korean bank owns the rest.

DOJ_NMG_0090020

U.N. Creates N.Korea Sanctions List (AP)

AP, November 2, 2006

The U.N. Security Council agreed Wednesday on a list of banned items that could be used to make nuclear, chemical and biological weapons or ballistic missiles and ordered all countries to prevent North Korea from importing or exporting the items.

The Security Council resolution adopted on Oct. 14 to punish North Korea for conducting a nuclear test requires all countries to keep North Korea from selling or buying any material for weapons of mass destruction or ballistic missiles. It also orders nations to freeze assets of people or businesses connected to these programs, and ban the individuals from traveling.

The new council committee monitoring the sanctions drew up three separate lists of nuclear-related, chemical and biological-related, and missile-related material and equipment which the 15 council members approved.

Slovakia's U.N. Ambassador Peter Burian, the sanctions committee chairman, said he sent a note to all 192 U.N. member states on Wednesday informing them that the lists had been approved and reminding them to send a report to the committee on their compliance with the sanctions by Nov. 13.

He said the lists have hundreds of items "but if you are translating them into concrete products, it's really thousands."

Burian said the lists would likely be updated with additional items.

At a meeting of the sanctions committee on Wednesday, he said, members would start discussing the individuals and entities that will face sanctions, and they would also start putting together a list of luxury items that North Korea will be banned from importing.

U.S. Debates Value Of North Korea Talks (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 1 — Officially, the Bush administration is “pleased” — as President Bush put it on Wednesday — that North Korea has agreed to resume talks on nuclear disarmament. But behind closed doors at the White House and the State Department, some are less happy, saying the country’s nuclear test should be answered with isolation.

When it comes to North Korea, the Bush administration has always found itself pulled in two directions — confrontation versus engagement — and has generally settled on a middle course that was neither. To persuade North Korea to return to the bargaining table, President Bush agreed last week to a slight softening of his stance against direct talks with North Korea, a concession that made clear that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was in charge of the policy, at least for now.

But Ms. Rice is coming under increased fire inside and outside the administration from officials and experts who are skeptical about what diplomacy can achieve in this case, and who argue that there is no chance a new round of nuclear talks with North Korea will succeed.

“What’s a good description? Fantasy? Dreamworld?” said Nicholas Eberstadt, a North Korea expert with the American Enterprise Institute in Washington. “All we’re doing with these hapless efforts at conference diplomacy is continuing to talk while North Korea continues to build nuclear weapons.”

A senior Bush administration official was equally pointed in criticizing the new initiative. “In the past, the one thing we could never be criticized for was whether our tough talk meant something,” said the official, who has participated in internal debates and would speak only on condition of anonymity about his dissenting views. “When we gave a stick, they knew we were serious. We’ve lost that credibility.”

This is not a new debate by any stretch. Within the administration, a more hawkish wing that includes Vice President Dick Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and John R. Bolton, the ambassador to the United Nations, has chafed against talks with any American foe, be it North Korea or Iran. Meanwhile, advocates of diplomacy, including R. Nicholas Burns and Philip D. Zelikow, two of Ms. Rice’s top lieutenants at the State Department, have sided with European allies in saying that the United States should engage its foes.

DOJ_NMG_0090021

But the fact that the debate has resurfaced with such vigor suggests that even North Korea's decision to test a nuclear device on Oct. 9 in defiance of American warnings has not changed the old fault lines.

Ms. Rice has found herself in the middle of the tug-of-war as she seeks to mute international criticism of America's so-called cowboy diplomacy. On the two big nuclear proliferation issues, Iran and North Korea, Ms. Rice has helped to move the administration away from unilateralism, with President Bush offering in May to join European negotiations over Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Even after North Korea conducted a round of missile tests in July and three months later tested the nuclear device, the United States continued to call for it to return to six-nation disarmament talks.

"Pretty clearly, the president of the United States thinks we're doing the right thing," the State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, said Wednesday. "This pathway is the best opportunity we have to achieve the objective we all share: a denuclearized Korean peninsula."

Ms. Rice argues that a new round of talks will be different and that the United States will wield more leverage because the negotiations will take place while North Korea is under United Nations sanctions for the nuclear test. But Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader, has participated in multiple rounds of talks over the past several years while accelerating his pursuit of nuclear weapons.

North Korea boycotted the talks last year after the United States imposed financial penalties in September 2005 on Banco Delta Asia, a bank in Macao, accusing it of helping the North launder money and pass counterfeit $100 bills manufactured by the North Korean government.

For a year, North Korea refused to return to the talks, and the United States refused to lift the sanctions. The Bush administration balked at North Korean overtures for one-on-one talks, insisting that America would talk to North Korea only as part of the six-party negotiations. But last week, Chinese officials contacted the American Embassy in Beijing and proposed a three-way meeting involving the United States, North Korea and China. That step required a shift in the American line against direct talks, but in response to a request from Ms. Rice, Mr. Bush agreed.

The chief American negotiator, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, worked out the deal in a seven-hour session on Tuesday with his Chinese and North Korean counterparts. As a concession to entice North Korea back to the talks, the United States agreed to discuss the financial restrictions arising from the counterfeiting issue, a gesture that has been criticized inside and outside the administration.

There is "zero chance" that the talks will persuade North Korea to dismantle its nuclear program, said John Tkacik, a senior research fellow at the Heritage Foundation and a former State Department diplomat. "My Machiavellian mind tells me that the Chinese have worked out a deal with the Russians and the North Koreans that if North Korea comes back to the six-party talks, the main issue will not be denuclearization, it will be counterfeiting."

American negotiators continue to maintain the financial restrictions will remain unless North Korea stops counterfeiting United States currency. "They have to get out of the illicit-activities business and get out of the counterfeiting business," Mr. Hill said in an interview Tuesday.

Russia Speaks Against Iran Draft Measure (AP)

By Steve Gutterman

AP, November 2, 2006

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said Wednesday that a draft U.N. Security Council resolution imposing sanctions on Tehran over its nuclear program would isolate Iran, suggesting that Moscow will not back the resolution in its current form, news agencies reported.

Russia has not ruled out sanctions against Iran but repeatedly has warned that harsh measures could harden Tehran's defiance and scuttle chances for a negotiated end to the prolonged standoff over its nuclear program.

"We cannot support measures that in essence are aimed at isolating Iran from the outside world, including isolating people who are called upon to conduct negotiations on the nuclear program," Interfax quoted Lavrov as saying.

DOJ_NMG_0090022

The European resolution is meant to punish Iran for its refusal to halt uranium enrichment activities that have heightened fears it is seeking to develop nuclear weapons.

Lavrov reiterated his claim that the resolution would go beyond existing agreements among nations seeking to rein in Tehran's nuclear ambitions.

The draft orders all countries to prevent the sale and supply of material and technology that could contribute to Iran's nuclear and missile programs. It requires countries to freeze the assets of companies and organizations involved in those programs, and also imposes a travel ban and freezes the assets of people involved — a measure Lavrov appeared to be referring to in his remark suggesting it would hamper negotiators.

Interfax said Lavrov spoke in response to a question about whether Russia completely rejects the European draft or intends to seek changes.

"We will work on the text of the resolution," Lavrov said, adding that Russia would seek to focus the document on concrete aspects of Iran's program that the International Atomic Energy Agency has identified as possibly serious risks, including uranium enrichment and a heavy-water reactor, ITAR-Tass reported.

The text of the resolution drafted by Britain, France and Germany was expected to be discussed this week at the United Nations.

While the U.S. has indicated it considers the draft too weak, Lavrov has signaled Russia's opposition and suggested it is too strong.

Lavrov said Moscow will seek to foster negotiations between Iran and the international community.

Russia and China, both veto-wielding Security Council members, consistently have been reluctant to support sanctions. Comments Tuesday by Russia's Security Council chief Igor Ivanov hinted that Russia could support sanctions as a way to push Tehran into talks, but also left plenty of room for wrangling in the council.

Speaking Wednesday in Moscow, South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon, who will take over as U.N. secretary-general on Jan. 1, urged Iran to halt uranium enrichment and accept an international offer of incentives in return, Interfax reported. Iran's rejection of the proposal prompted the moves toward punishment that could include sanctions.

Russia has strong commercial ties with Iran, and a Defense Ministry official told The Associated Press on Wednesday that Moscow would fulfill a contract to supply air defense missiles to Iran unless Moscow backs international sanctions that would make it illegal.

Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov defended the $700 million contract signed last December to sell 29 Tor-M1 air defense missile systems to Iran, saying they were purely defensive weapons with a limited range.

Incoming UN Chief Calls On Iran To Halt Enrichment (AFP)

AFP, November 2, 2006

The newly-designated UN secretary general, Ban Ki-Moon, called on Iran to halt uranium enrichment and accept alternative incentives proposed by six world powers, Russian news agencies reported.

"Iran must halt enrichment of uranium and accept the proposal of the six" powers, the agencies quoted Ban as telling Russian journalists following a meeting with Russian President Vladimir Putin.

Ban, who is also currently the foreign minister of South Korea, afterwards held a meeting with Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov who repeated Moscow's reservations about a European draft UN resolution imposing sanctions on Tehran over its nuclear program.

"We cannot support measures that are essentially aimed at isolating Iran from the outside world, at isolating the very people who are called upon to conduct negotiations on the nuclear program," Lavrov told reporters after his meeting with Ban.

He said Russia, like the United States and Europe, had no interest in Iran acquiring sensitive nuclear technologies and wanted to ensure that UN nuclear inspectors got access to Iranian facilities to verify that this was not the case.

But he added that the European draft "goes far beyond the agreed framework" established by the five permanent UN Security Council members and Germany for alleviating international worry over Iran's nuclear intentions.

DOJ_NMG_0090023

Lavrov's comments mirrored remarks he made on October 26, when he stated that the European draft resolution on Iran "clearly does not further the objectives that the six powers agreed on earlier".

The United States has accused Iran of seeking secretly to develop nuclear weapons under cover of its nuclear energy program, a charge Tehran has consistently denied. Washington has also led calls for tough sanctions on Iran.

Russia, which is helping Iran build its first nuclear reactor, has maintained that only IAEA inspections can determine independently what Iran's nuclear activities aims are and has insisted that negotiations are best way to ensure Tehran does not move to develop nuclear weapons.

Iran Announces Military Maneuvers (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, November 2, 2006

Iran unexpectedly announced Wednesday that it would be holding military maneuvers in the Gulf this week, only days after U.S.-led navies held exercises in the same waterway.

Iranian state television quoted the head of the Revolutionary Guards, Gen. Yahya Rahim Safavi, as saying the 10-day maneuvers, named "Great Prophet," would take place in the Gulf and the Sea of Oman, beginning Thursday.

"The war games are aimed at demonstrating the deterrent power of the guards against possible threats," Safavi said.

Safavi stressed the drills were not a threat to neighboring countries, saying: "Our neighbors are our friends. The guards just want to prove that they ready to resist in any threatening situation."

His announcement came two days after U.S.-led warships finished a two-day maneuver in the Gulf — an exercise that Iran described as ""adventurist."

Iran said the six-nation drills would not improve security in the Gulf waters, through which about 20 percent of the world's oil passes. It also called on Gulf nations to set up their own regional security arrangements.

The U.S.-led maneuvers focused on surveillance, with warships tracking a ship suspected of carrying components of illegal weapons. The nations that took part were Australia, Bahrain, Britain, France, Italy and the United States.

Iran regularly holds large maneuvers, often using them to test weapons developed by its arms industry.

On Wednesday, Safavi told state TV: "The guard's air force will test fire the Shahab-3 (missile), equipped with cluster warhead, in the war game."

The Shahab-3 missile is capable of carrying a nuclear warhead and has a range of more than 2,000 kilometers (1,242.8 miles). It can reach Israel and U.S. forces in the Middle East.

Meanwhile, Russia on Wednesday defended Moscow's deal to supply air defense missiles to Iran, saying they were purely defensive weapons with a limited range.

"I wish to underline that these systems cannot be used in offensive operations," Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov told Russia Today television in an interview broadcast early Wednesday. "Secondly, they have a limited use as they are capable of protecting a small part of the Iranian territory."

Moscow has refused to bow to Western pressure and cancel its $700 million contract to sell 29 Tor-M1 air defense missile systems to Iran which was signed last December.

U.S. Faults Syria, Iran, Hezbollah On Lebanon (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Nov. 1 -- The White House on Wednesday accused Lebanon's Hezbollah militia and its Iranian and Syrian backers of seeking to topple the U.S.-backed government of Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said the United States is "increasingly concerned by mounting evidence that the Syrian and Iranian governments, Hezbollah and their Lebanese allies are preparing plans to topple Lebanon's democratically elected government."

Snow warned that any attempt to destabilize Lebanon through "manufactured demonstrations" or "physically threatening its leaders" would constitute clear violations of U.N. resolutions. He singled out Syria, charging that it has devised a plan "to prevent" the Lebanese government from approving a U.N. tribunal to try the killers of former Lebanese prime minister Rafiq Hariri, who was assassinated in February 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0090024

White House and State Department spokesmen declined to characterize the evidence used to support the claim, implying that it was based on classified information. And some U.S. intelligence officials and U.N. diplomats said privately that there was no sign that an armed overthrow of the government is in the works.

The announcement came just one day after Hezbollah's leader, Hasan Nasrallah, said in a television interview that he is prepared to organize protests if his movement is not given a larger say in Lebanon's affairs. It followed the report of a new diplomatic initiative by British Prime Minister Tony Blair, who sent a senior adviser, Nigel Sheinwald, to meet Syrian President Bashar al-Assad.

Next week, Lebanon's leading political figures will discuss a demand by a political alliance, headed by Hezbollah, that it be granted 30 percent of the Lebanese cabinet seats in a new national unity government, U.N. diplomats said. That would give them the power to veto any major decision by the government.

The demand represents an effort by the Islamic movement to parlay the political popularity it won by battling Israeli forces to a standstill over the summer. U.S. and U.N. officials fear that Hezbollah would use that authority to block any decision by the Lebanese government to approve a U.N.-backed tribunal to prosecute suspects in Hariri's death.

"It's pretty clear that in the aftermath of this summer's violence there is a broader political struggle going on over Lebanon's political future," said Flynt L. Leverett, a Middle East expert and senior fellow at the New America Foundation. "I think that Hezbollah and its allies have the natural advantage in that struggle, given Hezbollah's role in the conflict."

Intelligence officials said they think the White House statement was referring to Nasrallah's threat of widespread protests if Lebanese leaders fail to create a unity government. One official said that although U.S. intelligence officials think Nasrallah would like more power and Syria would like a friendlier Lebanese government, there are no signs of an impending coup.

U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan convened a meeting with U.S., Russian, French, British and Chinese representatives to build support for a plan to establish a tribunal, probably based in Cyprus, to prosecute suspects in Hariri's death.

U.N. prosecutor Serge Brammertz is investigating whether top Syrian officials ordered the assassination of Hariri and other critics of the Syrian government. His predecessor, Detlev Mehlis, has implicated officials within Assad's inner circle.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told the Lebanese Broadcasting Corp. last week that the United States has heard that "there are people who would like to destabilize the government of Prime Minister Siniora. We've heard that there are people who would like to intimidate or assassinate again."

Rice said "it's not any great secret" that the administration has concerns about Syria's sponsorship of violence in Lebanon, but she stopped short of accusing Syria of planning fresh attacks. "I just want to make very clear that the international community believes there should be no foreign intimidation of the Lebanese people," she said.

U.S. Reports Plot To Topple Beirut Leaders (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Michael Slackman

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 1 — The White House said Wednesday that there was “mounting evidence” that Iran and Syria were involved in a plot to bring down the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora of Lebanon, but senior officials refused to describe in any detail the intelligence they said they had collected.

In an unusual statement, the White House said it was “increasingly concerned by mounting evidence that the Syrian and Iranian governments, Hezbollah and their Lebanese allies are preparing plans to topple Lebanon’s democratically elected government.”

American officials said they had evidence that Syria and Iran were trying to engineer the creation of a new “unity” government that they could control, partly through Hezbollah, a Lebanese Shiite organization considered a terrorist group by the United States.

One senior American official, who declined to be identified by name because he was discussing an intelligence issue, said there were also indications of “planning for a more violent” attack on the government, but he gave no details.

DOJ_NMG_0090025

In the written statement, issued by the White House press secretary, Tony Snow, the administration also said there were "indications" that Syria was trying to block passage of a statute by the Lebanese Parliament that would require that Lebanon cooperate with an international tribunal that is to try those accused of involvement in the assassination of the former prime minister, Rafik Hariri, in February 2005. Syria has denied involvement, though Syrian intelligence officials, including close family members of President Bashar al-Assad, have been implicated.

In interviews in recent days, senior American officials have said the evidence is one reason that the United States cannot engage in negotiations with Syria or Iran, as several leading Republicans, including the former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, have urged.

"Talking isn't a strategy," the president's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, said in an interview late last week before heading to Iraq. "The issue is how can we condition the environment so that Iran and Syria will make a 180 degree turn?" a reference to what he said were their efforts to undermine stability in the region.

Asked on Wednesday about the new warning from the White House, Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said that "quite clearly, Hezbollah has its patrons in Damascus, and certainly in Tehran" who observe "very few boundaries concerning what it will do and what it won't do."

But administration officials said they had little evidence of an impending physical attack. Instead, they said they believed that Hezbollah might stage a political crisis to bring about the fall of the government. For the Bush administration, that possibility poses a vexing problem: if the Siniora government collapses because of domestic political infighting, any change of government may look more like parliamentary politics than a coup.

At the moment, Hezbollah, which is part of the current government, is seen to be in a stronger political position than the Washington-allied March 14 coalition, which controls the government and the largest bloc in Parliament.

Tension has been rising in Lebanon since the cease-fire that ended a 34-day war with Israel this summer that was directed against Hezbollah, which launched attacks on Israel from Lebanese territory.

Foreign pressures are only one of the many forces driving the political dynamics between competing factions. Lebanon's political factions are scheduled to begin talks on Monday to discuss Hezbollah's demand for a new national unity government, a proposal that two recent polls determined has the backing of about 70 percent of the population.

"Both camps are escalating to put their opponents in the corner in order to reach concessions," said Hilal Khashan, a political scientist at the American University of Beirut who said that Washington's charges do not warrant "any attention."

The White House clearly hopes that its public support will buttress the American-backed government, but some experts in Beirut warned that it may well have had the opposite effect. The government's chief critics, including the Hezbollah leader, Hassan Nasrallah, have charged that those who control the government are puppets of Washington.

"Love can be deadly," said the speaker of Parliament, Nabih Berri, after hearing Washington's charges on Wednesday. "Is it a defense for Lebanon? Or pushing it toward chaos? Is it a support for the government? Or incitement against it?"

While Iran and Syria have long maneuvered for position in Lebanon, there is also a local fight under way over who controls the reins of power. Hezbollah and its chief ally, the former general Michel Aoun, are pressing to extend their control. The March 14 coalition is struggling to hold them back.

With its announcement, Washington has adopted the political talking points of its closest ally in Beirut, the Druse leader Walid Jumblatt, who has repeatedly sought to undermine Hezbollah by charging it is nothing more than a puppet of Iran and Syria. Mr. Jumblatt was visiting Washington this week and met with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

In an interview, a member of Mr. Jumblatt's party, the Progressive Socialist Party, said he agreed with Washington's characterization of how events may unfold.

"We have evidence of the Iranian-Syrian-Hezbollah plan," said Akram Chehayeb, a member of Parliament. His proof, he said, included statements by Syrian officials close to Iran who called for toppling the government, and a speech by the Syrian president in which he said "we have to translate our military victory into a political one."

It was unclear to what extent Washington may have relied on that information in making its assertions.

In a television interview on Tuesday, Mr. Nasrallah said that if his political opponents did not accept a national unity government, he would rally his supporters in the streets.

DOJ_NMG_0090026

Mr. Nasrallah's influence is clear: when the fractious parties sit down to talk on Monday only Hezbollah's demands will be on the agenda. In addition to the unity government, which would bring Hezbollah's allies into power, the group wants to amend the election law and call early elections for Parliament.

Opponents of Hezbollah wanted to discuss disarming Hezbollah's militia, and replacing the pro-Syrian president, Émile Lahoud, whose term was extended by Damascus.

"I don't buy it," said Jamil Mroueh, publisher of The Daily Star newspaper in Lebanon of Washington's statement. "This is a domestic issue, in terms of the wrestle for power."

Syria 'plotting To Destabilise' Lebanon (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Daniel Dombey And Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, November 2, 2006

The US on Wednesday said it had mounting evidence that Syria, Iran and Hizbollah were planning to "topple" the elected Lebanese government and told them to keep their "hands off".

The US warning reflects growing concerns that Lebanon's Hizbollah, an armed faction and political party backed by Syria and Iran, is raising the pressure for a change of government, now dominated by pro-western forces.

The US statement came hours after Hassan Nasrallah, Hizbollah leader, vowed to stage peaceful protests demanding fresh elections unless his opponents agreed to the creation of a national unity government to replace that of Fouad Siniora, the prime minister, by mid-November.

The White House said: "We are increasingly concerned by mounting evidence that the Syrian and Iranian government, Hizbollah and their Lebanese allies are preparing plans to topple Lebanon's democratically elected government."

Later, Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said the US was "making it clear to everybody in the region that we think that there ought to be hands off the Siniora government; let them go about and do their business."

Hizbollah, which has 14 of parliament's 128 seats, is represented in the government by two ministers but demands that its Christian allies, now in opposition, also be brought in. Mr Siniora has rejected demands for change but top political leaders are due to hold talks on the issue next week.

The warning – dismissed by Hizbollah as "just one more American interference in Lebanese affairs" – followed a diplomatic initiative by Tony Blair, the UK prime minister, who sent his top foreign policy adviser to meet Bashar al-Assad, the Syrian president, in Damascus on Monday.

Sir Nigel Sheinwald first visited Washington where he met senior US officials to discuss the situation in Iraq, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as well as his planned mission to Syria.

But analysts said such consultations did not mean that the US and UK were in agreement over their policy towards Damascus, with the US seeking to isolate Mr Assad and the UK exploring ways to engage Syria and test its willingness to play a more constructive role in the peace process between Israel and the Palestinians.

"We went to [Damascus] express our concerns on these issues," said a Downing Street official on Wednesday night. "We want to see concrete action and we are now waiting to see what concrete reaction there might be from the -Syrians."

The UK is as concerned as the US about a potential fall of the Lebanese government, as pressure mounts from Hizbollah and its allies in Beirut. The anti-Syrian coalition that now controls the government believes that part of the Hizbollah attempt to widen the participation in the government or bring a new cabinet is to derail plans for an international tribunal to try the perpetrators of the killing of the former prime minister Rafiq Hariri.

Sean McCormack, the US state department spokesman, said Hizbollah which "started a war in the region" with Israel, would stop at nothing to achieve its ends.

In Damascus on Monday, Sir Nigel told Mr Assad there was a range of actions that Syria could take which would be in its own interest and that of the international community.

The UK is exploring whether Syria can move the Palestinian Hamas movement towards adopting the conditions set by western governments to move the peace process forward.

U.S. Sees Evidence Of Lebanon Coup Plot (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0090027

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

washington — In an unusual statement, the Bush administration charged Wednesday that there was "mounting evidence" that Iran, Syria and the militant group Hezbollah were trying to engineer the overthrow of the elected government of Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora.

American officials said they had evidence that the two countries were trying to help create a new "unity" government that would give greater influence to their Hezbollah allies.

They contended that Syria was also trying to block legislation that directed Lebanese cooperation with an international tribunal investigating the slaying of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. Syrian officials have been implicated in the February 2005 attack.

But U.S. officials declined to provide details, saying they could not disclose information from intelligence sources. Sean McCormack, the chief State Department spokesman, said there were "strictures" on what he could say because "we collect a lot of information I can't talk about."

He said Hezbollah chief Sheik Hassan Nasrallah recently warned in a speech that "the Siniora government take certain steps or Nasrallah and his compatriots would see that it falls."

Hezbollah officials have been pressing for Shiite Muslim parties to be given control of eight Cabinet ministries, up from five, to better reflect their share of Lebanese support. Hezbollah has also called for mass demonstrations to press for a unity Cabinet that would give Islamic militants and their allies vetoes over key decisions.

McCormack also noted that Emile Lahoud, the pro-Syria president of Lebanon, had spoken about taking steps to block formation of the tribunal to bring Hariri's killers to justice.

McCormack said that the administration had put out its statement to show its support for the Siniora government and to make clear that "we, as well as others, are watching closely."

At the same time, he insisted that "we're not going to interfere in Lebanon's domestic politics."

In Beirut, Hezbollah spokesman Hussein Rahal said on Al Arabiya television that the U.S. statement was "just one more American interference in Lebanese affairs" designed to prop up the Siniora government.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations John R. Bolton have warned Syria and Iran in recent days not to interfere in Lebanese affairs. In an interview with the Lebanese Broadcasting Corp. on Oct. 26, Rice said that Lebanon had a history of intimidation and assassinations and "we've heard that there are people who'd like to intimidate or assassinate again." She offered no details.

The Siniora government has worked closely with Washington, which hopes Siniora's team can help limit Hezbollah's influence. The Shiite Muslim militant group waged war with Israel during the summer.

The Jerusalem Post speculated Wednesday that mock raids by Israeli fighter jets over Hezbollah strongholds Tuesday were "an unveiled warning to Nasrallah" not to restock the militant group's arsenal.

Israeli officials have said the military will conduct periodic flights over Lebanon until Hezbollah returns two Israeli troops captured during the summer and international forces take adequate steps to prevent Hezbollah from rearming.

The U.S. is providing political and economic support to the Lebanese government as well as aid to train the weak military.

Yet the popularity of the United States in Lebanon has diminished because of perceived U.S. support for Israel in the summer war, limiting the Bush administration's ability to influence events in the country.

David Schenker, a former Pentagon official now at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, said the "trend in Lebanon is really troubling…. There's an overwhelming array of forces against the Siniora camp. It's going to be hard to beat them back."

Hezbollah Threatens Protests In Lebanon (AP)

By Sam F. Ghattas

AP, November 2, 2006

Hezbollah is threatening street protests to force early elections in Lebanon if its demands are not met for a "national unity" Cabinet that would give the Islamic militants and their allies veto power over key decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0090028

The bold move reflects the Shiite group's push to consolidate the political power it gained following its self-proclaimed victory in its punishing summer war with Israel. The effort seems certain to further exacerbate an already tense political situation in Lebanon, where the Western-backed government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora has refused earlier Hezbollah calls to step down and allow the formation of a new Cabinet.

It could also lead to violence, with pro-government groups warning of a confrontation with militants in the streets.

"Our concept of the national unity government is that all the basic forces in Lebanon be in it ... actual and serious participation, not an aesthetic participation," Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, Hezbollah's leader, said in a lengthy interview on Hezbollah's Al-Manar TV Tuesday night.

In the same interview, Nasrallah said that "serious negotiations" were taking place over the two Israeli soldiers whose July 12 capture by his militant group sparked the 34-day war.

He said a negotiator appointed by U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan has been meeting with Hezbollah and Israeli officials. He would not provide details about the negotiations, but told Al-Manar: "We have reached a stage of exchanging ideas, proposals or conditions."

The Israeli government declined to comment on the assertion.

"We don't comment about anything that has to do with the abducted soldiers. Israel will do all it takes to get their release without hurting Israel's security," spokeswoman Miri Eisin said.

Nasrallah also warned that any attempts by the beefed-up U.N. peacekeeping force in southern Lebanon to disarm Hezbollah would transform the country into another Iraq or Afghanistan. He did not elaborate.

A U.N.-brokered cease-fire that ended the fighting on Aug. 14 does not give a direct mandate to the peacekeepers to take away Hezbollah's weapons by force, unless the guerrillas are caught in the buffer zone along the border with Israel.

On the domestic front, Nasrallah said Hezbollah and its allies should comprise one-third of the 24-member Cabinet. That effectively means the guerrilla group and allies could veto key decisions. A two-thirds vote in the Cabinet is needed to pass decisions that are not made by consensus. A resignation of one-third of the Cabinet automatically brings down the government.

The move, if successful, would significantly raise Hezbollah's standing in the Cabinet, where it and its Shiite ally, Amal, currently have five ministers. Such veto power and influence in decision-making would also bolster their standing in the 128-seat parliament, where the group and its allies hold less than half the seats, compared to 70 seats held by the anti-Syrian majority.

Nasrallah said he welcomed a call by parliament speaker Nabih Berri, a Hezbollah ally, to hold talks next week on forming a national unity government. However, should the talks fail, Nasrallah said Hezbollah would begin political and street actions against the government on Nov. 13. The guerrilla group is highly organized and politically disciplined, and its rallies frequently draw hundreds of thousands of supporters.

Saniora has repeatedly rejected the idea of a new government, contending that his Cabinet achieved much for the country and did its best to stop the war. His supporters say that Hezbollah and its backers, in pushing for greater political power, are doing Damascus' bidding and are trying to undermine the formation of an international tribunal to try suspects in the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri in February 2005.

The assassination sparked massive street protests and prompted Syria to withdraw its forces from Lebanon under international pressure. The parliament, however, has lacked the strength to force pro-Syrian President Emile Lahoud out of office or to eliminate Syria's proxy influence through local allies like Hezbollah.

In the face of Nasrallah's ultimatum, government supporters have threatened popular counter-protests, raising fears of a repeat of the kind of sectarian clashes between Lebanon's Sunnis, Shiites, Druse and Christians that ravaged the country during its 15-year civil war.

Leaders of Anti-Syrian factions have repeatedly warned of violence if Hezbollah supporters pour into the streets.

Walid Jumblatt, a member of parliament, was quoted by Lebanese newspapers Wednesday as warning during a visit to Washington that "threats by some forces in Lebanon to resort to street (protests) in order to bring down the government" would "lead to anarchy."

Nasrallah has played down any fears of violence in the threatened street protests, saying his campaign would be peaceful.

DOJ_NMG_0090029

Ethiopian PM: Islamic Militia A Threat (AP)

By Chris Tomlinson

AP, November 2, 2006

Ethiopia's prime minister, who has sent troops to bolster Somalia's interim government, said Wednesday the al-Qaida-linked militants controlling much of the neighboring nation are a threat to the Horn of Africa and the wider world.

Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said he held out little hope that the secular, U.N.-backed acting government in Somalia can reach a peace agreement with the Islamic militants.

"Apparently some people believe that the al-Qaida elements in Mogadishu ... are people one can talk to in a reasonable manner, that they can be convinced not to be extremists," Meles said in an exclusive interview with The Associated Press.

The extremists "represent a direct threat first to Somalia and the Somali people, second to the region and Ethiopia, and lastly to the international community," he said. "When they control the whole of Somalia it would be very naive to assume that they will mend their ways, cease to be terrorists and become very civilized and very tame pussycats."

Ethiopia, a largely Christian nation, backs Somalia's two-year-old acting government, which has failed to exert any influence outside its base in the western city of Baidoa. Eritrea, a nation that broke away from Ethiopia in a 1961-91 civil war and fought a 1998-2000 border war with its rival, supports the Islamic militia.

A confidential U.N. report obtained by the AP on Friday said 6,000 to 8,000 Ethiopian soldiers are in Somalia or along their border while 2,000 troops from Eritrea are inside Somalia. Eritrea denied having any troops in Somalia, and Ethiopia says it sent only a few hundred advisers.

Meles controls the Ethiopian armed forces as head of a coalition that has governed since 1991. He previously confirmed sending military advisers to Somalia; that prompted the Islamic militia to declare a holy war against Ethiopia.

"In effect they have declared war on us, they have massed their troops very close to our border, so they have publicly shown that they pose a direct security threat to us," Meles said Wednesday. "It would be a dereliction of duty for any Ethiopian government to ignore that and welcome the takeover of the whole of Somalia by jihadists."

He declined to discuss what action he might take against the militants in Somalia.

The Arab League is sponsoring peace negotiations between the Somali government and the Islamic militia. But a third round in the effort, being held in Khartoum, Sudan, was suspended Wednesday after the two sides refused to sit down with each other.

Meanwhile, Islamic militants expanded their control by taking over an important Somali coastal town Tuesday night. The fighters peacefully seized Hobyo in the central Mudug region, according to an Islamic official.

The leaders of the Council of Islamic Courts have demanded that Ethiopian troops withdraw from Somalia before they will meet with the interim government. They have also called for Somalia's secular national charter to be replaced with Islamic law.

Meles said he has little faith that extremist elements within the Islamic group would ever honor an agreement with the transitional government.

"I think so far the talks have not been serious. I believe the (extremists) believe they have the military momentum and that they are using the talks in Khartoum as a cover for their military takeover," he said.

The prime minister said international diplomats do not take the threat posed by the militants seriously. The Islamic group appears to be split between a moderate wing which is ready to negotiate, and an extremist wing led by men the United States accuses of having ties to al-Qaida.

Meles insisted the Ethiopian soldiers in Somalia are there only to train a new Somali national army and protect the interim government. He said the training began about a month ago and the new army was not yet capable of protecting the transitional government.

Meles first warned about Somalia's Islamic militants during a May 2005 interview with the AP, but he said the world did little to build up the transitional government, allowing the Islamic militants to become the most powerful military force in the country.

"I believe the international community could have done more and should have done more," he said.

State Dept Vetted Speakers For Criticism Of Bush Adminstration (KCS)

DOJ_NMG_0090030

By Jonathan S. Landay

The Kansas City Star, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON - An internal State Department review has found that U.S. officials screened the public statements and writings of private citizens for criticism of the Bush administration before deciding whether to send them on foreign speaking assignments.

The screenings amounted to "virtual censorship" in the State Department's selection of speakers, said a report by the department's Inspector General's Office. McClatchy Newspapers obtained a copy of the 22-page report, which was completed in September.

The vetting practice appears to have been part of the Bush administration's efforts to control information, muffle dissenting views and promote positive assessments of its policies to foreign audiences.

It also appears to be contrary to the guidelines of the U.S. Speaker and Specialist Program, which taps U.S. experts to deliver lectures, serve as consultants and conduct seminars overseas or from the United States via teleconferences. The guidelines call for the State Department to provide speakers "who represent a broad range of responsible and informed opinion in the United States" and are "not limited to the expression of U.S. government policies."

Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware, the top Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, requested a review of the program after a December 2005 story by Knight Ridder Newspapers (since acquired by the McClatchy Co.) quoted State Department officials who complained that political litmus tests were being used to weed out speakers critical of the Bush administration.

The Inspector General's Office recommended that the Bureau of International Information Programs, which runs the speakers program, adopt new regulations to ensure that speakers are chosen "regardless of their personal opinions on policy issues."

In one case cited in the December Knight Ridder story, a conflict resolution expert and author of a book critical of Iraqi reconstruction was told at the last minute that his participation in a videoconference in Jerusalem was no longer required.

Internal e-mails quoted in the report showed that IIP officials pressed to have the expert, David L. Phillips, replaced by other scholars.

The Inspector General's report found that the Bureau of International Information Programs (IIP) used "no expressed or established 'ideological litmus tests,' or 'black or white lists" of speakers. But it said that "past . . . leadership" in the State Department's Bureau of Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs, whom it didn't name, questioned the "ideological credentials" of some speakers and "this contributed to a series of internal IIP management reactions."

"These reactions were manifested in some cases in poor management decisions that influenced the speaker selection process during a period of heightened national security concerns," said the report. "An atmosphere of extreme caution and self-censorship was created."

Unidentified former IIP managers "encouraged the speakers program to employ 'due diligence' in its selection of speakers. This meant vetting speaker candidates' public statements or publications that appeared to run counter to Administration policies," the State Department Inspector General's report continued. "Several speaker program officers and reference specialists did so regardless of whether the speaker candidates' personal opinions had a bearing on the topical issues for which they were being considered for recruitment."

"Others, in an effort to maintain 'balance' unrealistically, suggested recommending two ideologically different speakers for a program in which only one speaker was requested," said the report.

In another case cited in the Knight Ridder report, a request by the U.S. Embassy in Jakarta, Indonesia, for a visit by Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., who lived in Indonesia when he was young, was delayed for seven months while IIP political appointees argued that a Republican senator be sent with him.

The report found that while some IIP employees acted "on the margins" of the speaker program's guidelines, "there was no ideological motivation; rather, it was done in an attempt to 'maintain program balance.' Nevertheless, it resulted in virtual censorship in the speaker selection process."

DOJ_NMG_0090031

The report didn't reveal the identities of anyone involved in the selection process or the private U.S. citizens whose statements and publications were vetted.

Big Israeli Strike With Tanks Kills 8 Palestinians In Gaza (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 1 — Israeli troops staged one of the largest raids into the Gaza Strip in recent months on Wednesday, killing eight Palestinians and wounding more than 40 in gun battles that began before dawn and lasted much of the day. One Israeli soldier was also killed.

The Israeli soldiers, in tanks, on foot and backed by helicopters, exchanged fire with Palestinian militants in the northern Gaza farming town of Beit Hanun, the launching ground for many of the Palestinian rockets fired into southern Israel.

As the two sides battled, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's security cabinet met in Jerusalem and debated whether to step up the 4-month-old military operations in Gaza.

In recent weeks, some senior political and military officials have expressed support for expanded operations to halt Palestinian rocket fire in northern Gaza and rooting out weapons smuggling tunnels on Gaza's southern border with Egypt.

But the security cabinet chose not to escalate military actions, at least for now. In a statement, the security cabinet said the military would continue the "current security activity."

Avigdor Lieberman, the leader of Israel Beiteinu, a far-right party that just joined the governing coalition, said the military should take a much tougher approach, Israel radio reported.

However, Israel's defense minister, Amir Peretz, who leads the left-leaning Labor Party, opposed expanding the military operations, and his position carried the day.

"There is no intention to carry out operations for show, or operations to appease public opinion, but only defined operations whose goal is clear, whose purpose is not only deserving but necessary," Mr. Peretz said.

Still, the incursion on Wednesday was one of the most wide-ranging since the Israeli military re-entered Gaza at the end of June.

The Israeli military pulled out of Gaza in September 2005, but returned after an Israeli soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, was captured and taken into the territory.

In a statement released by his office on Wednesday, the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, demanded that Israel "cease immediately all hostile actions against our people."

Wednesday's operation, like many that have preceded it, involved dozens of Israeli tanks and other armored vehicles. In addition, hundreds of infantry soldiers walked into the territory, which is much less common.

Most of the fighting was on the outskirts of Beit Hanun, in the northeast corner of Gaza. The eight Palestinians killed are five militants, a member of the Palestinian security forces and two people whose identities could not be immediately determined. Most of the wounded also were militants, though some civilians were hurt, according to Palestinian security officials and medical workers.

The Israeli military said its forces had come under fire from Palestinians with automatic rifles and antitank missiles.

Israeli troops took up positions atop Palestinian homes. Helicopters and drones flew overhead and carried out occasional strikes.

The Palestinians still managed to fire several rockets into southern Israel, lightly wounding one civilian, the military said.

Rami Hamad, a 24-year-old Hamas militant who was wounded, said he had been shot in the leg while trying to reach a fellow militant, Ahmad Saadat, who died.

"They have the sophisticated military power, but in our religion it says prepare whatever you have to confront the enemy," Mr. Hamad said at Kamal Adwan Hospital in Gaza, where he was being treated. "Holy war is an obligation."

At the hospital morgue, Yousef Saadat, 43, wept as he learned that his son had been killed. Mr. Saadat said he had urged his son to finish school and become a teacher, which he did. But Ahmad still insisted on becoming a militant. "He refused to get married," Mr. Saadat said. "He spent his time preparing for martyrdom."

DOJ_NMG_0090032

The Israeli forces closed off the entrances and exits to Beit Hanun, and it was not clear how long they intended to remain. In recent months, the Israeli raids have typically lasted a day or two before the forces pulled back.

Since the Israeli troops returned to Gaza four months ago, more than 250 Palestinian militants and civilians have been killed, according to Palestinian and Israeli rights groups. Three soldiers have died.

Meanwhile, in the latest measure of the Palestinian economic crisis, Palestinian government revenue has fallen by 60 percent since Hamas, the radical Islamic group, came to power in March, the International Monetary Fund said in a new report.

Palestinian Authority revenue for the April-September period was $500 million in 2006, down from $1.2 billion during the same period a year earlier, the report said.

Israel, the European Union and the United States classify Hamas as a terrorist group and cut the flow of money to the government when it took over. As a result, the Palestinian Authority has paid salaries to government workers only partially and sporadically.

The sharp drop in government revenues was partly offset by increased international aid to nongovernmental groups. The aid for the April-September period was $420 million, up from $230 million a year earlier. Still, the overall economy has been contracting rapidly in recent months.

Israeli Troops Spark Clashes In Gaza Strip (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

GAZA CITY, Nov. 1 -- Israeli special forces backed by tanks and drone aircraft pushed into the northern Gaza Strip on Wednesday, setting off hours of fighting that killed at least seven Palestinians, most of them gunmen, and one Israeli soldier. More than 40 other Palestinians were wounded by shrapnel and Israeli gunfire, some from rooftop snipers.

The raid was designed to root out stockpiles of crude Palestinian rockets, known as Qassams, and the men who fire them into southern Israel. By twilight, at least eight rockets had landed in or around the Israeli city of Sderot, damaging cars and slightly injuring two women in the largest one-day barrage in weeks.

A few masked gunmen from the Izzedine al-Qassam Brigades, the military wing of the Palestinians' governing Hamas movement, held a street-corner news conference here, where a spokesman called on Sderot residents to leave the city "if they care about their lives."

Capt. Noa Meir, an Israeli military spokeswoman, said the Palestinian guerrillas "are going to try to prove they still have the ability to do this. Bringing rocket fire down to zero may be impossible."

Israeli forces, which pulled out of Gaza last year, have been entering the strip regularly since the June 25 cross-border raid in which gunmen killed two Israeli soldiers and captured Cpl. Gilad Shalit, a 20-year-old conscript now in the hands of Hamas's military wing. Operations have rarely lasted longer than a few days and have focused on reducing rocket fire and destroying tunnels used by Palestinians to smuggle weapons across Gaza's border with Egypt.

In recent days, senior Israeli military officers have argued for a broader assault on the strip, frustrated that the rocket attacks, while declining in intensity, have continued. Israel's security cabinet rejected the military's request Wednesday but voted to continue what Israeli officials describe as "pinpoint" operations.

The push Wednesday into Beit Hanoun brought Israeli troops as deep into Gaza as they have been in months, effectively sealing off the agricultural community of 28,000 people. Palestinian health officials said Israeli forces prevented ambulances from entering or exiting the small hospital in Beit Hanoun for hours. Israeli military officials said that the delay was the result of heavy fighting and that a humanitarian corridor into Beit Hanoun for Palestinian ambulances was opened after noon.

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas called the operation a "massacre," adding that he hoped "the Israeli escalation in the Gaza Strip would not affect the ongoing negotiations" over Shalit's release. Israeli and Palestinian officials, working through Egyptian mediators, have been seeking a deal that would free roughly 1,000 Palestinian prisoners in exchange for Shalit.

Hamas gunmen engaged Israeli troops as they crossed into Beit Hanoun around 1:30 a.m., firing rocket-propelled grenades and rifles with support fire from tanks and drones. An Israeli soldier identified as Staff Sgt. Kiril Golenshein, 21, was killed in the morning fighting.

DOJ_NMG_0090033

Golenshein is the third Israeli soldier killed in Gaza since Shalit's capture. Over that time, more than 250 Palestinians in Gaza have been killed by Israeli military forces; most of them were gunmen.

"We were exchanging fire with the special forces," said Rami Ehkrawat, 24, a Hamas gunmen recovering from a bullet wound in his left leg at Kamal Adwan Hospital in Beit Lahiya. "Our men heard Israeli soldiers screaming for help."

Ahmad Saadat, a 23-year-old Hamas gunman, was killed next to Ehkrawat. The dead also included three other Hamas gunmen -- Tareq Naser, 23; Husam Abu Herbeed, 26; and Ahmad Odwan, 20. Mohammed al-Masri, 23, of the radical group Islamic Jihad, and Fayez al-Zuwaidy, 27, of the Palestinian National Forces, a government security branch, were also killed. The affiliation of the seventh man, Khalil Hamad, 28, was unclear. [A] news service reported two additional deaths, both civilians, citing hospital officials.

Maazoza Abu Amsha, 60, said she peered out her window during the fighting and watched four Hamas gunmen stop a Palestinian ambulance. The men, she said, waved the ambulance on after determining it was not being used by Israeli special forces.

Seconds later, Abu Amsha said, a missile slammed into the men from the sky. She said she was wounded when a second missile landed nearby as she and about a dozen relatives tried to help the wounded.

"As long as Israel continues to target us, we will target Israel," said Abu Obaida, a spokesman for Hamas's military wing.

Al-Jazeera Plans To Battle Western Media (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, November 2, 2006

Al-Jazeera's taboo-smashing newscasts regularly vex politicians in Washington, but not nearly as much as they anger leaders in the Arab world, where the news channel has been banned from operating in 18 countries at one time or another.

Now, the network is launching its biggest gamble on its 10th anniversary — an English-language channel with an Arab perspective. Al-Jazeera International plans to hit the airwaves Nov. 15 and hopes to steal viewers from CNN and the BBC.

Feisty and sometimes graphic coverage of global carnage is an Al-Jazeera specialty, as is bracing commentary that has shaken up the Arab world and rattled the West.

"We have an edge over the other networks: We're already based in the Middle East. And we have a different perspective," director Wadah Khanfar told a news conference at the network's Doha headquarters Wednesday.

Al-Jazeera has been through a lot in 10 years, with three staffers killed in Iraq, another locked away without charge at the U.S. prison facility in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and a correspondent who interviewed Osama bin Laden convicted on terror charges in Spain.

Those it has covered have also suffered. The network is credited with waking up Arab TV viewers with brash discussions of banned topics. It questioned autocrats across the region and brought a large dollop of diplomatic clout to Qatar, a tiny sheikdom on the Persian Gulf. A frustrated President Bush even talked of bombing the channel's headquarters in 2004, according to a leaked British government memo.

"It made the airwaves uncontrollable," Amjad Nasser wrote Wednesday in the London-based pan-Arab daily Al-Quds Al-Arabi.

The fear Al-Jazeera inspires in the Arab world is best seen in Saudi Arabia, where the network has never been allowed to send a reporter — even those making personal pilgrimages to Mecca.

Worse, a Saudi boycott of the channel bars Al-Jazeera advertisers from doing business in the kingdom. The boycott has chased away almost all advertisers, leaving Al-Jazeera dependent on the deep pockets of Qatar's royal family.

"We are totally blocked from Saudi Arabia," Khanfar said. The station's employees are also banned from Iraq, Tunisia and Algeria, staffers said.

The network declines to say virtually anything about its finances, but it doesn't appear to be having money trouble. Al-Jazeera International has hired more than 500 staffers, poaching some of the world's best-known journalists from networks including the British Broadcasting Corp., CNN, CNBC and ABC. It will broadcast in ultra-expensive high-definition TV with four chief broadcast centers rather than CNN's two or BBC's one.

DOJ_NMG_0090034

Although its one-time anchor, Riz Khan, is among those who departed for Al-Jazeera International, CNN International said it welcomed the new competition.

"We're not worried," spokeswoman Susanna Flood said. "News channels are judged by what they do and not what they say they'll do."

Al-Jazeera says its goal is to reverse the information flow to the world's 1 billion English speakers who now have no choice but to watch Western-oriented broadcasters. Al-Jazeera International also appears to have natural audiences among the world's 1.2 billion Muslims, most of whom don't speak Arabic.

Before taking on the big networks, however, it first needs to be seen, which requires coaxing hundreds of global cable TV operators to carry its signal. This has been tough in many countries, the station's commercial director Lindsey Oliver said — not least the United States, where the Bush administration has accused Al-Jazeera of anti-American bias.

Some U.S. cable carriers are adopting a "show-me" policy, waiting to see what sort of opposition it generates before agreeing to carry it, said Michael Holtzman, a PR spokesman for the network.

"There's no better way to demystify Al-Jazeera than by putting it on the air," Holtzman said. "Most Americans don't speak Arabic, so they haven't had the opportunity to draw their own conclusions."

On Nov. 15, the new 24-hour network will be available to at least 40 million households worldwide via cable in Western Europe, the Middle East, Australia, Malaysia and a few other places, Oliver said.

In the United States, she said, at least one major cable provider and one major satellite provider will carry it, but she declined to identify them.

Comcast, the largest U.S. cable provider, does not plan to be one of them, spokeswoman Jenny Moyer said.

Cox Communications, the third-largest provider, has talked with Al-Jazeera but has not decided whether to carry it, Cox media relations director Stephanie Davis said.

Al-Jazeera has been trying to smooth its entry into the vital U.S. market by casting the channel as the ideal forum for the Bush administration to talk to the Muslim world. Al-Jazeera has had meetings in the White House, with members of Congress and at the State Department and Pentagon, Oliver said.

It has also met with American Jewish media leaders and interest groups to discuss its portrayal of Israel, Holtzman said.

Israel, one of the few countries in the Middle East that has never banned Al-Jazeera, is itself a lucrative target market. Oliver said she was in discussions with Israeli providers.

"There's huge interest for this channel in Israel," she said. "That wouldn't be the case if we were going to be unbalanced."

The network also said it was launching a pan-Arab newspaper, also called Al-Jazeera, to compete with other Arabic dailies.

Taiwan Set For New Clash With Beijing (FT)

By Kathrin Hille

Financial Times, November 2, 2006

Chen Shui-bian, Taiwan's president, has suggested his country could "freeze" its current constitution and adopt a new one, a move likely to re-ignite tensions with China.

Speaking to the Financial Times, Mr Chen said that defining the scope of Taiwan's sovereignty and territory was "extremely serious, complicated and sensitive, but also extremely important".

The remarks indicate that Mr Chen intends to challenge Beijing further before he steps down in May 2008.

China retains a threat of war against the self-ruled island in case it formalises its de-facto independence. Past moves by Taiwan to amend its constitution – in place since 1947 – have provoked stern warnings from Beijing.

Altering Taiwan's constitution would be difficult since any change would require a three-fourths majority in the opposition-dominated parliament. A change would also require approval by at least 50 per cent of the electorate in a referendum.

However, Mr Chen pledged to put constitutional change at the centre of the agenda for his remaining time in office. "I must pursue three big movements [including pushing for] a new constitution which truly fits Taiwan," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0090035

Mr Chen's comments indicate he could adopt a more audacious course in strengthening Taiwan's separation from China before he steps down, an approach which would unsettle cross-Strait relations after more than two years of relative quiet.

Mr Chen triggered warnings from China and the US in late 2003 and again in early 2004 when he first proposed a new constitution and pushed for Taiwan's first island-wide referendum.

His remarks appear designed to regain support among Taiwanese nationalist voters, a group his ruling party badly needs to win over before a series of forthcoming elections.

Taiwan's current "Republic of China" constitution refers to the country's territory only as "existing national boundaries" rather than spelling out precisely what comprises the national territory. However, since it was written in China after the second world war for all of China, it is widely understood to refer to the then Chinese territory, which stretched as far as Mongolia.

Mr Chen said Taiwan should discuss the idea of a "Second Republic" – a concept raised by one of his former pro-independence advisers – to free the country of what he called an "absurd and unrealistic" definition of sovereignty, without openly provoking China.

"[Under this concept] the current constitution would be frozen, and a new Taiwan constitution would be written," he said. "Freezing the [Republic of China] constitution also means keeping some kind of a link to the [old] ROC constitution and not cutting it off completely."

The preamble to a new constitution could address the territory of Taiwan, but the relevant sections of the old constitution defining the territory would not be touched, thus avoiding a change to the status quo, Mr Chen said.

The ideas discussed by Mr Chen represent ways technically to honour his previous commitments not to declare Taiwanese independence.

But the president made clear that he feels no more than formally bound by these commitments: "We are not breaking these commitments. But Taiwan still wants to continue to walk down our own path of democracy, of freedom, of human rights, and of peace."

African Leaders, China To Meet On Investment (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

BEIJING -- Forty-eight African leaders will convene in Beijing tomorrow, with Chinese officials unusually defensive about suggestions that they are exploiting Africa to satisfy their country's growing economic needs.

The heads of state are expected to participate in the unprecedented three-day gathering that many foreign diplomats and analysts describe as a "charm offensive." Chinese leaders reject that term.

Accusations of a Chinese threat to Africa are unfounded, state council member and former Foreign Minister Tang Jiaxuan said last week. He took pains to reassure Americans and others that China will not threaten their interests in the continent.

Chinese involvement "will not affect the cooperation of China or African countries with a third party, nor will it hurt the interests of any third party," Mr. Tang told the Xinhua news agency. "Quite on the contrary, strengthened China-Africa cooperation and common development will only bring good opportunities for the rest of the world."

A day before Mr. Tang spoke, World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz accused China and its banks of ignoring human rights and environmental standards when lending to certain African countries.

"I hope, in time, our viewpoints will converge," Mr. Wolfowitz told Les Echos, the French sister newspaper of the Financial Times.

In September, the Zambian opposition's presidential candidate, Michael Sata, called the Chinese in his country "exploitative investors" who "ill-treat our people."

"Foreign relations must benefit all concerned," he said. "It must not be a one-way street. Chinese investment has not added any value to the lives of the people of Zambia. We want investors ... who add value."

The China-Africa Cooperation Forum was established in 2000, but its highest-level sessions have been ministerial meetings. The summit that begins tomorrow will be the largest gathering of Chinese and African leaders in history.

DOJ_NMG_0090036

China's investment in Africa has exceeded $6 billion, according to Ministry of Commerce statistics. More than 800 nonfinancial investment projects have been set up in 49 African countries, covering trade, manufacturing and processing, resource development, communications, agriculture and other areas.

Government figures show that by the end of last year, China had invested in 27 major oil and natural-gas projects in 14 African countries, including Sudan, Algeria, Angola and Nigeria. It imported more than 38 million tons of crude oil from Africa in 2005, or about 30 percent of its total oil imports.

In the first six months of this year, Sino-African trade totaled $25.6 billion, up 41 percent from the same period last year.

U.S. officials said they will scrutinize the summit, but that China's interest in Africa is not necessarily a negative development. If conducted properly, respecting international standards and following transparent practices, Chinese investment could help Africa and the world economy as a whole, they said.

"We welcome not only Chinese, but any country's efforts to bring about economic development and positive change in Africa," said a senior State Department official in Washington. "We hope the Chinese will engage with African regimes and emphasize the importance of democracy and human rights."

Jendayi Frazer, assistant secretary of state for African affairs, urged China earlier this year to invest in sectors other than oil, which would "contribute to Africa's growth and development" rather than just helping China's economic growth.

Mauro De Lorenzo, resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute in Washington, said China also has "increased military cooperation and arms sales" to Africa. He added that, because of the lack of transparency, "nobody knows if the Chinese are making money in Africa."

"The Chinese interest has no doubt raised Africa's status," he said. "For the first time, we are talking about Africa in terms of what it has to offer, not what it needs."

Mr. De Lorenzo noted that the Sept. 28 Zambian election marked the first time that China openly interfered in another country's affairs.

After Mr. Sata's anti-China comments, Beijing's ambassador to Zambia, Li Baodong, suggested that bilateral ties would suffer and Chinese investors might pull out if Mr. Sata won. He did not.

China's Great Haul: 15 Billionaires (USAT)

By Calum Macleod

USA Today, November 2, 2006

SHANGHAI — Forget Chairman Mao's workers' paradise. Communist China is taking a great leap toward huge private fortunes.

Forbes' annual list of the richest Chinese out today includes a record 15 billionaires, up from 10 last year and just three in 2004.

That's chump change in the USA, where all 400 on Forbes' list of richest Americans are billionaires. Still, a country that once persecuted disciples of free enterprise is now barreling down the capitalist road.

China's new billionaires have profited from enterprises ranging from selling TVs to recycling paper to building condos. “Chinese are born with entrepreneurialism in their genes,” says Russell Flannery, who compiled Forbes' list.

The combined worth of China's richest 40 jumped nearly 50% from last year to $38 billion. The minimum fortune to gain entry to the exclusive club: $514 million.

Topping the list is electrical appliance king Wong Kwong Yu, 37, whose worth is estimated at $2.3 billion. That's 4% of the value of the world's richest man, Microsoft co-founder Bill Gates.

China's recent surge in mega-wealth is “comparable to the U.S. at the end of the 19th century, when you had the Rockefellers and Carnegies,” says Rupert Hoogewerf, CEO of Hurun Report, a rival list of the rich.

The late Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping paved the way for today's billionaires in the 1980s, when he freed the economy from the straitjacket of central planning imposed by Mao Zedong, the revolutionary founder of the People's Republic of China.

DOJ_NMG_0090037

The percent of households with large fortunes in a country of 1.3 billion is still tiny. Los Angeles County has 263,000 millionaire households, about the same number as all of China, according to an April 2006 survey by the research firm TNS Financial Services.

The prospect of many more millionaires in coming years has lured representatives of companies that peddle high-end goods to Shanghai this week for China's Luxury Summit. They are talking about how to cash in on China's burgeoning wealth.

Tom Murry, president of New York-based Calvin Klein, says on his first visit to China in 1974 that he saw "dirt roads and everybody wearing the same clothes."

Today, Calvin Klein has 43 stores in China. In March, it plans to open its first Calvin Klein Collection luxury store in Beijing. China, Murry says, has undergone "a radical change, the biggest transformation in any country I've ever observed."

Bill Hutchinson, general manager of Simpson Marine, a yacht dealer based in Hong Kong, agrees. "The wealth and speed of growth in China is staggering," says Hutchinson, who predicts boat sales will soon rival those in the USA. "The lure of China's riches are profound for all the luxury goods purveyors. We're like chickens sitting on an egg. When it hatches, it's going to be a big chicken."

Chinese Activist's Verdict Overturned (WP)

By Maureen Fan

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

BEIJING, Nov. 1 -- Rights activists and lawyers on Wednesday hailed an overturned verdict in the case of a blind legal activist as a victory over corrupt officials in China.

"This is a success of the central party committee practicing rule of law," said Li Jinsong, lawyer for Chen Guangcheng, a self-taught legal activist blinded by a childhood illness. "This is a success of the Chinese people fighting against corrupt officials and safeguarding the dignity of law."

Chen and his supporters have been beaten, jailed and placed under house arrest since embarrassing local officials by exposing forced abortions and sterilizations in eastern Shandong province last year.

At his trial, conducted by Judge Wang Jun in Yinan County People's Court, Chen was deprived of his own legal counsel. He was sentenced in August to more than four years in prison for disrupting traffic and damaging property. Supporters said the charges were trumped up and noted that Chen was under guard or house arrest at the time of the incident in question.

Chen appealed his sentence to the Linyi City Intermediate Court, which decided Monday to overturn the verdict and send the case back to Yinan People's Court to be retried. That trial could come in about six weeks, lawyers said.

Chen's wife, Yuan Weijing, said this week's decision "shows that there are some serious problems with the first trial" and said she believed authorities had been under great pressure to make concessions. Chen's case has garnered international attention. Diplomats have said the trial made a mockery of China's stated aim to improve the rule of law.

While Yuan said she was overjoyed by the developments, she also expressed caution about expectations for a second trial.

"It's really hard for me to predict the result of the retrial, because I'm still under house arrest," she said. "If I don't have freedom, villagers will still be under great pressure. If I don't have freedom, witnesses will not talk frankly in the court. If I don't have freedom, the case will not be judged justly."

Li, the lawyer, said he was optimistic.

"There is still hope for us," he said. "The current result shows that the first verdict was illegitimate, and the prosecution against Guangcheng has been effectively contaminated."

Bush Renews US Sanctions On Sudan (AFP-Y)

AFP, November 2, 2006

US President George W. Bush renewed US economic sanctions on Sudan for one year and left open the door to imposing new ones linked to the violence in Darfur, the White House said.

"I have determined that it is necessary to continue the national emergency and to maintain sanctions against Sudan," Bush said in a letter to the US Congress released by the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0090038

The US president cited actions and policies that "are hostile to US interests and pose a continuing unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security and foreign policy of the United States."

The United States has a wide range of economic sanctions in force against Sudan, from bans on trade and all oil and petrochemical transactions to prohibitions on selling defense-relate goods to Khartoum.

In addition, "the United States has designated individuals at the United Nations under targeted sanctions, in the form of an assets freeze and travel ban," said White House national security spokesman Gordon Johndroe.

Washington "is prepared to pursue the designation of additional individuals that continue to commit violence and impede the peace process in Darfur," he said.

Turkey's EU Bid Quietly Loses Steam (WSJ)

By Philip Shishkin

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

Cengiz Candar has backed Turkey's bid to join the European Union for two decades.

These days, however, Mr. Candar, a former adviser to the Turkish leader who drafted the country's 1987 EU application, is having doubts. "It's not a sentiment of love," Mr. Candar says of Turkey's stance toward the European bloc. "It's a marriage of convenience."

Mr. Candar's skepticism is one measure of how Turkey-EU relations have deteriorated to the point where a total collapse of the membership bid is possible.

Next week, the European Commission is scheduled to issue a report card on Turkey's first year of membership talks, launched nearly two decades after the original application. The report is expected to be so poor that commission President José Manuel Barroso has warned that the talks could come to a "traumatic stop" if Turkey doesn't meet more requirements soon. With public support for the Turkish bid sliding well below 50% both across Europe and inside Turkey, the talks have come close to being suspended, with recriminations on both sides.

Cengiz Aktar, one of Turkey's foremost EU commentators, describes the dynamic between the two sides as "the coalition of the unwilling."

Successive U.S. administrations have backed the idea of Turkey's membership as a way to bind this Muslim democracy of 70 million into the Western fold. It would help bridge the growing divide between the West and the Islamic world, and show that there's nothing inherently incompatible between a secularly governed Muslim country and the West. At a time when much of the Middle East has embraced either political Islam or secular dictatorship as a model of governance, Turkey stands almost alone with its open political system.

Turkey's rejection by the EU would be seen by many Muslims as further evidence that the West is hostile to Muslims and seeks to subdue them. The West's regional image is already tarnished by the U.S.-led war in Iraq, the Israeli bombing of Lebanon and Pope Benedict XVI's recent critical comments about Islam, which inflamed anger that is likely to resurface when the pope visits Turkey this month.

For Turkey, any breakdown of the talks could hurt its economy and slow down the process of domestic overhauls that have delivered more transparent governance and macroeconomic stability. It would also strengthen the hand of nationalist forces that have long believed that Turkey's alliances with the West aren't necessary.

"The most valuable part of the [EU] process is the realignment of [Turkish] institutions toward a liberal-democratic stance," says Serhan Cevik, a Turkish native who is a Turkey analyst at Morgan Stanley in London. "The EU also gives you the anchor effect, and that improves predictability, which is valuable for investors."

But European officials have warned that unless Turkey makes some steep concessions, negotiations could come to a halt when EU leaders meet in December. Diplomats say the odds favor a compromise that allows talks to continue. "If the European Commission were to freeze some negotiating chapters...it would be a joke. They're already frozen," says Volkan Bozkir, Turkey's ambassador to the EU, noting that after a year of talks, only one of the 35 chapters for negotiation has been opened. He blames obstructionist tactics by EU states opposed to Turkey's membership.

DOJ_NMG_0090039

The EU blames Turkey's failure to meet commitments it made when negotiations began. Olli Rehn, the EU's official in charge of extending membership to new countries, has expressed frustration at Turkey's slow progress since the start of negotiations in implementing the legislative and other changes that it needs to go forward. "We should be both fair and firm" with Turkey, said Mr. Rehn, who has also criticized the European opposition to Turkish membership, chiefly from Austria, Germany and France.

Many Turks accuse Europe of looking for ways to derail the talks by coming up with new and ever-more-difficult-to-meet demands. "Even if you catch a bird with your mouth, they will invent another trick" for the Turks to perform, Mr. Candar says, quoting an old Turkish adage.

By the time the EU decided to open formal accession talks in December 2004, Turkey had adopted overhauls so far-reaching that some local commentators called them "a silent revolution." Turkey extended greater rights to its restive Kurdish minority, limited the role of the military in the state affairs, and perhaps most symbolically, the Turkish government showed new flexibility on settling the decades-long impasse on the island of Cyprus, which is divided into the Greek South and the Turkish North. But progress on Cyprus quickly fizzled out, through no fault of Turkey, and remains the subject of a continuing deadlock with the EU.

While Turkish Cypriots voted for reunification in a 2004 referendum, Greek Cypriots rejected it, then went on to join the EU where they've become among the toughest critics of Turkey. The EU is now demanding that Turkey end an embargo on the ports and airports of the Greek Cyprus, but Turkey says it will only do that if the EU lifts its blockade of Turkish Cyprus. The deadlock continues. After 2004, when the EU decided to open talks, the Turkish government slowed down the pace of change. "The calculation was: We have achieved great success and should take credit for it," says Mr. Aktar, the EU commentator.

Turkey has also been unfortunate in the timing of its bid. After admitting 10 mainly Eastern European countries in 2004, and with Romania and Bulgaria to come in January, there is a sense of enlargement fatigue within the EU. Also across Europe, there are growing suspicions of how well Europe's own Muslim communities can integrate into European secular culture, adding further strain to Turkey's bid.

Since 2004, when the EU decided to open talks, Austria threatened to veto their launch so it could add conditions; France said it would hold a referendum before admitting Turkey; and most recently, the French parliament passed a law making it a crime to deny that Turks committed genocide against ethnic Armenians early last century -- a genocide Turkey denies. The bill further convinced many Turks that Europe is simply seeking to humiliate them instead of holding constructive talks.

US Seeks Return Of Democracy Organization To Bahrain (AFP)

AFP, November 2, 2006

A US official said she had urged Bahraini officials to allow a US-funded organization that promotes democracy in developing nations to resume activities in the Gulf monarchy.

"I discussed the return of NDI to Bahrain," undersecretary for public diplomacy and public affairs Karen Hughes told reporters in reference to the National Democratic Institute, whose Bahrain representative was asked to leave the country last May.

"We are disappointed that NDI left Bahrain ... NDI played a positive role in Bahrain as well in other countries like Kuwait and Yemen," she said.

Hughes, whose visit to Bahrain came in the runup to parliamentary and municipal elections on November 25, met with Crown Prince Sheikh Salman bin Hamad al-Khalifa.

The NDI's representative in Bahrain, a close US ally that hosts the US Navy's Fifth Fleet, said in May he had been asked by authorities to leave the country. The representative, Fawzy Gouled, said he was not given an explanation.

The NDI, loosely affiliated with the Democratic Party of the United States and funded in part by the US government, is a non-profit organization founded in 1983 to channel grants for promoting democratic institutions in the developing world.

Starting 2002, the Institute organized a series of democracy-building training courses in Bahrain, working with association leaders, municipal officials and parliamentarians.

Their activities have been sharply criticized by Islamist lawmakers, Shiite religious leaders and members of government, who accused the organization of interfering in Bahrain's internal affairs.

DOJ_NMG_0090040

The NDI maintains field offices in some 50 nations in Africa, Asia, Latin America and the Middle East, and is currently chaired by former US secretary of state Madeleine Albright.

Rivals For U.N. Council Seat Reach Deal To Back Panama (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Nov. 1 -- Guatemala and Venezuela agreed Wednesday to withdraw from the race for a seat on the U.N. Security Council and support Panama as a consensus candidate, Ecuador's U.N. ambassador said.

With the backing of the two countries, Panama's election to a two-year term on the Security Council is virtually certain.

The announcement by Ambassador Diego Cordovez, who hosted two meetings Wednesday between the foreign ministers of Guatemala and Venezuela, ends a deadlock between the two countries that dragged on through 47 votes.

The voting has become highly political because the United States is supporting Guatemala over leftist Venezuela, whose fiercely anti-American president, Hugo ChÃ¡vez, referred last month to President Bush as "the devil" in a speech to the U.N. General Assembly.

With pressure mounting from Latin American countries to break the deadlock, Guatemalan Foreign Minister Gert Rosenthal and Venezuelan Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro met Wednesday morning, and again for two hours in the late afternoon, to discuss withdrawing from the race and supporting a third candidate.

Asked why Panama had been selected, Rosenthal said: "It's a country that unites South America and Central America. We're concerned about the idea of divisions between the north and the south of Latin America. We would like to put that idea to rest by seeking a country that is well received at both extremes of our continent."

Latin Fight For U.N. Security Council Seat Ends (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela, Nov. 1 — Venezuela and Guatemala agreed Wednesday to withdraw from their race for a seat on the United Nations Security Council and to support Panama as a candidate. Their agreement ended a drawn-out contest that had shown the limits of the efforts by the Venezuelan president, Hugo Chávez, to find a prominent platform for his views.

Diego Cordovez, Ecuador's ambassador to the United Nations, announced in New York the choice of Panama as a consensus candidate to represent the region, after weeks of voting that began Oct. 16. The compromise came after 47 rounds of voting in the United Nations in which neither Guatemala nor Venezuela attained the two-thirds majority of the 192-member General Assembly needed for the seat.

"This is moment of isolation for Venezuela on the world stage," said Milos Alcalay, a former Venezuelan ambassador to the United Nations under Mr. Chávez, who resigned in 2004, saying the government was violating democratic principles. "The democratic left in Latin America was becoming alienated by Venezuela's militaristic language."

Venezuelan diplomats had positioned the race largely as a contest between Mr. Chávez's foreign policy and that of the Bush administration, describing efforts by the United States to support Guatemala's candidacy as "gross blackmail." The presidents of Bolivia and the Dominican Republic said they had been approached by Venezuelan officials as possible alternatives.

Still, officials here have been describing the episode as a victory illustrating the capacity of a developing country to stand up to the "empire," as the United States is frequently called in Venezuelan government circles. "Chávez will try to find a way to use this to his favor," said Elsa Cardozo, a political analyst at the Central University of Venezuela. "This is not a government looking to become more moderate."

Venezuela agreed with Syria and Iran on Wednesday to build a $1.5 billion oil refinery in Syria. Venezuela has been strengthening ties with the two Middle Eastern countries, in addition to other nations on the fringe of American influence like Belarus and Cuba, in an effort to counter the power of the United States.

While Venezuela's effort to win the seat for a nonpermanent member of the United Nations Security Council illustrated the limits of Mr. Chávez's international ambitions, it also showed how Venezuela had been able to cement regional alliances. While the balloting was secret, news reports have said that South American countries like Argentina, Brazil and Uruguay, which have increasingly important commercial ties with Venezuela, supported Mr. Chávez.

DOJ_NMG_0090041

Most Caribbean countries also reportedly voted in favor of Venezuela, following intensive efforts by Mr. Chávez's government to extend its exports of oil on favorable terms to countries in the region.

A turning point against Venezuela's effort to win the seat seemed to come during a speech by Mr. Chávez at the United Nations in September, when he ridiculed Mr. Bush as the devil. That comment appeared to influence some of the diplomats who decided to vote for Guatemala. Still, Mr. Chávez's description of Mr. Bush played well with many people in Venezuela, where wariness over the tacit approval by the United States of the brief coup that ousted Mr. Chávez in 2002 has pervaded relations between the two countries.

Sometimes relations tilt toward the surreal. The National Assembly, which is controlled by Mr. Chávez's supporters, recently called on the Bush administration to explain why it had carried out the attack on the World Trade Center.

Panama In Line For UN Security Council Seat (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, November 2, 2006

Venezuela and Guatemala agreed to abandon their competing bids to win a two-year seat on the UN Security Council, settling on Panama as a compromise candidate.

The race, which reached 47 rounds, had pitched supporters of Hugo Chavez, the populist Venezuelan president, against allies of the US, in an angry battle of competing visions for the future of the United Nations.

Guatemala held a consistent lead throughout the contest, but it never attained the two-thirds majority necessary for victory. Venezuela had been expected to win greater support, but nonetheless claimed success in staving off the US-backed candidate's ambitions.

Diego Cordovez, Ecuador's UN ambassador, yesterday said both countries had "agreed that Panama will be the country that will replace them as a candidate for the Security Council", paving the way for a quick resolution to the deadlock.

The 35-member Latin American and Caribbean group must still approve the choice, followed by a vote in the General Assembly, but the agreement is unlikely to face major opposition.

Venezuela had earlier backed Bolivia as the country to replace its bid, but that choice was equally unpalatable to the US. The choice of Panama, which is seen as closer to the US camp, came as something of a surprise, with many analysts expecting Dominican Republic instead.

Venezuela last week indicated it was ready to withdraw, but Guatemala had resisted a deal. Gert Rosenthal, its foreign minister, yesterday said his government had withdrawn reluctantly, even though it won 46 of the 47 rounds of voting.

Panama, assuming its candidacy is accepted, will join four other new members – South Africa, Indonesia, Italy and Belgium – on next year's council. Peru, the Republic of Congo, Ghana, Qatar and Slovakia will remain another year.

The five permanent members of the council are the US, UK, France, Britain and Russia. Some diplomats feared a Venezuelan victory would have significantly increased the difficulty of pushing through controversial resolutions in the council, such as current proposals for sanctions on Iran – leading to endless speeches.

But the presence of South Africa and Indonesia is still likely to make discussions more difficult next year, and the US and Europe are hoping to resolve the Iran issue before the changeover.

Venezuela To Sell D.C. Oil At Discount (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

Venezuela will provide heavily discounted heating oil to about 37,000 low-income families in Maryland, Virginia and the District this winter, Caracas' envoy to the United States said yesterday.

The local jurisdictions are beneficiaries of a greatly expanded program that this winter will assist more than 400,000 families in 16 U.S. states and the District, up from eight states and 180,000 families last year, said Ambassador Bernardo Alvarez Herrera.

DOJ_NMG_0090042

Oil provided under the expanded program, first mentioned by President Hugo Chavez during a fiery speech to the United Nations in September, will be distributed through local governments, community centers and churches, and will be offered at 40 percent below the market price.

"This will give people a chance to have additional supply of heating oil," Mr. Alvarez told editors and reporters during a luncheon at The Washington Times. "We are not making as much money as we could be, but extraordinary times require extraordinary measures."

This will be the first time that Washington-area families benefit from the program, which is still being negotiated by Citgo, the oil company controlled by the Venezuelan government, and the Citizens Energy Corp., a non-profit group founded by Joseph P. Kennedy II, said an aide to Mr. Alvarez.

Citizens Energy officials could not be reached for comment late yesterday. Mr. Kennedy is a former congressman from Massachusetts and the son of Robert F. Kennedy.

The heating-oil program, which started last year, again includes jurisdictions in Delaware, Pennsylvania, New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Maine and Vermont. Other newcomers this year are Alaska, New Jersey, Michigan, Minnesota, Indiana and Wisconsin, Mr. Alvarez said.

Several communities that had been considering the Venezuelan offer rejected it after Mr. Chavez described President Bush as "the devil" in his speech to the U.N. General Assembly.

In Alaska, many Eskimo and Indian villages say they have no choice but to accept the oil, but others would rather suffer.

"As a citizen of this country, you can have your own opinion of our president and our country. But I don't want a foreigner coming in here and bashing us," Justine Gunderson, administrator for the tribal council in the Aleut village of Nelson Lagoon, told the Associated Press last month. "Even though we are in economically dire straits, it was the right choice to make."

Nelson Lagoon residents pay more than $5 for a gallon of oil -- or at least $300 a month per household -- to heat their homes along the wind-swept coast of the Bering Sea, where temperatures can dip to minus 15 degrees.

Asked why Mr. Chavez's government is worried about poor Americans while poverty in his own country remains a problem, the ambassador said the profit Venezuela is forfeiting from its discounted sales in the United States is not enough to make a difference for Venezuela's needy.

"The problem with poverty in our country is not money, it's management," he said.

The United States and Venezuela have had a tenuous relationship since Mr. Chavez came to power in 1999. Mr. Chavez has partnered with other U.S. adversaries, such as Cuba and Iran, to challenge the dominant role of the United States in world affairs.

Nevertheless, Venezuela wants American businesses to continue investing in the South American country, and Mr. Alvarez repeatedly urged the United States yesterday to import more oil from relatively nearby Venezuela, rather than the distant Middle East.

He said, however, that Caracas had decided to purchase future commercial aircraft from Airbus, the European company, instead of Boeing, for fear that U.S. sanctions would bar Venezuela from buying spare parts from the United States.

On another recent dispute that threatened to decrease the number of flights U.S. airlines are allowed to operate to Venezuela, the ambassador said his government will preserve the status quo, having won more flight licenses for Venezuelan carriers to the United States.

Mr. Alvarez, a 50-year-old political scientist, has been ambassador to Washington since 2003. He has held various positions in the Venezuelan government, rising to a vice minister of energy and mines.

'Yes, You Will Be Thoroughly Beaten' (WSJ)

By Arnold Tsunga

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

A tsunami has rolled through Zimbabwe, different from the tidal waves that hit Asia in 2004. Ours came last year, in the form of bulldozers and soldiers. Vibrant towns were reduced to flat and desolate grounds. More than 700,000 people lost their homes and livelihood. Why?

DOJ_NMG_0090043

President Robert Mugabe thought that the poor people who lived in these urban areas represented a political threat. He feared that the citizens might mobilize against him. So he launched a pre-emptive strike against those already suffering under his policies. He called it "Operation Murambatsvina," literally "Operation Clear the Filth" -- the "filth" being hundreds of thousands of Zimbabwean men, women and children who were internally displaced, many of whom continue to live without access to humanitarian assistance today.

Zimbabwe was once a success story in Africa, but over his long rule Mr. Mugabe has dragged us all down. Under the pretext of pan-Africanism, he has created a system of terror for the majority and patronage for the elite few. Our inflation is estimated to be the highest rate in the world. According to the WHO, Zimbabweans have the shortest life expectancy world-wide -- the average life span has halved to only 35 years old today from 69 in 2000.

In the past six years, the government of Zimbabwe has increasingly turned to repressive and often violent means to suppress criticism from the opposition and civil society. Opposition political parties have been stifled. Police and other state-sponsored agents routinely intimidate, attack and torture government critics, including members of civil-society organizations, human-rights lawyers, journalists and trade unionists. At the same time, the police use repressive laws to silence critical voices in the remnants of civil society. Americans may take for granted the essential freedoms of speech and assembly. But in Zimbabwe, printing presses have been bombed and newspapers have been closed for criticizing Mr. Mugabe.

In reaction to recent waves of protests against deteriorating social and economic conditions, the Zimbabwean government this autumn intensified its campaign to suppress those of us who are peacefully dissenting. On Sept. 25, the government violently ended a peaceful march by some 500 activists from the National Constitutional Assembly in Harare. Riot police armed with batons blocked the march, ordered the activists to sit down, and proceeded to beat them one at a time with batons. During the beatings, people panicked, leading to a stampede that injured several dozen.

Mr. Mugabe has thrown himself into this campaign to stifle critics. Responding to the arrest and torture of 15 trade-union activists in September, he said "some are crying that they were beaten. Yes, you will be thoroughly beaten."

Today, Zimbabwe's man-made human-rights catastrophe is bleeding across the region, as Zimbabweans continue to stream into South Africa to escape the deteriorating political and economic conditions at home. An estimated 1.2 to 3 million Zimbabweans refugees now live in South Africa, and the stability of the Southern African region is increasingly at stake.

The effort to fight HIV/AIDS has also suffered serious setbacks. According to a report by Human Rights Watch, Mr. Mugabe's forced evictions have disrupted access to treatment and health care for thousands of Zimbabweans living with HIV. Today, more than a year after the evictions, many still live in appalling conditions, without shelter or in overcrowded houses. As a result they are left not only more prone to opportunistic infections such as pneumonia and tuberculosis, but also exposed to a more resistant strain of HIV with potentially catastrophic consequences for the whole region.

After working for many years as a commercial lawyer in Mutare, I was abducted, tortured and threatened for simply defending individuals who stood in the way of Mr. Mugabe. My co-workers and I have been arrested and dragged to the courts for trying to document and create an official record of government abuses. Some people ask me why I bother using the legal system when the deck is so stacked against us. I answer that there is still a semblance of a court system and some brave judges who will uphold the law. But they are operating in straitjackets and desperately need support to continue doing the right thing.

We in Zimbabwe will continue our long fight to restore civil society, the rule of law and basic human rights. But we need the support of the international community.

Human-rights defenders in Zimbabwe face enormous risks as they fight for reparations and resettlement of the hundreds of thousands made homeless by Mr. Mugabe's evictions. The U.S. can support these activists through the provision of technical assistance and other forms of targeted support. Greater humanitarian assistance is also required for the victims of the evictions who today remain in desperate need of housing, food and other forms of assistance.

The crisis in Zimbabwe does not just affect Zimbabwe. It destabilizes the entire region. It also tests the interests of Western society. For example, in the absence of concerted U.S. assistance and support, Beijing has seen a strategic opportunity to fill a vacuum: China is moving in to fill the gap in Zimbabwe and other developing countries -- without any concern for human rights or democracy.

DOJ_NMG_0090044

Zimbabwe Lawyers for Human Rights stands for a Zimbabwe that adheres to constitutionalism, the independence of the judiciary and respect for basic human rights. Just as Mr. Mugabe has used law with tsunami-like force for his own political ends, our vision is to use it to rebuild a just, stable and democratic society that adheres to the rule of law.

Mr. Tsunga is the executive director of Zimbabwe Lawyers for Human Rights. He will be awarded Human Rights Watch's top honor at the organization's Voices for Justice dinner tonight in New York City.

Punished For Being Female (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

Bride burnings, honor killings, female infanticide, sex trafficking, mass rape as a weapon of war and many other hideous forms of violence against women are documented in a report released last month by the United Nations.

The report, a compilation of many studies from around the world, should have been seen as the latest dispatch from that permanent world war — the war against women all over the planet. Instead, the news media greeted its shocking contents with a collective yawn.

The war analogy is not an overstatement. In many parts of the world, men beat, torture, rape and kill women with impunity. In Ciudad Juárez, a Mexican city on the Texas border, 300 to 400 women have been murdered over the past several years. Many were raped and mutilated. The widespread belief that punishment for these crimes was unlikely was a "key factor" in their occurrence, the report said.

Each year thousands of wives in India are murdered and maimed — many of them doused with kerosene and set ablaze — by husbands dissatisfied by the size of their dowries or angry about their wives' behavior. In Ethiopia, the abduction and rape of young girls is a commonplace way to obtain a bride. In many instances the parents agree to the marriage, believing that the raped child is no longer fit to marry anyone else.

In Pakistan, a woman cannot legally prove that she was raped unless four "virtuous" Muslim men testify that they witnessed the attack. Without those four witnesses, the woman herself is vulnerable to prosecution for fornication or adultery.

While it's undoubtedly true that men maim and kill other men in astonishing numbers, what I'm talking about here is the way that women, by the millions, are systematically targeted for attack because they are women.

In some cases the sexual violence comes in vast, sickening waves. Just think, for example, of Darfur, Congo, Sudan and the former Yugoslavia. As the report noted, "The incidence of violence against women in armed conflict, particularly sexual violence, including rape, has been increasingly acknowledged and documented."

More than 130 million girls and women are living with the consequences of genital mutilation, and many others have died from this barbaric practice. Jessica Neuwirth, the president of Equality Now, an international women's rights organization, said, "Everyone who's been cut knows someone who died from the cutting. They die from bleeding, or later from infection, or sometime later in life they have enormous health problems."

The litany of serious abuses against women and girls can seem endless: child marriages, forced marriages, kidnapping and forced prostitution, sex slavery. According to the U.N. report, "A study in India estimated that prenatal sex selection and infanticide have accounted for half a million missing girls per year for the past two decades."

The most common form of serious abuse against women and girls around the globe is violence by intimate partners. Huge percentages of female murder victims, even in such developed countries as Australia, Canada, Israel and the United States, are killed by current or former husbands or boyfriends.

A study of young, female murder victims in the U.S. found that homicide was the second leading cause of death for girls 15 to 18, and that 78 percent of all the homicide victims in the study had been killed by an acquaintance or intimate partner.

The U.N. report tells us what we should already have concluded: that this pervasive violence against women, "whether perpetrated by the state and its agents, or by family members or strangers, in the public or private sphere, in peacetime or in times of conflict," is unacceptable.

Not only are we not doing enough to counter this wholesale destruction of the lives of so many women and girls, we're not even paying close attention. There are women's movements in even the smallest countries fighting against the violence and other forms of abuse. But they are underfunded and get very little support from those in a position to help. (Even in Afghanistan under the Taliban there were women who ran underground schools, and girls who risked their lives to go to them.)

DOJ_NMG_0090045

There was a time when activists cried out for our consciousness to be raised. It's not too late. We can start by recognizing that the systematic subordination and brutalization of women and girls around the world is, in fact, occurring — and that we need to do something about it.

Why Meddle In Nicaragua? (WP)

By Michael Shifter

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

As Latin America's busy election cycle winds down, the Bush administration deserves a lot of credit. In election after election it has shown admirable restraint and has wisely avoided taking sides. Nicaragua, however, has been the exception. U.S. conduct in advance of Sunday's election has been anything but restrained. The Bush administration has blotted its otherwise exemplary record in a small and impoverished Central American country -- probably the one in which there is the least at stake for U.S. interests.

Washington has been in a dither about the prospect of former Sandinista president Daniel Ortega returning to power after 16 years. To be sure, an Ortega win would not be cause for celebration. He has essentially become a corrupt and cynical party boss, intent on amassing and maintaining power. His pact in 2000 with former president Arnoldo Aleman, who was later convicted of embezzlement, tightened his grip on key electoral and judicial institutions. Ortega has forged alliances with a number of former enemies, including contras -- members of the U.S.-supported rebel army that sought to topple the Soviet-backed Sandinistas in the 1980s. The chances that an Ortega presidency would usher in the kind of fundamental economic and social reforms that Nicaragua desperately needs are next to nil.

Yet Ortega's possible comeback would not have far-reaching repercussions in Latin America and surely would constitute no threat to the United States. Intervention in Nicaragua's internal affairs is unwarranted. Nevertheless, an alarmed Bush administration seems to be suffering from a Cold War flashback. U.S. officials have threatened dire consequences for Nicaragua should Ortega be elected. Both Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez and the American ambassador in Managua, Paul Trivelli, have said that an Ortega presidency would scare off foreign investors and jeopardize Nicaragua's participation in the Central American Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA) with the United States. Nicaraguans have been given notice that U.S. aid would be cut under an Ortega administration. Most egregious, Reps. Dana Rohrabacher, Ed Royce and Pete Hoekstra sent letters to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff requesting that they block remittances sent by Nicaraguans living in the United States back to their families -- an important part of the Nicaraguan economy -- in the event of an Ortega win.

These tactics are clearly intended to prevent Ortega -- who, polls suggest, is hovering around the 35 percent he would need to win outright -- from returning to the presidency. The Bush administration has also tried without success to persuade a divided opposition to unite behind the candidacy of conservative Eduardo Montealegre, who recent polls show would be Ortega's strongest challenger.

Adding to the spectacle, Oliver North, who helped raise funds for the contras in the 1980s by selling arms to Iran, went to Nicaragua last week to throw his weight behind another candidate, Jose Rizo, who is aligned with Aleman.

U.S. interference in the Nicaraguan election -- criticized by the Organization of American States monitoring group -- has been motivated in part by a sense that under a Sandinista government Venezuela's Hugo ChÃ¡vez, an ally of Ortega and adversary of President Bush, would be able to cause further mischief and gain a foothold in Central America. But such fears are exaggerated. ChÃ¡vez's capacity to carry out his agenda has been limited. In fact, ChÃ¡vez's support for anti-U.S. candidates in various elections this year -- including those in Peru and Ecuador -- has largely backfired. At a minimum, any possible criticism of ChÃ¡vez for interfering in Nicaragua by giving oil and fertilizer to Sandinista-controlled municipalities is neutralized by Washington's own questionable role.

Before Nicaragua, the Bush administration could claim the moral high ground in dealing with Latin American elections this year. Even in the tight Mexican election -- where there is clearly more at stake than in Nicaragua -- U.S. officials were highly professional, winning praise even from advisers in the campaign of leftist AndrÃ©s Manuel LÃ³pez Obrador. In Peru, where a stridently anti-U.S. and pro-ChÃ¡vez candidate had a real chance of winning the presidency, the United States was properly discreet.

DOJ_NMG_0090046

But it seems it couldn't resist the temptation to meddle in an election to thwart an old Cold War foe. Too bad. There was reason to believe Washington had finally learned its lesson.

The writer is vice president for policy at the Inter-American Dialogue and teaches Latin American politics at Georgetown University.

Ortega's Strange Allies (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

Hard to believe, but the candidate with the best shot of coming to power in Nicaragua's election on Sunday is none other than Daniel Ortega, the former Sandinista dictator. A change of heart by the people of Nicaragua? Not at all. Most Nicaraguans dread his return, after his decade of rule after 1979 destroyed the economy and drove inflation over 1,000% annually.

Up to now, Nicaraguans have never entertained the thought of Mr. Ortega returning to power. When the Sandinistas agreed to an election in 1990, they expected him to win hands down. But Mr. Ortega got only 41% of the vote to Violeta Chamorro's 55%. In the 16 years since, the Sandinistas have used their seats in congress to thwart and weaken Nicaragua's hard-won democracy. Persistent, if nothing else, the Sandinistas manufactured a political opening for the party in the late 1990s when a corrupt president needed a ruthless party to bail him out.

The president was Arnoldo Aleman (1997-2002), whose right-of-center Constitutional Liberal Party (PLC) was once the symbol of Contra resistance against Sandinista repression. But in 2003 Mr. Aleman was sentenced to 20 years in prison after being convicted of money laundering and fraud. In an attempt to minimize his legal troubles while still president, Mr. Aleman carved up Nicaraguan politics with Mr. Ortega in what is now infamously known as "the pact" or El Pacto.

Under this incredible deal, Mr. Aleman and the Sandinistas divided the seats on the electoral council, the Supreme Court and the government's fiscal oversight agency. And one more thing: Mr. Ortega got the PLC to agree to lower the threshold needed to win the presidency in the first voting round to 35%, provided the winner has a five percentage point spread over the next finisher. Mr. Aleman's past problems have made it difficult for the two anti-Sandinista parties to unite, so the old commandante's presidential dream is in reach.

Ironically, Mr. Ortega may be even less popular than he was when he lost to Mrs. Chamorro; he's polling just below the 35% he would need to avoid a second round, where he almost certainly would lose. But if he tops 35%, he'll need to ensure that Eduardo Montealegre, who has been making a credible run at Mr. Ortega, finishes well behind.

Mr. Montealegre broke with the PLC over its corrupt practices and now leads the Liberal Nicaraguan Alliance (ALN). He has had few resources in the campaign and no political machine, but he has held his own against Mr. Ortega. Yesterday the former Prime Minister of Spain, José Maria Aznar, released a letter supporting Mr. Montealegre.

Why, you may wonder, hasn't the anti-Sandinista opposition joined behind Mr. Montealegre? The reason is that the PLC's Mr. Aleman, now living under house arrest, still needs Danny Ortega. Mr. Aleman remains party boss of the PLC, and he knows that his only hope to get out from under his long sentence is a President Ortega.

The PLC has its own candidate, José Rizo, and it has tried to drain votes from Mr. Montealegre by telling anti-Sandinista voters -- who tend to be pro-American -- that Mr. Rizo is backed by the U.S. and even by Oliver North, who is still widely regarded as a hero among anti-Sandinistas.

In early October Mr. North wrote a column arguing that the PLC is the only party that can beat Mr. Ortega. Last week he traveled to Managua and was photographed with Mr. Rizo. Mr. Montealegre dropped in a recent CID-Gallup poll, though without much gain for Mr. Rizo. Many voters remain undecided, seemingly confused over who has the better chance to defeat Mr. Ortega.

Florida Governor Jeb Bush has also had to dispel rumors that he would come to Nicaragua on behalf of the PLC and Mr. Rizo. Governor Bush told the Miami Herald on Friday: "The particular thing I wanted to make sure people understood is that I'm not supporting a candidate whose campaign says I was going to attend the last week of rallies for him. I wasn't, and I'm not."

DOJ_NMG_0090047

If confusion still remains come election day, Messrs. Ortega and Aleman may be the beneficiaries. Nicaraguans will be the losers.

Stern Review (WSJ)

By Bjorn Lomborg

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

The report on climate change by Nicholas Stern and the U.K. government has sparked publicity and scary headlines around the world. Much attention has been devoted to Mr. Stern's core argument that the price of inaction would be extraordinary and the cost of action modest.

Unfortunately, this claim falls apart when one actually reads the 700-page tome. Despite using many good references, the Stern Review on the Economics of Climate Change is selective and its conclusion flawed. Its fear-mongering arguments have been sensationalized, which is ultimately only likely to make the world worse off. * * *

The review correctly points out that climate change is a real problem, and that it is caused by human greenhouse-gas emissions. Little else is right, however, and the report seems hastily put-together, with many sloppy errors. As an example, the cost of hurricanes in the U.S. is said to be both 0.13% of U.S. GDP and 10 times that figure.

The review is also one-sided, focusing almost exclusively on carbon-emission cuts as the solution to the problem of climate change. Mr. Stern sees increasing hurricane damage in the U.S. as a powerful argument for carbon controls. However, hurricane damage is increasing predominantly because there are more people with more goods to be damaged, settling in ever more risky habitats. Even if global warming does significantly increase the power of hurricanes, it is estimated that 95% to 98% of the increased damage will be due to demographics. The review acknowledges that simple initiatives like bracing and securing roof trusses and walls can cheaply reduce damage by more than 80%; yet its policy recommendations on expensive carbon reductions promise to cut the damages by 1% to 2% at best. That is a bad deal.

Mr. Stern is also selective, often seeming to cherry-pick statistics to fit an argument. This is demonstrated most clearly in the review's examination of the social damage costs of CO2 -- essentially the environmental cost of emitting each extra ton of CO2. The most well-recognized climate economist in the world is probably Yale University's William Nordhaus, whose "approach is perhaps closest in spirit to ours," according to the Stern review. Mr. Nordhaus finds that the social cost of CO2 is $2.50 per ton. Mr. Stern, however, uses a figure of $85 per ton. Picking a rate even higher than the official U.K. estimates -- that have themselves been criticized for being over the top -- speaks volumes.

Mr. Stern tells us that the cost of U.K. flooding will quadruple to 0.4% from 0.1% of GDP due to climate change. However, we are not told that these alarming figures only hold true if one assumes that the U.K. will take no additional measures -- essentially doing absolutely nothing and allowing itself to get flooded, perhaps time and again. In contrast, the U.K. government's own assumptions take into account a modest increase in flood prevention, finding that the cost will actually decline sharply to 0.04% of U.K. GDP, in spite of climate change. Why does Mr. Stern not share that information?

But nowhere is the imbalance clearer than in Mr. Stern's central argument about the costs and benefits of action on climate change. The review tells us that we should make significant cuts in carbon emissions to stabilize the concentration of atmospheric carbon dioxide at 550 ppm (parts per million). Yet such a stark recommendation is not matched by an explicit explanation of what this would mean in terms of temperature.

The U.N. Climate Panel estimates that stabilizing at 550 ppm would mean an increase in temperature of about 2.3 degrees Celsius in the year 2100. This might be several degrees below what would otherwise happen, but it might also be higher. Mr. Nordhaus estimates that the stabilization policy would reduce the rise in temperature from 2.53 degrees Celsius to just 2.42 degrees Celsius. One can understand the reluctance of the Stern review to advertise such a puny effect.

Most economists were surprised by Mr. Stern's large economic estimates of damage from global warming. Mr. Nordhaus's model, for example, anticipates 3% will be wiped off global GDP if nothing is done over the coming century, taking into account the risk for catastrophes. The Stern review purports to show that the cost is "larger than many earlier studies suggested."

On the face of it, Mr. Stern actually accepts Mr. Nordhaus's figure: Even including risks of catastrophe and non-market costs, he agrees that an increase of four degrees Celsius will cost about 3% of GDP. But he assumes that we will continue to pump out carbon far into the 22nd century -- a rather unlikely scenario given the falling cost of alternative fuels, and especially if some of his predictions become clear to us toward the end of this century. Thus he estimates that the higher temperatures of eight degrees Celsius in the 2180s will be very damaging, costing 11% to 14% of GDP.

DOJ_NMG_0090048

The Stern review then analyzes what the cost would be if everyone in the present and the future paid equally. Suddenly the cost estimate is not 0% now and 3% in 2100 -- but 11% of GDP right now and forever. If this seems like a trick, it is certainly underscored by the fact that the Stern review picks an extremely low discount rate, which makes the cost look much more ominous now.

But even 11% is not the last word. Mr. Stern suggests that there is a risk that the cost of global warming will be higher than the top end of the U.N. climate panel's estimates, inventing, in effect, a "worst-case scenario" even worse than any others on the table. Therefore, the estimated damage to GDP jumps to 15% from 11%. Moreover, Mr. Stern admonishes that poor people count for less in the economic calculus, so he then inflates 15% to 20%.

This figure, 20%, was the number that rocketed around the world, although it is simply a much-massaged reworking of the standard 3% GDP cost in 2100 -- a figure accepted among most economists to be a reasonable estimate.

Likewise, Mr. Stern readjusts the cost of dealing with climate change. The U.N. found that the cost of 550 ppm stabilization would be somewhere around 0.2% to 3.2% of GDP today; he reports that costs could lie between -4% and 15% of GDP. The -4% is based on the suggestion that cutting carbon emissions could make us richer because revenue recycling could address inefficiencies in taxation -- but the alleged inefficiencies, if correct, should be addressed no matter what the policies about climate change. The reason Mr. Stern nevertheless finds a very low cost estimate is because he only considers models with so-called Induced Technological Change. These models are known to reduce costs by about two percentage points because carbon cuts lead to an increase in research and development, which again makes further cuts cheaper. Thus Mr. Stern concludes that the costs are on average 1% of GDP, and in the summary actually claims that this is a maximum cost. * * *

The Stern review's cornerstone argument for immediate and strong action now is based on the suggestion that doing nothing about climate change costs 20% of GDP now, and doing something only costs 1%. However, this argument hinges on three very problematic assumptions.

First, it assumes that if we act, we will not still have to pay. But this is not so -- Mr. Stern actually tells us that his solution is "already associated with significant risks." Second, it requires the cost of action to be as cheap as he tells us -- and on this front his numbers are at best overly optimistic. Third, and most importantly, it requires the cost of doing nothing to be a realistic assumption: But the 20% of GDP figure is inflated by an unrealistically pessimistic vision of the 22nd century, and by an extreme and unrealistically low discount rate. According to the background numbers in Mr. Stern's own report, climate change will cost us 0% now and 3% of GDP in 2100, a much more informative number than the 20% now and forever.

In other words: Given reasonable inputs, most cost-benefit models show that dramatic and early carbon reductions cost more than the good they do. Mr. Stern's attempt to challenge that understanding is based on a chain of unlikely assumptions.

Moreover, there is a fourth major problem in Mr. Stern's argument that has received very little attention. It seems naïve to believe that the world's 192 nations can flawlessly implement Mr. Stern's multitrillion-dollar, century-long policy proposal. Will nobody try to avoid its obligations? Why would China and India even participate? And even if China got on board, would it be able to implement the policies? In 2002, China decided to cut sulfur dioxide (SO2) emissions by 10% -- they are now 27% higher despite SO2 being nationally a much bigger health and environmental problem than climate change. * * *

Why does all this matter? It matters because, with clever marketing and sensationalist headlines, the Stern review is about to edge its way into our collective consciousness. The suggestion that flooding will overwhelm us has already been picked up by commentators, yet going back to the background reports properly shows declining costs from flooding and fewer people at risk. The media is now quoting Mr. Stern's suggestion that climate change will wreak financial devastation that will wipe 20% off GDP, explicitly evoking memories of past financial catastrophes such as the Great Depression or World War II; yet the review clearly tells us that costs will be 0% now and just 3% in 2100.

It matters because Gordon Brown, Tony Blair and Nicholas Stern all profess that one of the major reasons that they want to do something about climate change is because it will hit the world's poor the hardest. Using a worse-than-worst-case scenario,

DOJ_NMG_0090049

Mr. Stern warns that the wealth of South Asia and Sub-Saharan Africa will be reduced by 10% to 13% in 2100 and suggests that effect would lead to 145 million more poor people.

Faced with such alarmist suggestions, spending just 1% of GDP or $450 billion each year to cut carbon emissions seems on the surface like a sound investment. In fact, it is one of the least attractive options. Spending just a fraction of this figure -- $75 billion -- the U.N. estimates that we could solve all the world's major basic problems. We could give everyone clean drinking water, sanitation, basic health care and education right now. Is that not better?

We know from economic models that dealing just with malaria could provide economic boosts to the order of 1% extra GDP growth per capita per year. Even making a very conservative estimate that solving all the major basic issues would induce just 2% extra growth, 100 years from now each individual in the developing world would be more than 700% richer. That truly trivializes Mr. Stern's 10% to 13% estimates for South Asia and Sub-Saharan Africa.

Last weekend in New York, I asked 24 U.N. ambassadors -- from nations including China, India and the U.S. -- to prioritize the best solutions for the world's greatest challenges, in a project known as Copenhagen Consensus. They looked at what spending money to combat climate change and other major problems could achieve. They found that the world should prioritize the need for better health, nutrition, water, sanitation and education, long before we turn our attention to the costly mitigation of global warning.

We all want a better world. But we must not let ourselves be swept up in making a bad investment, simply because we have been scared by sensationalist headlines.

Mr. Lomborg, author of "The Skeptical Environmentalist" (Cambridge, 2001), teaches at the Copenhagen Business School and is director of the Copenhagen Consensus Center.

Climate Non-Conformity (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

Two scientific events of note occurred this week, but only one got any media coverage. Therein lies a story about modern politics and scientific priorities.

The report that received the headlines was Monday's 700-page jeremiad out of London on fighting climate change. Commissioned by the British government and overseen by former World Bank chief economist Nicholas Stern, the report made the intentionally shocking prediction that global warming could eliminate from 5% to 20% of world economic output "forever." Meanwhile, doing the supposedly virtuous thing and trying to forestall this catastrophe would cost merely an estimated 1% of world GDP. Thus we must act urgently and with new taxes and policies that go well beyond anything in the failed Kyoto Protocol.

The other event was a meeting at the United Nations organized by economist Bjørn Lomborg's Copenhagen Consensus Center. Ambassadors from 24 countries -- including Australia, China, India and the U.S. -- mulled which problems to address if the world suddenly found an extra $50 billion lying around. Mr. Lomborg's point is that, in a world with scarce resources, you need priorities. The consensus was that communicable diseases, sanitation and water, malnutrition and hunger, and education were all higher priorities than climate change.

We invited Mr. Lomborg to address the Stern report, and he takes apart its analysis brick-by-brick in the columns nearby. To our reading, there isn't much left of this politicized edifice. But we'd stress a couple of points ourselves.

The first is that the Stern review almost surely understates the real costs of combating climate change. The International Energy Agency has estimated that the world must spend $16 trillion on infrastructure from 2001 to 2030 just to meet growing energy demand. That by itself would be 1% of GDP over that period. And that doesn't include the cost of moving to carbon-free power from fossil fuels, or the financial "incentives" -- i.e., global subsidies from Western taxpayers -- that China and India would need if the Stern report's policies were to have any chance of being implemented. The Stern review also calls for substantially increasing taxes, which we know from experience would also reduce global GDP and thus leave fewer resources to fight the consequences of any warming.

The second point is that the Stern report barely mentions the potential benefits from warming in the world's cold-weather regions. Al Gore and others warn about the damage from coastal flooding and changing weather patterns, among other horror scenarios. But the world is large and its climate diverse, and a longer growing season in Siberia or Canada is at least one possible benefit of warming. The Stern report also dismisses any chance of moderate warming (meaning temperatures in 2100 only two to three degrees Celsius higher than in 1900), even though many climate models say this is in fact the most likely outcome.

DOJ_NMG_0090050

Unlike the Stern report and its patrons, those of us who take a skeptical approach to these doomsday climate scenarios aren't trying to end the discussion. The Earth is warmer now than it was in the recent past, and this may be partly attributable to human behavior. But everything else -- from how much warmer, to the extent of mankind's contribution, to the cost of doing something about it -- remains very much in dispute.

Some of the Stern review's recommendations, such as carbon trading rights, are also worth debating. But most of its proposals are merely openings for government to expand its role in allocating investment, raising taxes and otherwise controlling economic decisions. Socialism was supposed to have died with the Soviet Union, but it is making a comeback under the guise of coping with global warming.

Meanwhile, there are far more urgent, and far less speculative, problems that we know how to solve with the right policies. That message may not get scary headlines, but it would improve the lives of more human beings around the world.

Climate Threat Heats Up (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

OVER THE LAST two years, the findings of studies on global warming have grown increasingly dire. The glaciers are melting, the polar bears are endangered. Climate change is linked to the catastrophic western wildfires, and warming oceans have been tied to Katrina-like hurricanes.

On Monday, the British government tried to translate it all into dollars and cents. A 700-page report written by former World Bank economist Nicholas Stern argued that global warming will eventually cost nations from 5% to 20% of their gross domestic product if strong action is not taken now. Flooding, crop failures, shortages of drinking water and higher rates of some diseases would bring about a depression equal to the worst the world has ever known, the report projects, while population migrations from the most affected nations would create global chaos.

The Stern report attempts to weave climate science with economics, but in truth it is at best guesstimating, down to its dubiously tidy bottom line, that if nations invested 1% of their GDP right now into reducing greenhouse gas emissions they could avoid much or all of this catastrophe. There's no doubt that human activity contributes heavily to climate change, but at this point we still don't know how much of the blame we deserve or the extent of the possible damage, let alone what the best spending formula is to prevent it.

Though the numbers are debatable, the essential message cannot be ignored: There will be irreversible long-term damage if emissions are not significantly reduced. The report repudiates President Bush's line that regulating greenhouse gases would endanger jobs. Under Stern's scenario, there would be a great loss of jobs if nothing is done.

Britain has championed the struggle against global warming, and Bush's intransigence is isolating him from the emerging global consensus. No wonder this nation's emissions are up almost 16% since 1990 and climbing every year, while Britain has reduced emissions during that time by 14% and Germany by 17%.

The U.S. is not only failing to be a leader on curbing one of the world's most serious threats, it's not even a decent follower.

DOJ_NMG_0090051

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Detainees' Attorneys Ask Court To Allow Challenges (WP)..... 4
Detainees Challenge Military Trials Law (AP) 4
Padilla Papers Detail Allegations Of Mistreatment (NYT/AP)..... 5
Ex-judges: Detainee Law Unconstitutional (AP-Y) 5
Alleged Terrorist Mastermind Languishes In British Legal Limbo (FINDLAW/AP) 6
Britain Said To Seek Weaker Torture Protections (WP)..... 7
British Authorities Charge Suspect With Violations Of Terrorism Laws (NYT)..... 8
Israeli Agent Scoffs At Hamas Defendant's Torture Claims (AP).. 8
What They Don't Know Is Frightening (WT) 9
FBI Logs On For Monitoring Service For Arabic Networks (GCN)10

Homeland Response:

Air Plot Said To Target Cities (WP) 10
PayPal Building Targeted In Explosion (AP) 11
Probe Of Blast At EBay's North S.J. Campus Yields Few Answers; Site Set To Reopen Thursday (MERCN) 11
Explosive Shatters Window At PayPal Headquarters (NYT)..... 12
EBay Campus Closed After Halloween Explosion (SJBIZ)..... 13
Man Convicted In Fake Hazmat Incident (NSDY/AP) 13
Man Behind Chemical Attack Hoax Could Get 5 Years (WVIT).. 13
Uncasville Man Admits Lying To FBI In Powdery Substance Hoax (NORBULL)..... 13
There's Secrecy, And There's Expediency (WP)..... 14
Bonuses Don't Cut Turnover For TSA (USAT)..... 14
Ruby Ridge Revisited: Deval Let Sniper Off The The Hook (BOSH) 15

War News:

Staying The Course, Win Or Lose (WP)..... 16
US Air Strike Kills Al-Qaeda Kingpin: Military (AFP)..... 17
Iraqi Shiites Continue To Exert Independence And Seek Changes To U.N. Deal On U.S. Troops (NYT) 17
Iraqi Prime Minister Asserts Independence, Gains Stature (CSM)..... 19
Baghdad Attacks Target Busy Areas (WP) 20
Last Gasps In Iraq (USAT)..... 21
Army Journal Cites Problems With Iraqis (AP-Y) 22
Military Rebuts Media On Iraq (LAT) 22
Homeward Bound -- If Only For A Year (LAT)..... 23
Medic Tends A Fallen Marine, With Skill, Prayer And Fury (NYT)25
Same Old Demons (NYT)..... 26
Hadley Travels To Afghanistan After Iraq (AP-Y)..... 27
Stop Calling It The 'War On Terror' (LAT)..... 28

DOJ:

Attorney General Makes Surprise Lecture At Law School (HATCHET) 29

Corporate Scandals:

H-P's Hurd Answers House Panel On Probe, Sheds Little New Light (WSJ) 29
Sorin To Plead Guilty In Comverse Backdating Case (WSJ)..... 30
5 Workers Charged With Conspiracy & Security Fraud (KCBS). 31
Prosecutors Are Prospering (HC) 31
New York AG Presses Companies To Stop Paying Indicted Employees' Legal Bills (LAW)..... 33
Halliburton Says It Will Agree To SEC's Request For More Time For Bribery Investigation (FINDLAW/AP) 34

Criminal Law:

Judge May Allow Abramoff To Be Sentenced In Washington (MH) 35
Breach At Lab Called Significant (LAT) 35
Karen Weldon's Ties To Serbs Detailed (PHI) 36
Powerful Republican Enters A Dogfight Over Lobbying Link (FT)37
Women's Testimony Continues At FCI Trial (TALLDEM) 38
Ex-Ala. Fire College Official Agrees To Plead Guilty To Fraud (AP) 39
Former Elsa Officer Second Accused Of Taking Bribes (FWST) 40
Sentencing Postponed For City Official In Truck Scandal (AP)... 40
Commerce Bancorp Is Off The Hook (PHI)..... 40
Fla. Lawmaker Resigns Over Threatening Phone Calls (USAT/AP) 41
Mob Enforcer Denied Bail On Extortion Charges (PHI)..... 42
Pittsburgh Mob Boss Dies (KDKA) 43
Late Design Change Is Cited In Collapse Of Tunnel Ceiling In Boston (NYT) 43
CEO Is Charged With Stealing Identities (MH)..... 44
Former Atlanta Editor Gets 8 Years In Child Porn Case (TEXGAZ) 44
Supreme Court Ponders Retroactive Ruling (AP) 44
Second Guilty Plea In Cable Fraud Scheme (UPI)..... 45
Despite Flawed Defense, A Death Sentence Stands (NYT) 46

Civil Law:

Groups Ask FTC To Probe Online Ad Profiling (WP) ... 47
Torts Gone Wild (LAT) ... 47

Civil Rights:

Poll Assignment Calls Mislead (BSUN) ... 48
U.S. Attorney's Office: We're Ready To Investigate Election Fraud (BALTBIZ) ... 49
More Poll Workers Recruited, But Training Proves Daunting (WP) ... 50
Md. Democrats Say GOP Plans To Block Voters (WP) ... 51
False Voter Registrations Allegedly Submitted (KCS) ... 52
Four ACORN Workers Indicted In Kansas City (SLPD) ... 53
Conference Looks At Human Trafficking Along Border (EPTIMES) ... 53
Annexation Excludes Vote (BSH) ... 54
Activist Calls For Cop Probe In DeKalb Rally Set For Friday Over 31 Shootings Since 2001 (AJC) ... 55
US State Attorney General Gets Patient Records From Abortion Clinics After 2-year Effort (FINDLAW/AP) ... 56
Outside Money Fuels Battle On Abortion (NYT) ... 56
Military Pressed Over Expressions Of Faith (WP) ... 57
Marriage Limits Set To Face Stiff Fight In 3 States (WT) ... 57
Female Voters Courted In Affirmative-Action Fight (WP) ... 58

Antitrust:

CVS Buying Caremark For About $21.2B (AP) ... 59
Kazaa Said To Pay $10 Million In Settlement (NYT) ... 60
Fate Of Canadian Steelmaker To Be Decided Soon (BSUN/BLOOM) ... 61
Orthopedics Maker Is Said To Be In Talks To Buy A U.S. Rival (NYT) ... 62
Tribune To Weigh Offers For Parts Of Its Holdings Decision Follows Tepid Bids For All Of Media Company; A Prod To Private Equity? By SARAH ELLISON (WSJ) ... 62

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Justices Appear Divided In Case On Emission Rules (WSJ) ... 64
Justices Challenge EPA's Arguments In Clean Air Act Case (WP) ... 65
Groups Want Forest Rules Overturned (AP) ... 66
U.S. Agency To Review Oil Royalties (NYT) ... 66
California Can Lead The Way (USAT) ... 67

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Balco Grand Jury To Charge Graham (MERCN) ... 68
BALCO Panel To Charge Track Coach (LAT/AP) ... 69
2 Suspects In Arson Cases Arrested (USAT) ... 69
Nationwide Dragnet Nabs Local Fugitive (TOLB) ... 70
Multi-agency Sweep Nets Murray Man (MURRLT) ... 70
Fugitive In Sexual Assault Case In Colorado Arrested (LVRJ) ... 71
Tips Sought On Missing Explosives (MUCHRONICLE) ... 71
Drug Death Defendant Pleads Not Guilty (SLPD) ... 72
Heroin Kingpin Convicted, Could Get Life Sentence (AP) ... 72
FEDS FINISH GIVING 'ICEBOX' EVIDENCE (TMT) ... 72
Border Guard Accused Of Accepting Bribes Released Pending Trial (AP) ... 74
Ex-Mexican Drug Czar Faces More Charges (AP) ... 74
Ex-LCC Coach Given Probation In Drug Case (SDUT) ... 75

Immigration:

Federal Judge Blocks Town's Crackdown On Illegal Immigrants (FINDLAW/AP) ... 75
Bush May Find An Ally On Immigration (WT) ... 76
Lawsuit Says Latino Citizens Were Caught Up In Raids Seeking Illegal Immigrants (LAT) ... 78

Congress-Administration:

Bush Says Rumsfeld, Cheney Should Stay (AP-Y) ... 79
Kerry Offers Apology To Troops (WP) ... 80
Bush Stands By Cheney, Rumsfeld (LAT) ... 81
Bush Works To Solidify Base With A Defense Of Rumsfeld (NYT) ... 82
Bush Seeks To Minimize Burden Of Iraq On Republican Candidates (BLOOM) ... 83
Bush To Hit GOP Campaign Trail (CHIT) ... 84
IGs Probe Allegations On Global Warming Data (WP) ... 86
Democrats Say Hunger Report Stalled (AP-Y) ... 86

Other News:

Economy Displays More Signs Of Slowing (USAT) ... 87
Weak U.S. Manufacturing Data Signal Slowdown In Economy (WSJ) ... 88
Catching Breath: Dow Industrials Ease For 4th Day (WSJ) ... 89
Kerry Sorry For 'Stuck In Iraq' Remark (AP-Y) ... 89
Flubbed Joke Makes Kerry A Political Punching Bag, Again (NYT) ... 90
Kerry Apologizes For Iraq Remark (USAT) ... 92
Kerry Apologizes For Insulting Troops (WT) ... 92
Analysis: Iraq War Dominates Campaign (AP-Y) ... 93
Bush's Nostalgia (NSWK) ... 94
First Lady: World Listening To Iraq Talk (AP-Y) ... 96
Party Shuns Kerry After Iraq 'Joke' (FT) ... 96
Kerry Issues Apology After Iraq 'joke' (FT) ... 97
Kerry's Remark Puts Presidential Bid At Risk (LAT) ... 97
Job From Hell Dept. (RC) ... 99
The Great Divider (NYT) ... 100
A Taxing Time For The GOP (WP) ... 100
Is GOP Confidence For Real? (CSM) ... 102
Democrats' Foreign Policy Pickle As Iraq And Terror Top Agenda (WSJ) ... 103
Cantor Pushes For Reforms (RC) ... 104
Word To The Wise: Don't Ignore Independents This Year (RC) 105
What It's Like Being Caught Up In A Wave: I've Been There (RC) ... 107
With Iraq Driving Election, Voters Want New Approach (NYT) . 108
Democratic Leader Put To Work As G.O.P. Campaign Star (NYT) ... 109
Pelosi's War Blunder (WT) ... 111
Scandals Alone Could Cost Republicans Their House Majority (WP) ... 111
Picking Up The Pace (NYT) ... 113
Winning Small (NYT) ... 113

DOJ_NMG_0090053

How Big Will The Democratic Wave Be? Use This Formula (RC)114
Behind The Gridlock (WP) ... 116
Republican Seems To Rally In Run For Seat Foley Quit (NYT) 117
Luring Lapsed Democrats In Kentucky (NYT) ... 118
Politics That Go Against The Grain (WP) ... 120
Republicans In Uphill Slog In Colorado (CSM) ... 122
Why Economy Is Key In Indiana Election (CSM) ... 123
Concentration Of Competitive Races Puts Ohio At Center Of Midterm Battle (NYT) ... 124
Reverse Swiftboating (WT) ... 125
GOP Closing Gaps In A Couple Of Key Races (USAT) ... 126
Parochial Issues Come To The Fore In Tennessee Senate Race (MCT) ... 127
Clinton Campaigns For Ford In Memphis (USAT) ... 128
Beating Around The Bush (WSJ) ... 129
Virginia's Tight Senate Campaign Turns On Personal Attacks (MCT) ... 130
Allen Suggests Webb Behind Heckler Incident (WT) ... 131
Steele Gains Key Support Beneath The Surface In PG (WT) ... 132
Arizona, Maryland Senate Races Targeted (AP-Y) ... 133
Ohio Voters Unmoved By Incumbent's Bipartisan Reputation (FT) ... 133
Clawing For Votes, Chafee Steers Race Toward Gutter (WP) . 134
Republican Is A Political Force, Despite Party Baggage (WP) .. 135
On Election Night, Networks Plan To Proceed With Caution (WP) ... 137
Elections Rake In Big Bucks For Media Outlets (USAT) ... 138
Stem-cell Issue Gains Momentum In Homestretch (WT) ... 138
Local Issues Mirror National Ones, But The Special Effects Occasionally Stand Alone (NYT) ... 139
Voting For Judicial Independence (NYT) ... 141
Life, Liberty And Property Rights (USAT) ... 141
Loose Change Lawmakers Tap PAC Money To Pay Wide Array Of Bills Funds For Candidates At Risk Also Cover Hotels, Meals And Gifts For Big Donors $5,000 For A Texas Funeral By BRODY MULLINS (WSJ) ... 142
Stinging From Scandal, Tribes Trim Donations (USAT) ... 145
PodestaMattoon Said To Be Ready To Split Up (RC) ... 145
An Election On Drugs (WP) ... 146
Wiring Development (NYT) ... 147
North Korea Wants Bank Accounts Unfrozen (AP) ... 147
N. Korea's Bank Accounts Targeted (LAT) ... 148
Money May Underlie North Korea's Return To Talks (WSJ) ... 150
U.N. Creates N.Korea Sanctions List (AP) ... 151
U.S. Debates Value Of North Korea Talks (NYT) ... 152
Russia Speaks Against Iran Draft Measure (AP) ... 153
Incoming UN Chief Calls On Iran To Halt Enrichment (AFP) ... 153
Iran Announces Military Maneuvers (AP) ... 154
U.S. Faults Syria, Iran, Hezbollah On Lebanon (WP) ... 154
U.S. Reports Plot To Topple Beirut Leaders (NYT) ... 155
Syria 'plotting To Destabilise' Lebanon (FT) ... 157
U.S. Sees Evidence Of Lebanon Coup Plot (LAT) ... 157
Hezbollah Threatens Protests In Lebanon (AP) ... 158
Ethiopian PM: Islamic Militia A Threat (AP) ... 159
State Dept Vetted Speakers For Criticism Of Bush Adminstration (KCS) ... 160
Big Israeli Strike With Tanks Kills 8 Palestinians In Gaza (NYT)161
Israeli Troops Spark Clashes In Gaza Strip (WP) ... 162
Al-Jazeera Plans To Battle Western Media (AP) ... 163
Taiwan Set For New Clash With Beijing (FT) ... 164
African Leaders, China To Meet On Investment (WT) ... 165
China's Great Haul: 15 Billionaires (USAT) ... 166
Chinese Activist's Verdict Overturned (WP) ... 166
Bush Renews US Sanctions On Sudan (AFP-Y) ... 167
Turkey's EU Bid Quietly Loses Steam (WSJ) ... 167
US Seeks Return Of Democracy Organization To Bahrain (AFP)168
Rivals For U.N. Council Seat Reach Deal To Back Panama (WP/AP) ... 169
Latin Fight For U.N. Security Council Seat Ends (NYT) ... 169
Panama In Line For UN Security Council Seat (FT) ... 170
Venezuela To Sell D.C. Oil At Discount (WT) ... 170
'Yes, You Will Be Thoroughly Beaten' (WSJ) ... 171
Punished For Being Female (NYT) ... 172
Why Meddle In Nicaragua? (WP) ... 173
Ortega's Strange Allies (WSJ) ... 174
Stern Review (WSJ) ... 175
Climate Non-Conformity (WSJ) ... 177
Climate Threat Heats Up (LAT) ... 178

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0090054

TERRORISM NEWS:

Detainees' Attorneys Ask Court To Allow Challenges (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

Attorneys for captives in the Guantanamo Bay military prison asked a federal appeals court yesterday to reject a provision of the new military-commission law that strips hundreds of detainees of their right to challenge their detention in U.S. courts.

The lawyers, joined by a group of retired judges from both political parties, argued that the United States cannot indefinitely imprison foreign nationals in a military prison without charging them with crimes and deny them the chance to test the evidence against them in the U.S. justice system.

President Bush sought Congress's approval this fall for the Military Commissions Act, which also set new rules for military trials of the detainees, and signed it into law Oct. 17. Government lawyers quickly moved to throw out hundreds of pending challenges by the detainees, known as habeas corpus cases. The issue is pending before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

But attorneys for detainees argue that the law does not apply to detainees with ongoing cases, in part because the government can take that drastic step only when the country is in the middle of an active war.

"We do not believe Congress wiped out our cases in this act, and we feel strongly if Congress had done that, it would be unconstitutional," said David H. Remes, one of the lawyers. "The only time Congress can suspend the writ of habeas is in cases of invasion and rebellion. We are not being invaded, and there is no rebellion."

The administration pressed for passage of the new law after the Supreme Court ruled this summer in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld that pending habeas cases could continue, despite administration arguments that a previous law had ended those rights.

Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said yesterday that the government would not comment but would respond in a brief due to the appeals court Nov. 13.

An estimated 435 detainees remain at the military prison at Guantanamo Bay. The government has determined that about 100 could be released or transferred. Another group may be charged with crimes and tried before military commissions.

The habeas dispute involves the majority, who never will be charged but have been deemed "enemy combatants" by a three-member military panel.

A group of seven federal judges, who filed a separate friend-of-the-court brief, argued that the new law is fatally flawed for another reason. Under a separate provision, they noted, the military can imprison someone without any charges based on evidence produced through statements of the detainee or of someone else made during torture.

The government "created a tribunal that was permitted to accept evidence secured by torture and presume that evidence was genuine and accurate," the judges wrote. If U.S. courts have no role in testing the basis for holding detainees, they said, the U.S. government "cannot remove the stain of torture" from the military's decisions.

The detainee attorneys also argued that the law uses imprecise language in describing the effective date for the act to apply to specific categories of cases.

Detainees Challenge Military Trials Law (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON - Lawyers for dozens of Guantanamo Bay detainees asked a federal appeals court Wednesday to declare a key part of President Bush's new military trials law unconstitutional.

The detainees' lawyers challenged the military's authority to arrest people overseas and detain them indefinitely without allowing them to use the U.S. courts to contest their detention.

Bush gave the military that authority last month when he signed a law that sets up special commissions to hold trials for foreigners designated as "enemy combatants." Bush hailed the law as a crucial tool in the war on terrorism and said it would allow prosecution of several high-level terror suspects.

In written arguments, attorneys for more than 100 detainees who would be locked out of the regular judicial system asked the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit to let the detainees keep their legal challenges going in civilian courts.

DOJ_NMG_0090055

The framers of the Constitution never would have permitted the government to hold people indefinitely without charges, the lawyers wrote.

"Persons imprisoned without charge must retain the right to obtain a court inquiry into the factual and legal bases for their imprisonment," they wrote.

This argument echoes a Supreme Court ruling in June in which the justices ruled that the Bush administration's system for trying enemy combatants violated U.S. and international law. Within weeks, the president persuaded Congress to pass a law setting up military commissions and barring detainees from using the civilian court system.

Shortly after the law was signed, the Justice Department told hundreds of detainees that their cases in the U.S. courts had been rendered moot.

Even if the court decide not to declare the law unconstitutional, attorneys offered a creative way for the court to keep the case alive. They suggested the judges rule that the law doesn't mean what the Justice Department thinks it means - because if it did, it would be unconstitutional.

On Wednesday, seven retired federal judges from both political parties filed legal briefs in the detainees case before the Washington appeals court, arguing that the military commissions law would allow authorities to use evidence obtained by torture.

"We believe that compelling this court to sanction executive detentions based on evidence that has been condemned in the American legal system since our nation's founding erodes the vital role of the judiciary in safeguarding the rule of law," the judges wrote.

Although the law prohibits torture, the judges said the military has not addressed torture claims made by detainees. The retired judges also argued that the new law illegally strips courts of the power to question military decisions about the detainees' torture claims.

The Justice Department had no comment on the briefs Wednesday and has until Nov. 13 to respond in court.

Padilla Papers Detail Allegations Of Mistreatment (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

MIAMI, Nov. 1 (AP) — Jose Padilla is asserting that he was tortured during his three and a half years in American custody as an enemy combatant, including being threatened with execution and forced to stand for long periods.

Mr. Padilla's lawyers are asking a federal judge to dismiss the terror support charges against him because he suffered from "outrageous government conduct" during more than 1,300 days in military custody.

"Many of the conditions Mr. Padilla experienced were inhumane and caused him great physical and psychological pain," Michael Caruso, a lawyer for Mr. Padilla, said in court papers filed last month. It is the first time Mr. Padilla has made such detailed allegations about his treatment. His lawyers cited no corroborating evidence or witnesses.

United States Attorney R. Alexander Acosta in Miami declined to comment. Prosecutors and Defense Department officials said they would respond to the allegations by Nov. 13.

Mr. Padilla, a 36-year-old former Chicago gang member, was declared an enemy combatant by President Bush in June 2002, shortly after he was arrested when he arrived at O'Hare International Airport in Chicago. American authorities initially said he was on a mission for Al Qaeda to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in an American city.

He was held and interrogated at a Navy brig, mostly in a small isolation cell, until he was transferred to civilian custody in January to face federal terrorism support charges in Miami along with two others. Trial on those charges is scheduled to begin Jan. 22.

In the court papers, Mr. Padilla asserted among other things that interrogators had threatened him with "imminent execution" or with painful cuts; that he was forced to wear a hood and stand in "stress positions" for long periods; that noxious fumes were sometimes introduced into his cell; that he was forced to endure extreme heat and cold, bright lights or total darkness, denied opportunities to shower for weeks and deprived of sleep; and that he was not provided with a copy of the Koran.

Ex-judges: Detainee Law Unconstitutional (AP-Y)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 2, 2006

Seven retired federal judges from both political parties have joined dozens of Guantanamo Bay detainees in urging an appeals court to declare key parts of President Bush's new anti-terrorism law unconstitutional.

The judges, in a rare court filing Wednesday, said stripping courts of the right to question how the military handles terrorism suspects "challenges the integrity of our judicial system" and effectively sanctions the use of torture.

DOJ_NMG_0090056

Bush signed a law this month allowing the military to arrest people overseas and detain them indefinitely without allowing them to use the U.S. courts to contest their detention. Bush hailed the law, which established a system of military trials, as a crucial tool in the war on terrorism and said it would allow prosecution of several high-level terror suspects.

For detainees challenging their imprisonment, the law locks them out of the civilian court system. Dozens of detainees argued Wednesday that the law is unconstitutional, and the retired judges echoed that in their own papers filed with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

"We believe that compelling this court to sanction executive detentions based on evidence that has been condemned in the American legal system since our nation's founding erodes the vital role of the judiciary in safeguarding the rule of law," the judges wrote.

The brief was filed by retired Judges Shirley M. Hufstedler, Nathaniel R. Jones, George N. Leighton, Timothy K. Lewis, Frank J. McGarr, Abner J. Mikva and Patricia M. Wald. Three of the judges — Leighton, Lewis and McGarr — were appointed by Republican presidents.

Though Congress banned the use of torture in the military commission law, the judges said military documents revealed evidence of torture that officials didn't properly address.

In one instance cited in court documents, a man who denied receiving artillery training said an interrogator beat him until he bled from his head.

"I was in a lot of pain, so I said I had the training," the man said, according to a transcript cited in court documents. "At that point, if he had asked me if I was Usama Bin Ladin, I would have said yes."

Without the court system, the judges said, there is no check on such behavior.

In their own court filings, lawyers for the detainees argued that the law is unconstitutional because it prevents people from challenging their detention in U.S. courts — a right that attorneys said the framers of the Constitution never would have allowed to be stripped.

"Persons imprisoned without charge must retain the right to obtain a court inquiry into the factual and legal bases for their imprisonment," attorneys wrote.

This argument echoes a Supreme Court ruling in June in which the justices ruled that the Bush administration's system for trying enemy combatants violated U.S. and international law.

Within weeks, the president persuaded Congress to pass a law setting up military commissions and barring detainees from using the civilian court system. Shortly after the law was signed, the Justice Department told hundreds of detainees that their cases in the U.S. courts had been rendered moot.

Supporters of the law compare military detainees to prisoners of war, who don't normally have access to civilian courts. They say wartime decisions should be left up to the president, who acts as commander in chief, not the courts.

The Justice Department had no comment on the briefs Wednesday and has until Nov. 13 to respond in court.

A Pentagon spokesman, Navy Cmdr. Jeffrey D. Gordon, defended the new law and said that terror suspects were being given their day in court.

"As a responsible democracy, we have an obligation to protect our citizens and those of our allies," Gordon said. "Holding unlawful enemy combatants captured during the war on terror is essential to preventing their return to the battlefield while collecting valuable intelligence in order to avert terror attacks like those seen on 9/11 and in cities around the world."

Alleged Terrorist Mastermind Languishes In British Legal Limbo (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jill Lawless, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 2, 2006

(AP) - LONDON-He's an al-Qaida-linked terrorist who worked with Osama bin Laden and plotted to bomb Los Angeles airport at the turn of the millennium, according to U.S. authorities.

Yet for the past year, Abu Doha has been imprisoned in a British jail for nothing more serious than immigration violations: A U.S. attempt to extradite him collapsed, and Britain lacks the evidence to charge him with terrorism.

Abu Doha's legal limbo has both civil libertarians and counterterrorism officials concerned - and some experts questioning how big a terrorist player he really is.

"I think if all that had been said about him was true, there would have been efforts to sustain the (extradition) request from the United States," Paul Wilkinson of the Center for the Study of Terrorism and Political Violence at St. Andrews University in Scotland said Wednesday.

The British government, however, says Abu Doha is a threat to national security and wants to deport him to his native Algeria.

Abu Doha is appealing, and the case is due to be heard early next year.

In Washington, an official who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the case, said the U.S. Justice Department was "horrified" at the idea of Abu Doha being free.

Abu Doha, 40, also known as Dr. Haidar, Amar Makhlulif and "The Doctor," has been described by U.S. prosecutors as a key al-Qaida figure who oversaw a plot to blow up Los Angeles airport on New Year's Eve 1999.

The plan was foiled when another Algerian, Ahmed Ressam, was caught trying to enter Washington state from Canada in a car loaded with explosives. Ressam identified Abu Doha as ringleader of the plot.

Abu Doha was arrested at Britain's Heathrow Airport in February 2001 while trying to travel to Saudi Arabia on a fake passport. He has been held in a high-security prison ever since.

In August 2001, he was indicted in New York as a mastermind of the Los Angeles millennium bomb plot. According to the indictment, he sent terrorists to training camps in Afghanistan and dispatched others to Canada to prepare for the failed attack.

Police and prosecutors claimed that Abu Doha, who moved to London in the 1990s, was a major player at the Finsbury Park Mosque - a key center for Islamist recruitment and training - and led a mostly Algerian terrorist network with cells in Europe and North America.

U.S. prosecutors also alleged that in late 1998, he met with bin Laden in Afghanistan "to discuss cooperation and coordination" between al-Qaida and "a group of Algerian terrorists whose activities Abu Doha coordinated and oversaw."

But in August 2005, the U.S. dropped its extradition request. Ressam, now serving a 22-year sentence for his involvement in the millennium plot, had stopped cooperating with prosecutors in 2003. Without his continued testimony, the U.S. said it was forced to drop its cases against Abu Doha and another alleged co-conspirator, Samir Ait Mohamed.

"Ressam's testimony would have been an essential part of the government's evidence at trial against Abu Doha," Assistant U.S. Attorney Eric B. Bruce wrote in an Aug. 21, 2005, notice asking the U.S. District Court in Manhattan to dismiss the charges.

Britain's Home Office said Abu Doha is now being held on immigration charges, appealing against its decision to extradite him to Algeria - a prospect that concerns civil liberties groups.

As a signatory to the European Convention on Human Rights, Britain is not allowed to deport people to countries where they may face torture or abuse.

In July, Britain and Algeria signed an agreement promising that nationals returned there will not be mistreated. Amnesty International says the Algerian security service uses torture on terrorist suspects, and has called the deportation agreement "a green light to torture."

A former senior U.S. intelligence official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said it was almost certain Abu Doha would be imprisoned on his return.

Rabah Toubal, spokesman at the Algerian Embassy in London, said Abu Doha had been involved in "many acts of terrorism" in his homeland, but declined to specify what would happen to him if he returned.

"If he comes back, he has to respond to some questions about what he did," he said.

Associated Press writer Lara Jakes Jordan in Washington contributed to this report.

Britain Said To Seek Weaker Torture Protections (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 2 -- The British government has systematically attempted to water down laws banning the transfer of terror suspects to countries that practice torture, according to a report issued Thursday by Human Rights Watch.

British officials strongly disputed the report's conclusions.

"Britain cannot have it both ways," Benjamin Ward, an official with the New York-based rights agency, said in a statement. "The government claims to oppose torture. Yet at the same time, it is actively trying to undermine the global ban against it."

The group concluded that the government of Prime Minister Tony Blair has adopted a "dangerous ambivalence" toward torture of suspected terrorists abroad since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States and the July 2005 bombings of the London public transit system.

"We're not in any way ambivalent about torture; we absolutely condemn torture and oppose it unreservedly," said a spokeswoman for the British Home Office, which handles domestic security. The spokeswoman spoke on condition of anonymity, following government practice here.

British opposition parties say Blair's government slavishly follows the American lead in foreign affairs, in particular the decision to invade Iraq. The war is widely unpopular here.

DOJ_NMG_0090058

British and European law prohibit deportation to a country where there is a likelihood that the deportee would be tortured. The British government has announced that it is seeking written assurances from countries, including Syria, Lebanon and Jordan, that they would not torture or mistreat suspected extremists deported from Britain.

Human Rights Watch said such assurances were little more than a legal fig leaf. "When it comes to torture, diplomatic assurances simply don't work," Ward said.

The Home Office spokeswoman said British officials believe that such assurances would be effective and added that the government was "happy to leave it up to the courts" to decide whether that policy was proper. She pointed out that in August a British judge ruled that the government could deport an Algerian man to his home country despite his argument that he would face torture there.

"The government is committed to protecting the public from the very real threat of terrorism," she said, adding that the government was trying to balance a deportee's risk of being tortured against the security risk posed if the person remained in Britain.

"It should be possible to take some account of the risk posed by the person on grounds of national security," she said.

The rights group also accused the Blair government of "whitewashing U.S. government abuses," including the practice of "rendition" of suspected extremists to countries that use torture.

A spokesman for the Foreign Office said British officials have no evidence that U.S. officials ever conducted a rendition using British territory or airspace.

"The U.K. government have not approved and will not approve a policy of facilitating the transfer of individuals through the U.K. to places where there are substantial grounds to believe they would face a risk of torture," the spokesman said.

Human Rights Watch said Blair had failed to use his close relationship with President Bush to press for changes to policies such as rendition. "The U.K. is losing the credibility that it once enjoyed," the report concluded. "The government's determination to bend the rules on its own account, and its refusal to confront abuses committed by its closest ally, is a moral and political abdication, in defiance of international law."

British Authorities Charge Suspect With Violations Of Terrorism Laws (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 1 — A 29-year-old man from East London was charged Wednesday with trying to take terrorism-related materials, including a manual titled “The Mujahideen Poisons Handbook,” on a Pakistan-bound flight from Heathrow Airport.

The man, Sohail Anjum Qureshi, was arrested by antiterror officers at the airport on Oct. 18 as he was waiting to board a flight to Islamabad, Pakistan. He was carrying about $17,000 in cash, a night-vision scope, two metal batons, two backpacks, two sleeping bags and a computer disk and hard drive containing a combat-training manual as well as the poison manual, the authorities said.

Mr. Qureshi, who lives in the Forest Gate neighborhood, has been charged with three counts of violating British antiterrorism laws and is to appear in court on Thursday. The authorities said that the charges were related to terrorist activities that were to have been carried out abroad, and that Mr. Qureshi was not involved in any of the other terrorism cases they were investigating.

In a separate case, a judge freed 2 of the 24 men arrested in August on suspicion of being part of what the authorities said was a foiled plot to blow up trans-Atlantic airplanes with homemade liquid explosives. The men, Mehran Hussain, 24, and Umair Hussain, 25, both of Chingford, East London, were set free after a hearing at a magistrate’s court in central London.

The judge in the case, Quentin Purdy, said there was “insufficient evidence” to put the two men on trial. But he warned the men, who are brothers, that they should not consider themselves exonerated, and he said that if new evidence came to light, prosecutors were free to charge them again.

The men had been charged with failing to disclose information to the authorities about their brother, Nabeel, a suspect in the bombing-plot case.

Nabeel Hussain, 22, remains in custody, charged with conspiracy to murder and with planning to bring liquid bomb-making materials on board airplanes and then to assemble and detonate them in midair.

Israeli Agent Scoffs At Hamas Defendant's Torture Claims (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, November 2, 2006

CHICAGO - An Israeli security agent scoffed Wednesday at a Chicago grocer's claim that he was deprived of sleep, forced to wear a foul-smelling hood and otherwise tortured after his arrest on charges of bankrolling terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0090059

"Isn't it true that he was psychologically and somewhat physically brutally, brutally abused?" defense attorney Robert Bloom asked the Israeli who testified under the alias Nadav at Muhammad Salah's trial.

"That is not correct," Nadav testified in Hebrew through a translator.

Salah, 53, of suburban Bridgeview and former university professor Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, of Alexandria, Va., face federal charges of with conspiring to funnel cash and fresh recruits for a terrorist campaign against Israel.

Salah was arrested at an Israeli checkpoint in January 1993 and agents found $97,000 in his East Jerusalem hotel room. He served 4 1/2 years in an Israeli prison after signing statements that he met with Hamas leaders.

Both defendants deny they are members of Hamas, which is intent on toppling the Israeli government, and Salah says that when arrested he was delivering the money to charities on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Salah claims he was tortured by agents of Israel's Shin Bet security service into admitting he furnished funds to Hamas commanders.

Nadav said he didn't attend the initial interrogation of Salah. But he said he knew the agents who took part refrained from using torture.

Bloom suggested Nadav had played the part of the "good cop" to warm up Salah while other agents placed a reeking hood over his head, forced him to sit handcuffed in a tiny chair and "beat the hell out of him."

Nadav steadfastly refused to agree to any of it.

In 3 1/2 hours of cross examination, Bloom and Nadav, a Shin Bet agent, played cat and mouse over what happened in the hours after Salah's arrest.

Nadav admitted that it took only 1 1/2 hours to get from the checkpoint to the Shin Bet interrogation center at Ramallah. But he balked when Bloom said Salah's arrest at about 5:30 p.m. and arrival at the center at 10 p.m. suggested soldiers had taken the long way to "soften him up."

"If there is a document that shows what time Mr. Salah was arrested I would be glad to see it," Nadav said. Pressed by Bloom, he said Israeli interrogators are not given arrest records but only arrest warrants.

"Are you aware that you are known to the Palestinians as Captain Liar?" Bloom asked Nadav. The agent said that was "far from the truth."

Salah attorneys had hoped to question Nadav further about Shin Bet interrogation methods but were barred from doing so. Some of the material they sought to elicit from the witness is classified for security reasons.

In place of the evidence, the defense attorneys introduced government supplied "substitutions," which were not as specific but did give a sharp glimpse into how prisoners were questioned.

The statement from the government said at the time Salah was questioned, Israeli interrogators were allowed to use hoods, handcuffs and shackles and to handcuff prisoners in small chairs, to threaten them and to threaten to arrest their family members.

In some cases, interrogators were allowed to slap prisoners, according to one of the substitutions read to the jury.

The trial is being conducted among heavy security. The courtroom is cleared of spectators and even those allowed to watch on TV from a room five floors away must pass through a metal detector, watched by an explosives-sniffing Labrador retriever named Comet.

What They Don't Know Is Frightening (WT)

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

How alarmed should Americans be upon learning that one of the nation's highest-ranking FBI counterterrorism policy-makers and two members of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, among numerous other unnamed officials, possess shallow knowledge about terrorist groups that have slaughtered Americans in the past, are killing our soldiers in the war on terror today and threaten to obliterate us in the future?

In a recent op-ed essay in the New York Times, Jeff Stein, the national security editor at Congressional Quarterly, revealed how ignorant these people are. Wrapping up lengthy interviews with Washington counterterrorism officials, Mr. Stein would ask, "Do you know the difference between a Sunni and a Shi'ite?" He wasn't seeking theological explanations, "just the basics: Who's on what side today, and what does each want?"

Recently appointed as the executive assistant director of the National Security Branch of the FBI, Willie Hulon previously served as deputy assistant director of the Counterterrorism Division, when he testified July 13, 2004, before Congress about how important it was to develop "our knowledge and expertise about foreign cultures and our terrorist adversaries overseas." Mr. Hulon appeared stumped when he was asked: Which one is Iran -- Sunni or Shi'ite? "Iran and Hezbollah," Mr. Stein prompted. "Which are they?" Mr. Hulon guessed Sunni. Wrong.

DOJ_NMG_0090060

"The FBI believes the Lebanese-based Hezbollah," which blew up the Marine barracks in Lebanon in 1983, killing 241 Marines, "has terrorist cells in at least 10 U.S. cities," Bill Gertz, national security reporter for The Washington Times, revealed in his latest book, "Enemies." John Miller, the FBI's assistant director for public affairs, told Mr. Gertz that the FBI is concerned that Iran could activate a network of Hezbollah terrorists in the United States if the international community takes action to stop the Iranian nuclear program.

Given that Sunnis and Shi'ites are massacring each other throughout Baghdad and across Iraq in sectarian strife bordering on civil war, one would think that seven-term Alabama Republican Rep. Terry Everett, who serves as vice chairman of the subcommittee on Technical and Tactical Intelligence, would be on top of it. To Mr. Stein's basic question, Mr. Everett replied, "One's in one location, another's in another location. No, to be honest with you, I don't know" the difference. Three-term Virginia Republican Rep. Jo Ann Davis, who chairs the subcommittee on Terrorism/HUMINT, Analysis and Counterintelligence, which oversees the CIA's performance in its recruitment of Islamic spies, told Mr. Stein: "It's a difference in their fundamental beliefs. The Sunni are more radical than the Shia. Or vice versa. But I think it's the Sunnis who're more radical than the Shia." Asked which branch al Qaeda's leaders follow, she reasoned as follows: "Al Qaeda is the one that's most radical, so I think they're Sunni. I may be wrong, but I think that's right."

You could not make this stuff up. Given their governmental responsibilities, the ingrained incuriosity of these officials is as appalling as it is frightening.

FBI Logs On For Monitoring Service For Arabic Networks (GCN)

By Wilson P. Dizard III, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, November 2, 2006

The FBI now has access to an online service that its employees can use to screen TV broadcasts and provide alerts when specified words are used, either on English-language networks or networks broadcasting in Arabic.

Critical Mention Inc. of New York City provides the service, which it is furnishing to multiple users at the bureau under a recently concluded one-year contract with options for renewal.

“CriticalTV alerts users about a relevant clip seconds after a broadcast, and allows users to share the clip instantly within a workgroup via secure video-e-mail or a private video gallery. Users can also order a professional transcript or hard copy online,” according to a company announcement.

The vendor has forged a partnership with IBM Corp. to incorporate an Arabic-to-English, speech-to-text translation feature into the CriticalTV service. The TV monitoring service generates alerts of the use of a specified word or term within two minutes or so of its broadcast via a satellite or terrestrial broadcast network, the company said.

The bureau is using the service to monitor TV news mentions of the term “FBI” on various news networks to track the public’s perception of the law enforcement agency, sources said.

In a similar vein, a user at the bureau could use the service to track the use of other words of interest that might be broadcast in Arabic, including the names, events, locations, physical objects, organizations, vehicles, political parties, products or the like. Then a user could receive an English-text version of the Arabic broadcast as well as a video clip, and potentially incorporate the information in an appropriate database.

The company’s chief financial officer, Alan Davison, noted that its existing customers include many Fortune 500 companies as well as members of Congress who seek to track the news profile of political campaigns, major public events, their own companies, competitors, their products and the like.

Davison said that Critical Mention would launch its monitoring of five Arabic-language TV networks in mid-November, including Al Jazeera and other major broadcasters.

He added that the company plans to expand the foreign-language TV monitoring service to other languages as well.

A system user views a screen that provides, among other features an opportunity for “advanced search” which limits an inquiry by the network monitored or by other dimensions. Once the user has crafted a search that limits the inquiry to a targeted word or phrase, the system generates a response that includes text and video clips of the use of that term.

The user can immediately view the entire video clip or text version of the broadcast, translated by the advanced IBM Arabic-to-English translation tool if necessary.

The company already has about 500 clients, including private companies and government agencies.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Air Plot Said To Target Cities (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0090061

By Dan Eggen
The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

A group of alleged terrorists arrested in London in August planned to blow up airliners over U.S. cities to maximize casualties, rather than over the Atlantic Ocean as many intelligence officials originally thought, according to recent remarks by a senior FBI official.

The comments by Mark Mershon, head of the FBI's New York field office, indicate that U.S. and British intelligence officials now think that the airliner plot was aimed at maximizing the potential loss of life and economic impact.

"The plan was bring them down over U.S. cities, not over the ocean," Mershon said Oct. 24 at the Infosecurity 2006 conference in New York, according to Government Security News, which first reported the remarks this week.

Authorities had previously said it was unclear where the alleged terrorists intended to detonate liquid explosives, which they planned to smuggle onto as many as 10 transatlantic flights. Michael P. Jackson, deputy secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, said shortly after the plot was thwarted that while the conspirators appeared to be targeting nonstop flights to the United States, "the real focus was to blow up airliners and the people on them."

British police arrested 25 people in raids across Britain after uncovering the alleged plot. Eleven have been charged with conspiracy to murder and preparing acts of terrorism. Two brothers, Umair Hussain, 25, and Mehran Hussain, 23, were released Wednesday after a British court ruled evidence against them was insufficient to warrant a trial.

Christine Monaco, a spokeswoman for the FBI in New York, declined to comment on Mershon's speech.

Mershon told cybersecurity conference attendees that representatives of MI5, the British intelligence service, briefed the FBI on the liquid explosives case in recent weeks. "It would make your hair stand up to be in the room to hear that presentation," Mershon said, according to GSN.

Bruce Hoffman, a terrorism expert and Georgetown University professor, said the case indicates that Islamic extremists remain focused on attacking U.S. cities.

"They were clearly desirous of exceeding 9/11," Hoffman said. "The loss of life on the air and ground would be significant."

PayPal Building Targeted In Explosion (AP)

By Jordan Robertson
AP, November 2, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. - A Halloween night explosion shattered a window at a building housing offices for eBay's PayPal division, forcing the evacuation of dozens of employees.

PayPal spokeswoman Amanda Pires said Wednesday that the company had not received any threats but declined to comment on the investigation. The blast hit the first floor of the company's network operations center.

"We believe this is an isolated incident," she said. "We're working closely with local authorities. We have everything under control."

Business was not disrupted, but the complex was closed Wednesday and cordoned off by police tape. About 1,900 eBay and PayPal employees who work in buildings on the campus where the explosion occurred were asked to work from home or at another eBay campus in San Jose, Pires said.

No injuries were reported and no explosive device was found, but investigators determined the blast was deliberately set, Sgt. Nick Muyo said. Police had no suspects.

Investigators from the San Jose police and fire departments, the FBI and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives were investigating.

PayPal, which provides a platform for online payments, is a lucrative division of San Jose-based eBay Inc., generating some $350 million in revenue for the online auction company in the latest quarter.

Probe Of Blast At EBay's North S.J. Campus Yields Few Answers; Site Set To Reopen Thursday (MERCN)

By Sean Webby And Kimra Mcpherson
The San Jose Mercury News, November 2, 2006

EBay shut down its North San Jose campus on Wednesday, clearing the way for bomb-sniffing dogs and investigators, who still don't know who planted a powerful explosive that blew out a window and forced more than 1,900 employees to work elsewhere.

Nobody was injured in the Halloween night blast -- and other Silicon Valley companies were not put on alert. EBay expected Thursday morning to reopen the campus that also houses some of its PayPal operations.

DOJ_NMG_0090062

The company received no threats before or after the blast, which happened about 7:30 p.m. Tuesday in a landscaped breezeway outside the 100,000 square-foot, four-story building.

But the corporate target was so sensitive, the explosion so powerful and the bombing so rare in Silicon Valley that law enforcement from San Jose, the federal Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms and FBI converged on the campus.

After more than 24 hours scouring for clues, investigators had few answers. Was it someone intentionally targeting the Internet corporate giant, a techno-terrorist? Or was it a dangerous prank on a night known for smashed pumpkins and toilet paper attacks?

``It could have been a Halloween thing, it could have been kids, it could have been something larger," said San Jose Police Sgt. Nick Muyo. ``If it's a Halloween prank it's a sophisticated one."

Bomb-sniffing dogs spent the day nosing around the office and other campus buildings, all emptied of its employees, and at eBay's headquarters on Hamilton Avenue. They found nothing suspicious.

And investigators said that there was no indication that the company had been warned or that the bomber had targeted any other place. No one had taken responsibility for the blast as of Wednesday night.

EBay officials said eBay and PayPal service was not disrupted. Many of the processes that keep the Web pages running can be handled from other locations, eBay spokesman Hani Durzy said.

Durzy said the company expected to reopen the campus Thursday and ``the safety and security of our employees is our top priority for us."

Muyo described the source of the blast as a sophisticated explosive device that not only shattered a large, two-inch thick plate of safety glass, but blew over furniture inside.

``Whatever caused it was pretty strong," San Jose Fire Capt. Jose Guerrero said.

About 1,900 eBay employees work at eBay's North San Jose campus, which includes PayPal headquarters, technology staff, sales, marketing and the network operations center, Durzy said. Employees at that campus were invited to work at the company's other San Jose location or dial in from home, he said.

When PayPal employee Dan Hyder arrived for work this morning, he was told the office was closed and given a flier explaining what had happened. He walked around the site for a while after, taking photos of the investigators milling around the building where he used to work.

``It's bizarre," said Hyder, who now works in a different building and had already left work by the time the incident began Tuesday night.

Muyo said the timing of the explosion, at 7:34 p.m. when many people had already left work for the day, might indicate that whomever placed the device at the building wasn't looking to injure people.

Authorities received multiple reports of a smoke detector alarm sounding, Guerrero said, followed a few minutes later by multiple calls of an explosion.

When crews arrived, they found a 6-by-7-foot window had been shattered near a first-floor exit. The window's frame was bent and a light haze covered the area, Guerrero said. No flames, however, were visible, nor was there any other damage. Other debris was in the area, said Guerrero, who couldn't say exactly what the debris was.

Authorities have an idea about what may have caused the blast, Guerrero said, but he declined to disclose it. Muyo declined to say whether security cameras may have captured video footage from the site.

``We're not ruling anything out," said Muyo. Neither PayPal nor its corporate parent eBay received any threats prior to the blast, Muyo said.

``It was fortunate that no one was hurt," said Catherine England, an eBay spokeswoman.

From Google to Yahoo, other Silicon Valley corporations reported no similar threats or incidents.

Security experts said such dangers unfortunately came with the corporate territory.

``You're a target if you have a commodity that's of any particular value, whether it's home invasion or the CEO being kidnapped. It doesn't have to be a terrorist group, it could be the animal liberation front," said Forrest Franklin, direction of operations for Focus Group Consultants, Inc. in Carson City, Nev., who has worked as a consultant for several Silicon Valley companies. ``If you've got 3,000 people in your company, you've got 3,000 potential perps."

Ken Silva, Chief Security Officer for Verisign, agreed that such attacks can come from disgruntled employees.

``It could also just be a random person who is disgruntled with the company," Silva said. ``It doesn't take much for among millions of people out there for someone to get angry."

Explosive Shatters Window At PayPal Headquarters (NYT)

By Greg Sandoval, For News.com

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

An explosive left outside the headquarters of eBay-owned PayPal blew out a window Tuesday evening but caused no injuries, according to eBay.

San Jose, Calif.-based PayPal, an online payment system, closed the building on Wednesday as FBI agents and local police investigated, said eBay spokesman Hani Durzi. The blast occurred at about 7:25 p.m., and at that time about 45 employees occupied the building, said Durzi.

The explosion triggered the security alarm and officials from the San Jose Fire department later ordered the building, which is typically occupied by about 1,900, to be evacuated. Employees are scheduled to return to work tomorrow, Durzi said. He added that PayPal's operations were never interrupted.

"We have at this point no reason to believe that this was anything other than an isolated incident," Durzi said. "The most important point is that we continue to provide a safe and secure work environment for our employees."

Durzi said he was unaware whether authorities have identified a suspect. Calls to the San Jose Police Department and the FBI were not immediately returned.

Capt. Jose Guerrero, of the San Jose Fire Department, said it's believed that the device "was not highly sophisticated." Authorities have called in the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to help identify the explosive.

EBay Campus Closed After Halloween Explosion (SJBIZ)

San Jose Business Journal, November 2, 2006

The North San Jose campus of eBay Inc. remained closed Wednesday while investigators combed the area looking for clues to what caused an explosion Tuesday night that shattered a window.

Following the explosion, about 26 employees were evacuated from the offices used by Pay Pal, a unit of of eBay (NASDAQ:EBAY), shortly after 7:30 p.m.

By midday Wednesday, investigators from the FBI, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and San Jose police were on the scene and employees were not allowed inside.

No one was injured during the blast at 2211 N. First St. and no explosive devices were found.

About 1,900 eBay employees work at campus, which houses PayPal headquarters. Employees were either allowed to work from home Wednesday or at the company's other San Jose location.

EBay said there has been no disruption experienced by its customers due to the explosion or ongoing investigation.

Man Convicted In Fake Hazmat Incident (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, November 2, 2006

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) _ An Uncasville man was convicted Wednesday of lying to federal authorities about being the victim of a chemical attack.

Robert Robishaw, 40, pleaded guilty to one count of making false statements to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, prosecutors said. He entered his plea in U.S. District Court in Hartford, eight months after telling Groton fire authorities that an unknown substance fell out of a newspaper that he purchased at a Waterford convenience store. He told authorities the off-white, powdery substance caused his skin to turn red and tingle.

The report prompted a massive hazardous materials response in Waterford and Groton, and sent eight people to the hospital for decontamination. The substance turned out ot be cigarette ash that prosecutors say Robishaw put in the newspaper.

Robishaw was indicted on the federal charge in April and faces up to five years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000 when he is sentenced on Jan. 23.

U.S. Attorney Keven O'Connor said the case was prosecuted under a relatively new federal law that makes it a crime to perpetrate a hoax about a bombing, chemical attack or similar incident.

Man Behind Chemical Attack Hoax Could Get 5 Years (WVIT)

WVIT-TV, November 2, 2006

HARTFORD, Conn. -- An Uncasville man who reported a chemical attack that turned out to be a hoax could spend five years in prison, NBC 30 News reported.

Robert Robishaw, 39, pleaded guilty Wednesday to making a false statement to the FBI.

Robishaw claimed he was exposed to a white powder at a Waterford gas station in March. The powder turned out to be cigarette ash.

The scare sent eight people to a hospital for decontamination.

Uncasville Man Admits Lying To FBI In Powdery Substance Hoax (NORBULL)

DOJ_NMG_0090064

Norwich Bulletin, November 2, 2006

HARTFORD — A 40-year-old Uncasville man pleaded guilty today to one count of making a false statement to the FBI in connection with his claim that he was exposed to a white powder substance which caused toxic chemical effects.

Robert Robishaw, 40, formerly of 119 Maple Ave., entered the plea in federal court in Hartford, according to U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor.

On March 16, Robishaw called the Groton fire department to report he had been exposed to an unknown powder substance that had dropped from a newspaper at Cumberland Farms in Waterford earlier in the day. He claimed there was a reaction on his skin from the substance.

His claim prompted a large scale response by firefighters at his location at 266 Bridge St. in the City of Groton, where the area was evacuated and individuals were decontaminated.

The Cumberland Farms in Waterford, where he had allegedly purchased the newspaper, was also evacuated and employees subjected to decontamination procedures.

Robishaw later revealed that the substance was cigarette ash, and that he had placed the ash on his desk.

"Individuals who make threats of mass violence, however real or intended, will be prosecuted to the extent that federal law allows," O'Connor said.Robishaw is scheduled to be sentenced by Chief U.S. District Judge Robert N. Chatigny on Jan. 23, 2007.

He faces a maximum sentence of five years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000.

The case was investigated by the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force and is being prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorneys David Ring and Mark Rubino.

There's Secrecy, And There's Expediency (WP)

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

In 2004, the Department of Homeland Security inspector general's office issued a report slamming the department's failure to consolidate a dozen government watch lists containing information about suspected terrorists. The lack of a reliable master list, the report said, slows efforts to find terrorists trying to enter the country or plan an attack.

At least that's what the report seemed to say. When it was released, entire pages were blacked out, ostensibly for security reasons.

But recently, the Washington-based National Security Archive found a surprise in its mailbox: a mostly uncut copy of the report. The editor of a legal publication had requested an unedited version of the 48-page report under the Freedom of Information Act two years ago. By the time the government handed it over last month, the requester, Daniel Kowalski of Bender's Immigration Bulletin, had lost interest. So he mailed the report to the archive, an independent institute that collects and publishes declassified documents obtained through the FOIA. Its library, containing hundreds of thousands of once-secret notes, memos and reports, illuminates many of history's most significant, and clandestine, decisions and events.

"So many of these secrecy stamps look like Nixon's madman theory in operation," said Thomas S. Blanton, director of the National Security Archive. "If everybody thinks you're just not rational, that keeps them off balance, whether they are your fellow bureaucrats, your outside critics, or even your international criminals and terrorists."

Often, secrecy-related edits aren't about national security -- or madness -- as much as they are about convenience. Although some of the redacted information is truly sensitive, some is merely embarrassing to the government. Other cuts reflect the bureaucratic fact that it's easier to keep information secret than to risk releasing too much.

Several portions of the 2004 report seem to bear that out. It took two years to get, but here's Page 26, in its edited and restored forms. The problems the report describes, by the way, persist.

Bonuses Don't Cut Turnover For TSA (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — An ambitious program that paid the nation's airport screeners $18 million in bonuses as an enticement to stay in their jobs did not reduce the turnover rate at the Transportation Security Administration, which still has one of the highest attrition rates in the U.S. government, according to agency data.

The TSA has battled high turnover among screeners since the agency was formed after the Sept. 11 attacks. It is looking for ways to curb a staffing problem that has lengthened lines at airport checkpoints.

The TSA began paying 36,000 of its 45,000 screeners "retention bonuses" of $500 or $1,000 each in May. The turnover rate over the summer was unchanged from the winter and spring months, according to the TSA and the federal Office of Personnel Management.

One in five screeners left from Oct. 1, 2005, to Sept. 30.

"It's menial labor," said Michael Boyd, an aviation consultant who advises airports and airlines. "These are people who paw through luggage."

The TSA acknowledges the attrition problem and is taking additional steps. Among more recent efforts to curb turnover is a new pay grade that will raise salaries of high-quality veteran screeners by up to $5,300 and better position them to move into other government-security jobs such as the Secret Service or Border Patrol, according to TSA.

The agency also says it is creating screener jobs with salaries up to $56,700 that will focus on detecting bombs or identifying suspicious passengers. TSA has maintained that screeners with more experience are better at finding weapons at checkpoints.

Such improvements could help upgrade screening — which pays an average of $30,000 a year — "from a dead-end job to an occupation where (screeners) can see years of opportunity," said Gale Rossides, a TSA associate administrator.

The efforts come as some airports face longer security lines, prompting a TSA publicity campaign that urges travelers to know the rules about items they can carry onto planes so fewer bags have to be searched.

Cris Soulia, a screener in San Diego, said $500 bonuses amounted to $335 after taxes and "really don't have any effect" on people quitting.

Rossides said the attrition "is probably not that high" when considered against screeners' salaries and their physically demanding work, which often requires lifting heavy bags. Some efforts to retain screeners started too recently to affect attrition, Rossides said.

TSA figures show that attrition is lower than before 9/11, when private companies ran airport security.

Rossides said the bonuses and other efforts are improving morale and screener retention. She said TSA data show screeners are less likely to quit now than they were six months ago. But those gains are being offset by a growing number of part-time screeners, who are twice as likely to leave as full-timers.

The agency has 8,200 part-time screeners, up from nearly 6,200 late last year, and will add even more. Part-time screeners work brief shifts at busy periods.

Randy Walker, director of Las Vegas' McCarran International Airport, said that he's seen no reduction in turnover and that lines are "still painful on our peak times." But he said a new program that shifts screener hiring from TSA headquarters to TSA's local airport security directors means vacancies are filled faster.

Ruby Ridge Revisited: Deval Let Sniper Off The The Hook (BOSH)

By Kimberly Atkins, Boston Herald Reporter

Boston Herald, November 2, 2006

As the Justice Department's chief civil rights prosecutor, Deval Patrick made the controversial decision not to criminally prosecute an FBI sniper who shot and killed an unarmed woman as she held her infant daughter in her arms during a 1992 standoff in Ruby Ridge, Idaho.

The incident, in which U.S. Marshall William F. Degan of Quincy and the wife and son of white separatist Randy Weaver were killed during an 11-day standoff, is cited by experts as the spark that started the anti-government militia movement that exploded after the standoff in Waco, Texas, less than a year later.

In 1994, Patrick, the Democratic candidate for governor who was then assistant attorney general, concluded there was insufficient basis to prosecute FBI sniper Lon Horiuchi for shooting and killing 43-year-old Vicki Weaver. Horiuchi had testified that he opened fire on the woman's husband and his friend, Kevin Harris, when he thought they were about to fire on an FBI helicopter.

Patrick made the recommendation despite a report by a task force assembled by Patrick's boss, Attorney General Janet Reno, that found numerous problems with the FBI's handling of the standoff, and called the protocol used by the FBI's Hostage Rescue unconstitutional under the circumstances.

The report referred the case to Patrick's department to decide whether to charge Horiuchi. Aides to Patrick said he was unavailable for comment because he was preparing for last night's debate.

Former Justice Department spokesman Myron Marlin called the incident "a tragic one that occurred during the final months of the first Bush administration."

"The Justice Department believed the critical element of willfulness necessary for a criminal civil rights prosecution could not be established beyond a reasonable doubt," Marlin said in a statement to the Herald yesterday. "Such willfulness, or knowing, intentional use of unreasonable force could not be made out against the FBI agent."

Patrick's assessment, he noted, was"reaffirmed by a separate criminal investigative team."

In 1995, however, a Senate subcommittee headed by Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) found “simply no justification” for the shot Horiuchi took that killed Vicki Weaver and “missed the 10-month-old baby in her arms by less than two feet.”

“Horiuchi should have known that as he fired blind through the cabin door, he was shooting into an area which could well have contained Vicki Weaver and her two younger daughters,” states the report, which took no position on whether Horiuchi should have been prosecuted.

The decision not to prosecute was ripped by both conservative and liberal groups. “It was obscene,” said author James Bovard, an outspoken critic of federal officials’ handling of the case. “There was no need for the excessive force the FBI used in gunning down a mother holding her baby.”

WAR NEWS:

Staying The Course, Win Or Lose (WP)

By Robert Kagan

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

BRUSSELS -- Here in Europe, people ask hopefully if a Democratic victory in the congressional elections will finally shift the direction of American foreign policy in a more benign direction. But congressional elections rarely affect the broad direction of American foreign policy. A notable exception was when Congress cut funding for American military operations in support of South Vietnam in 1973. Yet it's unlikely that a Democratic House would cut off funds for the war in Iraq in the next two years.

Indeed, the preferred European scenario -- "Bush hobbled" -- is less likely than the alternative: "Bush unbound." Neither the president nor his vice president is running for office in 2008. That is what usually prevents high-stakes foreign policy moves in the last two years of a president's term. In 1988 Ronald Reagan had negotiated a clever agreement to get the dictator Manuel Noriega peacefully out of Panama, but Vice President George H.W. Bush and his advisers feared the domestic political repercussions of cutting a deal with a drug lord at the height of the "war on drugs," so they nixed the plan. The result was that Bush had to invade Panama the very next year to remove Noriega -- but he did get elected.

This President Bush doesn't have to worry about getting anyone elected in 2008 and appears to be thinking only about his place in history. That can lead him to act in ways that please Europeans -- for instance, the vigorous multilateral diplomacy on Iran and North Korea. But it could also take him in directions they will find worrisome if that diplomacy fails.

There is a deeper reason this election, and even the next presidential election, may not change U.S. foreign policy very much. Historically, and especially in the six decades since the end of World War II, there has been much more continuity than discontinuity in foreign policy. New administrations change policy around the margins, and sometimes those changes prove important -- George H.W. Bush temporized about the Balkans; Bill Clinton temporized and then sent troops. Clinton temporized about Iraq and then bombed. George W. Bush temporized and then invaded. But the motives behind American foreign policy, and even the means, don't differ all that much from administration to administration. Republicans berated the Democrats' "cowardly" containment until they took the White House in 1952, then adopted that strategy as their own.

This tendency toward continuity is particularly striking on the issue that most divides Americans from Europeans today: the use of military force in international affairs. Americans of both parties simply have more belief in the utility and even justice of military action than do most other peoples around the world. The German Marshall Fund commissions an annual poll that asks Europeans and Americans, among other things, whether they agree with the following statement: "Under some conditions, war is necessary to obtain justice." Europeans disagree, and by a 2 to 1 margin. But Americans overwhelmingly support the idea that war may be necessary to obtain justice. Even this year, with disapproval of the Iraq war high, 78 percent of American respondents agreed with the statement.

This broad bipartisan conviction is reflected in U.S. policies. Between 1989 and 2003, the United States engaged in significant military actions overseas on nine occasions under Bush I, Clinton and Bush II: Panama in 1989, Somalia in 1992, Haiti in 1994, Bosnia in 1995-96, Kosovo in 1999, Afghanistan in 2001 and Iraq three times -- 1991, 1998 and 2003, an average of one major military action every year and a half.

The reasons for this prolific use of military force have to do with the nation's history -- Americans have been fighting what they considered just and moral wars since the Revolution and the Civil War. And it has to do with Americans' relative power. It is no accident that the United States began to use force more frequently after the fall of the Soviet Union.

Those who imagine that the Iraq imbroglio may change this approach could be right, but the historical record suggests otherwise. Less than six years after the defeat in Vietnam, Americans were electing Reagan on a promise to restore American military power and engage in a concerted arms race with the Soviet Union.

DOJ_NMG_0090067

Even today leading Democrats who oppose the Iraq war do not oppose the idea of war itself or its utility. They're not even denouncing a defense budget approaching $500 billion per year. While Europeans mostly reject the Bush administration's phrase "the war on terror," leading Democrats embrace it and accuse the administration of not pursuing it vigorously or intelligently enough. Nor do leading Democrats reject the premise of the United States as the world's "indispensable nation" -- a notion that most Europeans find offensive at best and dangerous at worst.

In this respect, there is even less debate over the general principles of American foreign policy than during the Vietnam era. In those days, opponents of the war insisted that not just President Richard Nixon was rotten but that the "system" was rotten. They did not just reject the Vietnam War, they rejected the whole containment strategy of Dean Acheson and Harry Truman, which, they rightly claimed, helped produce the intervention in the first place. They rejected the idea that the United States could be a benevolent force in the world.

Today Democrats insist that the United States will be such a force as soon as George W. Bush leaves office. Although they pretend they have a fundamental doctrinal dispute with the Bush administration, their recommendations are less far-reaching. They argue that the United States should generally try to be nicer, employ more "soft power" and be more effective when it employs "hard power." That may be good advice, but it hardly qualifies as an alternative doctrine.

Many around the world will thrill at the defeat of Republicans next week. They should enjoy the moment while they can. When the smoke clears, they will find themselves dealing with much the same America, with all its virtues and all its flaws.

Robert Kagan, a senior associate at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and transatlantic fellow at the German Marshall Fund, writes a monthly column for The Post. He is the author of "Dangerous Nation," a history of American foreign policy.

US Air Strike Kills Al-Qaeda Kingpin: Military (AFP)

AFP, November 2, 2006

American forces killed an Al-Qaeda chieftain in the lawless western Iraqi city of Ramadi by destroying his car with a laser guided bomb, the US military said.

"Rafa Abdul Salam Hamud al-Ithawi, also known as Abu Taha, was the emir of Shamiyyah," it said. "He frequently harboured foreign fighters who entered Iraq illegally in order to assault innocent Iraqis and coalition forces."

Ithawi was killed on Wednesday along with his driver, "diminishing the al-Qaeda in Iraq network," the statement said.

Ramadi has become the focus of the battle between US forces and Sunni Arab insurgents fighting under the Al-Qaeda banner. Last week a US spokesman said marines were fighting to take back the city.

On October 15, Al-Qaeda militants held a brief parade in central Ramadi to declare the region an independent emirate, scoring a propaganda victory, but fierce fighting has continued since.

Iraqi Shiites Continue To Exert Independence And Seek Changes To U.N. Deal On U.S. Troops (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 1 — In a continued effort to demonstrate their independence from Washington, Iraqi Shiites are pressing a fresh set of conditions on their American supporters, asking for changes in the Iraqi government's relationship with the United States military.

In a move that seemed designed more to placate Iraq's Shiite majority than to influence the broader management of the war, Iraqi leaders have drawn up a set of changes to a United Nations agreement that provides some of the legal basis for American troops here.

The changes, if enacted, could give the Iraqi government more control over its own armed forces, something Iraqi leaders want, but were not likely to change fundamentally the way the war is directed.

The United Nations agreement, which expires on Dec. 31, is not the only source of legal justification for continued presence of American troops here. Another is the Iraqi Constitution. Even if the agreement expired, the status of the American military here would not change. What is more, no single Iraqi group truly wants the Americans out.

Iraqi leaders say they cannot accept a continuation of the United Nations agreement, which gives the United States and 27 other countries "the authority to take all necessary measures to contribute to the maintenance of security and stability in Iraq" without attaching some conditions to the original agreement. They say they want more control over their military to protect vulnerable areas from insurgent attacks.

A common view among American officers in the field, though, is that Iraqi troops, more than three years after the American effort to rebuild the Iraqi forces began, are years away from being able to fight the war on their own.

DOJ_NMG_0090068

A 19-member committee of Iraq's top political leaders, its prime minister and its president has agreed on six conditions, said one Shiite politician who has participated in negotiations. The points are being discussed with senior American military commanders here as well as with officials from the American and British Embassies.

They will be codified in a memorandum between Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and President Bush, Shiite lawmakers said, although the type of document is still a subject of debate. Iraqis say they will not insist on reopening the case publicly at the United Nations to avoid the risk of not having it extended.

Even so, they could embarrass the Americans by refusing to relent on changes, even as the deadline for extending the United Nations agreement nears or passes. But if that happened, the only serious question would be about the status of foreign forces from other countries, who provide more than 17,000 troops and whose legal status for being here is still more closely bound with the United Nations agreement.

"They agreed on almost all the conditions," said Sami al-Askari, a Shiite politician whose political bloc has participated in the talks, but "we want legal guarantees that this document will be implemented, otherwise we will have a problem facing the Parliament."

A spokesman for the United States Embassy in Baghdad confirmed that American officials were in talks with the Iraqi government on the subject, but would not give details.

The changes the leaders seek include speeding up the process of handing over control to Iraqi regions for their own security sooner, currently scheduled to be completed in the first half of next year. Under the current arrangement, American forces have full operational control nationally until the end of 2007, and political leaders seek more control over security for portions of the country earlier, according to Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser.

"Iraqi leaders are handcuffed" by the United Nations agreement, said Hadi al-Ameri, a member of the committee and the leader of the Defense and Security Committee in Parliament. "We will not tell the Americans to go, but if they stay it should be according to conditions."

Mr. Maliki remarked bitterly in an interview with [a news service] last week that he could not move one company of Iraqi soldiers without permission from the American military.

The complaint is a striking example of just how far apart Iraqi and American leaders are, at least in their public statements.

Demands for a faster transition to Iraqi control are being made at a time when the 141,000 American forces deployed here remain the indispensable core of the war effort. Shiite officials in the Maliki government have acknowledged that fast-forwarding the move to Iraqi control involves "risks," an assessment many American officers call an understatement.

Nowhere is that more apparent than in Baghdad, where American and Iraqi officials have said the war will be won or lost. In the stepped-up effort to regain control of the capital that began in August — an effort now admitted by American commanders to be faltering, partly for lack of troops — nearly two-thirds of the forces have been American. Only a third of the needed Iraqi forces ever showed up, leaving the effort vastly understaffed.

The Shiite demands spring from a frustration deep within the Shiite leadership that has been building for months over the American approach to the war. Shiites say Americans, particularly Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, have focused unfairly on Shiite-run death squads and that the American military has not been tough enough on Sunni militias.

"There is a feeling that the Americans diverted their support to the Sunni side," Mr. Askari said.

Mr. Maliki has repeatedly acted to soothe this frustration in recent weeks with policy moves asserting his own independence from the Americans. Last month, he demanded that the American military release a Shiite cleric whom it had suspected of death squad activity, and on Tuesday, he ordered the lifting of an American security cordon here. He has to ask American permission as he does not have operational control of the American forces, something that Americans will never give.

"Now they hear about amnesty for Baathists," Mr. Askari said, referring to the Sunni-dominated party that ran the country under Saddam Hussein. And Sadr City, the largest Shiite district, he said, "is surrounded from all sides. If it continues like this, it is very dangerous."

Mr. Maliki even refused an American request last month for amnesty for some prisoners at the end of Ramadan, Mr. Askari said. Many in American facilities are Sunni Arabs, and Shiites often say that Americans release too many of them.

That argument goes to the very heart of the war here, which has shifted from a Sunni-led insurgency to an even deadlier conflict in which Shiite and Sunni militias force members of the other group out of neighborhoods and carry out revenge killings with relative impunity. But while formerly these arguments were the domain of Iraq's most partisan politicians, Mr. Maliki himself is now putting them forth in a sign of just how strained relations with the American military have become.

They are also deeply troubling to American military commanders, who fear the government will use the security forces, largely Shiite, selectively to protect Shiites, or in an even darker possibility, as a fighting force on one side of a civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0090069

American officials have expressed frustration with the government of Mr. Maliki, saying it has been slow to begin to make changes badly needed to stabilize the country and that action against death squads is just one of them. Mr. Khalilzad detailed a series of goals last month in remarks that Mr. Maliki angrily dismissed as “inaccurate.”

Attacks that harden Iraqi groups against one another continued. At least 18 Iraqis were killed in a series of attacks across the capital on Wednesday. In addition, 35 bodies were found. Casualties mounted in a suicide attack Tuesday on a wedding party. In all, 23 Iraqis, including 9 children, the bride and the groom, were killed in the blast, The Associated Press reported. Gunmen on Wednesday seized two Sunni coaches from a youth center. One of them taught blind athletes.

The military on Wednesday announced two deaths on Tuesday, a soldier in Baghdad and a marine in western Iraq, bringing the toll for October to 105.

Iraqi leaders said they expected to submit the new text of the changes by Dec. 1. It must pass through Parliament before taking effect.

Iraqi Prime Minister Asserts Independence, Gains Stature (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, November 2, 2006

BAGHDAD

Shiites from the crowded Baghdad district of Sadr City are reveling in what they deem their "victory" over American forces after Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki on Tuesday ordered the dismantling of US and Iraqi checkpoints surrounding the area.

The checkpoints - manned by US and Iraqi troops for a week in an effort to find a kidnapped US military translator of Iraqi descent as well as snare an alleged death-squad leader - had snarled traffic and bred growing anger in the slum.

They also provided Mr. Maliki with a chance to further assert his independence after weeks of friction between Washington and Baghdad - just days before US midterm elections, in which the Iraq war has become a defining issue.

Aides to the premier have said that they want to take advantage of the vote, and the unpopularity of Mr. Bush and the Iraq war, to expand Maliki's authority. The new assertive tack is boosting the portrayal of Maliki as commander in chief.

The US pullback is being seen in Sadr City as a loss for the Americans, even as Maliki has shown that he can issue orders and deliver - though he has yet to follow through on vows to stanch sectarian killings.

At the same time, anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia has been accused of playing a key role in sectarian murders, has also gained from a careful marshalling of his loyalists. Militiamen enforced a general strike on Tuesday to protest the US "siege," shutting down shops, offices, and schools.

Maliki's decision caught US commanders off guard, but was nonetheless carried out on the ground. The US Embassy insisted later that a joint Iraqi-US decision had been made.

Some Sadr City residents said the growing threat of unrest prompted the US acceptance of the checkpoint dismantling.

"The Americans agreed with Maliki's decision to leave Sadr City because of the US elections," says a driver with the nickname Abu Haidar. "If they let [the unrest] continue, it will spread. Moqtada [al-Sadr] and Maliki played it very well."

"It's a tactical loss for the Americans," says a jobless resident nicknamed Abu Ali, who says the decision to pull back was wise. "Because if they stayed [and violence flared], they would lose much more, not just in Iraq, but in the US."

A primary complaint echoing in Sadr City is that the US-Iraqi checkpoints did little to stop the violence: 26 laborers died in a market blast on Sunday. In the nearby district of Ur, also apparently subject to checkpoint control, a wedding party was hit with a car bomb Tuesday, leaving 23 dead, among them nine children.

Across Iraq Wednesday, police searched for at least 40 Shiites suspected to have been abducted by Sunni gunmen along a dangerous highway north of Baghdad. At least 27 Iraqis died in a spate of attacks.

Under fire by critics for not authorizing enough troops in Iraq, US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said that he had agreed to expand the size of Iraqi forces beyond the current 310,000 listed on the books as trained, and the previous goal of 325,000.

In Baghdad, an increasing number of Shiites believe that the US is more to blame for violence in Baghdad than Sunni insurgents - a once-common accusation that largely disappeared last February, when sectarian bloodletting surged after destruction of a key Shiite shrine. Some even accuse US forces of deliberately planting bombs to stoke more violence.

"The bombs came after the Americans came. When they are there, they are controlling security, so who is to blame?" says Ali al-Saidi, an Internet cafe owner. "When [US forces] entered Sadr City, we were worried. When they leave, we feel safer."

"The Americans are trying to make trouble in Sadr City," asserts Abu Ali. "They want to return Sadr City and the Mahdi Army to a war situation."

DOJ_NMG_0090070

US forces fought pitched battles with the Mahdi Army in the holy city of Najaf and in Sadr City in April and August 2004. Sadr has since ordered his fighters not to attack US forces, and his support of Maliki's fragile Shiite coalition ended a months-long deadlock earlier this year.

After Maliki's order to remove the checkpoints, Sadr's office crowed in a statement to supporters: "Your patience and unity brought victory."

US forces have rubbed increasingly against Sadr's militia in recent months, with friction turning to gunfights at times. And the Mahdi Army, while winning kudos among many Shiites for defending them against Sunni insurgent attack, is also believed to be behind some sectarian killings that are leaving more than 2,500 Iraqis dead each month.

A second purpose of the US-Iraqi checkpoints was to snare a Shiite man alleged to be a death-squad leader. Residents and Sadr supporters jump to Abu Deraa's defense, countering that he is a simple man with a penchant for helping hostages get released from kidnapping gangs.

"One man gave him a camel for helping free his son," says Abu Kumail, a money changer who has seven children. "He saved a Sunni man from a gang - does that mean he is a leader of the death squads?"

"We are feeling that whenever [Americans] raid in Sadr City, they leave many bombs and IEDs [roadside bombs]," says Abu Kumail. "Who is the terrorist? We didn't know terrorism in our country before the [2003] US invasion."

Coming after one of the bloodiest months for US troops since the 2003 Iraq campaign began - 105 Americans died in October - some say US commanders preferred not to push harder on Sadr City now.

"It's a victory for the Iraqi people," says Abu Kumail. "They obeyed the cleric's order [for a strike], and they proved to the government and American soldiers they are peaceful people, and civilized.

"It's a victory, too, for the government," he adds. "They proved their power with a decision, a small justice that is fair to the people."

In a suburb that is home to an estimated 2.5 million Iraqis, Maliki's decision is resounding widely.

But so, too, do rumors that US troops are behind some of the blasts. Among the most common reasons cited here for a US interest in more war: Iraqi Shiites and militias have grown too powerful, both in government and outside of it; and even more conflict would justify a longer US presence, according to this perception.

"The Americans have different ways to make these blasts," charges Abu Ali, the jobless young man. "Sometimes they do it, and plant these bombs. Sometimes they create the good environment for bombs."

"We are not seeing [bombs being planted], but the Americans control the night," he adds, making a deductive leap. "All IEDs and bombs are planted at night, in the curfew."

Baghdad Attacks Target Busy Areas (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 1 -- At least 17 people were killed in car bombings, mortar attacks and roadside explosions in Baghdad on Wednesday, as the sounds of gunfights and explosions reverberated through the capital for much of the day.

In Sadr City, a Shiite Muslim slum in eastern Baghdad, life returned to normal a day after U.S. and Iraqi checkpoints were removed to allow the free flow of traffic and a strike was lifted to permit residents to reopen shops and return to jobs and classrooms.

The forced shutdown of most activities in Sadr City this week by the powerful Mahdi Army militia apparently played a major role in compelling the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to order an end Tuesday to a nearly week-long U.S. blockade of the teeming slum, home to 2.5 million Shiites. U.S. troops had cordoned it off in an effort to find an abducted U.S. soldier and a man considered to be one of Iraq's most notorious death squad leaders, both of whom were believed to be there.

But while Shiites hailed Maliki for asserting his independence and authority, and for alleviating the hardships imposed by the cordon, some Sunni Arab leaders questioned the decision.

Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, a Sunni, said in a statement that security in Baghdad had "noticeably improved" during the barricading of Sadr City. He said lifting the checkpoints "may mean freeing up the movement of terrorists."

Alaa Makky, a Sunni member of parliament from the Iraqi Islamic Party, said in an interview that Maliki "should suspend his decision" to lift the siege. Makky called for Maliki to forward the matter to the country's National Security Council, which he said could "consider the complications and side effects of the decision" and formulate a security plan for all of Baghdad, not just one neighborhood.

The crackle of gunfire and the boom of bombs and mortars punctuated life in the capital for most of the day. In the deadliest incidents, six people were killed by a roadside bomb in the Shurjah market of central Baghdad, five were killed and seven wounded by a car bomb at Aqaba bin Nafi intersection in eastern Baghdad, and three people were killed in a car bombing Wednesday morning in the southwest Bayaa neighborhood.

DOJ_NMG_0090071

The U.S. military said in a statement that a soldier assigned to Regimental Combat Team 7 in Anbar province west of Baghdad -- a stronghold for Sunni insurgents and the group al-Qaeda in Iraq -- died of combat injuries on Tuesday, raising the number of U.S. service members killed in Iraq in October to at least 104. It was the fourth-deadliest month for U.S. troops since the start of the war, and it brought the most fatalities since January 2005, when 106 U.S. service members were killed.

In a sign of how violent the month was, an unusually large number of October's deaths occurred in combat. Ninety-nine of the troops were killed in action, compared with 63 in September, 58 in August and 38 in July. Only two other months brought more U.S. troops killed in action -- November 2004 (125) and April 2004 (126).

On Wednesday, a U.S. soldier was killed by a roadside bomb west of Baghdad, the military said in a statement.

[A] news service, citing data from Iraq's Interior Ministry, reported that 1,289 Iraqi civilians died last month in political violence -- nearly 42 people per day -- up 18 percent from the 1,089 such fatalities in September. Many violent deaths in Iraq are believed to go unreported, however. This summer, the United Nations put the nationwide death toll at more than 3,000 people a month.

Because of the political sensitivity of death counts, the Interior Ministry has stopped publicly releasing death statistics, and the [news service] report could not be independently verified. The news agency said the data, a nationwide compilation of reports from the Interior, Defense and Health ministries, did not include all violent deaths, but only those judged to be the result of political, sectarian or ethnic killings, as opposed to criminal acts.

Last Gasps In Iraq (USAT)

By Ralph Peters

USA Today, November 2, 2006

On Tuesday, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki obeyed Muqtada al-Sadr's command to withdraw U.S. troops from Baghdad's Sadr City. He halted a vital U.S. military operation. It was the third time in less than a month that al-Maliki had sided with the anti-American cleric against our forces.

President Bush insists that we have no conflicts with the al-Maliki government. The president isn't telling the truth — or he himself doesn't support our military's efforts. He can't have it both ways. Bush appears increasingly desperate just to get through the upcoming elections.

I supported the removal of Saddam Hussein. I believed that Arabs deserved a chance to build a rule-of-law democracy in the Middle East. Based upon firsthand experience, I was convinced that the Middle East was so politically, socially, morally and intellectually stagnant that we had to risk intervention — or face generations of terrorism and tumult. I still believe that our removal of Hussein was a noble act.

I only wish the administration had done it competently.

Iraq is failing. No honest observer can conclude otherwise. Even six months ago, there was hope. Now the chances for a democratic, unified Iraq are dwindling fast. The country's prime minister has thrown in his lot with al-Sadr, our mortal enemy. He has his eye on the future, and he's betting that we won't last. The police are less accountable than they were under Saddam. Our extensive investment in Iraqi law enforcement only produced death squads. Government ministers loot the country to strengthen their own factions. Even Iraq's elections — a worthy experiment — further divided Iraq along confessional and ethnic lines. Iraq still exists on the maps, but in reality it's gone. Only a military coup — which might come in the next few years — could hold the artificial country together.

This chaos wasn't inevitable. While in Iraq late last winter, I remained soberly hopeful. Since then, the strength of will of our opponents — their readiness to pay any price and go to any length to win — has eclipsed our own. The valor of our enemies never surpassed that of our troops, but it far exceeded the fair-weather courage of the Bush administration.

Yet, for all our errors, we did give the Iraqis a unique chance to build a rule-of-law democracy. They preferred to indulge in old hatreds, confessional violence, ethnic bigotry and a culture of corruption. It appears that the cynics were right: Arab societies can't support democracy as we know it. And people get the government they deserve.

For us, Iraq's impending failure is an embarrassment. For the Iraqis — and other Arabs — it's a disaster the dimensions of which they do not yet comprehend. They're gleeful at the prospect of America's humiliation. But it's their tragedy, not ours.

Iraq was the Arab world's last chance to board the train to modernity, to give the region a future, not just a bitter past. The violence staining Baghdad's streets with gore isn't only a symptom of the Iraqi government's incompetence, but of the comprehensive inability of the Arab world to progress in any sphere of organized human endeavor. We are witnessing the collapse of a civilization. All those who rooted for Iraq to fail are going to be chastened by what follows.

DOJ_NMG_0090072

Iraq still deserves one last chance — as long as we don't confuse deadly stubbornness and perseverance. If, at this late hour, Iraqis in decisive numbers prove willing to fight for their own freedom and a constitutional government, we should be willing to remain for a generation. If they continue to revel in fratricidal slaughter, we must leave.

And contrary to the prophets of doom, the United States wouldn't be weakened by our withdrawal, should it come to that. Iraq was never our Vietnam. It's al-Qaeda's Vietnam. They're the ones who can't leave and who can't win.

Islamist terrorists have chosen Iraq as their battleground and, even after our departure, it will continue to consume them. We'll still be the greatest power on earth, indispensable to other regional states — such as the Persian Gulf states and Saudi Arabia — that are terrified of Iran's growing might. If the Arab world and Iran embark on an orgy of bloodshed, the harsh truth is that we may be the beneficiaries.

My disillusionment with our Iraq endeavor began last summer, when I was invited to a high-level discussion with administration officials. I went into the meeting with one firm goal, to convince my hosts that they'd better have Plan B in case Iraq continued to disintegrate. I left the session convinced that the administration still didn't have Plan A, only a blur of meandering policies and blind hopes. After more than three years, it was still “An Evening at the Improv.”

Then, last month, as Iraq's prime minister seconded al-Sadr's demand that our troops free a death-squad mastermind they had captured, I knew a fateful page had turned. A week later, al-Maliki forbade additional U.S. military raids in Sadr City, the radical mullah's Baghdad stronghold. On Tuesday, al-Maliki insisted that our troops remove roadblocks set up to help find a kidnapped U.S. soldier. Iraq's prime minister has made his choice. We're not it. It's time to face reality. Only Iraqis can save Iraq now — and they appear intent on destroying it. Après nous, le deluge.

Iraq could have turned out differently. It didn't. And we must be honest about it. We owe that much to our troops. They don't face the mere forfeiture of a few congressional seats but the loss of their lives. Our military is now being employed for political purposes. It's unworthy of our nation.

Ralph Peters is a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors and the author of 21 books. He is a retired U.S. Army officer.

Army Journal Cites Problems With Iraqis (AP-Y)

By John Milburn

AP, November 2, 2006

Iraqi soldiers being trained by American military advisers go on rampages, flee from dangerous situations and waste ammunition in undisciplined bursts of fire at any provocation, according to an account in a U.S. Army journal.

In contrast to the iron discipline imposed during Saddam Hussein's regime, "the new army serves the cause of freedom, and officers and soldiers alike are a bit confused about what this means," Lt. Col. Carl D. Grunow wrote in the July-August issue of Military Review.

Iraqi soldiers frequently use excessive force, going on retaliatory rampages after colleagues are killed by insurgents, Grunow wrote in the journal, a publication of the U.S. Army Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan.

"The `burst reaction' may be attributed to Iraqis experiencing denial, anger and grief all at the same time," he wrote.

Grunow, who spent a year with an Iraqi armored brigade north of Baghdad, also said that Iraqis often fail to report for training, and that sometimes up to 40 percent of some units flee from dangerous situations without fear of punishment.

"As of this writing, the only power holding them is the promise of a paycheck (not always delivered) and a sense of duty. Good soldiers leave after receiving terrorist threats against their families," Grunow wrote.

The old Iraqi army "executed deserters unhesitatingly," he said.

Another problem, Grunow wrote, is the Iraqi "death blossom," in which an attack by even a single sniper "provokes the average Iraqi soldier to empty his 30-round magazine and fire whatever belt of ammunition happens to be in his machine gun."

That is both dangerous and wasteful, he said.

Military Rebuts Media On Iraq (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

Washington — As concern in the Defense Department mounts over eroding public support for the Iraq war, the Pentagon has launched a rapid-response public relations effort to rebut news stories that officials believe are inaccurate or misleading.

Although all administrations have been critical of the media, most have avoided regular, ongoing public fights with journalists. But in recent weeks the Bush administration has shown a willingness to fight over facts and reporters' analysis of news events.

DOJ_NMG_0090073

The Defense Department's rapid-response efforts echo an initiative called "Setting the Record Straight," in which the White House identifies what it says are news reports' inaccuracies or quotations out of context. Among the first results of the Pentagon response is a new "For the Record" section of the Defense Department's website, http://www.defenselink.mil .

On Wednesday the section contained critiques of a Washington Post article, a Newsweek cover story and two New York Times editorials, as well as a list of "Five Myths About the War on Terror" that it said were "some of the more prominent ones in the public dialogue."

Pentagon officials say the effort is not in response to negative coverage of the war, but rather an attempt to adapt to new technologies and find ways to communicate with the American public and international audiences.

"We've always thought it is important to go out and correct the record," said Pentagon spokesman Bryan G. Whitman. "If we are doing it more aggressively, it is because we understand in this Information Age, it is easy for wrong information to be perpetuated."

The effort shows Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's frustration with increasingly negative coverage of the war, said Marvin Kalb, Washington-based senior fellow for Harvard's Shorenstein Center on the Press, Politics & Public Policy.

But Kalb said as long as the war was going badly, the media coverage was sure to be negative.

"It is not a matter of improving communication, it is a matter of the reality of the war," Kalb said. "The effective response has to be in the policy you pursue, not in the way the policy is covered.

"Rumsfeld is not the first government official who turns on the news at night and throws a bottle of Scotch at the TV."

Pentagon officials said they were dedicating staffers to the effort but would not specify how many would be hired or transferred. They also declined to say how much was going to be spent on the effort.

In an Oct. 3 memo released this week, J. Dorrance Smith, the assistant secretary of Defense for public affairs, outlined four focus areas for his department: distributing information on newer media forms like podcasts and YouTube; increased television and radio bookings; better assistance to military analysts and other "surrogates"; and the rapid-response group.

Pentagon Press Secretary Eric Ruff said the changes were part of an effort to improve the D-plus rating that Rumsfeld had given the public affairs operation.

"We're trying to do better than a D-plus," Ruff said this week.

"Al Qaeda has demonstrated time and again how they can use the Internet. We are, very frankly, behind the curve."

Homeward Bound -- If Only For A Year (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

camp paliwoda, iraq — Home means snowboarding, family meals and first-run movies. Home is where you can sleep late and drive around town in a pickup with the windows down and the radio up.

"I want to relax, maybe dress down, put on shorts and a T-shirt instead of wearing a uniform, maybe every once in a while not shave," Sgt. Jon Bullard said as he prepared to pack up his gear and head home to his wife and 12-year-old daughter.

Bullard and the other soldiers of the 1st Battalion, 8th Infantry Regiment, or the 1-8, are finishing up a one-year tour of duty in Iraq, leaving the portable toilets and processed food of this bleak base 50 miles north of Baghdad for division headquarters in Ft. Carson, Colo.

But home may be a fleeting respite. This was the battalion's second tour in Iraq, and most think they will be back for a third time, probably in another year.

"I hate this place," said Spc. Alex Esteban, a 21-year-old Miami native who mapped out plans for a trip to Las Vegas. At home, "I won't worry about getting shot at or mortared. But there's a 90% chance that I'll be back here in a year. I have no choice. It's my job."

Outside the former schoolhouse used as a battalion headquarters, the soldiers waited for the Chinook helicopters that would ferry them to nearby Anaconda, the massive air base where they would stay for a few days before heading to Kuwait and beyond.

Delay followed delay. They laid their rucksacks and M-16s on the ground; some dozed beneath the stars daydreaming, smoking cigarettes and chewing tobacco.

The talk turned to politics.

"There is no progress," said Sgt. Stephen Brodbeck, a 25-year-old Denver native. "We've been here doing the same thing for 3 1/2 years. These are the same Iraqi soldiers we tried to train in 2003. We did a lot, but it was all in vain. And the guys we lost, we lost in vain."

Others chimed in, some vehemently disagreeing.

DOJ_NMG_0090074

"We're helping provide security and buy time for the Iraqi government to step in," said Capt. Andrew Kletzing, 25, of Chicago. "Every month that goes by, they get a little bit more credibility and a little stronger. In the grand scheme of things it's making a difference. If we can succeed here, we can change the course of history."

Still, many of the soldiers despair at how bad things have gotten since they were last here.

"This doesn't look good, the things here," said Sgt. Dominie Price, 25, of Wheaton, Ill. "Maybe we don't see the big picture, and things will be better the next time we come back."

Almost all have become news junkies in Iraq, hanging on every word spoken by U.S. officials about the war, reading newspapers and news websites for clues about the country's security situation, any deployment extensions and whether the war will continue for many months or many years.

A sobering toll

It's been a harsh year for the men and women of the 1-8, a unit of the 3rd Brigade of the 4th Infantry Division, and the rest of the troops in Iraq. At least 780 troops have died in the country since the 4th Infantry deployed here last November, 105 in the last month alone. At least 5,500 troops have been wounded in the last year.

Five guys from the 1-8 won't be making it back to Ft. Carson. Their comrades recall their names as they were read out during commemorative roll calls:

Staff Sgt. Curtis T. Howard II, 32, of Ann Arbor, Mich.

Sgt. Gordon F. Misner II, 23, of Sparks, Nev.

Sgt. Dimitri Muscat, 21, of Aurora, Colo.

Spc. Thomas J. Wilwerth, 21, of Mastic, N.Y.

Spc. Walter B. Howard II, 35, of Rochester, Mich.

The soldiers cherish memories of home to keep up morale. Back home, though, life has not stopped. Relationships with loved ones have become more strained. Children have grown a year older.

"I'm worried about my son not recognizing me," said Spc. Joseph D. Leon, 23, of Santa Paula. "It's been hard just with the kids being so young still and just trying to get them going, and my wife being home by herself taking care of everything."

First thing he'll do when he gets home is take his wife, son and daughter to the zoo. "My daughter loves the monkeys running around, and the birds," he said.

Capt. Mark T. Jenner's mother died of cancer while he was deployed in Iraq. He's planning to leave the military. The 26-year-old Cherry Hill, N.J., native is looking forward to spending Thanksgiving with his wife and piecing together a new life as a civilian.

"We're into wine," he said. "We had a little hobby of traveling around the Colorado countryside and visiting the vineyards."

A light rain began, among the first signs of the coming winter. The noontime call to prayers floated across from a nearby mosque as Capt. Keith L. Carter, the departing commander of Bravo Company, set out on what was likely to be his last visit to Balad, a friendly, ramshackle Shiite Muslim farming town that has been the focus of the troops' attention.

Carter has put on 15 pounds since taking up weight lifting in Iraq. He used to run five or more miles a day. Being here, he says, has changed his physique.

"Since being in Iraq, I can bench press way more than I used to," he said.

But like many officers here, the low-key 29-year-old Chelmsford, Mass., native wonders whether any of his efforts to train Iraqi forces and improve security have made a difference.

"I think we're winning," he said. "But the pace isn't as rapid as a lot of people would like."

Confrontation in Balad

A commotion erupted in downtown Balad as the convoy pulled in. Residents gathered near the police headquarters. Carter led a group of men inside. The police chief and mayor were triumphant, showing off a pair of bloodied suspected insurgents they had captured.

A group of Iraqi soldiers and police manning a volatile checkpoint had confronted a car carrying three suspected insurgents. They engaged in a gun battle, killing one man who turned out to be a member of a local security force and arresting the two others, who had dynamite and other munitions in their Toyota sedan.

The suspected insurgents had a map of Balad that obviously came from Americans, giving credence to long-held suspicions that the security force in question, the Iraqi Strategic Infrastructure Battalion, had been infiltrated by insurgents.

"Did the terrorists have this map on them?" Carter asked.

Yes, they replied.

"Good job," he told them.

The rain clouds dispersed as the patrol pushed through traffic toward the base. Beams of sunlight illuminated the green farmlands.

DOJ_NMG_0090075

"They did this by themselves," Carter said. "We didn't even know about it."

Later that night at the base, the next batch of soldiers scheduled to head home started to assemble near headquarters. They clutched their redeployment orders as they waited for roll call. They eventually dozed off, but sprung to life as the roar of the Chinooks began to fill the sky over Iraq.

Medic Tends A Fallen Marine, With Skill, Prayer And Fury (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

KARMA, Iraq, Oct. 30 — Petty Officer Third Class Dustin E. Kirby clutched the injured marine's empty helmet. His hands were coated in blood. Sweat ran down his face, which he was trying to keep straight but kept twisting into a snarl.

He held up the helmet and flipped it, exposing the inside. It was lined with blood and splinters of bone.

"The round hit him," he said, pausing to point at a tiny hole that aligned roughly with a man's temple. "Right here."

Petty Officer Kirby, 22, is a Navy corpsman, the trauma medic assigned to Second Mobile Assault Platoon of Weapons Company, Second Battalion, Eighth Marines. Everyone calls him Doc. He had just finished treating a marine who had been shot by an Iraqi sniper.

"It was 7.62 millimeter," he continued. "Armor piercing."

He reached into his pocket and retrieved the bullet, which he had found. "The impact with the Kevlar stopped most of it," he said. "But it tore through, hit his head, went through and came out."

He put the bullet in his breast pocket, to give to an intelligence team later. Sweat kept rolling off his face, mixed with tears. His voice was almost cracking, but he managed to control it and keep it deep. "When I got there, there wasn't much I could do," he said.

Then he nodded. He seemed to be talking to himself. "I kept him breathing," he said.

He looked at Lance Cpl. Matias Tafoya, his driver, and raised his voice. It was almost a shout. "When I told you that I do not let people die on me, I meant it," he said. "I meant it."

He scanned the Iraqi houses, perhaps 150 yards away, on the other side of a fetid green canal. Marines were all around, pressed to the ground, peering from behind machine-gun turrets or bracing against their armored vehicles, aiming rifles at where they thought the sniper was.

The sniper had made a single shot just as the marines were leaving a rural settlement on the western edge of Karma, a city near Falluja in Anbar Province.

The marines had been searching several houses on this side of the canal, where they found five Kalashnikov assault rifles and bomb components, and were getting back into their vehicles when everyone heard the shot. It was a single loud crack.

No one was precisely sure where it had come from. Everyone knew precisely where it hit. It struck a marine who was peering out of the first vehicle's gun turret. He collapsed.

Petty Officer Kirby rushed to him and found him breathing. He bandaged the marine's head as the vehicle lurched away. Soon he helped load the wounded marine into a helicopter, which touched down beside the convoy within 12 minutes of the shot.

Once the helicopter lifted away, he ran back to his vehicle, ready to treat anyone else. He was thinking about the marine he had already treated.

"If I had gone with him," he said, and glanced to where the helicopter had flown away, over the line of date palms at the end of a field. His voice softened. "But I'm not with him," he said.

He turned, faced a reporter and spoke loudly again. "In situations and times like this, I am bound to start yelling and shouting furiously," he said. "Don't think I am losing my mind."

He held his bloody hands before his face, to examine them. They were shaking. He made fists so tight his veins bulged. His forearms started to bounce.

"His name was Lance Cpl. Colin Smith," he said. "He said a prayer today right before we came out, too."

"Every time before we go out, we say a prayer," he said. "It is a prayer for serenity. It says a lot about things that do pertain to us in this kind of environment."

The only sounds were Doc's voice and the vehicle's engine thrumming.

He recited the prayer. There was a few moments of silence. "It's a platoon kind of thing, if you know what I mean," he said.

He listened to his radio headset and looked at Lance Corporal Tafoya, relaying word of the marines' movements. "Right now the grunts are performing a hard hit on a house," he said. He turned back to the subject of Lance Corporal Smith, 19.

"The best news I can throw at anybody right now, and that I am throwing to myself as often as I can, is that his eyes were O.K.," he said. "They were both responsive. And he was breathing. And he had a pulse."

DOJ_NMG_0090076

He listened to his radio. “Two houses they’ve hit so far have both been swept and cleared.”

He looked at the reporter beside him. “Do you pray?” he asked. “Do that. I’d appreciate it.”

After a few minutes he started talking again. “You see, having a good platoon, one that you know real well, it’s both a gift and a curse. And Smith? Smith has been with me since I was...”

He stopped. “He was my roommate before we left,” he said.

He refilled his lungs and raised his voice. “His dad was his best friend,” he said. “He’s got the cutest little blond girlfriend, and she freaks out every time we call because she’s so happy to hear from him.”

He sat quietly again. A few minutes passed. “The first casualty we had here — his name was James Hirlston — he was his good friend.”

“Hirlston got shot in the head, too,” he said.

He said something about Iraqi snipers that could not be printed here.

Then he was back to the subject of Lance Corporal Smith.

“I really thank God that he was breathing when I got to him, because it means that I can do something with him,” he said. “It helps. People ask you, ‘What are you doing? What are you doing?’ It helps, because if he’s breathing, you’re doing something.”

There had been many Iraqi civilians outside a few minutes before the sniper made his shot. Most of them had disappeared. Now an Iraqi woman walked calmly between the sniper and the marines, as if nothing had happened.

She passed down the street.

Petty Officer Kirby began to list the schools he had attended to be ready for this moment. Some he had paid for himself, he said, to be extra-prepared.

In one course, an advanced trauma treatment program he had taken before deploying, he said, the instructors gave each corpsman an anesthetized pig.

“The idea is to work with live tissue,” he said. “You get a pig and you keep it alive. And every time I did something to help him, they would wound him again. So you see what shock does, and what happens when more wounds are received by a wounded creature.”

“My pig?” he said. “They shot him twice in the face with a 9-millimeter pistol, and then six times with an AK-47 and then twice with a 12-gauge shotgun. And then he was set on fire.”

“I kept him alive for 15 hours,” he said. “That was my pig.”

“That was my pig,” he said.

He paused. “Smith is my friend.”

He looked at his bloody hands. “You got some water?” he said. “I want some water. I just want to wash my wedding band.”

He listened to the tactical radio. The platoon was sweeping houses but could not find the sniper.

The company started to move. It stopped at another house. The marines were questioning five Iraqi men. Doc watched from the road, waiting for the next call.

“I would like to say that I am a good man,” he said. “But seeing this now, what happened to Smith, I want to hurt people. You know what I mean?”

The marines had not fired a shot.

They took one of the men into custody, mounted their vehicles and drove back to Outpost Omar, their company base, passing knots of Iraqi civilians on the way. The civilians looked at them coldly.

Inside the wire, First Lt. Scott R. Burlison, the company commander, gathered the group and told them that Lance Corporal Smith was alive and in surgery. He was critical, but stable. They hoped to fly him to Germany.

Doc had scrubbed himself clean. A big marine stepped forward with a small Bible, and the platoon huddled. He began with Psalm 91, verses 5 and 11.

“Thou shall not be afraid for the terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day,” said the big marine, Lance Cpl. Daniel B. Nicholson. “For he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways.”

Then he asked for the Lord to look after Lance Corporal Smith and whatever was ahead, and to take care of everyone who was still in the platoon.

“Help us Lord,” he said. “We need your help. It’s the only way we’re going to get through this.”

Doc stood in the corner, his arm looped over a marine. “Amen,” he said. There were some hugs, and then the marines and their Doc went back to their bunks and their guns.

Same Old Demons (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090077

Policy makers are again considering fundamental changes in our Iraq policy, but as they do I hope they read Elie Kedourie's essay, "The Kingdom of Iraq: A Retrospect."

Kedourie, a Baghdad-born Jew, published the essay in 1970. It's a history of the regime the British helped establish over 80 years ago, but it captures an idea that is truer now than ever: Disorder is endemic to Iraq. Today's crisis is not three years old. It's worse now, but the crisis is perpetual. This is a bomb of a nation.

"Brief as it is, the record of the kingdom of Iraq is full of bloodshed, treason and rapine," Kedourie wrote.

And his is a Gibbonesque tale of horror. There is the endless Shiite-Sunni fighting. There is a massacre of the Assyrians, which is celebrated rapturously in downtown Baghdad. Children are gunned down from airplanes. Tribal wars flare and families are destroyed. A Sunni writer insults the Shiites and the subsequent rioters murder students and policemen. A former prime minister is found on the street by a mob, killed, and his body is reduced to pulp as cars run him over in joyous retribution.

Kedourie described "a country riven by obscure and malevolent factions, unsettled by the war and its aftermath." He observed, "The collapse of the old order had awakened vast cupidities and revived venomous hatreds."

In 1927, a British officer asked a tribal leader: "You now have a government, a constitution, a parliament, ministers and officials — what more can you want?" The tribal leader replied, "Yes, but they speak with a foreign accent."

The British tried to encourage responsible Iraqi self-government, to no avail. "The political ambitions of the Shia religious headquarters have always lain in the direction of theocratic domination," a British official reported in 1923. They "have no motive for refraining from sacrificing the interests of Iraq to those which they conceive to be their own."

At one point, the British high commissioner, Sir Henry Dobbs, argued that if Britain threatened to withdraw its troops, Iraqis would behave more responsibly. It didn't work. Iraqis figured the Brits were bugging out. They concluded it was profitless to cultivate British friendship. Everything the British said became irrelevant.

The Iraq of his youth, Kedourie concluded, "was a make-believe kingdom built on false pretenses." He quoted a British report from 1936, which noted that the Iraqi government would never be a machine based on law that treated citizens impartially, but would always be based on tribal favoritism and personal relationships. Iraq, Kedourie said, faced two alternatives: "Either the country would be plunged into chaos or its population should become universally the clients and dependents of an omnipotent but capricious and unstable government." There is, he wrote, no third option.

Today Iraq is in much worse shape. The most perceptive reports describe not so much a civil war as a complete social disintegration. This latest descent was initiated by American blunders, but is exacerbated by the same old Iraqi demons: greed, blood lust and a mind-boggling unwillingness to compromise for the common good, even in the face of self-immolation.

The core problem is the same one Kedourie identified decades ago. Iraq is teetering on the edge of futility. Perhaps a competent occupation could have preserved it as a coherent entity, but now the Iraqi national identity is looking like a suicidal self-delusion.

Partitioning the country would be traumatic, so after the election it probably makes sense to make one last effort to hold the place together. Fire Donald Rumsfeld to signal a break with the past. Alter troop rotations so that 30,000 more troops are policing Baghdad.

But if that does not restore order, if Iraqi ministries remain dysfunctional and the national institutions remain sectarian institutions in disguise, then surely it will be time to accede to reality. It will be time to effectively end Iraq, with a remaining fig-leaf central government or not. It will be time to radically diffuse authority down to the only communities that are viable — the clan, tribe or sect.

A muscular U.S. military presence will be more necessary than ever, to deter neighboring powers and contain bloodshed. And the goals will remain the same: to nurture civilized democratic societies that reject extremism and terror.

But the boundaries may have to change. The war was an attempt to lift a unified Iraq out of its awful history, but history has proved stubborn. It's time to adjust the plans to reality.

Hadley Travels To Afghanistan After Iraq (AP-Y)

AP, November 2, 2006

President Bush's national security adviser arrived in Afghanistan Wednesday after wrapping up two days of meetings in Iraq aimed at soothing tension with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley traveled to Kabul for meetings with Afghan President Hamid Karzai and senior military leaders. A joint NATO-Afghan force has stepped up patrols in areas where insurgents are active to increase security in the country.

Perino said Hadley, who made the trip unannounced as a security precaution, "had two days of good meetings in Iraq." His visit came as al-Maliki was trying to assert authority with the Americans, most recently with Tuesday's orders to lift joint U.S.-Iraqi military checkpoints around the Shiite militant stronghold of Sadr City and other parts of Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0090078

Al-Maliki has repeatedly said the United States was trying to impose timelines for progress without first seeking his approval. At one point, he said he was a friend of the United States, but "I am not America's man in Iraq." The White House has sought to down play any serious dispute and said Hadley was not on a fence-mending mission.

Stop Calling It The 'War On Terror' (LAT)

By Timothy Garton Ash

The Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

WHETHER or not a formal post-mortem into the Iraq war is launched by a newly Democrat-controlled Congress after Tuesday's midterm elections, no one doubts that this has been a war, one without end. Yet one day it will end. Will we then still be at war? Were 9/11, Afghanistan, Iraq, the London bombings, Madrid, Bali and the rest all just pages of the opening chapter in a long saga called the War on Terror?

For all their criticisms of the way President Bush has waged the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, most Democrats don't challenge the central concept of the war on terror. They merely claim they could fight it better. Only a few intellectual Democrats, such as financier and philanthropist George Soros, insist that the very idea of the war on terror is, in his words, "a false metaphor."

Most Europeans, by contrast, agree with Soros. I have argued the same point. British military historian Sir Michael Howard was prescient in a brilliant article in Foreign Affairs titled "What's in a name?" and published just months after the 9/11 attacks. When then-Secretary of State Colin Powell declared that the U.S. was "at war" with terrorism, wrote Howard, "he made a very natural but terrible and irrevocable error." Apart from anything else, to use this language dignified the terrorists with the status of belligerents when they should have been treated as criminals. In a backhanded way, the coinage was itself a kind of glorification of terrorism.

Political words have consequences — especially when used by the most powerful nation on Earth — and one could plausibly suggest that much blood has flowed as a result of that choice of words.

It's clearly the case that after Sept. 11, 2001, when the administration said "war," it meant war in the familiar sense of trained people being commanded to go kill other people. In 2002, I asked a very senior administration official how this war on terror might end. He replied: "With the elimination of the terrorists." Yes, from the outset officials acknowledged that this was no longer war in the classic sense of two uniformed armies meeting on a field of battle. Yet the decision to make Iraq a central theater of the war on terror was, among other things, a kind of desperate reaching back to a more conventional kind of warfare that the mightiest army in the history of the world could clearly and swiftly win. Or so they thought.

In the last week, I have heard two powerful arguments for retaining the word "war" to describe the essential character of the age we're in. Lecturing in Oxford, Philip Bobbitt, the American historian and author of "The Shield of Achilles," and Matthew d'Ancona, editor of the conservative British weekly the Spectator, both insisted that we should not throw out the baby of the "war on terror" with the bathwater of Iraq.

Both counter-posed the notion of war to that of combating crime, favored by many liberal Europeans. Yes, bad mistakes were made in Iraq, said D'Ancona, but the very nature of this war is so new that it was inevitable that big mistakes would be made. The new terrible trio of rogue states, weapons of mass destruction and international terrorism cannot be beaten by the old Cold War trio of containment, deterrence and nonproliferation. Terrorists are waging a long-term psychological war, aimed at reducing us to a state of terror. This is not the Cold War, said D'Ancona, it's the cold-sweat war.

Bobbitt, meanwhile, talked of no less than three wars on terror: against global-networked terrorists, against the proliferation of WMD and against large-scale natural and non-natural assaults on civilian infrastructure, from earthquakes and the consequences of global warming to genocide and ethnic cleansing. That just about covers all the bases.

Both made some strikingly similar claims, far removed from the initial gung-ho rhetoric of Bush, Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld. This, D'Ancona and Bobbitt insisted, is a long-term, generational struggle, which requires patience as much as patriotism. Neither had a good word to say for Guantanamo Bay or Abu Ghraib. Both agreed that this war has to be fought within a framework of international law — which, however, must be adjusted to the new circumstances. And they emphasized the new context of what Bobbitt calls "market states," in which citizens have become like consumers, with governments behaving like nervous company boards. Does the consumer not like the product? Withdraw it from the shelves at once. Our presence in Iraq, said D'Ancona, is being treated like a listed company whose shares on the stock exchange are in free fall.

These are important points, which a segment of the British and European left has already taken onboard.

They failed to convince me, however, that the term "war on terror" should not be thrown out. It wasn't a good term to start with. Whatever the might-have-beens, it's now inextricably associated with a discredited U.S. policy and a disastrous real war in Iraq. What would we lose by dropping it?

DOJ_NMG_0090079

However, then we need an alternative. It might be better if international terrorists were treated as international criminals, but the overall metaphor of crime is not up to the job. A word that keeps popping up is "struggle." In substance, that's about right. This is a long-term struggle against multiple threats to free and open societies.

But the word "struggle" has its own baggage. It really won't do in German; not since "Mein Kampf" anyway. In English — English English, that is — it has a faint echo of people handing out copies of Socialist Worker on street corners. No, I can't see President John McCain or Hillary Clinton taking up "the struggle." So I'm struggling to find a better term. Ideas, anyone?

DOJ:

Attorney General Makes Surprise Lecture At Law School (HATCHET)

By Brandon Butler

George Washington University Hatchet, November 2, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made a surprise visit to a Law School class Tuesday and spoke about U.S. policy in the war on terror.

Students in the Law School's criminal procedure class were surprised to see the special guest speaker in Stockton Hall Tuesday. Associate professor of law Renee Lerner teaches the class and is an acquaintance of Gonzales'. The two worked together when she was at the Department of Justice and he served as White House counsel.

"When he walked in there was a definitive gasp," Lerner said. "The students were happily surprised to see him."

The attorney general spent about 15 minutes talking about issues such as the USA PATRIOT Act, wiretapping and military tribunals. Then, for about 35 minutes he answered questions from the 40 students in the class.

Lerner said Gonzales had a "very warm and inviting manner" when speaking with the students, whom she said responded well to the visit.

"Several students mentioned it was good to hear from someone who is directly involved in legal questions they study in an academic setting," she said. "Some also mentioned how fortunate we are to be in Washington D.C. where we have access to such high-ranking officials."

Lerner said she arranged the visit a couple of months ago when Gonzales approached her because he wanted to guest lecture in a Law School class. She did not tell her students Gonzales would be joining the class, but assigned readings on the subjects he spoke about.

She said that in the late 1990s, she arranged a guest lecture from then special prosecutor Kenneth Starr who was investigating President Bill Clinton.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

H-P's Hurd Answers House Panel On Probe, Sheds Little New Light (WSJ)

By DON CLARK And PETER WALDMAN

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

There are a few lingering questions in the Hewlett-Packard Co. leak-investigation scandal. For the most part, Chief Executive Mark Hurd has answered them with a standard response: I don't remember.

Mr. Hurd yesterday submitted written answers to 16 questions that were put to him by a House subcommittee investigating the affair, following his Sept. 28 testimony before the subcommittee. The responses don't provide much new information.

The investigation into media leaks of boardroom discussions, which began in early 2005 at the behest of former Chairman Patricia Dunn, included the examination of private phone records of directors, journalists and others. Private investigators, working on behalf of H-P, obtained records using a technique called pretexting, which involves pretending to be the user of a particular phone account.

SEE MORE

1

Read Mark Hurd's written responses2 to the House subcommittee questions.

One unanswered question is exactly when Mr. Hurd learned that phone records were being examined. He attended portions of a July 22, 2005, meeting that discussed the first phase of the leak investigation, called Kona I, but in response to questions from the House subcommittee, he said he can't recall much about it.

DOJ_NMG_0090080

"I cannot say that as of the July 22, 2005, meeting I understood that 'phone record information' was being obtained in connection with, or was assisting in the 'Kona I' phase of the investigation. At some point, I did come to understand that telephone-call information was being used," Mr. Hurd said in a response to the subcommittee.

Mr. Hurd said, in retrospect, he wishes he had been more focused on the "investigatory methodologies" used in the probe. He said he "did not think that anything improper might have been done" until much later, after Thomas Perkins resigned as a director in May 2006 and raised questions about the investigation.

"Unfortunately, I was not focused on the issue, so I did not dive into the details" of the investigation at the July 22, 2005, meeting, Mr. Hurd wrote.

Other evidence, indicates Mr. Hurd was indeed focused on media leaks during this period. In two separate speeches to H-P employees within days of his July 22, 2005, briefing on the leaks investigation, Mr. Hurd upbraided H-P workers for leaking corporate information to the media before H-P had formally disclosed it. In one of those speeches, Mr. Hurd called media leaks "reprehensible and unacceptable," and promised to "deal with [the leakers] appropriately." He said, "It is absolutely unacceptable that information does not stay in the company and that we have people that can't behave like adults."

Other participants in the July 22, 2005, briefing on the leaks investigation have said phone records were indeed discussed. Tony Gentilucci, H-P's former chief of investigations -- who ran the Kona I probe -- told H-P's outside counsel in August 2006 that he briefed Mr. Hurd and other H-P officials at the July 22 meeting, and "that the issue of obtaining phone records came up." Mr. Gentilucci added that he didn't think the details of pretexting were discussed.

Kevin Huska, another H-P security official who attended the July 2005 meeting, told H-P's outside lawyers that he thought "the concept of obtaining phone records" was discussed, but he wasn't sure whether pretexting itself came up.

And Ronald DeLia, the private investigator who led the leak probes for H-P, told H-P's outside lawyers that "any results" discussed at that July 2005 meeting, "would have had to include the results of the telephone research." Mr. DeLia said he didn't recall if Mr. Hurd was in the room for any discussion of phone records.

Several of the subcommittee's questions homed in on a remark that Mr. Hurd made to H-P's outside counsel in August of this year that he got the impression that H-P's investigators may have been obtaining phone records from some Web site. But he said he couldn't clarify whether he got that impression from the July meeting.

"I cannot say who made the remark about obtaining phone-record information off the Web or when that remark was made without speculating," Mr. Hurd wrote. "What I recall is that at some meeting someone mentioned getting phone-record information off of the Web and thinking there must be some sort of Web site with this information."

When Ms. Dunn gave similar testimony at the subcommittee hearing in late September, she was ridiculed by some House members, who found her belief that private phone records were publicly available to be implausible.

The subcommittee asked Mr. Hurd to explain his understanding of a PowerPoint slide presented at the July 2005 meeting, which said "intelligence" had been obtained that indicated one H-P director "appears to have contacted" certain journalists.

In response, Mr. Hurd wrote that he didn't recall any discussion at the July 2005 meeting of "what 'intelligence' meant or what specific types of 'intelligence' had been obtained."

The subcommittee's written questions focused only on the Kona I investigation. An H-P spokesman said Mr. Hurd is expected to respond to a second set of questions from the subcommittee within the next 30 days.

Last month, Ms. Dunn, Mr. DeLia and three other people were charged by California prosecutors with criminal fraud and conspiracy stemming from H-P's spying. All have professed innocence. Ms. Dunn was forced to resign as an H-P director. Messrs. Gentilucci and Huska were not charged with any crimes; Mr. Gentilucci resigned from H-P. Mr. Hurd was named to the additional post of H-P chairman, succeeding Ms. Dunn.

Sorin To Plead Guilty In Comverse Backdating Case (WSJ)

By PAUL DAVIES And MARK MAREMONT

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

The former general counsel of Comverse Technology Inc. is expected to plead guilty today to one count of criminal conspiracy in connection with an options-backdating scheme, according to people familiar with the matter.

William F. Sorin, a Harvard-educated lawyer who was at Comverse for more than two decades, would be the second former executive of the telecommunications-software firm to plead guilty. The company's former chief financial officer, David Kreinberg, entered a guilty plea last week.

Mr. Sorin, 57 years old, is scheduled to have a hearing at 12:30 p.m. EST today before Judge Nicholas Garaufis in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn, N.Y. He was charged in August with conspiracy to commit mail fraud, securities fraud and wire fraud and is expected to plead to one conspiracy count. The maximum time in prison for that charge is five years.

DOJ_NMG_0090081

The main target in the case, former Comverse Chief Executive Kobi Alexander, fled the country ahead of the charges and was arrested in September in Namibia after an international manhunt. An Israeli citizen and U.S. resident, Mr. Alexander is fighting extradition requests by the U.S. government, which has charged him in a 35-count indictment with securities fraud, bribery and other crimes. His attorneys have said he will contest the charges if and when he returns to the U.S.

Mr. Kreinberg is cooperating with the government, and in pleading guilty last week he claimed Mr. Alexander was the mastermind of a stock-options backdating scheme at Comverse that secretly boosted pay for top executives and caused the company to inflate its net income. Mr. Sorin has been in plea discussions with prosecutors in the Eastern District of New York, who declined to comment on whether he also will cooperate against Mr. Alexander.

Comverse is one of more than 130 companies being investigated by federal authorities for manipulating their options to benefit insiders. Options allow recipients to buy stock at a preset exercise price, generally set at the market price on the day they were granted. Backdating involves pretending that an option was granted on an earlier date when the market price was lower, thus conveying extra potential profit to the recipient.

In charging Mr. Sorin in August, federal authorities claimed that he, in effect, had tricked compensation committee members of Comverse's board into approving the backdated grants, by getting them to sign documents with the bogus grant dates already filled in.

5 Workers Charged With Conspiracy & Security Fraud (KCBS)

KCBS-TV, CBS 2, Los Angeles, November 2, 2006

(CBS) LOS ANGELES Five men who worked for a San Diego brokerage took secret commissions for selling stocks their firm had bought cheaply and that their superiors wanted to run up in value, a prosecutor told a jury Wednesday.

The brokerage, Hampton Porter Investment Bankers, shut its doors abruptly in 2001, U.S. Justice Department attorney Kathleen McGovern told a federal jury in Los Angeles.

The five, Bryan Laurienti, Michael Losse, David Montesano, Curtiss Parker and Donald Samaria are charged with conspiracy and securities fraud in connection with the transactions, which typically involved thinly traded low-value stocks their firm had received at deep discounts, the prosecutor said.

The stocks were known as "house stocks." "They carried out this scheme by pushing house stocks on their clients, many of whom had no business being in these stocks," McGovern said her opening statement.

The owners of the brokerage, John Laurienti and Gregory Walker, have pleaded guilty and are cooperating with the prosecution of their former underlings, McGovern said.

Prosecutors allege that more than 100 of Hampton Porter's clients were bilked out of an estimated $5 million as the result of trades made between 1998 and 2000.

Once the clients bought the stocks, the prices would go up, and co-conspirators in the alleged scam would sell their shares for huge profits, according to the government.

In addition to the commissions the clients paid for trades, Hampton Porter paid the defendants special commissions of about 10 percent for selling the house stocks, which they were allowed to keep only if the clients didn't then sell the shares, prosecutors allege.

But Bryan Laurienti's attorney said her client did not conduct any trades clients did not request. He "wasn't answering to a contingent in the firm, who the prosecution has told you they know were crooks," defense lawyer Evan Jenness said.

Jenness said some of the clients who bought the house stocks "made a lot of money" very quickly.

Jenness also blamed the dot-com stock market crash for prompting some of the clients to decide they should not have been involved in risky trades.

Lawyer Marcia Brewer, who represents Curtiss Parker, contended John Laurienti and Walker kept their scam hidden from the underlings at Hampton Porter because they wanted to make the brokerage seem legitimate. The brokers were yelled at if they did not sell the house stocks, Brewer said.

Testimony in the case is expected to begin Thursday morning.

Prosecutors Are Prospering (HC)

By Kristen Hays

Houston Chronicle, November 2, 2006

Talent from the task force is moving on or moving up

The Enron scandal led former CEO Jeff Skilling to a lengthy prison sentence.

But it also led to lucrative moves to law firms, promotions or academic careers for several of the federal prosecutors who dogged him and other corporate crooks.

Two of the three prosecutors who headlined the trial of Skilling and former Enron Chairman Ken Lay have left government work for law firms with deep pockets. The third is considering options.

Several prosecutors have done the same, though others chose different paths after serving an Enron tour of duty.

Upon Skilling's sentencing last week to 24 years and four months in prison for 19 criminal counts, the Justice Department said its Enron Task Force was disbanding after nearly five years, more than 30 indictments, 16 guilty pleas and five trials with a mixed record of success.

Their experience in chasing crimes made task force members hot commodities to law firms offering big money, said Adam Gershowitz, a professor at the South Texas College of Law in Houston.

"They got a lot of recognition from it. That means the next time a major white-collar case comes along and people look down the Rolodex on who to hire, they may want one of these guys," he said.

Most white-collar work, such as internal company investigations, never reaches a courtroom, though companies pay a lot for such guidance, Gershowitz said. Ex-federal prosecutors "are a cash cow for some of these big law firms because white-collar is very lucrative."

Sean Berkowitz, the third director of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force since its inception in January 2002, left the government this week to switch sides. He cross-examined Skilling, challenging everything from the ex-CEO's truthfulness to whether he paid his taxes.

"I'll be accepting with a major law firm in the Chicago area as soon as this week," Berkowitz said Wednesday, declining to confirm the name. Several firms have reportedly pursued Berkowitz since the trial ended.

John Hueston, who brutally cross-examined Lay, will join Los Angeles firm Irell & Manella next week after wrapping up a two-week Enron speaking tour in China.

The third main prosecutor, task force deputy director Kathryn Ruemmler, confirmed Wednesday that she is exploring opportunities but hasn't decided what her next move will be.

Berkowitz said critics may decry prosecutors who bolted for lucrative private-sector jobs. But he said none knew when they joined the Justice Department that Enron would come along or whether prosecutions would be successful. And most federal prosecutions go unnoticed.

"If we had not performed well, obviously it would not have gone as well," he said. Enron "has allowed people on a national level to see the talent that exists within the ranks of the Department of Justice."

North and FleissSeveral top white-collar attorneys that Enron prosecutors have faced also were once federal prosecutors.

Those include John Keker, lead lawyer for former Enron finance chief Andrew Fastow, and Mark Holscher, a member of Skilling's legal team. Keker prosecuted Oliver North in the Iran-Contra scandal and Holscher prosecuted Hollywood madam Heidi Fleiss.

None of the Enron prosecutors served on the task force from its inception through to the Lay-Skilling convictions. They hailed from cities throughout the country, and the work often required months away from home.

The first director, Leslie Caldwell, left the task force in March 2004, shortly after Skilling was indicted but before Lay was. She joined Morgan Lewis in New York a few months later.

She said she has no regrets about missing the premier trial in the probe.

"I never intended to stay for the duration, only to get things focused and moving forward until at least the key players were addressed," she said. "And I knew the case was in great hands."

The deputy director who moved up to replace her, Andrew Weissmann, stayed longer than any other task force prosecutor before he stepped down in July 2005. For several months he served as special counsel to FBI Director Robert Mueller, and in March of this year he joined Jenner & Block in New York. Another ex-Enron prosecutor, Lisa Monaco, now advises Mueller.

"Doing a very sophisticated white-collar investigation prepares you for representing companies," Weissmann said. "Enron itself was the world's most complicated internal investigation."

Sam Buell chose academia after leaving the task force in early 2004 upon having secured an indictment against Skilling. He was a visiting professor for two years at the University of Texas School of Law, and this fall joined the faculty of Washington University School of Law in the St. Louis area.

He said he always expected to write and teach in his post-prosecutorial life.

"Enron was the ultimate case in terms of its challenging complexity and national importance, so there really wasn't a whole lot left for me to do in the Department of Justice after Enron that would excite me," Buell said.

Justice promotionsStill others have moved up in the Justice Department.

· Cliff Stricklin, a former Texas state judge in Dallas who helped prosecute Skilling and Lay, in August was appointed first assistant to U.S. Attorney Troy Eid in Denver. He is to lead the prosecution team in the March insider trading trial of former Qwest Communications CEO Joseph Nacchio.

· Matthew Friedrich, who helped prosecute two trials, is counselor to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

· Ben Campbell, who led the prosecution team in the first broadband trial last year, succeeded Friedrich as acting chief of staff and principal deputy assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's criminal division.

· Van Vincent, who joined the task force in December to lead the retrial of two of the broadband executives this year, will begin a six-month detail in Iraq later this month as attorney adviser with the Justice Department's Regime Crimes Liaison Office in Baghdad. The organization helps the Iraqi High Tribunal with war crimes investigations and trials.

New York AG Presses Companies To Stop Paying Indicted Employees' Legal Bills (LAW)

By David Hechler, Corporate Counsel

Corporate Counsel, November 2, 2006

Federal prosecutors aren't the only ones putting the squeeze on corporate defendants, it turns out. Like the U.S. Department of Justice, New York state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer has also pressured companies to stop paying the legal fees of employees who face criminal charges. Spitzer appears to be the only state AG who has raised fee payment as an issue.

A handful of defense attorneys with clients indicted by Spitzer knew that he had demanded fee cutoffs. But the AG's tactics came as a surprise to several white-collar crime experts and leaders of the bar, including officials at the Association of Corporate Counsel, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers and the American Bar Association.

Most of Spitzer's targets are financial institutions swept up in his probe of mutual funds. According to a Corporate Counsel review of 17 agreements that Spitzer's office struck with companies accused of market timing, nine settlements included "no indemnification" clauses. These provisions prohibit a business from paying the legal fees of indicted employees unless its bylaws require it. In one instance, Bank of America Corp. agreed to a no-indemnification clause even though its bylaws require it to pay fees. Moreover, the bank had already begun advancing expenses in at least one case.

Spitzer's office declined to comment on the no-indemnification clauses. (Spitzer is running for governor of New York.)

The fee issue first garnered public attention in the Justice Department's prosecution of 16 former employees of KPMG for allegedly promoting and selling illegal tax shelters. In June the federal district court judge hearing the case ruled that Justice lawyers had unconstitutionally pressured KPMG to stop paying the legal bills of its ex-employees. Judge Lewis Kaplan wrote in his decision that the right of employees to have their companies pay their legal expenses "is as much a part of the bargain between employer and employee as salary or wages."

Though the fee cutoff question had come up in court before, Kaplan appears to be the first judge to issue a written ruling since the Justice Department issued its corporate prosecution guidelines in 2003. Known as the Thompson Memorandum, the guidelines instruct federal prosecutors to consider whether a company is paying its employees' legal bills when deciding whether to indict the business.

Spitzer has also taken an aggressive approach on fee payment, most often in mutual fund cases. Starting in 2003, the AG began investigating firms that engaged in market timing of their funds -- rapid trading that benefited favored clients to the detriment of long-term shareholders. It was a natural issue for Spitzer, since New York is the capital of the financial services industry. Believing that federal securities enforcement was lax, the AG resolved to go after perceived offenders himself. He was helped by a New York state securities law, the Martin Act, which allows prosecutors to win convictions without having to prove criminal intent.

To date, nine companies implicated in the market-timing probe have signed agreements with the AG that contain no-indemnification clauses. In virtually identical language in a section headed "Cooperation," the businesses are prohibited from paying expenses of "current or former directors, officers, employees, or agents," except where required by law or written agreement.

In addition to Bank of America, the companies that have agreed to this provision are Bank One Corp.; Federated Investors Inc.; Pilgrim Baxter & Associates Ltd.; RS Investment Management Inc.; Strong Capital Management Co.; Alliance Capital Management Corp.; AIM Advisors Inc. and Invesco Funds Group, which are affiliated; and Waddell & Reed Financial Inc., which signed the most recent agreement, in July.

One corporate defense attorney who challenged Spitzer on fee payments is C. Evan Stewart of New York's Zuckerman Spaeder. Stewart represents former Bank of America financial adviser Theodore Sihpol III, who was indicted by Spitzer's office in 2004. Though Bank of America's bylaws required it to pay its employees' legal fees, Stewart says he had to sue the company to force the issue.

According to Sihpol's complaint, filed in Delaware Chancery Court in 2003, his attorney was told by a Bank of America lawyer that it had decided to "cooperate fully" with Spitzer's office, and any "request for advancement of [legal] expenses by Mr. Sihpol would be vetted with the attorney general." After the bank's lawyers submitted a written request to Spitzer's office, they later told Sihpol that expenses would not be advanced. But shortly before the suit was scheduled to go to trial, Bank of America agreed to pay.

DOJ_NMG_0090084

In Stewart's view, the denial of fees is "fundamentally a denial of due process." He explains, "You're taking away the ability of people to defend themselves." A lawyer for Bank of America did not respond to a request for comment. In July 2005 a Manhattan jury acquitted Sihpol on 29 of 33 charges, deadlocking on the others. Three months later, the AG dropped those charges too.

Spitzer has aggressively pushed the fee issue in at least one other case. Last year his office sued Soundview Health Center to require that its indicted executives post a bond before it could could pay their attorneys' fees. Spitzer wanted to ensure that employees at the New York-based nonprofit health care provider who had been charged with misusing state funds would personally repay their legal expenses if they were eventually convicted.

Soundview's lawyer, Susan Necheles of New York's Hafetz & Necheles, says she had never heard of a prosecutor demanding a bond in such circumstances. "The attorney general was trying to squeeze people into cooperating with the investigation," Necheles says. "They were trying to cut off fees so people couldn't defend themselves." The state court judge denied Spitzer's demand. The employees eventually pleaded guilty to lesser offenses and still work at Soundview, Necheles says.

Defense lawyer Stewart hopes prosecutors at both the state and federal level will have a change of heart about fee payments after the KPMG ruling, but he isn't sanguine about it. "The optimist in me says I hope so, but I remain skeptical," he says. "I think the government will use every power it has at its disposal to do what it thinks is necessary."

Halliburton Says It Will Agree To SEC's Request For More Time For Bribery Investigation (FINDLAW/AP)

By Marcy Gordon, Ap Business Writer

AP, November 2, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Halliburton Co. has said it will agree to the Securities and Exchange Commission's request for more time to investigate possible bribery and corruption in connection with the company's natural gas operations in Nigeria.

The oilfield services conglomerate disclosed the SEC's recent request for a so-called tolling agreement in a regulatory filing on Tuesday. Such an accord will put off the time when the legal clock started running, or tolling, on the case under the statute of limitations - generally five years for such investigations.

The agreement also gives Houston-based Halliburton more time to make its case to the SEC against possible civil charges under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act or to work out a settlement with the agency. The act makes it unlawful to bribe foreign government officials or company executives to obtain or retain business.

"In September 2006, the SEC requested that we enter into a tolling agreement with respect to its investigation. We anticipate that we will enter into an appropriate tolling agreement with the SEC," Halliburton said in its filing.

SEC spokesman John Nester declined comment Wednesday.

Both the SEC and the Justice Department have been investigating an alleged $180 million (â‚¬141 million) bribery scheme in Nigeria involving the predecessor company of Halliburton engineering and construction subsidiary Kellogg, Brown & Root and three other companies - from France, Italy and Japan. The allegations center on a contract for a $4 billion (currently â‚¬3.1 billion) Nigerian liquefied natural gas plant that was awarded in 1995 to a consortium of the four companies.

Halliburton fired two consultants, including former KBR chairman A. Jack Stanley, for violating the company's business code of conduct by receiving "improper personal benefits" related to the consortium's construction of the Nigerian plant.

A former KBR employee has asked Congress to investigate what he claims are Halliburton's efforts to cover up violations of the anti-corruption law and to mislead federal investigators.

David A. Smith said in a filing with the SEC in September that he mistakenly received e-mails from a company attorney on how to handle federal investigations - notes he says were intended for David R. Smith, a vice president with Halliburton's tax group.

The e-mails, he said, focused on how Halliburton would defend itself against bribery charges.

David A. Smith, who says he owns a single share of Halliburton's common stock said in his SEC filing that David R. Smith "was being asked to weigh in on how to explain away the source of the bribes paid to Nigerian officials."

Halliburton has said that Smith's allegations are groundless.

The company, whose chief executive was Vice President Dick Cheney from 1995 to 2000, has been criticized since the beginning of the war in Iraq in connection with multibillion-dollar government contracts.

DOJ_NMG_0090085

In a report released last month, the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction found that KBR, which provides food, shelter and other logistics to U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan, abused federal rules to conceal details of its contract performance.

On the Net:

Securities and Exchange Commission: http://www.sec.gov

Halliburton Co.: http://www.halliburton.com

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge May Allow Abramoff To Be Sentenced In Washington (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, November 2, 2006

The imminent surrender of superlobbyist-turned-superinformant Jack Abramoff on a South Florida fraud conviction is eclipsing his starring role in a Washington corruption probe.

Abramoff is set to turn himself in on Nov. 15 to serve about six years in prison for lying to obtain a $60 million bank loan to buy a fleet of South Florida gambling ships.

Now, Justice Department lawyers and Abramoff's attorneys are rushing to have the once-powerful Republican insider sentenced two days later on a separate corruption conviction.

That way, they say, he can be imprisoned near Washington to continue to inform the government on dozens of lawmakers under investigation. Abramoff faces between 9 and 11 years in prison.

This week, U.S. District Judge Ellen S. Huvelle might consider their request for the Nov. 17 sentencing in Washington.

Justice Department prosecutors fear that if Abramoff ends up being incarcerated hundreds of miles from the nation's capital, their complex influence-peddling probe would be seriously hampered or indefinitely stalled.

The reason: Abramoff would not be as readily available to make sense of thousands of sensitive documents, e-mails, computer files and other potentially incriminating records for investigators. While he has been free on bond, he has been working around the clock as an informant for the Justice Department.

The investigation, which is likely to affect next week's congressional midterm elections, has already netted a half-dozen Washington lobbyists and GOP Congressman Bob Ney of Ohio.

The Washington probe's fate may come down to the timing of Abramoff's two sentencings.

U.S. District Judge Paul Huck, who has granted Abramoff three surrender extensions since his sentencing in late March, won't budge anymore.

"My main concern is, there comes a time when people have to pay the piper, so to speak," Huck said at a late September hearing in a Miami federal court. ``I think that time has come."

Breach At Lab Called Significant (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian

Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

More classified information from Los Alamos nuclear facility was found in the police raid of a residential trailer than was first disclosed, sources say.

A significantly larger amount of classified information from a nuclear weapons laboratory in New Mexico was discovered in a residential trailer during a police search on Oct. 17 than was disclosed by law enforcement officials, sources close to the investigation said Wednesday.

The search turned up a number of copies of classified documents from Los Alamos National Laboratory in the trailer park where a former employee lived.

Law enforcement officials last week had described finding only three electronic storage devices, known as memory sticks or thumb drives, inside the trailer. It was unclear whether the employee had knowingly removed secret material and placed it on the drives.

The discovery of the documents heightened concerns that the removal of classified information from the laboratory was not purely accidental, according to the sources, who asked not to be identified because they were not authorized to make public statements.

DOJ_NMG_0090086

Spokesmen for the laboratory and the Department of Energy said they would not comment about the classified documents, noting that the matter was in the hands of the FBI.

An FBI spokesman in New Mexico said the agency did not comment on ongoing investigations.

But it was clear that federal officials had grown concerned about the security breach.

Deputy Energy Secretary Clay Sell and National Nuclear Security Administration chief Linton F. Brooks went to Los Alamos this week to assess the breach and oversee the administrative probe into how the classified information was removed.

The facility has a long history of security and safety breaches. After new management was installed by the Energy Department this year, top officials had hoped the problems were solved. But the current incident is "one of the utmost concern," according to lab director Michael Anastasio.

Despite plans to eliminate most, if not all, of the access that employees have to transfer data from classified computers to removable storage devices, a significant ability still exists to place documents on disks and drives that can be taken from the lab, according to one official.

The existence of a larger amount of classified data at the trailer was first disclosed by Nuclear Watch New Mexico, a watchdog group in Santa Fe, which said it had obtained a detailed summary of a laboratory briefing.

Portions of the information were independently corroborated by The Times.

The summary indicated that police had found 228 documents with information printed on both sides, including classified intelligence and weapons data.

The computer thumb drives contained 408 separate classified documents.

Those numbers could not be independently verified, but sources told The Times it was a "large amount of information."

The documents originated in a classified data vault in the lab's dynamic experiments division, which conducts tests on nuclear weapons components, the summary said.

When Los Alamos police arrived at the trailer in response to neighbors' report of a fight, they found Justin Stone, 20, who was wanted on a probation violation, according to a police report.

Stone was hiding in the trailer owned by former laboratory archivist Jessica Quintana, and agreed to come out only after police promised he could smoke a cigarette before being placed under arrest.

A search of the trailer turned up a sizable amount of drug paraphernalia associated with methamphetamine use, and the classified data. Stone remains in custody.

Quintana, 22, later admitted to police that one of the glass drug pipes was hers, according to the police report. She has not been charged.

Quintana's attorney, Stephen Aarons, told New Mexico newspapers that Quintana did not know the significance of the information on the thumb drives.

Karen Weldon's Ties To Serbs Detailed (PHI)

By Mark Fazlollah And John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 2, 2006

As her father the congressman publicly supported a Serbian family with close ties to war criminal Slobodan Milosevic, lobbyist Karen Weldon in 2003 won a $240,000 contract to help improve the family's image.

Her relationship with the Karic family continued into late 2004, months after the House ethics committee began an investigation of her contracts and the role of her father, Rep. Curt Weldon (R., Pa.), The Inquirer has learned.

A newly obtained State Department cable shows that she tried to help the wife of Serbian tycoon Bogoljub Karic get a visa to visit Florida. The State Department - noting the request came from a congressman's daughter - opposed the visa, citing links to "terrorist activities."

"Karic wanted the visa to try to make himself respectable," recalled Ambassador Richard Gelbard, who was President Bill Clinton's personal envoy to the Balkans. "Getting a U.S. visa is like getting the Good Housekeeping Seal of Approval."

Bogoljub Karic has been on the lam since being charged in February with embezzling Serbian state funds. The Karics were once referred to as "the Rockefellers of Serbia."

The FBI is now investigating Karen Weldon's work for the Karics and other clients, trying to determine whether Curt Weldon used his position to help her win contracts.

Curt Weldon, who also repeatedly tried to persuade the State Department to grant visas to the Karic family, has said that his daughter never lobbied him and that he has not violated any ethics rules.

A lawyer for Curt Weldon, William J. Winning, said that the "cable doesn't say anything about what Congressman Weldon did or didn't do, or that he even knew about it."

DOJ_NMG_0090087

"I think it's extremely disturbing that we've had a series of bureaucratic leaks so close to the election that are obviously calculated to undermine Congressman Weldon," Winning said. "That strikes me as being particularly unfair."

The lawyer for Karen Weldon, James J. Rohn, declined to comment on the cable. Speaking generally about the investigation, Rohn said: "I've reached out to the government and offered our cooperation."

Prosecutors declined to comment.

The investigation became public Oct. 13, in the last weeks of a tough reelection fight for Weldon, a 10-term Republican from Delaware County.

On Oct. 16, FBI agents raided Karen Weldon's home in Philadelphia and office in Media. Agents also raided the Florida office of Itera International, a Russian energy giant that has paid about $500,000 to Solutions Worldwide for public-relations work, and whose employees have contributed $20,000 to Curt Weldon.

Gelbard said he twice met with Karic in an unsuccessful attempt to get him to disavow Milosevic. When he refused, the United States took away Karic's visa in 1999.

"We tried to use the visa as leverage," Gelbard said. "When he wouldn't help, we got the Europeans to revoke his visa also."

Both Weldons have long-standing relationships with the Karic family. He tried to help them as a congressman; she promoted them as a public-relations agent.

In 2003, Weldon unsuccessfully lobbied U.S. diplomats and immigration officials to allow Dragomir Karic, Bogoljub's brother, to enter this country as the congressman's guest at the annual National Prayer Breakfast in Washington.

Later that year, Weldon led a congressional delegation to Serbia to meet with Bogoljub Karic and the Serb's trade group.

Weldon has acknowledged that he has reviewed extensive - and unflattering - U.S. intelligence reports about the Karic family's ties with Milosevic.

"They told me that he and his brothers owned Milosevic, that they owned the banking system," Weldon said in a 2002 hearing before his House Armed Services Committee, speaking of conversations with U.S. Army intelligence officers.

"... The wives of the Karic brothers were best of friends with Milosevic's wife," Weldon told the committee. "The Karic brothers actually owned the house Milosevic lived in that we bombed."

Weldon came to change his mind about the Karics, and to believe they were humanitarians who were bullied into supporting Milosevic, a former staffer told the Los Angeles Times.

Karen Weldon's firm received a $20,000-a-month contract from the Karic family foundation in March 2003 to burnish the Karics' image and help them establish a "Serbia House" in Washington.

The State Department cable was posted by the U.S. Embassy in Belgrade on Oct. 15, 2004. It included a paragraph about Karen Weldon's efforts on behalf of Bogoljub Karic's wife, Milanka.

"An invitation letter was submitted from Karen Weldon, daughter of Congressman Curt Weldon," the document says. It noted that Bogoljub Karic is "ineligible under 212(a)(3)(B) (Terrorism Activities)."

"Mrs. Karic is in the lookout system as a '00' hit," the document says, a designation used for a person believed to be involved in criminal activity, according to State Department officials. A former senior diplomat said that Bogoljub Karic was suspected of money-laundering and gun-running.

Milosevic, who died in prison this year while on trial before the U.N. war-crimes tribunal at the Hague, was indicted in 1999 for ethnic cleansing during the 1990s Balkans war.

State Department officials said they could not comment on whether Milanka Karic received the visa.

The House ethics committee began investigating Karen Weldon's contracts in March 2004, after the Los Angeles Times report.

Curt Weldon has said he was cleared by that investigation. He has declined to release the committee's letter, which was issued in late September.

Karen Weldon owns a firm called Solutions Worldwide with partner Charles P. Sexton Jr., a top Delaware County Republican leader. Joseph Fioravanti, a lawyer for Sexton, said he could not comment, adding that he did not recall any details of the firm's work for the Karics.

U.S. diplomats have used the "terrorist activity" label to block visas for people as varied as Iran's hard-line president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, members of the Palestine Liberation Organization, and Venezuela's Supreme Court president, Omar Mora.

Powerful Republican Enters A Dogfight Over Lobbying Link (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington

Financial Times, November 2, 2006

In the high-stakes world of US lobbying, the Pennsylvanian town of Media is an unlikely power base for one of Europe's biggest defence manufacturers.

But in June 2005, Oto Melara, a division of Italy's Finmeccanica, turned to Cecelia Grimes, a property agent-turned lobbyist based in the quiet suburban town, to lobby on the company's behalf on crucial congressional defence appropriations decisions.

At first glance the decision to hire Ms Grimes, who runs her firm Grimes & Young from home, was an odd one. The lobbyist, who is known as "Cece", did not have the credentials of a seasoned Washington power player, unlike the company's former lobbyist, David Bates, who had served as an aide to President George Bushsenior.

But Ms Grimes did have at least one influential friend from the state in the US Congress: Curt Weldon. Today, Mr Weldon, a 10-term congressman who is the number two Republican on the powerful House armed services committee, is in a fight for his political life ahead of next week's mid-term elections.

In an election year that has been tough for Republicans across the country because of the unpopularity of the war in Iraq and a host of corruption scandals in the capital, Mr Weldon's campaign battle has been made more difficult by allegations that the lawmaker used his political weight to steer lobbying work to friends such as Ms Grimes and his own daughter, Karen, who heads the lobbying firm Solutions North America.

Last month, the FBI raided Ms Weldon's home and lobbying firm and the Florida headquarters of Itera, a Russian natural gas company that was championed by the congressman and was one of Ms Weldon's most lucrative clients.

According to a report in the Washington Post, prosecutors have already empanelled a grand jury on the Weldon case, and have obtained evidence through wiretaps on Washington-based mobile phones.

While it is unclear whether the investigation by federal prosecutors is limited to questions about the Weldon family's links to Itera, the probe has put Mr Weldon's other activities - including his support of Finmeccanica - under the microscope. It has also raised new questions about the fine line that regulates dealings between corporate lobbyists, lawmakers and the companies they advocate following the scandal involving the convicted "super-lobbyist" Jack Abramoff.

The Pennsylvania lawmaker has defended his record and said he believed the FBI's investigation was politically motivated.

Whatever the outcome of the probe, Mr Weldon's broad support for Finmeccanica has undoubtedly helped the company make inroads in the lucrative market for US defence projects. The support also appears to have bolstered the congressman's hometown district, which was chosen by Oto Melara in 2004 as a site for a new plant.

That same year Mr Weldon convinced the US Navy to reconsider a gun manufactured by Oto Melara, the Super Rapid 76mm, even though contractors had already chosen a gun made by United Defense, another manufacturer. At the time Mr Weldon said he was confident that giving Oto Melara "a fair chance" to bid for the project would lead to a "major investment" in the company's product.

One year later AgustaWestland, which is 50 per cent owned by Finmeccanica, won with Lockheed-Martin a $1.7bn (€1.4bn, £895m) contract to build the presidential helicopter, Marine One.

Although the award of the contract was seen at the time as a gesture of gratitude by the US to the government of Silvio Berlusconi, then Italian prime minister, for his support for the Iraq war, Aviation Week, a defence publication, noted the friendship between Mr Weldon and Pier Francesco Guarguaglini, Finmeccanica's chief executive. Mr Weldon's other daughter, Kim, was retained by AgustaWestland last year.

Russ Caso, a top aide to the lawmaker, denies Mr Weldon helped AgustaWestland to clinch the helicopter deal or that the company hired Kim Weldon to win favour with the congressman.

The Italian defence group said it had not been contacted by federal investigators and said it did not "seem" to be involved in the investigation. The company said it hired Ms Grimes last year after the chief executive of the subsidiary's US division, Howard Goldberg, met the lobbyist and was impressed by her "local expertise" in the Philadelphia market.

The statement contrasts with Ms Grimes's own lobbying disclosure forms, which indicate she lobbied lawmakers in Washington. Ms Grimes did not respond to requests for comment by the Financial Times, but she told the Los Angeles Times this year that her clients picked her firm over other Washington lobby groups because she was more affordable.

She also denied her clients liked her lobbying firm because of her friendship with Mr Weldon, whom she has known for 15 years.

Women's Testimony Continues At FCI Trial (TALLDEM)

By Chitra Subramanyam, DEMOCRAT STAFF WRITER

Tallahassee Democrat, November 2, 2006

One by one, women walked into a federal courtroom Wednesday to testify against two correctional officers charged in a sex-with-prisoners conspiracy on Day Three of their trial.

Ten women, some in suits and others in chains and prison uniforms, described their encounters with the two men at the Federal Correctional Institution in Tallahassee.

Alan Moore and Gregory Dixon are two of five FCI officers arrested June 21. A sixth officer, Ralph Hill, was killed in a shootout at FCI after he opened fire on federal agents. Moore and Dixon are facing trial on charges of mail fraud, bribery, witness tampering and conspiracy. The other officers, Alfred Barnes, Vincent Johnson and E. Lavon Spence, earlier pleaded guilty to mail fraud.

Some women told jurors they had sex with the officers in exchange for banned items. Others said they acted as lookouts or paid the officers to bring packages containing banned items into the prison. Defense attorneys tried to prove the witnesses were testifying in exchange for a reduced sentence.

One woman told jurors she had sex with Barnes and Moore.

"It wasn't a written agreement or anything like that," she said, referring to Barnes. She had sex with him "for the things that he brought me," she said. Moore, she said, entered her cell one night while her cellmate was sleeping. They had sex twice that night, she said.

A former inmate testified that she often acted as a lookout for Barnes. On one occasion, Dixon propositioned her, she said. On being questioned by defense attorneys, she said she didn't say anything about it earlier because "it was bad for me to cooperate while I was at FCI."

Another inmate, serving time for murder, said she had sex with Hill over a six-month period. On one occasion, she said, Dixon told her he "treated all females like they were wearing wires," and groped her. She told jurors Moore also talked to her about Hill.

One inmate, serving time on drug charges, told jurors Dixon "kinda took me under his wing ... looked at me like a little brother."

The Tallahassee Democrat is not using the women's names because of concerns raised by the U.S. Attorney's Office about identifying them.

The trial continues today.

Ex-Ala. Fire College Official Agrees To Plead Guilty To Fraud (AP)

By Desiree Hunter, The Associated Press

AP, November 2, 2006

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (AP) — A former deputy director at the Alabama Fire College agreed to plead guilty to conspiracy and fraud charges Wednesday, the fifth person at the fire college in Tuscaloosa to be charged in the ongoing probe of corruption in the state's post-secondary system.

The three-count plea agreement was reached with Robert Nix, who retired as deputy director in 1996, took a post at Shelton State Community College and served on the Alabama Fire College and Personnel Standards Commission from 2001-2005.

A former board member and treasurer of the Fire College Foundation, Nix admitted to spending about $70,000 of foundation funds for home improvements such as a gazebo-covered Jacuzzi and various purchases including a large screen TV and two Harley Davidson motorcycles.

He also admitted directing about $25,000 in fraudulent foundation scholarships to his son, granddaughter, grandson, sister and girlfriend's two daughters.

Nix, 67, faces up to five years in federal prison and a maximum $250,000 fine for counts one and two, which are conspiracy to commit theft and conspiracy to commit wire fraud. The third count seeks restitution of $328,000, the total amount Nix admitted receiving for personal use. He also agreed to cooperate with investigators and to plead guilty to a state felony ethics charge.

According to the plea agreement, Nix and the college's executive director spent hundreds of thousands in foundation funds from about January 2000 until September 2004 and falsified financial records. The executive director during that time was W.L. Langston, who was removed in April after concerns were raised about his management of the college.

U.S. Attorney Alice Martin announced the plea deal at a joint news conference in Attorney General Troy King's office at the Alabama Statehouse and said the fire college foundation could have been called the "friends and family foundation."

"When you read that he admits to having paid scholarships that were supposed to be money for the training of volunteer firefighters and EMTs, I wonder how much safer we are as a result of his children receiving scholarships to their grammar schools," she said.

"For too long, too many too powerful have been left unchecked," Martin said.

DOJ_NMG_0090090

Birmingham attorney Tommy Spina, who began representing Nix in 2004, said earnest pre-negotiations between his client and investigators had been going on for a few months. He said he expects Nix to have his first court appearance later this month.

Spina said Nix, who resigned from his part-time job as a fire safety specialist at Shelton State on Monday, recently decided on the plea deal so he could "right the wrongs and move forward."

Martin said the investigation, which began more than two years ago, is still "in the very beginning." She and King would not say how many others could be charged in the case.

"Everybody who has stolen a nickel from the two-year school system is a person of interest and every one of them will be sought and will be prosecuted," King said.

Former state Rep. Bryant Melton, D-Tuscaloosa, was the first to be charged in the joint federal and state probe at the fire college, which is located at Shelton State. He entered an agreement similar to Nix's in June, admitting he funneled state legislative grants to the fire college foundation and then used the money to pay gambling debts.

Next, Jasper banker Phillip Curtis Grace was charged with obstruction of justice and making false statements to federal investigators in August and two Shelton State assistants were arrested in the case last month. Doris Phillips and her daughter, Melinda Phillips Sexton, are accused of conspiring to fraudulently obtain state property and were charged with two counts of theft.

The state's two-year college system has been under intense scrutiny, with questions being raised about the use of state funding and nepotism issues.

Former Chancellor Roy Johnson was fired in July and Interim Chancellor Thomas Corts has begun investigations at Bishop State, where six people have been charged with theft by deception in connection with financial aid irregularities.

Two-year college spokesman Andre Taylor pointed out Wednesday that the fire college is autonomous from the two-year college system and is governed by a separate board. Taylor said two-year officials are working to make sure the "policies, procedures and practices" within the system are "up to par."

Former Elsa Officer Second Accused Of Taking Bribes (FWST)

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, November 2, 2006

McALLEN, Texas - A former Elsa police officer is the second to be indicted recently for allegedly taking bribes to protect drug loads, federal prosecutors said Wednesday.

Ismael Gomez, 27, is accused in a one-count indictment of receiving about $2,500 to use his official position to protect a vehicle he believed was transporting 10 kilograms of cocaine. The indictment was returned by a McAllen grand jury on Oct. 24 and unsealed Wednesday.

Gomez surrendered to the FBI and was ordered held without bond pending a hearing Nov. 6. He faces up to 20 years in federal prison and $250,000 in fines if convicted.

Another former Elsa police officer, 45-year-old Herman Carr of Donna, was indicted in an unrelated case in September for allegedly taking $5,000 to provide protection for a vehicle he believed was transporting five kilograms of cocaine. Carr is awaiting trial.

Sentencing Postponed For City Official In Truck Scandal (AP)

AP, November 2, 2006

CHICAGO - The sentencing of a key figure in the federal investigation of Chicago's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program was abruptly postponed Wednesday.

Donald Tomczak, 70, the former deputy head of the city water department, was rescheduled to be sentenced next Monday.

Attorneys said Tomczak was unable to come to court Wednesday because he had an unspecified medical condition.

Tomczak was charged in a federal investigation of the Hired Truck Program which outsources city hauling work to private companies.

He admitted taking payoffs from trucking companies in exchange for hauling work. He pleaded guilty to racketeering and a tax offense.

He also acknowledged that he headed a so-called patronage army of city workers that campaigned for Mayor Richard M. Daley and his allies. Daley has not been accused of any wrongdoing.

Commerce Bancorp Is Off The Hook (PHI)

By Joseph N. Distefano And John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090091

One year after two of its former Pennsylvania executives were sentenced to prison, Commerce Bancorp Inc. says federal prosecutors in Philadelphia are no longer investigating the company.

After "several inquiries" by the office of U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan in 2004 and 2005, "we were recently advised by the U.S. Attorney's Office that it has concluded its investigations without any action against us," Commerce said in a statement filed yesterday with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

"As a result, Commerce and its employees are not subjects of any investigations" by Meehan's office, the statement said.

Two federal law enforcement officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, confirmed that authorities had concluded their investigation.

Commerce shares fell 10 cents, or 0.3 percent, to $34.82 yesterday on the New York Stock Exchange. Even before the announcement, investors had stopped focusing on the bank's legal problems, and worried more about declining profitability in the banking business, said Gerard Cassidy, bank analyst at RBC Capital Markets, in New York.

Commerce, which has headquarters in Cherry Hill, is the largest bank based in the Philadelphia area. It has grown rapidly across New Jersey and Pennsylvania since the 1970s, targeting local-government deposit, insurance and bond accounts as a key part of its expansion strategy.

But Commerce's attempts to win Philadelphia city business away from locally dominant Wachovia Corp. after Mayor Street's election in 1999 brought the bank under the scrutiny of a federal probe of city contracting practices. The investigation examined the role of the late Ronald White, a lawyer and political fund-raiser, whom Commerce hired as a consultant and appointed as head of the bank's Pennsylvania advisory board.

Commerce Bank of Pennsylvania executives Glenn K. Holck and Stephen M. Umbrell were convicted last year on corruption charges related to former city treasurer Corey Kemp, who, with White's help, tried to win city business for Commerce. Kemp was convicted of providing help in winning city business in return for cash and favors, and sentenced to 10 years in prison. Holck and Umbrell are free while they appeal their convictions.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Schwartz, chief of the public-corruption unit in Philadelphia, said it would be inappropriate to comment.

"Typically, we don't comment on when an investigation is begun, whether it is active or has been concluded," said Schwartz, who prosecuted Holck and Umbrell.

Michael Drewniak, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in New Jersey, where Commerce is based, would not comment on whether his office had also made inquiries involving Commerce.

Commerce spokesman David Flaherty had no comment.

In the summer of 2005, Meehan said the FBI had seized Commerce records to determine whether the bank had also given municipal officials in Philadelphia suburbs preferential treatment to win government business. But investigators found no wrongdoing by the bank.

Key Dates in Commerce Probe

February 2003: The FBI begins bugging campaign to record Philadelphia officials' dealings with financial companies that sought city business.

October 2003: FBI bug discovered by Philadelphia police in City Hall.

June 2004: Commerce Bank of Pennsylvania executives Glenn K. Holck and Stephen M. Umbrell indicted on charges of attempting to corrupt Philadelphia officials.

May 2005:Holck and Umbrell convicted of conspiring to deliver personal benefits to Philadelphia treasurer Corey Kemp in exchange for help in winning city business.

July 2005: Kemp sentenced to 10 years in federal prison.

November 2005:A federal judge in Philadelphia sentences Holck and Umbrell to two years in prison and fines. Both men appeal.

December 2005: Commerce pays $600,000 to settle NASD accusations that its bond unit violated political campaign finance rules.

January 2006: U.S. Attorney's Office subpoenas Delaware County and several local governments in Delaware and Bucks Counties, seeking records of their business dealings with Commerce.

November 2006: Commerce tells the Securities and Exchange Commission that the U.S. Attorney's Office in Philadelphia has "concluded its investigations without any action against us."

Fla. Lawmaker Resigns Over Threatening Phone Calls (USAT/AP)

By Laura Wides-munoz, The Associated Press

USA Today, November 2, 2006

HIALEAH, Fla. — A state lawmaker resigned Wednesday from the Florida Legislature and was charged with two felonies in connection with leaving obscenity-filled messages and a racial slur on a colleague's voice mail.

State prosecutors charged Rep. Ralph Arza, a Hialeah Republican, and his 25-year-old cousin, Paulino Barbon. Both men could face up to 10 years in prison if convicted.

Arza, 46, had been urged to resign by House Republicans and Gov. Jeb Bush after the messages left on Rep. Gus Barreiro's voice mail became public.

Barreiro, a Miami Beach Republican, had already filed a complaint with the House rules committee, claiming Arza used racial epithets when referring to a Miami-Dade County official. To thwart the investigation, Arza allegedly left threatening phone messages for Barreiro.

The felony charges are one count each of retaliating against and tampering with a witness.

Authorities said a total of 10 phone calls were made Oct. 21 and Oct. 22 to Barreiro from phones belonging to Arza and Barbon. Five threatening calls were recorded, two from Arza's cellphone and three from Barbon's phone.

The men were expected to turn themselves in today, according to the Miami-Dade County State Attorney Katherine Fernandez Rundle.

Earlier in the day, Arza apologized for his actions and said he didn't want to distract from the work of the Republican-led Legislature. “I do not want to be the story,” he said. Arza previously acknowledged leaving the messages last month but said he was drunk.

He said he had learned that Barreiro had filed the complaint alleging Arza had earlier used a racial epithet when referring to Miami-Dade County schools Superintendent Rudy Crew, who is black. He used the same epithet in the phone message to Barreiro, who is Hispanic, but he has vehemently denied ever using a racial slur to refer to Crew.

Arza resigned about an hour before a special House panel was set to begin hearings on whether to expel him. The hearings were canceled.

“It's not really a happy day for anybody, I don't think,” Barreiro said. “I think he made the right decision — the right decision not only for himself, but I thought he looked at the bigger picture, which is the institution he represents.” Crew called the situation “a tragedy all the way around,” but said Arza was right to leave the Legislature.

The GOP gets to choose a replacement for Arza for Tuesday's general election, but his name will still be on the ballot. The situation will be similar to what has happened in former U.S. congressman Mark Foley's district. The GOP has replaced him with Joe Negron.

Mob Enforcer Denied Bail On Extortion Charges (PHI)

By George Anastasia

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 2, 2006

Mob enforcer Vincent "Big Vince" Filipelli was trying to explain to a deadbeat gambler the rules of the underworld:

He bet. He lost. Now he had to pay.

And if he didn't, Filipelli added, he would "hunt him down and put him in the hospital."

That was the message the hulking, former competitive bodybuilder delivered to a gambler named "T.J." during a meeting in the parking lot of a South Philadelphia "gentleman's club" back in May, according to an FBI agent who testified yesterday at Filipelli's bail hearing in federal court in Camden.

What Big Vince didn't know at the time was that T.J. was a New Jersey State Police trooper working undercover in an organized crime gambling investigation. The parking lot meeting was picked up on both audio and videotape as part of a 15-month probe.

After a protracted five-hour bail hearing yesterday, U.S. Magistrate Judge Ann Marie Donio pointed to that threat as the primary basis for granting the government's motion to have Filipelli, 53, held without bail.

Three witnesses outlined the confrontation, which took place in the parking lot of Crazy Horse Too, an upscale go-go bar and restaurant on Columbus Boulevard in South Philadelphia.

Filipelli met that day with T.J. and Lou, two men who had been placing bets with a mob-linked Internet gambling operation. T.J. was State Trooper James Calderelas. Lou was Trooper Leonard DiJoseph.

FBI Agent James Titcombe, who was part of the joint federal-state probe, provided a detailed account of several meetings Filipelli had with the undercover investigators. Titcombe said Filipelli, a former Mr. America bodybuilding champion, boasted about his acts of violence and the fact that he was a "made" member of the mob.

While none of the tapes was played in open court, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jacquline Carle quoted from them in arguing that Filipelli was a danger to the community and should be denied bail.

DOJ_NMG_0090093

Filipelli was charged with gambling, extortion and traveling interstate to make a violent threat when he was arrested last week. Those charges were formalized in an indictment returned by a federal grand jury yesterday.

Carle, in her closing argument, referred directly to one tape-recorded conversation in which Filipelli bragged that he had burst into an office and in front of 40 people had beaten a gambler who had refused to pay.

" 'He tried to get cute with me,' " Carle said, quoting the conversation recorded in April in which Filipelli told DiJoseph about the assault. " 'I put the kid in the hospital.' "

Donald Manno, Filipelli's attorney, had argued that the conversations were "street talk" and "puffing" by his client. "No one was assaulted," Manno said.

But Donio ruled the testimony was strong enough to support the government's request for no bail in the case.

Pittsburgh Mob Boss Dies (KDKA)

KDKA-TV, November 2, 2006

PITTSBURGH Michael Genovese was one of the last links to a lost era - an old-school mob boss who the law never caught up with.

The head of the western Pennsylvania La Cosa Nostra is dead.

By all accounts, mob informants, FBI agents and the now-defunct Pennsylvania Crime Commission, Genovese was the don of the Pittsburgh mob.

An old-style mob boss who ran one of 24 original mafia families in the U.S. that trace their roots back to Sicily.

Gambling, narcotics, loan sharking, even murder were all linked to the Genovese mob.

But Geneovese was never indicted - never sent to prison.

Several of his underbosses - including Chuckie Porter, Lou Ruicci and other mob lieutenants - were all convicted in a federal trial in the 1990s.

But they never brought charges against the reputed mob boss.

Genovese is reported to have been suffering from bladder cancer and heart disease.

He was 87 years old and died in his sleep.

The U.S. Attorney's office in Pittsburgh declined comment on Genovese's death.

In the past, the U.S. Attorney has said that the mob trials of the 1990s severely weakened mafia influence in the Pittsburgh area.

Late Design Change Is Cited In Collapse Of Tunnel Ceiling In Boston (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 1 — Engineers changed the design of the ceiling in Boston's Big Dig highway tunnel after they had already finished building the roof from which it would hang, and attached a new, heavier ceiling with hardware that had little margin of strength, the National Transportation Safety Board said on Wednesday.

Part of the ceiling collapsed on July 10, killing a woman as she rode in her car to Logan Airport and injuring her husband, who was driving. Details of the board's most recent discoveries were reported Wednesday in The Boston Globe.

According to the board, the original plan was for the ceiling in the area of the collapse to be made of metal coated with porcelain, but because of its high price, designers substituted pre-cast concrete panels, which are heavier. In some areas, they installed steel brackets in the roof for hanging the panels, but in the area of the collapse, in a connector tunnel that leads to Interstate 90, the roof was finished. So instead, they drilled holes in it and glued in anchors.

The heavier ceiling system, approved by engineers in March 1997, was a "one hanger out" design, meaning that it could survive the failure of one hanger. But that design "provides little or no redundancy," the board said in a report it released on Wednesday. "The N.T.S.B. has researched other tunnels throughout the country and has found that significant redundancy is built into the ceiling design so that in the event of hanger failures, the panels are self-supported."

In addition, the safety board said, it had not found any evidence that the tunnels were inspected between January 2003, when the tunnel opened to traffic, and the date of the collapse. An inspection after the collapse found that where the ceiling was still intact, many anchors had begun to pull away from the roof, some showing "extreme displacement" of more than one inch, the board said.

The board said it was trying to determine if there was a standard for tunnel inspection, but it noted that bridges were typically inspected every two years.

The board is also supervising an analysis of the epoxy used with the anchors, and it said it had interviewed an employee of CobnAm Testing, which was hired to test the strength of the anchor bolts.

DOJ_NMG_0090094

"The tester's description of the testing procedure differs from what has been found in the construction contract," the board said.

The board is an advisory agency that makes recommendations to government agencies and private parties after its investigations. The Massachusetts attorney general's office, the Justice Department and the Transportation Department's Office of Inspector General, whose investigations could lead to indictments, are also looking into the accident.

CEO Is Charged With Stealing Identities (MH)

The Miami Herald, November 2, 2006

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y. - A prominent Westchester businessman has been charged with stealing his employees' identities to obtain more than $1 million in bank loans and credit card charges, prosecutors said.

Terrence Chalk, 44, the chief executive officer of Compulinx Managed Services of White Plains, was indicted along with his nephew, Damon Chalk, by a federal grand jury on charges of conspiracy, credit card fraud, and making false statements to banks.

Terrence Chalk pleaded not guilty in U.S. District Court on Tuesday, where U.S. Magistrate Judge George Yanthis ordered him held on $250,000 bond.

Terrence Chalk founded Compulinx, a computer management firm, in 1990. He is accused of using the names, addresses, and Social Security numbers of his employees to secure the bank loans between 2001 and 2006, prosecutors said. He also ran up $100,000 in credit card charges using their identities, they said.

Chalk and his company were inducted this year into the Hall of Fame by the Business Council of Westchester. He serves on the boards of the American Red Cross and Hospice and Palliative Care of Westchester.

Last year, Terrence Chalk was nominated to the White Plains Youth Bureau, and was named businessperson of the year in February by the Westchester chapter of the Omega Psi Phi fraternity.

His lawyer, Mayo Bartlett, did not immediately return a call for comment.

Damon Chalk, 35, of Florida, was arrested by FBI agents Tuesday at La Guardia Airport. He was ordered held without bail. The name of his lawyer could not be immediately determined.

Former Atlanta Editor Gets 8 Years In Child Porn Case (TEXGAZ)

By Paige Milton, Texarkana Gazette

Texarkana Gazette, November 2, 2006

Federal child pornography charges stem from February 2004 incident

MARSHALL, Texas—Former Cass County newspaper editor Charlie Harrist will spend 97 months in a federal prison for child pornography charges, a judge ruled Tuesday.

The sentence was handed down by Judge T. John Ward of the Eastern District of U.S. District Court of Texas.

Harrist was convicted in June of two charges of federal child pornography, including possession of material involving sexual exploitation of minors and receiving material involving sexual exploitation of minors.

The charges stem from a February 2004 incident. Harrist took his personal computer to Atlanta, Texas, technician Jerry Griffin for repair. Griffin's employee, Melanie Warren, found child pornography images on Harrist's computer and reported her findings to the Cass County Sheriff's Office.

Harrist's computer was turned over to the sheriff's office, which was assisted in its investigation by the FBI.

During the trial, Billy Harrell, Harrist's attorney, argued the computer's hard drive had been cleaned prior to the discovery, negating the possibility the images belonged to Harrist.

Harrell also raised the possibility of tampering while the computer was in police custody, and pointed out Harrist had an adversarial relationship with law enforcement because of his reporting.

The defense also asserted Harrist was out of town during the times the images were placed on the computer, as shown by the computer system's clock.

Prosecutors argued the computer also contained news stories with Harrist's byline and personal photographs of Harrist and a friend, and the computer's system clock can be reset. A Longview, Texas, police detective who examined the computer testified he found "thousands" of images and videos of underage girls in sexual situations.

Harrist was indicted by a Tyler federal grand jury in April 2004.

He is the former editor of the Citizens Journal newspaper, based in Atlanta.

Supreme Court Ponders Retroactive Ruling (AP)

By Mark Sherman, The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0090095

AP, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — If Marvin Bockting were on trial today, his stepdaughter's accusations that he sexually abused her would not be allowed unless she testified about them in court.

The Supreme Court settled that issue in 2004 when it ruled that defendants have a constitutional right to cross-examine witnesses against them.

But Bockting was convicted in 1988 after 6-year-old Autumn Bockting's statements to Las Vegas police were presented to the jury even though the girl did not testify during the trial. He received a life sentence.

The question that reluctant justices confronted Wednesday was whether to apply the new rule to older cases, which the court has refused to do in a dozen cases over 17 years for matters of criminal procedure. However, an appeals court said the rule should apply retroactively and overturned Bockting's conviction as a result; other appellate courts have ruled differently.

Nevada Attorney General George Chanos and Justice Department lawyer Irving Gornstein argued that justices should not apply their 2004 ruling to older cases because, among other things, it would open the door to many defendants whose convictions depended on out of-court statements that were not subject to cross-examination.

Justice Anthony Kennedy singled out that problem if the court were to uphold the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in this case. "We have to look at the rule in the whole universe of cases, not just your case. It seems to me that was the problem you had in arguing in this area, and maybe you can suggest some way out. I don't see it," Kennedy said.

Franny Forsman, Bockting's lawyer, countered that the right to confront a witness was so important to the integrity of the trial that it deserved the same consideration as, say, the court's landmark ruling in the 1960s that guaranteed a lawyer to defendants in criminal trials.

Forsman, the federal public defender in Nevada, also told the justices that concerns about courts being weighed down with defendants challenging their convictions as a result of a favorable ruling for Bockting were overblown. Her research found just five cases, as of late September, in which convictions were overturned because the ruling about confronting witnesses was applied to older cases, she said. Claims based on the 2004 ruling would already have to be under way, she said.

"It is not going to open the floodgates," Forsman said.

A ruling is expected before July.

If Bockting loses at the Supreme Court, it will not be because his lawyer was ineffective.

Forsman received some rare public praise from the bench at the conclusion of her argument. "Ms. Forsman, can I ask you a personal question? Were you a moot court finalist?" Justice John Paul Stevens asked, referring to the law school exercise in which students display their advocacy skills in mock trials.

No, she said. Undeterred, Stevens said he attended a moot court at the University of Notre Dame law school around the time Forsman was a student there. "It was an awfully good moot court," he said.

The case is Whorton v. Bockting, 05-595.

Second Guilty Plea In Cable Fraud Scheme (UPI)

United Press International, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 1 (UPI) -- A second Connecticut defense contractor has pleaded guilty to fabricating test data on fiber optic cables used on the Patriot missile system.

Patrick Hale was the operations manager for Ace & Co., Inc., in Naugatuck, Conn. Ace distributes electronic components through its Stran Technologies division, which makes fiber optic and electrical connectors.

The military bought hundreds of the electrical connectors, known as the Tactical Fiber Optic Cable Assembly. Some were used on the first generation of the Patriot missile launchers, among other military systems.

All the Stran cables have since passed the required tests, and there are no known safety or suitability issues, according to the Justice Department.

The fraud began in 1999 when Ace was attempting to qualify as a military source for the cables, according to court documents filed at the beginning of August.

The humidity tests required by the Army's Communications and Electronics Command would have taken three months to complete, costing Ace up to $42,000, and would have delayed its ability to fill military orders for the connectors.

So Ace fabricated and falsified test results, and leased testing equipment to convince Army inspectors who visited the facility that the tests had been completed. Hale participated in the scheme to deceive the government.

On Aug. 2, 2006, Ace & Company, Inc. entered a corporate guilty plea based on the same scheme. Also on Aug. 2, the owner and president of Ace, James E. Stranberg, Jr., pleaded guilty to tax evasion based on his filing a false corporate income tax return for Ace in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0090096

Hale faces a maximum term of imprisonment of five years and a fine of up to $250,000 on the fraud charge, and a maximum term of imprisonment of one year and a fine of up to $25,000 on a tax charge.

Despite Flawed Defense, A Death Sentence Stands (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

Defense lawyers in capital cases are often criticized for conducting superficial investigations of their clients' backgrounds, but Ferdinand Radolovich's performance in a Kentucky case, one that ended in a death sentence, may have set a new standard.

"Apparently," a federal judge wrote in 2001, "neither attorney Radolovich nor the prosecution knew of petitioner's actual identity until his case had been affirmed on appeal."

When he was later challenged about the quality of his work on the case, Mr. Radolovich testified that he was an accomplished death penalty lawyer at the time, having tried four capital cases. The real number was zero, the federal judge, Jennifer B. Coffman, found, and Mr. Radolovich has been indicted for perjury for his statement.

But none of this has helped the inmate in question, who was sent to death row as James Slaughter but whose real name is Jeffrey Leonard.

Yesterday in Cincinnati, splitting 7 to 7, the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit declined to rehear the case. A dissenting judge, R. Guy Cole Jr., said the decision to allow Mr. Leonard to be executed even though the jury did not even know his real name, much less his background, opens a "new chapter in our death penalty history."

The case is not one of mistaken identity, and there is substantial evidence that Mr. Leonard is guilty of murder. But Mr. Leonard's current lawyers say a competent investigation of his background would have yielded a trove of evidence that might well have persuaded the jury to spare his life. He is, for instance, apparently brain damaged, and he endured a brutal childhood.

In June, the federal appeals court's three-judge panel agreed that Mr. Radolovich's performance was so bad that it violated the Constitution. But the two judges in the majority ruled against Mr. Leonard anyway, saying that better legal work would not have caused the jury to sentence him to life in prison instead of death.

Mr. Leonard, as James Slaughter, was sent to death row in 1983 for the stabbing death that year of Esther Stewart at a Louisville consignment store she owned.

In an interview yesterday, Mr. Radolovich defended his work.

"Mr. Slaughter admitted that he had lied to me, that he had given me a false name, a false date of birth, a false Social Security number." Mr. Radolovich said. "He told me he had no living relatives. Where was I supposed to go? What was I supposed to do?"

He added that the perjury charge, to which he has pleaded not guilty, was a result of a misunderstanding. While he acknowledged that the Leonard case was his first capital trial, he said that his testimony, at a 1994 state court hearing on Mr. Leonard's motion to vacate his conviction, meant to refer to experience he gained after the trial.

Judge Coffman, of Federal District Court in Lexington, Ky., wrote that Mr. Radolovich's investigation was inadequate.

"Petitioner could not even correctly spell the name, Slaughter, which he misspelled phonetically as being 'Slawter,' " Judge Coffman wrote. "This fact alone would cause the effective attorney to wonder about the veracity of his client's background information."

In yesterday's dissent, Judge Cole listed some of the information that Mr. Radolovich had failed to locate. Mr. Leonard "has possible brain damage from an untreated childhood skull fracture." His mother and stepfather "beat him so badly as a child that scars remain all over his body." His stepfather "once fired a gun at him as he ran out of his home carrying his younger brother." And "his mother, brothers and grandparents (who did not know about the trial) would have testified on his behalf."

The judges who declined to rehear the case yesterday did not give reasons. In the panel decision in June, the two judges in the majority said that "we do not find it reasonably probable that the outcome of Slaughter's sentencing would have been different if Radolovich had unearthed" the additional information.

Judge Cole, dissenting yesterday, said that was speculation.

"Although we cannot be absolutely certain," Judge Cole wrote, "that a single juror sentencing Jeffrey Leonard — a brain-damaged man whose family would corroborate his testimony and plead for his life — would come to a different conclusion, this court's decision leaves one aspect of this case indisputable: We will never know."

Judge Cole noted that one juror in the 1983 trial, in a sworn statement, said she would have voted to spare Mr. Leonard's life had she known more about him.

Kathleen K. Schmidt, a lawyer for Mr. Leonard, said she would ask the United States Supreme Court to hear the case.

Mr. Radolovich said he had mixed sentiments about yesterday's decision. "I'm heartsick that James went to death row," Mr. Radolovich said. "But after he told me he did it and after he lied to me, I'm a little less sympathetic."

DOJ_NMG_0090097

CIVIL LAW:

Groups Ask FTC To Probe Online Ad Profiling (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

Two consumer advocacy groups asked the Federal Trade Commission yesterday to investigate online advertising practices of Internet companies, asserting that the practices violate consumer privacy.

In a 50-page complaint, the D.C.-based Center for Digital Democracy and the U.S. Public Interest Research Group outlined online consumer tracking and profiling systems that they said are "deceptive and unfair to millions of users."

"Our online travels are increasingly becoming part of vast databases that comprise the source material for sophisticated analytical engines designed solely to make us more susceptible to online marketing," the complaint said.

The groups asked the FTC to investigate Microsoft Corp., Google Inc., Yahoo Inc. and other online companies and software firms, which they said were "aggressively" building new tools to analyze and classify consumers' behavior across the Internet and other digital media -- computers, cellphones, video games and televisions.

They singled out a Microsoft service that allows advertisers to take information gleaned from watching the millions of people who use the company's MSN Internet network. The information is combined with demographic data from credit bureaus and other sources to tailor ads to people based on geographic location, sex, age group, lifestyle and time of day. Microsoft's ad system "is deceptive and unfair," the report said.

The report also described new Web software programs that allow marketers to monitor people as they click and scroll online, logging where they enter a Web site, how long they linger on a page, even which part of the page they move their mouse across.

The groups urged the FTC to halt advertising practices that "abuse consumers" and to recommend federal legislation to protect them.

Mike Hintze, a senior attorney for Microsoft, said in an e-mail statement that "transparency" with consumers is "extremely important" and "will continue to be a central focus" of Microsoft's design of online services: "Consumer trust is essential to the success of online business and helping protect consumers' privacy is a top priority for Microsoft in our development and implementation of online services."

Google spokesman Barry Schnitt said that Google recognizes "that privacy is important" and that as it develops its advertising programs, it comes back "every time to the idea that the trust of the user is paramount." Yahoo spokeswoman Nissa Anklesaria said consumer trust and privacy were important and that the company had "a longstanding commitment to providing users with clear notice and choice" on the way their data is used.

Torts Gone Wild (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

WHEN LAWYERS say, "hard cases make bad law," what they often mean is that a sympathetic plaintiff or an unattractive defendant can induce judges to depart from a general rule that makes sense. The U.S. Supreme Court should resist that temptation in ruling on an Oregon jury's decision to order a tobacco company to pay $79.5 million in punitive damages in a case involving a lifelong smoker who died of lung cancer.

Lawyers for the widow of Jesse Williams convinced the jury that Philip Morris had targeted people like her husband with a "massive, fraudulent campaign to sow doubt about smoking and disease" — a campaign so effective that it could blunt warnings by the surgeon general. The jury then ordered the company to pay Mrs. Williams $821,000 in actual damages.

Fair enough, even though Williams had disregarded warnings from his family about the risks of smoking, realizing too late that "those darn cigarette people … were lying all the time."

But then the jury tacked on a punitive-damage award that was almost 100 times what it thought was necessary to compensate her for her loss. The jurors did so after her lawyer asked them to think about "how many other Jesse Williams[es] in the last 40 years in the state of Oregon there have been. It's more than fair to think about how many more are out there in the future."

Actually, the $79.5-million award was less than fair. In recent years, the Supreme Court has held that due process of law is violated when punitive damages — admittedly designed to punish the defendant for wrongful conduct, not to compensate the plaintiff — are "grossly excessive."

In a landmark 2003 ruling, the justices suggested that punitive damages should be capped at nine times the amount of actual damages.

DOJ_NMG_0090098

After Oregon's highest court affirmed the jury verdict against Philip Morris, the U.S. Supreme Court asked lawyers for the company and Mrs. Williams to address two questions. One was whether Philip Morris' "reprehensible" conduct overrode the requirement that punitive damages bear a reasonable relation to actual damages. The other was whether the Constitution allows a jury in a case brought by one individual to punish the defendant for the effects of its conduct on others.

Both questions seem like no-brainers in light of past decisions about the need for punitive damages to bear a reasonable relationship to proven harm. Yet during oral arguments Tuesday, several justices seemed to suggest that ambiguities in the record — such as whether the Oregon Supreme Court had concluded that punitive damages could be based on harm to non-parties — might require returning the case to lower courts.

Punting the case would be a terrible idea. As this lawsuit demonstrates, many lower courts are uncomfortable with the Supreme Court's efforts to curb outlandish punitive-damage awards. An inconclusive ruling would embolden those courts in their resistance. It also would encourage speculation that recent changes in the high court's membership have undermined its punitive-damage precedents. Two of the six justices in the majority in the 2003 ruling, the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Sandra Day O'Connor, are no longer on the court.

Huge awards in individual lawsuits — as opposed to sensible legislation — are not the best way to curb smoking, obesity, gun violence and other threats to public health. The Supreme Court should see through the smoke screen of this "hard" case and say that.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Poll Assignment Calls Mislead (BSUN)

By Melissa Harris, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, November 2, 2006

Workers falsely told of changes in Election Day posts; FBI notified

With Baltimore scrambling to make sure next week's voting goes smoothly, city elections officials expressed concern Wednesday at reports that a rogue caller was contacting poll workers and changing their Election Day assignments -- raising the prospect that some precincts might not have the staffing they need.

State elections chief Linda H. Lamone contacted the FBI Wednesday after Baltimore officials reported that someone called at least 10 poll workers and falsely told them that their precinct assignments had been switched.

Baltimore Board of Elections Chairman Armstead B. Crawley Jones Sr. said that poll workers are receiving legitimate calls this week from employees at the University of Baltimore's Schaefer Center, reminding election judges where to go and what time to arrive.

But the assignments have not been shuffled, Jones said. Such changes might be needed to fill vacancies but would not be made until early next week, he said.

The mysterious calls were being made as Baltimore elections officials hurried to make final preparations for Tuesday, when they hope to avoid a repeat of the no-show judge problem that the Sept. 12 primary suffered. Many precincts did not open on time, and a judge ordered polls to remain open an extra hour.

Overall, the city has trained enough volunteers -- 2,206 as of Wednesday for 2,100 spots -- but not enough of those are chief judges, who must attend a class to teach them how to supervise precincts.

This week, state auditors reported that Baltimore had not filled 250 of its 580 chief judge slots.

Helen Jankowiak, a Highlandtown Democrat who has been a chief judge for "longer than she can count," said that she could not return for the general election because she had no way of getting to the required refresher training course. She does not drive.

Lamone required local election boards to retrain every chief judge in the state after some jurisdictions experienced problems during the primary that resulted in late-opening precincts, slow results and a heavy reliance on paper ballots.

Election officials determined that all of the judges who reported the phone call attended the same training class of about 20 people.

"We don't want this to start spreading to other classes," said Jones, the interim chief.

The rogue calls added a new element of uncertainty to a tense election. Voters have requested more than 175,000 absentee ballots after calls from both political parties to use the paper alternative rather than risk equipment malfunction.

Federal prosecutors and the FBI have established an election fraud initiative in Maryland, as they do every two years, and warned Wednesday that fraud is often subtle.

DOJ_NMG_0090099

"It is a federal crime to seek out elderly or illiterate voters for the purpose of obtaining control of their ballots," according to a press release from U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein. "In addition, every voter has the right to mark his or her ballot in private."

About 10 election judges have reported that a female caller, who gave her name as either "Miss Brown" or "Marcia," called them Wednesday morning with a new precinct assignment, said Jones, the acting city elections chief.

In some cases, judges reported the call to city officials simply to complain about the switch. Two of the 10 judges reported that a phone number appeared on caller ID, but when that number was later dialed, a message said that the number was not in service, Jones said. Officials with the Schaefer Center were checking to make sure the calls were not coming from there.

In response to concerns about fraud generated by Wednesday's phone calls, interim elections director Cornelius L. Jones clamped down on election judges' personal information.

For instance, the Baltimore City Council has requested rosters of election judges, technicians and facility managers -- a request election officials said they would deny Wednesday.

Poll workers in the affected class also will receive a letter in the mail, confirming their assignments.

"It is extremely unfortunate that someone has resorted to cowardly and sneaky tactics to disrupt the election," said Raquel Guillory, a spokeswoman for Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley.

Armstead Jones, said that he is concerned because, at some point, the city likely will have to move poll workers and it will be difficult for judges to discern whether the switch is real.

He said that election officials would use e-mail addresses, cell phone numbers and a combination of methods to convey the information, including, if necessary, doing so in-person Tuesday morning.

The moves would likely be needed to fill chief judge vacancies.

Election supervisor Abigail Goldman said that the number of unfilled spots in Baltimore is shrinking every day but that she did not know exactly where the city stood and would not have a final count until training sessions conclude Sunday.

State law requires two chief judges per precinct, one Republican and one Democrat.

If there are still holes, Goldman said that she would "ask someone in that polling place to take the responsibility and become a chief judge" and that historically "people do step up to the plate."

Megan Shook, a chief Republican judge at Baltimore's Western High School, said that the system has improved since the primary.

"This time I got a phone call confirming when and where to report for duty," she said. "I've been paid for the primary, and I've already voted my absentee ballot. So I'm all set."

melissa.harris@baltsun.com

U.S. Attorney's Office: We're Ready To Investigate Election Fraud (BALTBIZ)

Baltimore Business Journal, November 2, 2006

In a preemptive move that underscores the highly partisan and tightly contested races for public office that will be decided next week, the Maryland U.S. Attorney's office said Wednesday that federal prosecutors and FBI agents are prepared to review and investigate allegations of election fraud.

A federal task force has been formed to look into any allegations of ballot forgery or theft, voter intimidation, campaign finance violations and corruption, among other federal election crimes, Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein said in a statement.

The task force has consulted with Maryland Elections Administrator Linda H. Lamone, Attorney General J. Joseph Curran and Special Prosecutor Robert A. Rohrbaugh on how it will handle fraud or voting rights violations, and will have a team of federal prosecutors and FBI agents at the ready while polls are open Nov. 7.

"Our goal is to prevent election fraud and preserve public confidence in the integrity of the democratic process," Rosenstein said in a statement. "Fair elections are the foundation of American government. Because elections involve high stakes and strong emotions, allegations of wrongdoing frequently arise. We will review all allegations in a nonpartisan manner and pursue any evidence that warrants criminal prosecution."

Such a move isn't unprecedented; the U.S. Department of Justice has long mobilized its resources in election years to quell electoral corruption, said Marcy Murphy, public affairs specialist for the U.S. Attorney's Office.

But Murphy also conceded "a lot of people are talking" about voter fraud in Maryland, and Rosenstein and his top prosecutors want to get the word out: We're ready to investigate wrongdoing.

Gov. Robert Ehrlich, locked in a tight and increasingly nasty race with Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, has called for voters to avoid the polls and vote with absentee ballots after human errors caused delays in Baltimore City and Montgomery County precincts during the Sept. 12 primary. Democrats have criticized Ehrlich's push as an attempt to depress turnout.

Controversy has also swirled around the use of electronic voting machines and their accuracy.

"I don't believe it's in response [to allegations already surfacing], but I think they are trying to alleviate the concerns about the election," Murphy said.

More Poll Workers Recruited, But Training Proves Daunting (WP)

By Christian Davenport

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

He had heard the horror stories about the voter check-in machines crashing during Maryland's September primary. And he knew about the doomsday fears of hackers hijacking an election.

But Samuel Goodman's main concern during a training session last week for prospective election judges in Montgomery County was something far more simple: how to turn on the machines.

In the aftermath of glitches that marred primaries in Maryland and other states, a lot of attention has focused on electronic voting systems -- why they malfunctioned and how susceptible they are to attack. But the pillars of Election Day are the legions of judges, the human safeguards in a process that has become more complicated as voting has grown more automated and layered with regulations.

The judges, often known as poll workers, have been recruited en masse locally and across the country leading up to the general election Tuesday. Prince George's and Montgomery counties, for example, will have 300 more than in the September primary.

Goodman is part of the wave of hastily recruited Montgomery trainees, and at 73 he fits what elections officials say is the age profile of the average poll worker nationwide. Most are well into their retirement years, and the technology changes can be daunting for some of those who didn't grow up using computers. That is why some states are looking to recruit college, and even high school, students to work the polls.

Goodman, a former NBC television news producer who lives near Rockville, said he found the jargon of the training session offered by the county Board of Elections incomprehensible and the technology overwhelming. It wasn't long before his eagerness hardened to frustration as he realized the job of check-in judge was going to be a lot harder than he thought.

He's no computer whiz, but given a bit more time he could manage, he said. In a single three-hour class, "there was no way to absorb all that," he said.

For the most part, poll workers are ordinary people who work long hours for little pay and perform admirably under trying conditions. Since the 2000 presidential election debacle, several states, including Maryland, have replaced paper ballot voting with electronic systems, and poll workers have had to relearn their jobs.

Some states have new rules to learn about checking photo identification at the polls and offering provisional ballots.

"We've made more election reform in the last six years in this country than we had in the 230 before it," said Paul S. DeGregorio, chairman of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission, which was created in 2002 to help elections run smoothly. "When you have poll workers who have been used to one system for 20, 30, 40 years, teaching them a new system can take a couple of elections for them to get used to."

Across Maryland, officials launched an aggressive campaign to recruit judges after the troubled fall primary, saying they needed more people to help with the general election. The judges are hired temporarily and paid $150 or more to work at precincts on Election Day after several hours of training.

State officials have called for additional training, but some local elections administrators say the sessions aren't nearly long enough.

"I think we should do a lot more," said Robert J. Antonetti Sr., the Prince George's interim elections administrator. He added that many of the judges find the new technology "mind-boggling." The county has held training sessions almost nightly and twice on Saturdays, he said.

Virginia did not experience any problems on the level of Maryland's during its primary, but it has also worked to recruit more judges in anticipation of an unusually high turnout for a midterm election. Helping the recruitment was a grant received by the University of Virginia, which went toward training 80 students from U-Va. and Piedmont College to be poll workers.

Jean Jensen, secretary of the Virginia Board of Elections, said recruiting efforts also were greatly aided by a new state law that prevents employers from penalizing workers who want to serve as elections judges, by, for example, forcing them to use a personal day.

Virginia uses touch-screen machines in 105 of its 135 cities and counties, with the rest using optical-scan machines. The touch-screen machines, which have been the focus of concerns in Maryland and elsewhere, have been operated in at least one previous election in each jurisdiction that is using them, Jensen said.

In Maryland, training sessions for Montgomery's judges have been held six days a week and will continue through Monday afternoon, the day before the election, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0090101

Montgomery is more familiar with electronic voting than most Maryland jurisdictions because it was introduced to the technology in 2002 with Prince George's and two other counties.

Still, the training session last week revealed how difficult it is for some prospective judges to master such a large amount of material in a short time. The trainees struggled with a new vocabulary: voter access cards, USB port, local area network, GEMS server. After the trainer said using the electronic poll book -- the machine that repeatedly faltered during the primary -- was a lot like using a PDA, Goodman wondered what a PDA is. It's a personal digital assistant, such as a BlackBerry or PalmPilot, he was told.

Later, when the instructor, Belinda Lee, asked the class to plug in the ethernet line, some stared blankly at the tangle of wires in front of them until she told them it was the one that looks like a telephone cord.

"Oy vey!" an exasperated Goodman blurted out.

During a break, trainee Joseph Burke, 80, of Chevy Chase thumbed through the thick three-ring binder he will have to become familiar with before Tuesday.

"That's a lot of stuff they threw at us," he said. "It's going to take some more studying."

Anthony DiLullo, 67, of Bethesda was comforted only by the fact that another check-in judge would be working the polls with him Election Day. "I hope the other person knows more than I do," he said.

Some fear that the changes in the way elections are run might be driving longtime poll workers away.

"It's a nationwide issue, and particularly when you transition to new equipment you see that some of your traditional poll workers decide it's time to retire," said DeGregorio, of the Election Assistance Commission. "So it puts the election officials in a bind in trying to fill the polls."

Although most poll workers are retirees who don't have to sacrifice a day of work to work the polls, states across the country are reaching out to younger generations, who have grown up using computers.

In Chicago, 754 high school students have been recruited to work the polls. Those younger than 18 are allowed to work as judges under a state law designed to involve younger people in the voting process, according to a news release. The city has also trained 2,000 college students to work as technicians at every polling place to prevent the kinds of problems that affected the city's primary this March.

In Ohio, Cuyahoga County has turned poll worker training over to the local community college, which has extended sessions by an hour and limited the class sizes. People must pass a written exam before they can serve as poll workers on Election Day.

Staff writers Zachary A. Goldfarb, Rosalind S. Helderman and Alec MacGillis contributed to this report.

Md. Democrats Say GOP Plans To Block Voters (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

A recently distributed guide for Republican poll watchers in Maryland spells out how to aggressively challenge the credentials of voters and urges these volunteers to tell election judges they could face jail time if a challenge is ignored.

Democrats said yesterday they consider the handbook, obtained by The Washington Post, evidence of a Republican effort to block people from voting Tuesday.

"The tenor of the material is that they are asking folks, if not directing them, to challenge voters," said Bruce L. Marcus, an attorney for the state Democratic Party. "It's really tantamount to a suppression effort."

Advocacy groups including the National Campaign for Fair Elections, Common Cause and the NAACP, as well as a George Washington University professor who is an expert on voter suppression, agreed with that assessment.

Barbara Burt of Common Cause said the technique, last seen in Ohio in the 2004 presidential election, is an "insidious voter intimidation tactic."

Republicans rebutted that charge, saying they merely are guarding against fraud. "I don't think that's borderline suppression," said state Republican Party Chairman John Kane. "It's making sure that people who have earned the right to vote are voting. We've had people die in wars to protect those rights."

No one disputes the legality of having poll watchers set up folding chairs and monitor the election on behalf of their party. Typically, though, poll watchers are present to help ensure that their party's supporters get to vote, not the other way around.

Democrats, for instance, have distributed advice to their poll watchers to "make sure that voters are not being turned away."

"The key is the perspective each party brings to the process," Marcus said. "Our philosophy is, if we have a qualified voter, we're going to turn things inside out and upside down to get them to be able to vote."

DOJ_NMG_0090102

The GOP poll-watcher program, outlined in a 13-page document, states: "Your most important duty as a poll worker is to challenge people who present themselves to vote but who are not authorized to vote."

It cautions, "Undoubtedly, the challenge process will be awkward and may cause consternation on the part of the challenged voter as well as the judges." It advises, "If there is cause to make a challenge, you should not hesitate to do so merely because it upsets the challenged voter or the election judges."

It adds, "If the election judge should try to ignore your challenge, point out that they would be committing a criminal offense punishable by not less than 30 days in jail."

Jonah H. Goldman, director of the National Campaign for Fair Elections, said the program "raises serious concerns."

"When you have a political party telling people their Number 1 responsibility is to challenge voters, our ears certainly perk up," Goldman said. "This could either be intended to challenge voters in a discriminatory way or in a disruptive way. A lot of times, they just try to cause chaos and long lines."

The manual provides a range of scenarios in which the volunteer should phone complaints to the party's legal headquarters or fill out "incident reports." The scenarios include voters who can't readily supply their full name, address or date of birth -- or who are assisted by election judges.

"People raising questions about the poll-watcher program may be looking at it from the wrong perspective," said Dirk Haire, the legal counsel for the state GOP. "I wonder if they are concerned that efforts we take could uncover fraud."

Democratic National Committee counsel Joseph E. Sandler said he believes one goal is to create a record for the GOP to use to challenge a close election's outcome in court.

Kane disputed this: "I think what we're doing is protecting ourselves. The Democrats are going to have 500 roving lawyers out there looking for every possible legal challenge."

Sandler said the legal team organized by his party will "be there to help deter the Republicans from effectively carrying this out. So people's votes are safe and secure."

The poll-watcher programs also underscore how tense both parties are about turnout -- particularly among black voters -- in the final days of the contests for Maryland governor and a U.S. Senate seat.

Various polls have shown that the outcome changes dramatically depending on how many black voters cast ballots.

A recent Washington Post poll that measured black turnout at 25 percent showed Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D) with a lead of 10 percentage points over Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R). A poll published yesterday by the Baltimore Sun that assumed black turnout at 19 percent showed the race as a statistical dead heat.

Spencer A. Overton, the GWU professor, said a program designed to encourage Election Day challenges has the potential to disenfranchise black voters. "Parties target particular communities, and they don't apply the rules uniformly to all voters in all areas," Overton said.

Kane, however, said the program is in no way intended to bar black voters. Ehrlich said he would not tolerate such an effort, adding that his plan has been to woo black voters, not turn them away. "I think our message has really struck a chord."

False Voter Registrations Allegedly Submitted (KCS)

By Dave Helling

The Kansas City Star, November 2, 2006

A federal grand jury handed up indictments Wednesday against four people for allegedly submitting false voter registrations to the Kansas City election board.

The indictments — against Kwaim A. Stenson; Dale D. Franklin; Stephanie L. Davis, also known as Latisha Reed; and Brian Gardner — include two felony counts against each, the U.S. attorney's office said.

All four defendants worked this year as voter registration recruiters for the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, known as ACORN. They could not be reached for comment.

ACORN officials said they no longer work for the group. And, they emphasized, ACORN turned in the names of three of the defendants to authorities last month after learning of the problem.

"I think that our system is working because we caught these people," Andrew Gins-berg, head organizer for Kansas City ACORN, said in an interview. "Sometimes people cheat, whether they make eight dollars an hour or eight million an hour."

Each charge of "knowingly and willingly" filing the false information carries a potential penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

"Those who commit fraud in the electoral process dilute the votes of their fellow citizens," U.S. Attorney Bradley Schlozman said in a statement.

The statement added: "This national investigation is very much ongoing."

Claudie Harris, board president for Kansas City ACORN, said the indictments do not taint the 35,000 other voter registrations submitted by ACORN in Kansas City this year. "I think we're doing a great job," she said.

Kansas City's Republican election director, Ray James, said the indictments could help maintain public trust in the election process.

"I hate for anyone to be prosecuted and suffer," James said. "But I've long been concerned about the rights of the general public to a fair election."

James and his Democratic counterpart, Sharon Turner Buie, have said that as many as 15,000 recently submitted voter registrations could be "questionable" — which they define as duplicates, unreadable applications, or containing information that doesn't match other existing records.

Last week the board chairwoman, Melodie Powell, said the board had turned over the investigation of the questionable cards to local and federal authorities.

ACORN has said that some of its applications may have contained honest mistakes. But it also says some of the problems may be political.

"I think if we had registered 35,000 Republicans, none of this would have been in the news," Ginsberg said.

Republicans were quick to respond. "This illegal assault on our election system should concern every voter in the state," party spokesman Paul Sloca said in a statement.

Democratic party spokesman Jack Cardetti said, "We absolutely support the prosecution of anyone who turns in fraudulent registration cards."

The Republican election director in St. Louis has criticized ACORN's voter registration process in that city. Its board sent letters to 5,000 voters asking them to re-verify their registrations, an action some critics called illegal.

Four ACORN Workers Indicted In Kansas City (SLPD)

By Jo Mannies

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, November 2, 2006

According to the Kansas City Star, the U.S. attorney's office over there has just announced it has indicted four workers with ACORN for "providing false information to the Kansas City Election Board, and…filing a false voter application with the board."

Each offense carries a penalty of up to five years in prison and a fine of $250,000; anyone found guilty also loses their right to vote.

ACORN, which stands for the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, has come under fire in a number of states — and the city of St. Louis — over allegedly fraudulent voter registrations.

ACORN national spokesman Kevin Whelan said the group actually had been responsible for three of the indictments. "We caught them; we turned them in," he said. "We're pleased that the FBI was able to bring these indictments and we provided them with information that helped with the investigation."

ACORN provided a copy of the letter it had sent to Kansas City authorities on Oct. 11.

ACORN officials have maintained that they welcome any arrests of workers found to have committed fraud, but that they don't want such problems to take away from the legitimate registrations honest workers have turned in.

ACORN sent out a release earlier Wednesday, saying that its workers in St. Louis plan on "knocking on 150,000 doors — three times on Election Day — to get out the vote!"

Meanwhile, the U.S. Attorney's office here Catherine Hanaway, U.S. attorney for Missouri's Eastern District, said Wednesday that her office has set up a hotline for people reporting possible election fraud or voter discrimination in connection with Tuesday's election. The number is 314-539-7733.

Assistant U.S. Attorney John Bodenhausen, an assistant U.S. attorney, will coordinate the office's efforts, which are part of the Justice Department's nationwide Election Day Program.

Complaints about ballot access problems or discrimination can also be made directly to the Civil Rights Division's Voting Section in Washington at 1-800-253-3931 or 202-307-2767.

Conference Looks At Human Trafficking Along Border (EPTIMES)

By Darren Meritz, El Paso Times

El Paso Times, November 2, 2006

Far West Texas and Southern New Mexico's proximity to the U.S.-Mexico border creates a unique environment in which immigrant-smuggling operations can easily change into abusive, exploitative human trafficking, experts said Wednesday at an El Paso conference.

DOJ_NMG_0090104

Victims of human trafficking -- who often are manipulated into forced labor, prostitution, sex tourism and pornography -- are typically reluctant to come forward for fear of deportation, recriminations from their trafficker or insecurity about admitting they are victims, experts said.

"The difficult aspect of this is actually identifying the victims," said Paul Piñon, coordinator of the El Paso Human Trafficking Task Force and an organizer of the two-day conference titled "Human Trafficking: Working Together to End Modern-Day Slavery." The conference continues today.

About 300 representatives of law enforcement agencies and social service organizations, such as the Salvation Army and the Diocesan Migrant and Refugee Services, attended the third annual conference.

Piñon detailed several cases in the El Paso area that illustrated crimes possibly related to human trafficking and indicative of the close association of human trafficking and immigrant smuggling.

In one case, police charged two men in October 2005 with unlawful transport for holding an 18-year-old man and an 18-year-old pregnant woman against their will after they had crossed the border into the United States near Fabens.

In another case, police in February this year recovered a 15-year-old Salvadoran girl during an undercover sting operation at the Downtown Greyhound bus station. Her alleged kidnapper tried to hold her in exchange for a $5,500 ransom, Piñon said.

Though local figures were unavailable, officials at the conference Wednesday conference speculated that trafficking in the region is rising and cited a Department of State estimate that about 18,000 people are trafficked annually in the United States. The FBI estimates that human trafficking generates about $9 billion in profit each year.

"During the past few years, we have seen an increase in trafficking in this area, but they're difficult to investigate because victims don't want to cooperate," said Michelle Arriaga, a graduate student who presented a report on local efforts to curb the crime. "If they're in constant fear of being deported, it's very difficult for them to be willing to participate or discuss what's happened to them."

Jennifer Romero, a victim specialist for the FBI in El Paso, said that victims often experience debilitating psychological abuse at the hands of the trafficker, who lures them with the promise of good jobs and assistance navigating through the U.S. immigration process, she said.

Human traffickers use coercion and control, sometimes depriving victims of basic necessities and using long-term manipulation to instill enough fear and doubt to prevent them from reporting to authorities, she said. Victims then can be forced into jobs that are illicit and illegal, such as prostitution and sex tourism.

"Screw with the mind, and the body will follow," she said.

Darren Meritz may be reached at dmeritz@elpasotimes.com; 546-6127.

Annexation Excludes Vote (BSH)

By Ryan Lafontaine

Biloxi Sun Herald, November 2, 2006

WAVELAND - Newly annexed residents here will not have a say in Tuesday's party primaries for mayor and aldermen, according to a letter Wednesday from the Justice Department.

However, voters who register to vote before 5 p.m. on Monday will be allowed to vote for mayor and aldermen in the Dec. 5 general election.

The city had been awaiting an official decision from the federal government for several weeks on whether nearly 1,000 residents would be included in next week's vote.

The residents officially became Waveland citizens in July when the city settled an annexation dispute with neighboring Bay St. Louis in a deal that gave Waveland a stretch of land along the western right of way of Mississippi 603.

According to federal legislation adopted in the 1960s, the Justice Department must review changes in ballot procedures, voting districts and other electoral rules in several states - mostly in the South - to ensure that minorities maintain influence in elections.

In the settlement, Bay St. Louis took a massive slice of land between the highway and the Jourdan River, stretching north to Interstate 10.

Many residents on both sides of the highway were anti-annexation, and some believe Waveland purposely delayed a federal decision to eliminate the disgruntled new voters from this year's election.

Earlier this year, Waveland attorney Zach Butterworth said the city was hoping to have a decision at least 30 days before the party primaries, which would have given the new residents time to become registered voters.

On Wednesday, Butterworth dismissed claims of malice and said federal approval simply took longer than the city first thought.

DOJ_NMG_0090105

GOP mayoral candidate Craig Cameron, who is looking to make history by becoming the city's first black mayor and just the second Republican ever to hold the city's top office, said a chunk of new votes made available days before the election could muddy the campaign for any candidate.

"I have no way of knowing whether anything was done to purposely exclude them," Cameron said. "Having new voters at the last minute could complicate things for all the candidates, but I am very sympathetic to (the new residents') concerns."

Mayor Tommy Longo said the court denied a request last year from Waveland, asking to postpone an annexation decision until the two cities could recover from Hurricane Katrina.

"There wasn't much we could do," Longo said. "The annexed land was handed to us, and we asked to get a decision on the new voters as quickly as we could, but we were at the mercy of the federal government."

Activist Calls For Cop Probe In DeKalb Rally Set For Friday Over 31 Shootings Since 2001 (AJC)

By David Simpson, Mae Gentry, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 2, 2006

A DeKalb County civil rights activist Wednesday called for an outside investigation of a string of shootings by police, and the sister of a slain suspect plans to organize a protest this week to demand that the department do a better job of training its officers.

"Bring in the FBI, the GBI and the Justice Department to investigate all of the shootings," said John Evans, former president of the DeKalb County chapter of the NAACP. "And then set up a civilian review board [to review future cases]."

An article in Wednesday's Atlanta Journal-Constitution prompted the call for the outside investigation, said Evans, who now heads up a local civil rights group based in Lithonia known as Operation LEAD.

The AJC examined internal reports of 31 shootings from 2001 to 2005 and found that officers had a pattern of violating department policy, such as forcing confrontations with armed suspects without backup, shooting into moving cars and neglecting safety rules for handling suspects once they were in custody.

Most of the officers involved were not disciplined, the newspaper found, and the department did not address the pattern of violations in its training programs.

Iffat Muhammad, whose brother was fatally shot by a DeKalb officer in August, said the newspaper's report confirmed her concerns about the recent string of shootings.

Her brother was shot by an officer checking on a trespassing complaint. He attacked the officer and tried to get her gun, police said.

"Basically, we were told this doesn't happen in DeKalb County," said Muhammad, the president of the DeKalb County chapter of the New Order Human Rights Organization. "Yes, it does, from 2001 to 2005 and into 2006."

Nick Marinelli, the county's interim police chief, and DeKalb Chief Executive Officer Vernon Jones did not respond to messages seeking comment on Evans' and Muhammad's statements, which were made late Wednesday afternoon.

The GBI can only enter a shooting case at the request of the law enforcement agency, said GBI spokesman John Bankhead. An FBI spokesman declined to comment.

In the meantime, the department is putting together a process to detect patterns of problems, Marinelli said earlier.

The department also is making changes to its training after a consultant found it hadn't paid enough attention to "de-escalation" of confrontations, Marinelli said.

So far this year, DeKalb County police officers have shot and killed 11 suspects — the highest number in metro Atlanta. One officer also has been killed.

The department hasn't finished its investigations of those cases, but Marinelli has said he is expediting the process and plans to release his findings soon.

In its examination of the 31 shootings, the AJC found that officers had violated department policy in nine of them. Two officers were fired, one was suspended and another was reprimanded.

In light of the findings, community leaders called on the department to place a greater emphasis on training.

"The message is train them properly, follow procedures," said Muhammad, whose group is planning a protest outside police headquarters at 2 p.m. Friday.

"We're not saying that the outcomes would be different, but who knows? They may have been," she said.

The newspaper's article comes at a time when the county is conducting a search for a new police chief. Marinelli is among the candidates being considered by Jones.

Civil rights activist Gerald Rose, the founder and CEO of the New Order organization, said Wednesday he hopes Jones "looks at the true facts" about the shootings and ensures that the next chief takes the issue seriously.

DOJ_NMG_0090106

Kristie Swink, a spokeswoman for Jones, said, "The next DeKalb County police chief will ensure that all officers are properly trained and well-equipped in order to protect the safety of every resident in DeKalb County."

In south DeKalb, constituents have been concerned about the shootings, said County Commissioner Lee May, who wants to hear more about Marinelli's training plans.

"That is definitely something that I'm going to ask to see," May said.

Staff writer Ty Tagami contributed to this article.

US State Attorney General Gets Patient Records From Abortion Clinics After 2-year Effort (FINDLAW/AP)

By John Hanna, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 2, 2006

(AP) - TOPEKA, Kansas-The state attorney general said that his office has received the records of 90 patients from two abortion clinics and is reviewing them for possible crimes, the culmination of an effort that prompted concerns over patient privacy.

Attorney General Phill Kline, one of the United States' foremost abortion opponents, said Tuesday the targets of his investigation are rapists, sex offenders with child victims - and doctors involved in abortions. Those doctors could include physicians performing abortions, providing a second opinion for late-term abortions or failing to report abuse of a child.

The clinics had argued that giving the attorney general access to the records would invade patients' privacy.

Shawnee County District Judge Richard Anderson subpoenaed the records at Kline's request in September 2004, concluding there was probable cause to believe they contained evidence of crimes.

While Anderson didn't give Kline unfettered access to the records, the state Supreme Court imposed new guidelines for having them reviewed and edited before they were given to the district court. Under that process, neither Kline nor the judge saw the names of the patients.

Kline's office received redacted copies of the records a week ago.

His disclosure came a week before the Nov. 7 general election, with Kline, a Republican, in a tight race with Johnson County prosecutor Paul Morrison, a Democrat. Morrison has made Kline's pursuit of the records a key issue in his campaign, even suggesting the efforts are an abuse of power.

Because the records are redacted, individual patients cannot be identified, Kline said. He could seek the names of any victims of child rape to build cases against the perpetrators, he said.

In addition to child rape, possible crimes include potentially illegal late-term abortions, incest, forcible rape and making a "false writing," he said.

The records came from a clinic in Overland Park, Kansas, and a clinic in Wichita, Kansas, operated by Dr. George Tiller.

Pedro Irigonegaray, an attorney for the clinic, said that the records don't show any wrongdoing by the clinics and that if the clinics had not fought back, the attorney general would have seen unedited files.

"Nothing whatsoever in those records supports the proposition that our clients have violated the law," Irigonegaray said.

Outside Money Fuels Battle On Abortion (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

The fierce battle over abortion in South Dakota has cost some $4 million, much of that from places other than South Dakota.

That is what the two largest political groups campaigning on the issue say they have collected in the months leading up to next week, when voters there will decide whether to uphold a ban on nearly all abortions in what would become the most restrictive such law passed in the nation in at least 14 years.

Vote Yes for Life, a group that has pressed for approval of the law, said on Wednesday that it had received $2.15 million in cash, as well as contributions of $39,000 in goods and services. The South Dakota Campaign for Healthy Families, which has urged voters to reject the provision legislators adopted in February and the governor signed in March, said it had collected $1.8 million since late June, as well as in-kind contributions of less than $50,000.

All along, each side had said its efforts were being driven by South Dakota natives, but had complained that the other side was being pressed on and heavily financed by well organized national organizations from Washington and elsewhere.

As a deadline for filing financial data to state officials arrived this week, both sides issued news releases that show they have received money from outside South Dakota.

DOJ_NMG_0090107

The South Dakota Campaign for Healthy Families said that of the $1.8 million, less than $160,000 — about 9 percent — came from South Dakota; the campaign got 738 contributions from state residents, it said. The rest — more than 10,000 donations totaling more than $1.6 million — came from elsewhere. Vote Yes For Life, meanwhile, said that 65 percent of its money came from inside the state.

Military Pressed Over Expressions Of Faith (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

The U.S. military is being buffeted by dueling legal claims over religion, with one set of plaintiffs contending that the Pentagon is suppressing evangelical Christianity and another set arguing just the opposite -- that the brass gives the most aggressive evangelicals free rein to proselytize in uniform.

Although Congress intervened this fall, directing the Air Force and Navy to rescind controversial new policies on religion, chaplains on both sides of the issue said the congressional action only muddied the waters.

"Congress took action, but who won? I'm not sure. The only thing I can safely predict is, get ready for new controversies over the place of evangelism in the armed forces," said retired Navy Capt. Gary R. Pollitt, executive director of the Military Chaplains Association, a private, nonprofit group representing chaplains in all the services.

In the latest lawsuit, an evangelical Christian chaplain is charging the Navy with violating his First Amendment rights by forbidding him to pray "in the name of Jesus" at public ceremonies.

Chaplain Gordon J. Klingenschmitt filed the lawsuit Oct. 25 in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia with assistance from the Rutherford Institute, a Charlottesville-based public interest law firm that sued the Pentagon over its policy of requiring U.S. servicewomen stationed in Saudi Arabia to wear a Muslim head covering.

Klingenschmitt's suit alleges that the Navy has effectively established a "civic religion" and is "suppressing [his] Christian faith" by requiring him to offer nonsectarian prayers when speaking to diverse groups of sailors.

He also alleges that his objections to the Navy policy are the real reason that his commanders court-martialed him in September and are now in the process of kicking him out of the Navy. Klingenschmitt was found guilty of disobeying an order by wearing his uniform at a political protest in front of the White House.

"Can the Navy censor a chaplain's prayers, yes or no? That's what my suit is asking," Klingenschmitt said yesterday.

A spokesman for the Navy, Lt. j.g. Karl Lettow, said it does not comment on pending litigation. Navy officials have said that chaplains are free to pray however they wish in voluntary worship services but that the Navy encourages them to "respect the diversity of their audience" when addressing mandatory gatherings.

Meanwhile, a former White House counsel whose lawsuit against the Air Force was dismissed last week said he intends to refile a broader suit, or possibly multiple suits, accusing all the armed services of allowing evangelical Christians to pressure members of other faiths.

U.S. District Judge James A. Parker dismissed the initial suit by Michael L. "Mikey" Weinstein because it was based on alleged incidents of religious bias at the Air Force Academy, but neither Weinstein nor any of his five co-plaintiffs claimed to have suffered from those incidents.

Weinstein, who spent 10 years as an Air Force lawyer and worked in the Reagan White House, said he is now picking the best cases from "a veritable cornucopia of new plaintiffs and accusations."

Some evangelical groups and individuals "believe they have an illimitable right to push their biblical worldview in the military, 24 hours a day, seven days a week, up and down the chain of command," Weinstein said. "Our view is that you certainly have that right at certain times and places that are well established by the U.S. Constitution and our case law. . . . But you can't do it on the job when you're wearing the uniform during the workday."

Reports of aggressive evangelism at the Air Force Academy led the service to issue interim guidelines last year urging commanders to be "sensitive" about sharing their faith and called for a minute of silence or at most a "brief, non-sectarian" prayer at mandatory gatherings.

Evangelical groups complained about the Air Force guidelines and a similar Navy instruction, and House Republicans proposed legislation to guarantee that chaplains can always pray as they wish. In a compromise, that wording was dropped from a defense authorization bill, but a legislative report urged both the Air Force and the Navy to rescind their policies. Congress is expected to hold hearings on the issue next year.

Marriage Limits Set To Face Stiff Fight In 3 States (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090108

Voters in eight states are expected Tuesday to pass constitutional amendments that define marriage as the union of one man and one woman. But in at least three states, the margin of victory -- if there is one -- may be razor-thin.

In Arizona, a recent Northern Arizona University (NAU) poll shows Proposition 107 squeaking by, 51 percent to 42 percent, which is "way too close for comfort," said Cathi Herrod of Protect Marriage Arizona Coalition.

The Arizona amendment has attracted huge public support -- more than 300,000 people signed petitions to get it on the ballot -- and survived a court challenge. But it also has been targeted for defeat by a well-organized coalition called Arizona Together, which says the amendment will hurt both heterosexual and homosexual couples.

Several polls, including one by Arizona State University (ASU) and KAET-TV, indicate the amendment will be soundly defeated. Recent ASU polling results, which show 30 percent of voters supporting the amendment, "reaffirm that Arizona voters do not want to take away health care from families," said state Rep. Kyrsten Sinema, a leader of Arizona Together.

Mrs. Herrod said NAU used the ballot language in its poll and is a more accurate reflection of voter intent. But she worries that the opponents' vigorous campaign and voter complacency will pose problems. "People think these marriage amendments pass easily. That's not true," she said.

In Wisconsin and South Dakota, polls have shown marriage amendments headed for defeat. Fair Wisconsin, which opposes the amendment, has promised to run "one of the biggest campaigns in the state in 2006." In South Dakota, a poll released in August showed the amendment losing, 49 percent to 41 percent, and South Dakotans Against Discrimination has initiated a radio and print campaign to educate voters about this "poorly worded" and "extreme" amendment, said spokesman Jon Hoadley.

But traditional-values groups in those states say they have no intention of losing. "There is just a groundswell of movement in support of this amendment," said Julaine Appling of Vote Yes for Marriage in Madison, Wis., noting that recent polls have consistently put them ahead by 51 percent to 53 percent.

Rob Regier of the South Dakota Family Policy Council said he can't explain polls showing a defeat for the marriage amendment, but he noted that at least one poll showed the amendment winning by a landslide. South Dakota voters are "still pretty conservative," he said. "I don't see South Dakota being the first and only state to lose a marriage amendment."

Polls in South Carolina, Tennessee and Virginia suggest those amendments will pass. In Idaho, citizens lobbied lawmakers for more than three years to pass an amendment, and at least one poll showed a 2-to-1 margin of support, "so I think it will pass," said Marriage Protection Alliance leader Julie Lynde.

Colorado has two marriage-related measures that are expected to pass: A new Denver Post poll of 625 voters indicated a marriage amendment would win, 51 percent to 43 percent, as would a domestic partnership law, 47 percent to 42 percent.

Female Voters Courted In Affirmative-Action Fight (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

DETROIT -- The women are having their say in Michigan politics this year. With Democrats trying to reelect Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm and Sen. Debbie Stabenow over their male Republican challengers, no state has a more feminist cast to its ballot.

And, in a referendum fight over affirmative action, female voters will probably decide whether Michigan becomes the third state to outlaw preferential treatment for minorities and women in education, state employment and public contracting.

Ward Connerly, the Californian who sponsored successful anti-affirmative-action initiatives in California and Washington state during the 1990s, has brought an identical measure to Michigan.

His spokeswoman here is Jennifer Gratz, who was the plaintiff in a lawsuit accusing the University of Michigan of discriminating against her for being white when it did not admit her as a student a decade ago. The Supreme Court ultimately upheld the university's right to give preference to "under-represented groups" but barred it from artificially boosting their entrance qualification scores.

After her rejection, Gratz said in an interview, she contacted Connerly and asked him to bring the fight to end racial and gender preferences to Michigan. It has turned into an expensive and bitter battle -- with women's votes the main prize in what polls suggest is a tossup election.

Trisha Stein, campaign manager for One United Michigan, the broad coalition fighting the measure to ban affirmative action, said polling shows that "if this is a campaign about gender, the proposal will not pass, but if it's a campaign about race, it will likely pass."

The opposition to Connerly looks formidable. Stein counts more than 200 organizations on her side, including major Michigan businesses, labor unions, and religious and civic groups. One United Michigan has raised and spent more than $3.3 million.

DOJ_NMG_0090109

But Connerly faced equally formidable establishment opposition in California and Washington and prevailed. In an interview, he said Michigan has presented "more obstacles than I expected," but he still predicted victory. "People see simple fairness in what we're proposing," he said.

On Friday, his supporters in Michigan reported raising $1.3 million and spending slightly more than half, with the rest in reserve. More than $1 million came from Connerly's California organization and similar groups elsewhere.

The proposed amendment to the state constitution would "ban affirmative action programs that give preferential treatment to groups or individuals based on their race, gender, color, ethnicity or national origin for public employment, education or contracting purposes."

Debbie Dingell, a General Motors executive who is co-chairman of One United Michigan, said that if the initiative passed, it would jeopardize special treatment programs for breast and cervical cancer and end an effort to attract more women into science and mathematics careers.

Gratz says such fears are exaggerated. "I have a degree in math," she said, "and colleges are eager to have more women coming into the field. This is a distraction from the real issue: discrimination on the basis of race and gender."

Church groups and civil rights organizations in Detroit are trying to mobilize the African American community in opposition to the initiative. But at a rally of female activists in a local Teamsters hall, leaders complained that it is difficult to communicate the message that a vote in favor of affirmative action requires marking the ballot "no."

One United Michigan's radio and television ads are targeted at women, with one concluding that the measure "hurts Michigan's mothers and daughters, taking away opportunities, risking their future."

Connerly's side ran ads during the summer but has delayed going back on the airwaves until the final days. A tracking poll for One United Michigan conducted by Steve Mitchell, a veteran Michigan pollster, found a sharp gender split on the proposition.

In the first few days after the ads began in mid-October, opposition among women rose from 36 percent to 49 percent, and most recently it has leveled off at 47 percent, with 35 percent opposed. Men supported the measure, 49 percent to 40 percent. Mitchell said the outcome is too close to judge, especially because there is a history of white voters fudging their answers to pollsters on racial matters.

Mitchell also noted that on ballot issues, the undecided typically break to the "no" side, but he cautioned that the racial aspect of the measure might change the pattern.

There is also a partisan split in the polling. Although GOP gubernatorial candidate Dick DeVos and other prominent Republicans have urged a "no" vote, 63 percent of Republicans in the poll said yes, while 59 percent of Democrats said no. Independents were split.

ANTITRUST:

CVS Buying Caremark For About $21.2B (AP)

By LUCAS L. JOHNSON II

AP, November 2, 2006

NASHVILLE, Tenn. - Drugstore operator CVS Corp. announced Wednesday it is buying pharmacy benefits manager Caremark Rx Inc. for about $21.2 billion in stock, creating a company that will have formidable power in negotiating lower prices with drug companies.

The deal would create a $75 billion drug distribution powerhouse that could compete more effectively for customers as Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and other retailers introduce programs selling cheap generic drugs.

"This is all about giving the consumers unparalleled access and choice ... It will help providers deliver the right drugs at the right time," CVS CEO Tom Ryan said in a conference call.

But investors sent shares of both companies lower, and some analysts raised concerns about integrating the two businesses.

CVS shares tumbled $2.32, or 7.4 percent, to close at $29.06 on the New York Stock Exchange while Caremark lost $1.06, or 2.2 percent, to finish at $48.17. Caremark shareholders will be getting CVS stock in the deal.

SunTrust Robinson Humphrey analyst David Magee wrote in a note that the deal could be seen as too much risk for CVS which is still digesting acquisitions from the past couple of years, including purchasing the Sav-On drug store chain made earlier this year. He also wrote the deal could distract CVS from growing its existing business lines.

He said the he was optimistic about the long-term implications of the deal because of the size and buying power of the new company.

DOJ_NMG_0090110

Company officials said the deal would create significant benefits for employers and health plans through more effective cost management and new programs, and for consumers through expanded choice and more personalized services.

"Combining Caremark's expertise in serving employers and health plans with CVS's expertise in serving consumers will create a powerful force for change in pharmacy services," said Edwin "Mac" Crawford, Chairman, CEO and President of Caremark, which is based in Nashville.

The merger brings together companies from two industries that have had a sometimes bitter rivalry. PBMs offer customers the option of purchasing their drugs through the mail for reduced prices. Drug stores have argued such policies cut into their revenue and compromise patient safety because it deprives them of access to a pharmacist.

The growing mail order business has been hurting drug stores' market share, said Morgan Stanley analyst Mark Wiltamuth. CVS has its own mail order subsidy and analysts said buying Caremark would bolster that portion of its business, analysts said.

The companies called the deal a "merger of equals" and under the terms, Caremark shareholders will receive 1.67 shares of Woonsocket, R.I.-based CVS for each share of Caremark. CVS shareholders will own 54.5 percent of the combined company and Caremark shareholders will own 45.5 percent.

The new company will be called CVS/Caremark Corp. and will be headquartered in Woonsocket.

The pharmacy services business will remain based in Nashville. Combined 2006 revenue for the companies are expected total about $75 billion, a joint statement said.

Caremark's Crawford will become the chairman of the combined company and Ryan will become president and chief executive of the combined company.

After the markets closed Wednesday, CVS reported its third-quarter profit rose 13 percent on higher same-store sales.

Net income grew to $280.7 million, or 33 cents per share, from $249.2 million, or 30 cents per share, a year ago.

Revenue rose 25 percent to $11.21 billion.

Analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial expected earnings per share of 32 cents on revenue of $11.24 billion.

Caremark reported a 25 percent increase in third-quarter profit on strong sales in the company's mail-order and retail businesses.

Net income grew to $288.6 million, or 67 cents per share, from $231.4 million, or 51 cents per share, a year ago.

Revenue rose 13 percent to $9.14 billion.

Analysts expected earnings per share of 63 cents on revenue of $9.23 billion.

Glenn Garmont, an analyst with First Albany Corp., said before the announcement that the deal was likely spurred in part by the fear that Wal-Mart, "will emerge as a fierce new competitor following its introduction of selected $4 generic drugs."

Wal-Mart announced last week that it is extending its $4 for a one-month supply of 314 different generic prescriptions to make the program available at 1,008 stores in 27 states.

However, Ryan and Crawford said Wal-Mart's action didn't affect their decision to merge.

"We've been working on all this for some time," Crawford said. "This didn't have anything to do with Wal-Mart."

Garmont said such a deal between Caremark and CVS "would spawn others, and we view all PBMs ... as potential take-out targets."

Still, some analysts said the deal might face antitrust concerns. Barry Barnett, a health care consultant for PricewaterhouseCoopers, said regulators might be concerned that Caremark might unfairly funnel business to CVS pharmacies at the expense of other drug stores.

Caremark buys drugs from pharmaceutical companies directly and then distributes them through its national network of about 60,000 pharmacies and seven mail-order offices. It provides services for over 2,000 corporate, insurance, managed care, government, and union health plans.

Caremark posted 2005 net income of $932.4 million on sales of $32.99 billion.

CVS is the nation's largest pharmacy chain by prescriptions filled, and is second to Walgreen Co. in total sales. It operates more than 6,200 stores in 45 states and reported 2005 net income of $1.22 billion on sales of $37.01 billion.

The Securities and Exchange Commission has been investigating whether executive stock options were backdated at Caremark, company officials have acknowledged. In September, Caremark's Crawford said the company is in "good shape" regarding the investigation and doesn't expect to have to restate earnings.

Kazaa Said To Pay $10 Million In Settlement (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

Kazaa, the file-sharing successor to Napster that record companies have been battling for years, has reached a tentative settlement in the last of three major lawsuits against it.

Under the agreement with the National Music Publishers' Association, Kazaa agreed to pay music publishers and songwriters a "substantial sum," the association said. Though it not disclose the figure, a person with knowledge of the terms of the deal said it was about $10 million.

Kazaa also agreed to continue using filtering software intended to prevent unauthorized exchange of copyrighted songs over its network.

The music and motion picture industries sued Kazaa, as well as the rival file-sharing networks Grokster and Morpheus, in 2001, claiming that they facilitated the illegal distribution of copyrighted material.

Kazaa, which is operated by Sharman Networks in Australia, settled separate lawsuits by recording artists and motion picture studios in July, agreeing to pay a total of $115 million. That left one major case from 2001 still unresolved, the one filed by the association, which represents songwriters and their publishers.

The association notified the United States District Court in Los Angeles on Monday that the two sides had reached an agreement in principle. The terms of that agreement are subject to final court approval, and also must be approved by the board of the publishers' association and the individual plaintiffs.

"The anticipated settlement represents an important victory for songwriters, music publishers and music fans alike," said David Israelite, the publishers' association president and chief executive, in a written statement today. "It will be another key milestone in the ongoing transformation of the digital music marketplace to one that will allow legal services to thrive."

A spokeswoman for Kazaa in the United States said the company had no comment on the settlement or its terms.

The settlement underscores how the tables have turned in recent years on file-sharing networks, whose days of operating freely outside the realm of copyright law appear to be ending. When Kazaa settled the two lawsuits earlier this year, it also struck licensing deals with major record labels — Universal Music Group, Sony BMG, Warner Music and the EMI Group — to distribute their copyrighted material over its network and pay them royalties. It also agreed to employ filtering technology.

Napster, the pioneering file-sharing network that became a scourge of the record industry, earlier reached a similar agreement with the music industry, but not before it was forced to shut down operations.

The record industry's success in fighting Napster led to the growth of networks like Kazaa, Grokster and Morpheus, which allowed users to do similar things. Though they hoped to escape Napster's fate by using somewhat different technology, those networks eventually ran into the same legal issues that Napster had.

Last year, in the case Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios v. Grokster Ltd., the United States Supreme Court ruled that file-sharing services could be held liable for contributing to copyright infringement. That ruling gave the record companies and motion picture studios leverage to press the file-sharing services to reach settlements.

Grokster resolved all its suits with the industry and is no longer in operation. A federal court in Los Angeles last month found that Morpheus had assisted in copyright infringement; its operator, StreamCast, is in settlement talks with the movie and music industries.

LimeWire, another service that has been sued by the record industry, continues to allow users to download songs without the industry's permission, and Grokster, Kazaa or Morpheus, has indicated no willingness to settle. Instead, LimeWire has mounted an aggressive legal defense, and last month filed a counterclaim against the record industry.

Fate Of Canadian Steelmaker To Be Decided Soon (BSUN/BLOOM)

Bloomberg News

The Baltimore Sun, November 2, 2006

Mittal Steel Co., the world's largest steel producer, said the trust holding Canadian steelmaker Dofasco Inc. will likely make a decision by the end of this month on whether to sell the business to ThyssenKrupp AG.

The Netherlands trust, created by Arcelor SA in April to try to thwart Mittal's hostile takeover bid, will likely decide whether to allow the sale by Nov. 28 to comply with an antitrust agreement with the U.S. Justice Department, Carlos Hernandez, Mittal's U.S. legal counsel, said Oct. 30.

Mittal must sell either Dofasco or one of two tin mills in Weirton, W.Va., or Sparrows Point, after the Justice Department said in May the merger between Mittal and Arcelor would lead to less competition in tin mill products in the Eastern United States. Mittal is required by the department to use its "best efforts" to try to sell Dofasco.

"We think we've done everything possible to make the sale of Dofasco," Hernandez said. "We are now awaiting on the trustees to say what they are going to do. We are fairly confident it will be before the 28th."

Luxembourg-based Arcelor agreed to buy Dofasco for $4.95 billion in January, giving it 10 percent of the North American automotive steel market. Rotterdam-based Mittal in January agreed to sell Dofasco to ThyssenKrupp if its takeover of Arcelor was successful.

DOJ_NMG_0090112

The trustees are Allan Tuttle, a lawyer at Washington-based Patton Boggs LLP, former Arcelor board member Robert Hudry and Frederic van Bladel, who headed legal affairs at Arcelor.

"It still looks very difficult for them to sell Dofasco," Credit Suisse analyst Michael Shillaker wrote in an Oct. 18 note. "The ultimate legal decision is that of the Dutch stichting [trust], and why will the stichting agree as a value proposition to sell Dofasco at a lower price than Arcelor paid for it?"

No legal impediment prevents Arcelor Mittal from selling Dofasco to ThyssenKrupp if the directors of the trust agree, Hernandez said. ThyssenKrupp AG, Germany's largest steelmaker, expects to acquire Canadian steelmaker Dofasco from Arcelor Mittal "soon," Karl-Ulrich Koehler, the president of ThyssenKrupp's steel unit, said on Sept. 29.

Orthopedics Maker Is Said To Be In Talks To Buy A U.S. Rival (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

Smith & Nephew, the British maker of orthopedic products, is in early talks to acquire an American rival, Biomet, the nation's largest manufacturer of artificial hips, knees and other orthopedic devices, for more than $9 billion, people briefed on the negotiations said yesterday.

The preliminary talks come more than six months after Biomet hired Morgan Stanley to help consider "strategic alternatives focused on enhancing shareholder value."

Other suitors, including several private equity firms, have also expressed interest in Biomet, these people said. Rivals like Zimmer Holdings; DePuy, a subsidiary of Johnson & Johnson; and the Stryker Corporation have not participated in the auction, these people said, because of potential antitrust concerns.

Speculation has been rife in recent weeks that Smith & Nephew, which is based in London, had approached Biomet, and its shares rose more than 16 percent in the last month. Biomet's stock fell 44 cents yesterday, to $37.40 a share. Smith & Nephew has long been viewed as the natural buyer for Biomet, analysts said.

Biomet, which is based in Warsaw, Ind., is expected to fetch at least $10 billion, analysts suggest, though the company still could decide against selling and call off the auction entirely.

The auction was a result, in part, of a sluggish financial performance and the abrupt and unexpected resignation of Dane A. Miller, Biomet's longtime president and chief executive, in March.

Biomet's board responded to Mr. Miller's resignation by skipping over the two operating executives under Mr. Miller and naming Daniel P. Hann, Biomet's general counsel, as the company's interim leader.

One cloud hanging over Biomet is a Department of Justice investigation that started in June over possible criminal violations of antitrust regulations in the manufacturing and sale of orthopedic implant devices among the top companies in the industry.

Tribune To Weigh Offers For Parts Of Its Holdings Decision Follows Tepid Bids For All Of Media Company; A Prod To Private Equity? By SARAH ELLISON (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

Tribune Co., the big media company whose properties include the flagship Chicago Tribune, the Los Angeles Times and the Chicago Cubs baseball team, has told prospective bidders it is prepared to consider offers to sell off parts of itself after receiving lower bids than expected for the entire company, said people familiar with the situation.

The move raises the prospect that Tribune Co., whose current market value is $8.4 billion, could become the second large U.S. newspaper chain this year to drastically remake itself under investor pressure. The changes signal tectonic shifts in newspaper ownership in an age when readership and advertising, threatened by the Internet and other new technologies, are under siege. It also marks an about-face for Tribune management, which earlier this year rebuffed calls from its biggest shareholder, the Chandler family, to consider a sale or a breakup.

For the newspaper industry, the postwar era has been dominated by giant newspaper chains like Tribune and Gannett Co. snapping up regional newspapers and creating broad, publicly traded companies generating large profits even as circulation slowly declined. But the surge in online news, a steep drop-off in younger readers and the migration of advertising to the Internet has hammered profits and stocks for many media companies, which have been slashing costs and seeking other new strategies.

A breakup of part or all of Tribune would follow the full breakup earlier this year of Knight-Ridder Inc., which sold all of its 32 newspapers -- a portfolio which included the Miami Herald and the Philadelphia Inquirer -- to McClatchy Co. It turned around and sold 12 Knight-Ridder papers, some to local business interests.

Indeed, a slew of local owners like the investor group that purchased the Philadelphia Inquirer and Daily News from Knight-Ridder could be lined up to take Wall Street's place in the industry. Among others, former General Electric Co. Chief Executive

Jack Welch has said he would be interested in buying the Boston Globe from the New York Times Co. with partners including Jack Connors, an advertising executive.

As Tribune's problems have deepened, a host of wealthy and well-connected prospective bidders have made public their desires to pick off a few of its 11 daily newspapers. Most coveted is the Los Angeles Times, for which at least three wealthy Los Angelenos have expressed interest: Entertainment mogul David Geffen, real-estate magnate Eli Broad and Ron Burkle, who made his fortune from supermarkets. The Times generates an estimated $250 million in annual earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation and amortization and could be valued at $2 billion or more.

Other groups have circled the Hartford (Conn.) Courant and Newsday on New York's Long Island.

Even while opening up the bidding, Tribune plans to continue discussions with private-equity groups that have expressed interest in the entire company, said people familiar with the matter. So far, four private-equity bidding teams have submitted nonbinding expressions of interest, putting a value on Tribune in the "low $30s," said a person familiar with the situation.

That's right around where Tribune stock has been trading. Shares yesterday closed down 71 cents at $32.62 in 4 p.m. trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Tribune declined to comment.

People familiar with the process said Tribune is unlikely to be disbanded into dozens of small pieces. If anything, these people said, shopping individual assets may be a way to flush out higher prices from the private-equity groups. As in any negotiation, these people said, each side is pushing for whatever advantages it can claim. Moreover, Tribune may resist offers for some properties, such as its flagship newspaper, and could ultimately decide to do nothing.

Still, it seems clear Tribune has been losing leverage in recent discussions with bidders. Earlier this week, the Audit Bureau of Circulations reported that nearly every major newspaper in the nation suffered a drop in circulation in the past six months. Tribune was among the worst hit.

DESKTOP NEWS ALERTS

1

Get alerts for breaking news -- such as Fed moves, major world events and big mergers -- delivered straight to your desktop. Alerts will appear in a small window on your screen, much like an instant-messaging window. See a sample and get more information.2

Total average weekday paid circulation at the Los Angeles Times, its biggest newspaper, dropped 8% in the past six months, to 775,766 as of Sept. 30. The Chicago Tribune's circulation fell 1.7% to 576,132, while Newsday was down 5% to 410,579.

More broadly, Tribune has been disappointed by the overall tepid response of bidders so far. "I'm somewhat surprised," said John Miller, an analyst at Chicago-based Ariel Capital Management, one of the company's biggest holders with several million shares. Given recent sales prices for other newspapers, and valuable Tribune properties such as the Cubs and an interest in online jobs company CareerBuilder, he said, the prices being offered "seem too low."

That has forced Tribune to reconsider its reorganization plan, and could push the Chicago-based company to sell off assets it once considered untouchable. Such is the case with the Cubs, which the company acquired in 1981 for just $20 million. Today the Cubs are one of the most highly visible franchises in sports, despite their notorious losing ways. At least one analyst now estimates the team is valued at as much as $750 million.

Meanwhile, Tribune's TV stations as a group could sell for as much as $4 billion, according to industry estimates. Several recent television stations have sold for about 12 times cash flow, including WATL in Atlanta. Since the broadcast group raked in $436 million in operating profit in 2005, that would put their price tag at about $5.2 billion. But the price is likely to be lower than that because Tribune has sold three stations this year, and some stations -- such as two in New Orleans -- could be difficult to unload.

Almost all of Tribune's stations are affiliated with the upstart CW network, formed this fall by merging assets from the defunct WB and UPN networks. While audiences for the CW are slightly larger than those for the WB -- Tribune's CW stations were all former WB affiliates -- its future performance is unclear.

"Selling some of these stations is going to be a pretty steep hill for Tribune to climb because the CW is still an unproven asset," says Elliot Evers, managing director of San Francisco's Media Venture Partners.

Potential bidders for at least some stations include Belo Corp., Gannett, and CBS Corp., which already owns 11 stations that are CW affiliates. Although CBS's station portfolio reaches about 38% of the country -- 39% is the federal limit -- it could buy WPIX in New York and WGN in Chicago under rules allowing for one broadcaster to own two stations in a market under certain circumstances. CBS already owns a station in New York and one in Chicago.

A person familiar with the matter said CBS has looked at Tribune's New York and Chicago stations but cautioned that nothing is imminent and that the two sides were nowhere near agreement in valuation. A CBS spokesman declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0090114

E.W. Scripps Co., which owns 70% of the Food Network, is the obvious buyer for Tribune's 30% stake in that cable channel, but the two remain far apart on price. "We continue to have an interest in acquiring Tribune's minority stake in Food Network, but at a price that creates value for our shareholders," said Scripps spokesman Tim Stautberg.

A big problem in any breakup plan would be taxes. Unlike a full corporate sale -- which would create minimal taxes -- Tribune would have to pay a tax bill on each individual divestment. That means that buyers will have to make highly attractive offers for each individual asset, covering both the tax costs and the value offered by the private-equity consortiums.

The Tribune's newspapers have a very low tax basis of about $2 billion to $3 billion, estimates Lehman Bros. corporate tax expert Robert Willens, and could likely fetch high prices that would trigger a big tax bill. However, he said, it would be relatively easy to get around that tax bill by spinning off individual newspapers into publicly traded subsidiaries. A potential buyer could then buy a controlling stake in the new subsidiary.

That could figure into another big part of this process: How the Federal Communications Commission will treat special exemptions previously awarded to Tribune allowing it to operate newspapers and television stations in the same market. The exemption -- from FCC rules that limit cross-ownership -- disappears once the assets are sold.

Private-equity firms apparently are comfortable with the asset questions, said people familiar with the matter. But getting new waivers may be timely and complicated, and could get wrapped into an always unpredictable political and legal process.

Earlier this year, Tribune had pursued a different approach to deal with pressure from the Chandlers and other shareholders. CEO Dennis FitzSimons opted for a $2 billion stock buyback and undertaking $500 million of asset sales. But pressure for more decisive action grew as Tribune's stock price weakened after the buyback was completed.

Even when the company announced it would explore alternatives to maximize value, Mr. FitzSimons insisted that the Los Angeles Times was not for sale. And while the latest move may be designed to test the market for individual assets, it may be hard for the board to resist momentum toward a breakup once offers start coming in.

Besides reversing that approach, a breakup would seem to undercut the rationale behind the landmark $8 billion merger between Tribune and Times Mirror in 2000, which brought the Tribune and Times under one roof and established coast-to-coast marketplaces of newspaper and television stations.

At the time, John Madigan, then chairman and CEO of Tribune, said, "A major portion of the value creation opportunities from this combination will be derived from faster revenue growth in our media businesses."

But that growth never materialized. Times Mirror's biggest property, the Los Angeles Times, began to hemorrhage readers and advertisers, and the same thing happened to smaller Times Mirror papers. As the fortunes of those properties faded, tensions between Los Angles and Chicago grew, ultimately resulting in a rupture on Tribune's board.

The merger was announced six years ago at the height of the Internet boom, before the outlook on newspapers and broadcast stations had soured.

---- Brooks Barnes, Adam Thompson, Merissa Marr and Joseph T. Hallinan contributed to this article.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Justices Appear Divided In Case On Emission Rules (WSJ)

By Mark H. Anderson

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Several justices resisted pleas from environmental groups and the federal government for the Supreme Court to overturn a lower-court ruling that spared Duke Energy Corp. from having to install pollution controls on several power plants.

The outcome of the case wasn't clear, with the nine-member court appearing divided on how to rule.

Duke Energy and the Environmental Protection Agency have been fighting over whether the company was required to get federal permits before it modernized eight coal-fired power plants in North Carolina and South Carolina in a way that increased efficiency but let them run longer hours so as to emit more pollution. The utility has alleged the EPA, under the Clinton administration, wrongly altered longstanding emissions regulations allowing companies to skip permits for upgrades as long as the hourly rate of pollution doesn't increase.

The Fourth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va., agreed and ordered changes to the EPA regulations. A similar lawsuit in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia came out the other way, upholding the EPA.

The electric-utility industry says it is on the line for billions of dollars in upgrades if the EPA's current rules are upheld. Environmental groups counter that a Duke Energy victory would frustrate the Clean Air Act's goal of imposing tougher pollution standards on newer facilities.

DOJ_NMG_0090115

But the case's impact may be limited because the Bush administration has proposed industry-friendly rule changes that would exempt power companies from new permits when retrofitting their plants as long as the hourly rate of emissions doesn't increase. After the EPA lost in the Fourth Circuit, the administration declined to appeal. The government appeared before the Supreme Court to defend the current regulation only after environmental groups, over the government's objection, persuaded the justices to hear the case.

At oral arguments yesterday, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Antonin Scalia and Samuel Alito expressed concerns the EPA altered its emissions regulatory scheme almost 20 years after implementing regulations mandated by Congress. "What I'm concerned about is companies can get whipsawed," Justice Scalia said. Chief Justice Roberts more than once cut off Sean Donahue, the attorney representing several environmental groups, questioning his arguments that the statutes support the EPA regulatory changes. "That's a tough sell, isn't it," he told Mr. Donahue.

At issue in the appeal is whether the EPA has regulatory leeway under the Clean Air Act to alter rules that apply when power plants make changes to existing facilities. Before the 1999 changes, some of the EPA's regulations required federal permits only if the hourly rate of emissions rose while other rules required a permit if total emissions would be raised.

Duke Energy has maintained that, while its plant upgrades will result in more pollution because the overhauled facilities will run longer, the hourly rate won't increase. A decision is expected by July 2007.

Justices Challenge EPA's Arguments In Clean Air Act Case (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

Supreme Court justices took a skeptical view of an Environmental Protection Agency crackdown on air pollution from electric power plants yesterday as the court heard oral arguments in a major case on the authority of the federal government to punish violations of the Clean Air Act.

At issue is a wave of lawsuits begun by the EPA during the last two years of the Clinton administration in which the agency sought to force utilities to equip their refurbished older plants with state-of-the-art pollution control equipment. The EPA said it was enforcing its long-established view of the Clean Air Act's requirements. But companies objected, saying the EPA was unfairly imposing a new and stricter interpretation of ambiguous federal regulations.

At yesterday's argument, most of the justices who spoke up seemed to agree with industry's view.

"What I'm concerned about is that companies can get whipsawed," said Justice Antonin Scalia.

When Sean H. Donahue, a lawyer for Environmental Defense, a private organization defending the EPA enforcement actions, told the court that the agency's regulations were "clear on their face," Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. interjected, "That's an audacious statement."

At issue in the case, Environmental Defense v. Duke Energy , No. 05-848, is how to measure utilities' compliance with the Clean Air Act's "new source review" program, which governs emissions from plants that have been modernized or expanded.

Environmental Defense says that about 17,000 facilities are covered by the rules, and it cites studies that show 20,000 premature deaths per year traceable to pollution from coal-fired plants.

It says the EPA properly insisted that Duke Energy get a special permit and install new pollution-control equipment before reopening several coal-fired plants it had started renovating in 1988, because the plants' total emissions dramatically increased when they were brought back online.

But Duke, a North Carolina-based utility, countered that the proper standard was not the total amount of pollution its plants emitted, but the rate at which they emitted it. By that measure, the company said, its renovations had not changed the plants' capacity for pollution.

In June 2005, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, based in Richmond, ruled in Duke Energy's favor.

By that time, the Bush administration had promised to change EPA enforcement policy, announcing in 2002 that it would bring no new cases against utilities.

But the EPA continued cases that were pending when the administration took office in 2001, so the Bush EPA and Environmental Defense were on the same side in the 4th Circuit.

After that, the administration proposed new clean air regulations that echo the 4th Circuit's decision and would apply it nationwide. It then asked the Supreme Court not to accept Environmental Defense's request to intervene in the case.

The court's decision to take the case over the administration's objection was a surprise. Since the adoption of modern environmental legislation in 1970, the court had agreed to hear just two previous cases in which an environmental group was the petitioner.

Yesterday, the Bush administration was back on Environmental Defense's side of the case, defending the EPA's authority to press the last few cases against Duke and others.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg asked Thomas G. Hungar, a deputy solicitor general, about the impact of the administration's shifting positions. "Since the government is now taking the position that another Duke could do just what was done here and there's an enforcement action pending, would you, if you prevailed in that enforcement action, nonetheless enforce, though it goes against the current government policy?"

"Your Honor, the 2005 proposal that you're referring to is only a proposal. . . . It has not been adopted," Hungar replied. "So the rules as they exist today are the same as the ones we're talking about, although there was a modification in 2002."

A decision in the case is expected by July.

Groups Want Forest Rules Overturned (AP)

By Terence Chea

AP, November 2, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — Environmentalists asked a federal judge Wednesday to overturn the Bush administration's rules for managing the country's 155 national forests, arguing that the regulations illegally weaken protections for wilderness and wildlife.

Issued in December 2004, the rules represented a major shift in how the government balanced conservation and commercial interests in its 192 million acres of forest land. The management plan gave regional forest managers more discretion to approve logging, drilling and other projects without lengthy environmental studies.

Wednesday's hearing in federal court in San Francisco was the first since a coalition of environmental groups sued the Bush administration over the changes in February 2005, a month after they took effect.

Lawyers for the environmentalists told U.S. District Court Judge Phyllis Hamilton that the rules do not include the safeguards for endangered wildlife and forests that federal law requires. The rules allowed forest management plans to be revised without environmental studies and repealed a requirement for forests to maintain "viable" populations of native wildlife.

They also argued that the administration failed to study adequately the environmental impact of changing forest management practices and did not give the public enough opportunity to comment on the revisions.

"The government must involve the public when it radically changes the management standards of our forests," said Peter Frost, an attorney for the environmental groups, Defenders of Wildlife, Sierra Club, the Wilderness Society, and Vermont Natural Resources Council.

Administration officials said the rules allow forest managers to respond more quickly to wildfires, invasive species and other emerging threats. The change shortened the time to get revisions made from as many as nine years to as few as two or three.

In court Wednesday, Cynthia Huber, a Justice Department attorney, defended the Bush forest rules. She said the administration provided 90 days of public comment when it issued its draft proposal to overhaul forest management rules in December 2002.

Huber also argued that environmental studies should only be required for specific projects that could impact forests and wildlife, not when management plans are revised.

The plan "definitely does not undermine protections of the forests" and complies with federal environmental laws, Huber said.

Judge Hamilton did not indicate when she might rule.

The lawsuit is one of several ongoing legal challenges to Bush administration policies for overseeing national forests.

Twenty environmental groups and four states sued the U.S. Forest Service last October when it repealed the "Roadless Rule," a Clinton-era ban on road construction in nearly a third of the nation's forests. In September, a federal judge reinstated the ban, ruling the agency failed to conduct necessary environmental studies before making the change.

U.S. Agency To Review Oil Royalties (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 1 — The Government Accountability Office, the watchdog agency for Congress, is beginning a broad investigation into potential deficiencies in how the government collects billions of dollars in royalties from companies that produce oil and gas on federal territory. The inquiry is being done at the request of the Republican-led House Government Reform Committee.

In announcing the investigation, Republican lawmakers said they had worries about the management of the entire royalty program by the Interior Department, including its regulations and enforcement practices and the accuracy of basic information.

DOJ_NMG_0090117

"They don't know how much oil is coming out of the ground," said Representative Darrell E. Issa, Republican of California and chairman of the committee's subcommittee on energy. "If an oil company were to give them the right number, they would take it. If they were to give them the wrong number, they would take it."

The investigation reflects a growing anger in Congress about the Interior Department's vast oil and gas leasing program, under which the government collects as much as $10 billion a year on oil and gas produced on federal land and in federal waters.

The Minerals Management Service of the Interior Departmet, which oversees royalty collections, has come under growing criticism from lawmakers in both parties for losing track of billions of dollars in royalties.

The agency has been under fire since February for errors on offshore leases that could cost the government more than $7 billion over the next five years, as well as for its sluggish response.

Four auditors responsible for scrutinizing royalties recently contended that their superiors blocked them from challenging millions of dollars in deliberate underpayments.

In September, the inspector general of the Interior Department, Earl C. Devaney, told lawmakers that top Interior officials had encouraged a culture of cronyism, ethical lapses and poor management. "Short of crime, anything goes," he testified.

Mr. Issa said the agency's numbers do not add up, that its systems for reporting production and royalty payments appear to be overwhelmed and that midlevel officials had come forward confidentially to describe wide-ranging weaknesses throughout the program.

Mr. Issa and Representative Tom Davis, a Virginia Republican who is chairman of the Government Reform Committee, said their staff had been "contacted numerous times regarding alleged deficiencies in M.M.S. management" and reporting by oil and gas companies.

In a statement on Wednesday, the Minerals Management Service said it welcomed the review and had nothing to hide. "We are confident the review will show that M.M.S. is accurately and efficiently collecting the royalties due to the federal government per existing statutes and regulations," the agency said. "We also welcome any constructive suggestions that we can use to further strengthen our program."

In their letter to the Congressional investigative agency, the lawmakers demanded that the inquiry examine the complex regulations for calculating royalties, the adequacy of the agency's information systems and the pace of its enforcement efforts.

As part of that, investigators will scrutinize a recent decision by the agency to drop claims that the Chevron Corporation had systematically underpaid the government for natural gas by inflating its costs for processing.

Democratic lawmakers have argued for months that the Interior Department under President Bush has been devoted almost entirely to serving the oil and gas industry, at the expense of American taxpayers.

Mr. Issa and other Republicans have become sharply critical as well.

The agency set off an initial round of investigations in February when it admitted that energy companies were likely to escape billions of dollars in royalties over the next five years because of mistakes in leases the government signed in the 1990s. The mistakes were made during the Clinton administration, but were not disclosed for another six years.

In July, Mr. Issa and Mr. Davis publicly accused the department of stonewalling their inquiry. "We believe the department may have deliberately withheld crucial information," the lawmakers wrote in a letter to the department.

In September, the two lawmakers expressed anger that the Bush administration had decided it would not try to recover about $2 billion that had already been lost as a result of the flawed leases.

"This is absurd," they wrote in a letter to Dirk Kempthorne, the interior secretary. "That money belongs to the federal government."

The new investigation will come on top of others already under way. The Government Accountability Office is already digging into the agency's accounting systems. The inspector general of the Interior Department is reviewing the agency's auditing and enforcement efforts; that report is expected by the end of December.

California Can Lead The Way (USAT)

By Carl Pope

USA Today, November 2, 2006

Voters want change and leadership that will take America in a dramatically different direction. One way many candidates across the country are demonstrating their commitment to change is by calling for the development of renewable energy sources. And this Election Day, Californians can help put the USA on the path to a saner, cheaper, smarter, more secure energy future by voting "yes" on Proposition 87.

DOJ_NMG_0090118

To most Americans, investing in smart energy solutions such as renewable solar and wind and other alternate fuel sources is a no-brainer. It's obvious to them that our nation's dependence on oil ties our fate to the most unstable parts of the world, makes consumers vulnerable to high gas prices, and increases the threat of global warming.

A monumental investment in new energy technologies ought to be a top political priority. Instead, federal spending for energy research and development is half what it was 25 years ago. Congress has handed over billions in new subsidies to oil companies, despite the fact that oil industry profits have tripled in the past three years.

California citizens can help the entire nation free itself from the grip of Big Oil by approving Proposition 87. This initiative would fund a $4 billion effort to reduce dependence on gasoline by 25% over 10 years. It would provide incentives to make alternative-fuel vehicles and renewable fuels more widely available and affordable to consumers. And it would fund research to bring clean, renewable energy and energy efficiency technologies to the marketplace more quickly.

Prop 87 is not a tax on residents. It would impose a minor assessment on the excess profits of California oil producers, something other oil producing states such as Alaska, New Mexico, Texas and Louisiana already have in place.

California has long been a leader in technological innovation, and our national economy and way of life are better for it. By supporting Prop 87 on Tuesday, California citizens can be leaders once again and make an important investment that will pay dividends for current and future generations.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Balco Grand Jury To Charge Graham (MERCN)

By Elliott Almond

The San Jose Mercury News, November 2, 2006

The track and field coach who ignited the Balco Laboratories drug scandal in 2003 is expected to be charged by the U.S. Attorney on Thursday with obstructing the investigation.

Trevor Graham, who has coached sprinters Marion Jones, Justin Gatlin, Tim Montgomery and other Olympic medal winners, will be indicted for making false statements to federal agents investigating the steroids case, the Associated Press reported Wednesday. AP cited two unidentified Justice Department sources.

In June, 2003, Graham sent the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency a syringe with traces of a steroid known as ``the clear'' and fingered Balco as the source.

The Mercury News previously reported one of Graham's former athletes told the San Francisco grand jury investigating Balco that the Raleigh, N.C., coach sold the sprinter illegal drugs. Graham, who runs the Sprint Capitol USA team, has repeatedly denied wrongdoing.

His attorney, Joseph Zeszotarski, declined to comment Wednesday evening. He previously said Graham told the truth when interviewed by authorities in 2004.

The charges come two weeks after Graham's long-time assistant testified in front of the current grand jury handling the case. Randall Evans, a former sprinter from St. Augustine College in Raleigh, told the Mercury News two weeks ago at the courthouse, ``Trevor is my best friend. I was there the whole time. I know what happened.''

He declined to say what he told the grand jury, or what prosecutors asked him. But Evans said, ``I had no choice. I wasn't going to take the rap. I told the grand jury the truth. I wasn't going to lie and then face perjury.''

Evans, who said he wasn't sure if he would coach again, added that he planned to ``tell all. Maybe I'll write a book.''

Evans, 36, might have provided damaging evidence against Graham because he is connected to Angel Guillermo Heredia, a former discus thrower from Laredo, Texas, and Mexico.

Heredia told the grand jury he supplied performance-enhancing drugs to Graham for his athletes, according to reports. Heredia's name surfaced in a letter written in 2003 by Balco founder Victor Conte Jr. about drug use by Sprint Capitol athletes. Conte never sent the letter to track officials but an Internal Revenue Service Agent leading the investigation of drugs and money laundering discovered it.

The charges against the coach likely stem from a 2004 interview with agents in which Graham denied knowledge of drug use among his athletes even though at least a half dozen had tested positive. His statement differed from one given about the same time by former shot putter C.J. Hunter, Jones' ex-husband.

Hunter told investigators that Graham introduced Jones to a drug regimen for the 400 meters, the Mercury News reported. It included the blood-boosting drug EPO. Hunter told authorities that Graham instructed Jones where to inject herself. Sources also told the Mercury News that Conte originally sent packages of drugs to Graham, according to Hunter's account.

The U.S. Olympic Committee banned Graham from its training centers in August because of the unusual number of his athletes convicted of drug violations. Last year, Montgomery was banned for two years based on evidence in the Balco case. Gatlin, the defending Olympic gold medalist in the 100 meters, tested positive for artificial testosterone in April.

Contact Elliott Almond at (408) 920-5865 or ealmond@mercurynews.com

BALCO Panel To Charge Track Coach (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Track coach Trevor Graham, who helped launch a three-year federal probe of steroid use by elite athletes, was expected to be charged by a grand jury as soon as today with obstructing the investigation, two Justice Department officials with knowledge of the investigation told the Associated Press.

Speaking on condition of anonymity because the charges had not been made public, the officials said Graham would be charged with making false statements to authorities investigating steroid use in sports.

Graham operates Raleigh, N.C.-based Sprint Capitol USA, a team of about 10 athletes that includes 100-meter co-world record holder Justin Gatlin, who tested positive for testosterone and other steroids in April.

Graham also coached sprinter Marion Jones, who won five medals at the 2000 Sydney Games, and her ex-boyfriend Tim Montgomery, suspended from competition for two years although he never tested positive for a banned substance.

Several of Graham's athletes, however, have tested positive for banned substances, and the coach is being investigated by a grand jury for lying to those looking into doping among elite athletes connected to the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, the now-defunct Burlingame supplement company that served as a front for a steroids ring.

Graham helped launch the federal investigation three years ago by anonymously mailing a vial containing "the clear," a previously undetectable steroid to the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency.

Neither Graham nor his attorney returned telephone calls and e-mail inquiries from the Associated Press. Graham steadfastly has denied ever providing banned performance-enhancing drugs to his athletes.

2 Suspects In Arson Cases Arrested (USAT)

By Keith Matheny, Marie Mccain And Erica Solvig

USA Today, November 2, 2006

BEAUMONT, Calif. — An auto mechanic in jail Wednesday in connection with two June arson fires is a “person of interest” in last week's massive wind-whipped wildfire that killed five federal firefighters, the Riverside County Sheriff's Department said.

Raymond Lee Oyler, 36, was arrested Tuesday after his home was searched Monday, Sgt. Earl Quinata said.

Quinata issued a news release Tuesday night that said Oyler was not a suspect in the Esperanza fire. He has not been charged in that fire.

Oyler, who is being held in the Riverside County Jail in lieu of $25,000 bail, is accused of igniting the two earlier fires near this rural town 20 miles west of Palm Springs. He is being arraigned today on charges related to those fires, the sheriff's department said.

Jason Walden, general manager of the auto center where Oyler has worked for four months, described him as a real workhorse. “They're climbing up the wrong tree,” said Walden, a former firefighter with the U.S. Forest Service. “He's not someone who is into fire.”

Oyler uses blowtorches on the job, but “he doesn't get that gleam in his eye like a pyromaniac,” Walden said.

Whoever is ultimately charged with last week's wildfire arson also will face murder charges and, potentially, the death penalty, said Sara Danville, Riverside County chief deputy district attorney for the Major Crimes Unit.

Firefighters on Monday were able to surround the wildfire that blackened more than 40,200 mostly uninhabited acres, the California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection reported. Firefighting costs reached $9.9 million.

The fire, which was started last Thursday, burned 34 homes and killed five firefighters. The five — Capt. Mark Loutzenhiser, 43, of Idyllwild; Jason McKay, 27, of Phelan; Jess McLean, 27, of Beaumont; Daniel Hoover-Najera, 20, of San Jacinto; and Pablo Cerda, 23, of Fountain Valley — will be honored in a memorial service in a large arena near San Bernardino on Sunday.

Cerda, who suffered burns over 90% of his body, died Tuesday at a hospital near San Bernardino.

A preliminary report from the U.S. Forest Service released Tuesday said the firefighters had only one escape route from a house they were trying to save. Their engine faced toward that escape route, but the fire overwhelmed them, the report stated, and they were not able to get to shelter.

At least three federal departments will investigate the scene separately.

DOJ_NMG_0090120

"The objective of this safety investigation is to determine facts surrounding the incident, identify lessons learned, and develop recommendations for accident-prevention purposes," the preliminary report stated.

Local investigators Wednesday continued questioning people, including convicted arsonists, to try to determine who started the blaze.

The Riverside County sheriff announced shortly after the six-day blaze began that it was a case of arson. A reward leading to an arrest and conviction is $550,000 and growing. A fund for the firefighters' families also exceeds $500,000 and could eventually reach $1 million, Riverside County officials said.

Nationwide Dragnet Nabs Local Fugitive (TOLB)

Toledo Blade (OH), November 2, 2006

Ex-Toledoan accused of probation violation

A former Toledo man who was arrested last week on an 11-year-old outstanding warrant is among the fugitives nabbed in a nationwide law enforcement dragnet that will be the subject of a major announcement tomorrow by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Russell Johnson, 49, was wanted for an alleged probation violation that stems from a 1991 conviction in Lucas County Common Pleas Court for sexually assaulting an 11-year-old girl.

A resident of Florida, Johnson was arrested by officers with Northern Ohio Violent Fugitive Task Force on Oct. 22 at a mobile home park at 3510 Consaul St. in East Toledo.

Mark Herr, a Lucas County assistant prosecutor, said Johnson's arrest was part of a dragnet involving federal, state, and local authorities to apprehend suspects wanted in homicides, sexual assaults, gang-related crimes, kidnappings, major drug offenses, and crimes against children and the elderly.

"He is a very high-profile figure," said Mr. Herr, who was informed of the arrest by U.S. Marshals involved in the operation.

The Justice Department is planning to announce the arrest of Johnson and others tomorrow in Washington as part of an effort to track down and arrest fugitives from justice, Mr. Herr said.

Johnson appeared yesterday before Judge Frederick McDonald on the probation violation charge. The hearing was continued to tomorrow to allow the defendant to consult with a court-appointed attorney.

He was indicted in 1990 on 20 counts of sexual battery and convicted in December, 1990 on one of those felony offenses.

Judge McDonald sentenced him to the maximum two-year prison term in January, 1991, and released him about three months later on shock probation. He was placed on probation.

The arrest warrant was issued in October, 1995 after he allegedly failed to report to the court's probation department.

Multi-agency Sweep Nets Murray Man (MURRLT)

Murray (KY) Ledger & Times, November 2, 2006

A 19-year-old Murray man was arrested in a multi-agency round up of people who committed sex crimes.

Brian Gryzmala, of Murray, was charged with distribution of matter portraying a sexual performance by a minor and possession of matter portraying a sexual performance by a minor, according to a release from the Kentucky State Police.

KSP and the Kentucky Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force announced Monday the results of Operation Harvest Moon. The effort aimed to arrest suspects involved in online child sexual exploitation crimes and non-compliant registered sexual offenders.

Operation Harvest Moon resulted in 11 federal indictments and three state arrests, including Gryzmala.

"The message is clear: Kentucky is and will continue to be a child-predator-free zone," U.S. Attorney for the Eastern Kentucky District said in the KSP release. "The message to child sexual predators should also be clear: Stay out of our state. These people are the lowest dregs of society and we will not allow them to harm our children."

Operation Harvest Moon began Oct. 23 and culminated months of investigations by KSP and other law enforcement agencies throughout the state.

The task force, which is located within the KSP Communications and Computer Technology Branch, and 14 other participating agencies spearheaded the online investigative component of Operation Harvest Moon.

The other agencies partnering with Kentucky ICAC include the FBI, U.S. Secret Service, U.S. Marshals Service, U.S. Attorney's Office, U.S. Postal Inspection Service, Louisville Metro Police Department, Lexington-Fayette Urban County Division of Police, Owensboro Police Department, Bowling Green Police Department, Morehead Police Department, Winchester Police Department, Franklin Police Department, Oldham County Police Department and Boone County Sheriff's Department.

"The Kentucky State Police led this effort to identify and round up those individuals engaged in criminal online activity and in non-compliance with House Bill 3," KSP Commissioner Jack Adams said in the release. "But the success of Operation Harvest Moon rests with the cooperation among law enforcement agencies throughout the state. The resources, time and energy invested by these officers, and their family with their populations and locales, are responsible for the effectiveness of the operation."

In addition to the online investigations, the KSP and task force identified those registered sexual offenders violating new residency restrictions. As of Monday, KSP troopers have charged 37 people for residing within 1,000 feet of restricted areas and another 58 arrests are pending.

The registry notification requires sex offenders to report any address change to their local probation and parole office before actually moving. If offenders move without following procedure, they are considered non-compliant and can be charged with a Class D felony punishable by one to five years in prison. House Bill 3 enhanced those conditions by requiring offenders to live at least 1,000 feet from schools, licensed day care facilities and publicly owned playgrounds and by making possession of child pornography a felony.

Fugitive In Sexual Assault Case In Colorado Arrested (LVRJ)

Las Vegas Review-Journal, November 2, 2006

A fugitive strike team arrested a 43-year-old North Las Vegas man late Monday on a warrant charging him with multiple counts of sexually assaulting an 11-year-old girl in Littleton, Colo.

Michael Pope, who once worked as a dealer in Las Vegas casinos in the late 1980s and early 1990s, was taken into custody without incident while trying to hide in a vehicle, according to task force commander Patrick Sedoti.

Advertisement

Pope's arrest stems from incidents that authorities in Jefferson County, Colo., said occurred between December 2004 and June 2005 when he was renting a room in Littleton and occasionally was the baby sitter for the girl, who lived in the home.

Pope had moved to North Las Vegas, where he lived with his sister until moving out recently to live near Fort Apache Road and Charleston Boulevard, said Fidencio Rivera, chief deputy of the U.S. Marshals' office in Las Vegas.

"When the case came in, we tracked him down to a girlfriend in the valley," Rivera said, noting that the strike team worked in cooperation with North Las Vegas police.

He said law enforcement officials in the Las Vegas area have no knowledge of Pope molesting any children locally.

Tips Sought On Missing Explosives (MUCHRONICLE)

By Theresa D.McClellan, CHRONICLE NEWS SERVICE

Muskegon Chronicle (MI), November 1, 2006

Missing explosives from a Ferry Township asparagus field has sparked the interest of federal authorities.

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives posted a $5,000 reward for information leading to an arrest and conviction in connection with whoever dug up and stole the materials buried about 3 feet deep on the 48-acre site.

The materials had been placed by Bay Geophysical Inc. of Traverse City. The company used them to create seismic charges while looking for gas and oil, having been doing gas and oil explorations "for a few years," Michigan State Police Trooper Stacy Baylis said.

The materials were eight 150-gram Pentalite seismic charges and nine electric cap detonators. When combined, each charger has the explosive power of a half stick of dynamite, police said.

"In a word, damage could be considerable. That could remove the front of a small building," said Sgt. Troy Fellows of Michigan State Police's Hart post.

The theft was discovered Monday. Company officials estimate it occurred between 6 p.m. Sunday and 11 a.m. Monday, police said.

While a security guard was posted on the wooded property off Baker Road, he did not see anything unusual, Baylis said.

"This is a federal case, the feds are investigating and we are making no other statement," said a company spokeswoman, who declined further comment.

The green explosives are about six inches long and four inches round with electric systematic detector caps.

"Theft of explosives is a top priority for ATF. The stolen charges and detonators are identified as high explosives and are dangerous," said ATF Special Agent Valerie J. Goddard.

"The public is cautioned not to handle or touch any of these explosives materials if they are located, and to immediately contact their local law enforcement agency or ATF for the safe removal of these items," Goddard said.

faxbox

Anyone with information about missing explosives from an Oceana County asparagus field taken sometime between 6 p.m. Sunday and 11 a.m. Monday is asked to call Michigan State Police's Hart post at (231) 873-2171; the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosive at (888) 283-2662 (ATF-BOMB); or Silent Observer at (888) 786-7271 (STOP-CRIME).

Drug Death Defendant Pleads Not Guilty (SLPD)

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, November 2, 2006

A St. Louis man pleaded not guilty Wednesday to charges connecting him with the "date rape drug" overdose death of a SIUE senior in 2002 — but he was unsuccessful getting a federal judge to issue a gag order in the case.

John F. Berger, 36, was arraigned Wednesday afternoon after being indicted on charges of possession with intent to distribute 1,4-butanediol (BD) with a resulting death; possession with intent to distribute BD for human consumption; cocaine distribution; and possession with intent to distribute BD for human consumption with death resulting. He surrendered Monday and has been released on $50,000 bond.

BD converts to Gamma-hydroxybutyric acid, or GHB, in the body. GHB is colorless, odorless and tasteless and depresses the central nervous system. It can cause drowsiness, nausea, loss of inhibition, amnesia and hallucinations and at higher does, it can cause unconsciousness, seizures, breathing trouble or death.

U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway said that investigators believe Berger supplied the drug that killed Tressa Gross on April 7, 2002. Hanaway announced the charges against Berger in a press conference Tuesday, complete with pictures of Berger and a plea for any potential victims or witnesses to come forward.

Berger's lawyer, John Rogers, cited Hanaway's press conference and the news reports that followed as reasons for a "gag order" on attorneys and staff on both sides and all parties involved in the case.

Rogers' filing called Hanaway's comments at the press conference "inappropriate" and "unfair" and said they could "poison" or manipulate jurors in a future trial.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Thomas Mummert III, however, turned down the gag order and got Assistant U.S. Attorney Jim Delworth to promise that his office and the Drug Enforcement Administration will make no more public statements without discussing the issue with him.

In other developments, Delworth said that he had provided Rogers with some of the evidence in the case before the hearing. He handed Rogers an audiotape and videotape after the hearing.

Heroin Kingpin Convicted, Could Get Life Sentence (AP)

AP, November 1, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) _ An Irvington man who authorities say was a major heroin kingpin faces up to life in prison after a jury convicted him Tuesday of conspiracy, racketeering, drug, gun and money laundering charges.

Authorities said Charles "Black" Hamilton was the head of an operation that moved huge amounts of heroin _ about 20,000 doses a week _ from northern New Jersey to the Trenton area.

At the time Hamilton was arrested in 2004, authorities believed his operation was responsible for three-fourths of the heroin in Trenton.

Hamilton, 36, also had ties to the Bloods street gang, the Attorney General's office said.

His conviction came after a three-week jury trial in Trenton. While the sentence could be as stiff as life in prison, it will be up to a judge to decide Hamilton's exact penalty.

Two other men in the operation already are serving prison terms.

FEDS FINISH GIVING 'ICEBOX' EVIDENCE (TMT)

Tyler Morning Telegraph, November 1, 2006

EDITOR'S NOTE: The names of undercover law enforcement officers and confidential informants in this article are withheld to protect their identities.

The U.S. government presented the rest of its evidence Wednesday in the trial of three men involved in a large methamphetamine-distribution ring that spanned three states.

A confidential informant and co-defendant testified in the "Operation Icebox" case in U.S. District Judge Leonard Davis' court, along with law enforcement officials and forensic chemists.

Simon "BJ" Balderas Jr., 29, the alleged ringleader in the case, and brothers Jose (Joe) Zavala, 27, and Rene Zavala, 31, are on trial in Tyler federal court for allegedly conspiring to distribute more than 10 kilograms of meth in Tyler, Shreveport and Miami. Nineteen people were charged in the conspiracy. The three men on trial are each charged in at least 23 counts of the 26-count indictment and face up to life in prison for the conspiracy.

DOJ_NMG_0090123

A confidential informant testified Wednesday that he bought "ice" meth from Jose Zavala, whom he called a "pretty large drug dealer in the Tyler area." He said Rene Zavala helped his brother distribute the meth and picked the drugs up in Dallas.

The CI said he and Jose Zavala went to Balderas' house a few times to buy meth. The jury saw video recordings of the CI buying meth from Jose Zavala and at Balderas' house. The jurors also heard an audio recording of a trip the CI took with Rene Zavala to Dallas to pick up 2 pounds of meth on Feb. 3.

He said 1 pound was given to Stanley "Drew" Burkhart and the other was given to Jose Zavala.

During one recording, Jose Zavala talked about a Dallas source he felt was "ripping them off" and said he had a "necklace full of teeth" for the man, which the CI said meant he would knock his teeth out.

One video showed the CI sitting with Balderas and Jose Zavala in the living room of Balderas' house. On the coffee table, Balderas weighed drugs and had a large bag of meth.

The CI had three felony charges against him in Rusk County dropped and was paid $2,100 for helping the government. He now has several felony cases pending in Smith County, including possessing 14 grams of meth, unlawfully carrying a pistol, burglary, failure to identify and theft charges, which he incurred after his work as a CI was completed, he said.

CO-DEFENDANT TESTIFIES

Stanley "Drew" Burkhart, 44, testified that he had been using meth for about 20 years when he met Balderas in 2004. Burkhart said he had been selling drugs since about 2003. He said he bought meth from Balderas, starting out at a couple of ounces and increasing to 1 pound per week. He said he estimated that he bought a total of about 10 pounds from Balderas.

After about four months, he said he began buying meth from Jose Zavala and he estimated he bought a total of 20 pounds from him. He said he also bought meth from Sam Leal, another co-defendant in the case.

He pleaded guilty to possessing with the intent to distribute more than 1 kilogram of meth. He was arrested Feb. 3 with the pound of meth he got from Rene Zavala. He said he paid him about $1,000 for the pound.

Smith County sheriff's Deputy Michael Strickland said he stopped Burkhart for a traffic violation on Feb. 3 and after found several small plastic bags of meth, as well as a large bag of meth, totaling 580 grams, and drug paraphernalia.

A Gregg County sheriff's deputy and DEA task force officer testified that he arrested co-defendants Gloria Medina and Manuel Escobar at a motel in Longview on Jan. 19. He said 10 ounces of meth were discovered there and drug paraphernalia and an assault rifle were found at Ms. Medina's Tyler residence.

An undercover Texas Department of Public Safety narcotics officer testified that a CI bought 2.7 grams of meth on Jan. 5 and 32 grams of meth on Feb. 15 from co-defendant Eduardo "Collette" Vasquez Jr.

He said another CI bought 28 grams of meth on Jan. 25 from co-defendant David Branch and introduced the officer to Branch. The officer said he developed a relationship with Branch about dealing Ecstasy and meth, and that his source was "BJ." On Feb. 8, Branch told the officer he sold more than 1,000 pills of Ecstasy in the last month and sold the officer 1 ounce of meth and 24 Ecstasy pills, he said.

SEARCHES, SEIZURES

A Smith County sheriff's deputy and DEA task force member testified that when officers searched Jose and Rene Zavala's residence on March 8, they found two handguns, ammunition, a container with suspected meth, two tubes with suspected steroids, two scales and more than $5,000 in cash.

A Palestine police officer and DEA task force officer testified that officials found two rifles, four pistols and $2,500 cash in a March 8 search of Simon Balderas Sr.'s home.

A DEA special agent testified that on March 8, law enforcement searched Vasquez's apartment and found marijuana in several small bags as well as six bricks, about 1 kilogram each. He said they also found 141 tablets of Ecstasy, three handguns, a fake shaving cream bottle with 2 ounces of meth and Ecstasy pills inside and a fake hairspray can with 1 ounce of meth inside.

He said officials searched the house of Zavala's parents and found scales and a collector's AR-15 assault rifle.

An ATF special agent testified that when searching a Tyler hotel room on March 8 where a woman and co-defendant Jacinto Martinez were located, officials found nearly $6,000 inside the woman's purse, $3,710 in Martinez's pocket and a safe with $200,000 cash and a drug ledger inside.

A DEA special agent testified that when officials searched Balderas Jr.'s house on March 8, they discovered digital scales, pictures of Balderas Jr. and others displaying guns and Nortenos signs, a safe containing pills and two pistols and another safe containing drug notes.

Two handguns were found in a garage behind Balderas Jr.'s and Balderas Sr.'s neighboring houses, he said.

DRUG TESTING

Two chemists testified about testing drugs in the case.

A chemist in the DPS' Tyler crime lab said he tested 14.1 grams of meth.

DOJ_NMG_0090124

A forensic chemist for the DEA lab in Dallas said she tested 29 items, which totaled 1,315.5 grams of meth, 749.2 grams of Ecstasy, steroids and 5.19 grams of prescription medication. She said 1,000 grams equals 1 kilogram.

Two Smith County probation officers testified to Jose Zavala's and Balderas' prior felony convictions.

Jose Zavala was convicted in 1999 of possession of marijuana. Balderas was convicted in 1993 of aggravated assault. They are each charged with being felons in possession of firearms.

Paul Fazande has testified he sold up to 6 pounds of meth per week in Shreveport for Balderas. He was arrested in Shreveport in October 2005 and has pleaded guilty to drug charges. He was not indicted in Icebox.

Samuel Leal Jr., 33, testified that he bought meth from Jose Zavala and Balderas. He said several sources in Dallas supplied Balderas with meth through the Zavala brothers but he met one man who claimed to be associated with a drug cartel who moved drugs to Dallas from Mexico. Leal said he began buying meth from the man and took the place of Joe Zavala with that drug source. Leal bought and supplied Balderas with the drugs, up to 10-15 kilograms per week, he said.

John Thomas Carroll, 24, testified earlier that he bought meth from Balderas Jr. and the Zavalas and sold it in Tyler. After he moved to Miami, Balderas' source had switched from the Zavalas to Leal and Jacinto Martinez, who began sending him shipments that increased from ounces to kilograms. He said at the peak of sales, he sold 5 kilograms per week in Miami.

Efrem Gonzalez Gamez was scheduled to go to trial with the others but pleaded guilty to the conspiracy charge.

Leal, Carroll, Gamez, Martinez, Balderas Sr., Escobar, Burkhart, Vasquez, Branch, Ms. Medina, Jeff Attaway, Mark Anthony Gomez, Tanya Smith, Joey Paup, and Brandy Rodgers, also known as Brandy McNinch, have all pleaded guilty to similar charges. Jamie Long was arrested in September and is set to go to trial in December.

Assistant U.S. attorneys Bill Baldwin and Mary Ann Cozby are prosecuting the case. Tonda Curry represents Balderas, Rex Thompson represents Jose Zavala and Jim Williams represents Rene Zavala.

The trial will resume with defense evidence on Thursday.

Border Guard Accused Of Accepting Bribes Released Pending Trial (AP)

AP, November 2, 2006

SEATTLE -- A U.S. border guard accused of accepting cash and sexual favors from a female drug smuggler was released Tuesday on a $20,000 bond, against the wishes of prosecutors.

Federal Magistrate Judge Mary Alice Theiler also agreed to let the guard, Desmone Bastian, continue living in Surrey, British Columbia, where he will be monitored pending trial, scheduled for Jan. 2. Bastian has pleaded not guilty to one count of accepting a bribe and another of importing controlled substances.

Bastian is accused of accepting an undisclosed amount of money as well as sexual favors from a female smuggler who told federal agents that she is also a madam. According to Assistant U.S. Attorney Susan Roe, the smuggler claimed that Bastian sometimes showed up at her house of prostitution wearing his U.S. Customs and Border Protection uniform.

In exchange for the money and favors, he would allow her to drive into the U.S. from British Columbia with OxyContin pills and marijuana, Roe said.

Bastian first raised suspicion last March, when he was seen leaving his post at the Blaine crossing to approach the smuggler's car, which contained 3,000 OxyContin pills, Roe said.

Investigators combed records and discovered that the woman had crossed the border numerous times in the past several years, often in Bastian's lane. He never referred her for a secondary inspection, Roe said.

Bastian's attorney, Michael Nance, argued against detaining him pending trial, noting that it was not a violent crime.

Ex-Mexican Drug Czar Faces More Charges (AP)

AP, November 1, 2006

MEXICO CITY — Mexico's former drug czar, already serving 71 years for drug trafficking and racketeering, has been ordered to stand trial on a new set of firearms and corruption charges, prosecutors announced Wednesday.

Jesus Gutierrez Rebollo is accused of handing out military weapons to corrupt government officials, the federal attorney general's office said.

The officials allegedly worked with a web of conspirators that protected and aided drug traffickers, the office said in a statement.

Gutierrez Rebollo, one of the highest-level Mexican officials to ever have been convicted, was expected to bring toughness and integrity to Mexico's war on drugs when he assumed the drug czar post in 1996.

But the next year, police arrested Gutierrez Rebollo after it was found he was staying in a luxury apartment owned by cocaine kingpin Amado Carrillo Fuentes.

DOJ_NMG_0090125

Informants later alleged that the general was asking Carrillo Fuentes' Juarez cartel for a $60 million in exchange for sending soldiers to protect and support its smuggling operations.

Gutierrez Rebollo was convicted of drug trafficking, racketeering and corruption and sentenced to 40 years in prison. He was later convicted of handing out military firearms to drug traffickers and sentenced to an additional 31 years and 10 months.

Ex-LCC Coach Given Probation In Drug Case (SDUT)

The San Diego Union-Tribune, November 1, 2006

SAN DIEGO – A former La Costa Canyon High School girls water polo coach who had cocaine and Ecstasy in his car when stopped in February was sentenced Wednesday to probation and ordered to register as a narcotics offender.

Steven Pierce Moyer, 43, pleaded guilty Sept. 11 to possession for sale and transportation of Ecstasy.

The married father of two also admitted an allegation that the drugs found in his car were not for personal use and that he intended to sell or distribute them.

The Carlsbad resident faced a maximum of four years in state prison under the plea bargain.

A U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent testified at Moyer's July 14 preliminary hearing that the defendant was overheard ordering cocaine and Ecstasy from a known drug dealer, Michael Cardosi.

Moyer left a voice mail message for Cardosi, indicating that he needed the drugs before a party he was hosting, according to court testimony.

On Feb. 23, Moyer was seen getting into the back seat of Cardosi's Mercedes-Benz in the parking lot of a Vons supermarket in Encinitas, but agents did not see any drugs change hands.

DEA agents tailing Moyer asked Carlsbad police to pull him over because they didn't want to jeopardize the larger investigation that had been going on since 2004, DEA Special Agent Helem Sosa testified.

Carlsbad police Sgt. Greg White testified that he stopped Moyer for speeding and was given permission to search his car, which yielded 10.2 grams of cocaine and 30 Ecstasy tablets.

Cardosi, 33, has been charged with evading a peace officer and drug offenses and will be back in court Dec. 12.

In sentencing Moyer, Judge David Danielsen agreed with prosecutor Cari Phillips that federal agents may have done Moyer a favor by arresting him and taking him out of his “party” lifestyle.

The judge suspended a one-year jail sentence so long as Moyer successfully completes three years on probation.

Danielsen told the defendant to put 100 percent of his effort into complying with all the terms of probation, because another judge might not react favorably to a violation considering the defendant's background.

Moyer, a walk-on, part-time coach at La Costa Canyon, resigned his position after he was charged in June.

He was the captain of Stanford's water polo team from 1982 to 1984 and played on the U.S. national team.

IMMIGRATION:

Federal Judge Blocks Town's Crackdown On Illegal Immigrants (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Rubinkam, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 2, 2006

(AP) - ALLENTOWN, Pennsylvania-A federal judge blocked the city of Hazleton from enforcing a pair of tough ordinances targeting illegal immigrants, just hours before the measures were to go into effect.

The measures, approved by City Council last month, would have imposed fines on landlords who rent to illegal immigrants and denied business permits to companies that give them jobs. They also would have required tenants to register with City Hall and pay for a rental permit.

U.S. District Judge James Munley ruled that landlords, tenants and businesses that cater to Hispanics faced "irreparable harm" from the laws and issued a temporary restraining order blocking their enforcement.

"We find it in the public interest to protect residents access to homes, education, jobs and businesses," he wrote in a 13-page opinion.

Hispanic groups and the ACLU sued Hazleton on Monday, contending the laws violate the Constitution because they trample on the federal government's exclusive power to regulate immigration.

Mayor Lou Barletta, who spearheaded the law, has argued that illegal immigrants have brought an increase in drugs, crime and gangs to the city. The city's lawyers on Tuesday cited a 10 percent increase in crime between 2004 and 2005 as a reason why the ordinances should be enforced.

DOJ_NMG_0090126

Munley, however, wrote that the city "offers only vague generalizations about the crime allegedly caused by illegal immigrants, but has nothing concrete to back up these claims."

Hazleton's crackdown, which was announced in June, has received national attention and spurred other towns to pass similar laws, saying that the federal government has not done enough about illegal immigration. Municipal officials view the Hazleton lawsuit and a similar one in Riverside, New Jersey, as test cases.

Witold J. Walczak, legal director of the ACLU of Pennsylvania, hailed Tuesday's decision as an important victory.

"I think what's important is the judge recognized that this ordinance has the potential to cause real harm by costing people their jobs, their houses and requiring children to leave schools," he said.

The judge's restraining order expires Nov. 14. He indicated that he will schedule a hearing on the ACLU's motion for a temporary injunction.

Barletta has said he is convinced the courts will ultimately uphold the law.

Bush May Find An Ally On Immigration (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

The Next Congress

Fourth of five parts

Immigration is the one major issue on which President Bush is likely to fare better next year if Democrats win control of Congress.

The issue is unfinished business to which all sides promise to return, after House Republicans this year prevented Mr. Bush from winning both a guest-worker program and citizenship rights for most illegal aliens.

Instead, House Republican leaders forced through a bill to construct 698 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border. Funding for the fencing and other border security measures will be the first test of the new Congress on immigration policy.

Democrats have an outside chance of taking complete control of Capitol Hill, but a better chance of winning one chamber, and in this series, The Washington Times is examining how such a transfer of power will affect U.S. policy and politics.

Neither House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, likely to be the speaker of the House if Democrats win that chamber, nor Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, the Democrats' Senate leader, would commit this week to funding the fencing if they gain control of Congress.

"What Leader Pelosi has said in the past is that we need to do comprehensive reform, and the fence could be part of that reform," said the California Democrat's spokeswoman, Jennifer Crider.

Jim Manley, spokesman for Mr. Reid, said the Nevada Democrat is working toward "solutions that are tough and smart, not political legislation designed to make for good election-year sound bites."

Republicans are questioning the Democrats' commitment. Last week, on the day Mr. Bush signed the fencing into law, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert issued a statement asking, "Would a Democrat majority support construction of a border fence?"

But Mr. Hastert won't commit to spending for the entire fence, instead focusing on "operational control" that could include less fencing but other measures, such as more Border Patrol agents and vehicle barriers.

"He'll commit to funding necessary to get operational control of the border, which goes far beyond a single line of fencing," said Lisa C. Miller, spokeswoman for the Illinois Republican.

For his part, Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, the Kentucky Republican likely to lead his party in the Senate with the retirement of Majority Leader Bill Frist, wants to see the funding through, his spokesman said.

"He sees border security as critical to our national and homeland security and believes the Congress should fund border security, including the border fence," spokesman Don Stewart said.

Unfinished business

Spending aside, Congress still faces the four major immigration questions that it punted on this year -- how to secure the border, how to boost workplace enforcement, whether to create a new program for future foreign workers in addition to the existing work programs that hundreds of thousands of people already use; and what to do about the estimated 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens now in the country.

Mr. Bush, joined by almost all Democrats and some Republicans, wants action on all of those issues, and the Senate passed such a bill this year.

But House Republicans insist that the government must prove it can control the borders and enforce the laws before considering a new worker program, and many Republicans oppose legalization of illegal aliens altogether, arguing that it is amnesty for lawbreakers.

If Republicans retain control of Congress, that impasse is likely to remain, said Frank Sharry, executive director of the National Immigration Forum, which supports a path to citizenship.

"It has stalemate written all over it -- stalemate plus [passage of] appropriations, which I don't think would satisfy either group of partisans," he said.

But if Democrats win the 15 seats they need to snatch control of the House, the odds for a deal improve somewhat.

"If the House stays Republican, chances of a comprehensive bill being enacted in the next Congress are less than 10 percent. And if the House is taken by the Democrats, chances of a comprehensive bill passing in the next Congress are about 50-50," Mr. Sharry said.

He figures there are probably 160 to 175 House Democrats willing to vote for comprehensive reform, meaning between 45 and 60 Republicans would have to join them to reach a comfortable margin for passage.

Less depends on which party controls the Senate, because a bipartisan consensus appears to exist for some sort of broad bill. Still, the Senate could improve prospects for a final compromise bill if it acts first, putting pressure on the House to follow through.

That would be different from this year, when the Senate Judiciary Committee got bogged down on judicial nominations, renewal of the USA Patriot Act and detainee treatment, allowing the House to drive the enforcement-first side.

People power

Much also will depend on the personalities in the debate.

The biggest change would be the difference between Mr. Hastert and Mrs. Pelosi. While the Republican has focused squarely on enforcement, boosted by voters in his district who have driven that message home to him, the Democrat has supported legalization.

She has opposed many of the security-only provisions Republicans have put forth, calling some "awful" and others "OK." But she said in September that "all of them are more acceptable in the context of comprehensive immigration reform."

If the Republicans maintain control in the House, the Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee probably would be Rep. Lamar Smith, a Texan who is a strong advocate for enforcement and has argued that a guest-worker program hurts American workers. However, Rep. John Conyers Jr., the Michigan Democrat in line to become chairman if his party wins control, supports a broad legalization.

How much of a priority the issue is for Democrats remains to be seen. Although leaders say they want to find a solution, it has not played a major role as Democrats campaigned this year.

When House Democrats issued a 25-page position paper on their priorities for next year, immigration reform was not among them.

And in "The Plan," a manifesto-type book by Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel and Democratic Leadership Council President Bruce Reed, immigration rated one brief mention -- an attack on Republicans for using the issue for political gain.

Money matters

But the opportunity to outspend Mr. Bush on homeland security might end up enticing Democrats to push for their own political gain on the issue, said Rikki Horton, government relations associate for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which opposes amnesty and calls for a crackdown on illegal immigration.

"Since the president doesn't fully fund some of these in his budget, I actually believe the Democrats would want to go against the president," she said. "I don't believe that everything will be fully funded but I do believe, in a scenario where the Democrats take over, I can see them wanting to use this to put the president in a bad light."

That happened two years ago, when just months after promising to increase the U.S. Border Patrol by 2,000 agents a year for five years, Mr. Bush's first budget included just 210 agents. Lawmakers from both parties used that move to criticize the White House and insist on bigger increases.

One of those lawmakers, Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, would have the chance to play a major role again should Democrats take control of the Senate.

He is in line to recapture the chairmanship of the Senate Appropriations Committee, and although he is not talking about specifics should Democrats win control, his record is clear.

"If we are truly serious about securing our borders -- and not just engaging in rhetoric and hot air -- then we will put real dollars where the rubber hits the road," he said earlier this year.

His spokesman, Tom Gavin, said Mr. Byrd supports the homeland security spending bill the president signed into law last month that included $1.2 billion for fencing, vehicle barriers, sensors, cameras and other infrastructure, and gives the Department of Homeland Security flexibility to decide what to spend where.

DOJ_NMG_0090128

"Senator Byrd is supportive of that funding and the secretary's authority. No matter which party is in power, Senator Byrd will continue to work to make the improvements to border security that are critical to the safety of the United States," Mr. Gavin said.

The major decisions for the appropriations committees will be how much to increase the Border Patrol and to determine how many workplace enforcement teams and additional detention beds are needed.

Chances for an immigration agreement also will become entwined with presidential personalities and politics.

The Hispanic vote might play a much larger role in the presidential election than it has in House races this year, which could influence the way both parties handle it.

And Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican and a major backer of legalization, is a presidential contender on the Republican side, though other Republican candidates are likely to emerge taking a much stricter line on the issue. Just this week Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, who was the champion of the 700 miles of fencing, announced that he is exploring a run for president.

Part I

Democratic majority ready to go to war over Iraq

Part II

Democrats wait in the wings with subpoenas

Part III

Specter of tax man haunts Democrats

Lawsuit Says Latino Citizens Were Caught Up In Raids Seeking Illegal Immigrants (LAT)

By Jenny Jarvie

The Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

atlanta — A civil rights group sued the federal government Wednesday on behalf of five Latino U.S. citizens who say they were detained and harassed by agents carrying out raids targeting illegal immigrants in south Georgia.

The Southern Poverty Law Center said that U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents used "Gestapo-like" tactics as they fanned across three Georgia counties in September, breaking into homes and stopping people in their cars "because they looked 'Mexican.' "

The class-action suit seeks not only compensatory damages for the plaintiffs — who include a landlord whose property was damaged — but also a court order preventing the agency from conducting similar raids across the country.

"This was a widespread sweep, based largely on racial and ethnic profiling, in violation of the 4th and 5th Amendments to the United States Constitution," Mary Bauer, attorney for the plaintiffs, said at a news conference here. Those amendments pertain to the right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure and the right to due process.

"Agents saw brown skin," Bauer said, "and made a presumption of illegality."

Marc Raimondi, an ICE spokesman, said the raids were conducted legally. "We don't conduct random sweeps," he said, noting that the agency had spent a month investigating the area and had compiled a targeted list of illegal immigrants who had worked at a poultry plant using fraudulent documents. "Race or ethnicity played no role," he said.

Federal agents searching for undocumented immigrants who worked at the Crider Corp. poultry plant in Stillmore, Ga., arrested more than 125 people in September. No U.S. citizens were arrested, but the suit claims that agents "trampled on" the constitutional rights of "every person of Hispanic descent unfortunate enough to get in the way."

Marie Justeen Mancha — a 15-year-old who was born in Texas and lives in Reidsville, Ga. — says she was in her bedroom getting dressed for school when she heard men inside her home yelling "illegals" and "Mexicans." In the living room, she says, she saw five men, one with his hand on his gun holster.

"My heart just dropped," she said.

Nearly two dozen armed agents roamed her house and yard without presenting a search warrant, the lawsuit said. Mancha's mother, Maria Christina Martinez, is a U.S. citizen who previously worked at the chicken plant.

According to the suit filed in federal court in Atlanta, agents stopped one plaintiff, Maria Margarita Morales, as she was driving home, repeatedly called her "Mexican," grabbed her arm and ordered her to get out of her vehicle. Agents also surrounded another plaintiff, Ranulfo Perez, outside his home, the suit said, grabbing him by the shirt, pressing a gun into his side and throwing him against his truck. Another plaintiff, Gladis Alicia Espitia, says agents broke down her front door and threatened to throw gas into her home if her family did not come out of a bedroom.

Georgia has the nation's fastest-growing population of illegal immigrants. According to the federal government, the number of undocumented immigrants in the state more than doubled, to 470,000 from 220,000, in the last five years. ICE's Atlanta office — which covers Georgia, South Carolina and North Carolina — arrested 4,633 suspected illegal immigrants in 2006, more than any previous year.

DOJ_NMG_0090129

Bauer said the Southern Poverty Law Center filed the suit — which lists Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, six ICE administrators and 30 unnamed ICE agents as defendants — to warn federal agents against conducting similar raids.

"If immigration is a problem, this isn't the solution," she said. "We want to send out a strong message that if they do this in other communities, they are going to be sued."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Says Rumsfeld, Cheney Should Stay (AP-Y)

By Terence Hunt

AP, November 2, 2006

President Bush said Wednesday he wants Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney to remain with him until the end of his presidency, extending a job guarantee to two of the most-vilified members of his administration.

"Both those men are doing fantastic jobs and I strongly support them," Bush said in an interview with The Associated Press and others.

On the war in Iraq, Bush said the military has not asked for an increase in U.S. forces beyond the 144,000 already there. He said U.S. generals have told him "that the troop level they got right now is what they can live with."

On another international issue, Bush said he was determined that sanctions imposed against North Korea must be applied even though Pyongyang has agreed to return to six-nation nuclear disarmament talks.

The president spoke in the Oval Office, seated in a wing chair in front of a table with a bowl of roses. Six days before midterm elections, he steered away from political questions beyond saying he was confident that Republicans would defy the polls and hold control of the House and Senate. "I understand the pundits have got the race over. But I don't believe it's over until everybody votes," Bush said.

He refused to say whether he could work effectively with House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi or Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid if Democrats won either the House or Senate, or both.

Bush did take the opportunity to take another poke at Sen. John Kerry, in political hot water for a remark that the White House has characterized as a slam on U.S. troops in Iraq. Kerry has said he was making a joke critical of Bush, not the troops.

"It didn't sound like a joke to me," the president said.

Democrats and Republicans alike have called for Rumsfeld's resignation, arguing he has mishandled the war in Iraq where more than 2,800 members of the U.S. military have died since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003. Cheney has faced sharp criticism for his hardline views. In recent polling, less than 40 percent of respondents had a favorable view of Cheney and about a third had a favorable view of Rumsfeld.

Bush said he valued Cheney's advice and judgment.

"The good thing about Vice President Cheney's advice is, you don't read about it in the newspaper after he gives it," the president said. While Cheney was re-elected with Bush for four years, there has been recurring speculation that he might step down, perhaps for health reasons. As a practical matter, Bush could ask the vice president to leave if he wanted.

Bush credited Rumsfeld with overseeing wars in Iraq and Afghanistan while overhauling the military. "I'm pleased with the progress we're making," the president said. He replied in the affirmative when asked if he wanted Rumsfeld and Cheney to stay with him until the end.

Responding to Bush, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said, "With all due respect, the president just doesn't get it. We need a change in the Iraq strategy, but with Rumsfeld running the show we'll never get it."

Bush opened the interview by saying he was pleased that North Korea was returning to stalled nuclear talks. Although North Korea has a history of walking away from negotiations, Bush did not express doubts about the intentions of Kim Jong Il, North Korea's leader.

"It's his choice," Bush said. "I would hope he is sincere." He said that any deal with North Korea would have to be verifiable.

The president said he did not accept North Korea as a nuclear weapons state, even though it tested an atomic bomb three weeks ago. "Our objective is to see they're not a nuclear weapons state," the president said.

Bush said Robert Joseph, U.S. undersecretary of state for arms control and international security, and R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, will travel through the region to talk with allies about how to make progress.

DOJ_NMG_0090130

"We're going to talk about making sure that the sanctions passed by the United Nations are effective," the president said. "Implementation of the sanctions will be on the table."

As for Iraq, the president expressed confidence in Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki despite apparent strains between Washington and Baghdad.

"I appreciate he's making hard decisions that he thinks are necessary to keep his country united and moving forward," Bush said. "I didn't find many differences of opinion when I talked to him. We both want Iraq to be able to govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself. We both want there to be benchmarks — Iraqi developed and designed benchmarks — that show the Iraqi people and the American people that this young democracy is making progress."

Bush said that "there's no question that October was a tough month. We lost 103 soldiers. It was a tough month because we were on the offense, the enemy was on the offense — the enemy was trying to affect us. And it was a tough month because of Ramadan. ... Our troops and Iraqi troops killed or captured over 1,500 people during this period of time."

Bush refused to comment on Cheney's assertion that a "dunk in water" of terrorist suspects was a "no-brainer" if it would save American lives. "We don't discuss the techniques we use," Bush said.

On other questions, Bush said:

_He will send Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson to Capitol Hill after the election to determine what can be achieved in the way of overhauling Social Security and Medicare.

_He understands the anxieties of some Republicans who have distanced themselves from his Iraq policies. "People will run the race they need to run," he said. Bush said Democrats "don't have a plan for victory."

_"It's hard for me to tell" if U.S. troops will still be in Iraq when he leaves office in January 2009.

Kerry Offers Apology To Troops (WP)

By Peter Baker And Jim VandeHei

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) issued two apologies for remarks that seemed to impugn U.S. troops and abandoned his public schedule yesterday, but he denounced what he called the "campaign of smear and fear" against him as the surreal sequel to the 2004 presidential election echoed across the campaign trail.

The White House and Republican allies orchestrated a cascade of denunciations throughout the day to keep the once and possibly future presidential candidate on the defensive and force other Democrats to distance themselves. Kerry canceled plans to appear with several candidates and returned home to avoid becoming "a distraction to these campaigns."

Republican strategists appeared almost gleeful over the contretemps because it revived a favorite target at a time they need to motivate core supporters to vote in Tuesday's midterm elections. GOP officials have tried to make the elections not a referendum on President Bush but a choice between two parties with competing visions over taxes, terrorism and Iraq, but they have struggled to find a symbol for Democrats. Kerry's comments have allowed Republicans to make him again the face of his party and cast 2006 as a rerun of Bush vs. Kerry.

Democrats were irritated to lose two days in the homestretch that they would rather have devoted to Bush's troubled Iraq policy, and they pressed Kerry to apologize and get out of sight. Hoping to change the subject, Democrats seized on comments by Bush, who told reporters he wants Vice President Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to remain in their jobs for the final two years of his administration.

To reassert their main message, Democrats planned a blitz of final-weekend television advertising assailing Bush for his management of the war; Republicans, meanwhile, poured more money into once-safe districts in a sign that the field of competitive races may still be expanding. Polls and strategists in both parties indicate that the Democrats are in position to win the House and are running neck-and-neck to take the Senate.

Republicans decided to make a last-minute bid to help save two GOP senators who had been almost given up for lost. Sens. Conrad Burns (Mont.) and Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.) trail Democratic challengers but appear within striking distance, according to GOP strategists. Democrats need to all but sweep the most competitive Senate races to win control.

But much of the day's political conversation centered on Kerry. His return to the national spotlight provided a new opening to Republicans, who have been battered through much of the fall by the political fallout from the escalating violence in Iraq, the House page scandal and new corruption probes.

Speaking to an audience in California on Monday, Kerry said: "Education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. And if you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

Kerry said yesterday that he meant it as a dig at Bush, and his office released a copy of the prepared remarks he was supposed to deliver: "I can't overstress the importance of a great education. Do you know where you end up if you don't study, if you aren't smart, if you're intellectually lazy? You end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq. Just ask President Bush."

DOJ_NMG_0090131

Rejecting the explanation, Republicans quickly developed a Web ad demanding that he apologize and issued statement after statement attacking and mocking him. One released by House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (Ohio) included a picture that appeared to show soldiers in the desert holding up a banner: "Halp Us Jon Carry -- We R Stuck Hear N Irak."

Bush for the second day took aim at his old foe as well. "It didn't sound like a joke to me," he said in an interview with news services. In a separate interview with radio host Rush Limbaugh, Bush said, "Anybody who is in a position to serve this country ought to understand the consequences of words, and our troops deserve the full support of people in government."

Cheney also jumped into the fray, his office so eager that in a rare move it sent out advance excerpts from a speech given later in the day. "Senator Kerry said he was just making a joke and he botched it up," Cheney said. "I guess we didn't get the nuance. Actually, he was for the joke before he was against it."

Around the country, Republicans pressed Democratic opponents to respond to Kerry's remarks. "Whatever the intent, Senator Kerry was wrong to say what he said," said Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. (D), who is in a tight Senate race in Tennessee. "He needs to apologize to our troops."

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) likewise condemned the remarks. "What Senator Kerry said was inappropriate," she said at a Veterans of Foreign Wars post. She added: "We don't need to be reciting the 2004 election, as much as President Bush would like that to happen. This election is about him and his policies."

Kerry tried twice to explain himself yesterday. After a Democratic candidate asked the senator not to campaign with him, Kerry canceled the rest of his schedule and called in to the Don Imus radio talk show, which is simulcast on MSNBC. Kerry said it is Bush who owes the nation an apology, for a botched war.

"They're trying to change the subject," Kerry said. "It's their campaign of smear and fear. . . . This is Swift boat stuff all over again."

Asked why not apologize for the misunderstanding, Kerry said: "Of course I'm sorry about a botched joke. You think I love botched jokes? I mean, it's pretty stupid."

Imus reflected Democratic anxieties by asking Kerry to stop talking publicly because it might "ruin" the party's election chances.

"I love you, but just stop it," Imus said. "I'm begging you."

"Well, I think it's important to talk about Iraq," Kerry said.

"I'm begging you," Imus said.

"I hear you," Kerry said. "You do not have to beg. You're my friend. I understand what you're saying. But I'm telling you, I'm not going to let these guys lie and smear."

"Stop now, stop now," Imus said again. "I'm begging you."

"You got it," Kerry said.

Kerry's apology did not satisfy critics, so by day's end, he issued a written apology: "I sincerely regret that my words were misinterpreted to wrongly imply anything negative about those in uniform and I personally apologize to any service member, family member or American who was offended."

Heading into the final days before the elections, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee plans to run an advertisement over the weekend that hits Republicans for not holding Bush accountable on the Iraq war, but the ad buy is small and is scheduled for CNN alone. More than half of Democratic candidates in close races for the House and the Senate are planning ads criticizing Bush for his management of the war.

Republicans, meanwhile, are spending a lot of money protecting GOP seats. The National Republican Congressional Committee launched a $200,000-plus ad to help Rep. Charles H. Taylor (N.C.), who trails Democrat Heath Shuler. As part of its effort to limit losses, the NRCC is spending heavily in Idaho to win an open seat in a conservative part of the country. Rep. Melissa Hart (Pa.), who was not considered in much trouble a few weeks ago, is also getting last-minute help from the NRCC.

Both sides are making last-ditch efforts at long-shot races as well. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee plans to run $1 million in ads against Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.). Republicans are making a play for Michigan, where polls show Democratic Sen. Debbie Stabenow with a steady lead.

Bush Stands By Cheney, Rumsfeld (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

washington — President Bush reached out Wednesday to conservative audiences, delivering pared-down versions of his campaign speech in interviews with radio talk show host Rush Limbaugh and Pat Robertson's Christian Broadcasting Network.

And, in a separate interview with news agencies, he gave a vow of support for Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, two heroes to conservatives, and said he wanted them to remain in their posts.

DOJ_NMG_0090132

With control of the Senate and House at stake in Tuesday's election, the president has focused on delivering a sharp-edged message intended to draw contrasts between Republicans and Democrats and energize his most loyal conservative voters to get to the polls.

Rumsfeld and Cheney have become focal points for critics of the administration's policies in Iraq. Democrats, and some Republicans, have called in increasing numbers for Rumsfeld's removal as the death toll in Iraq has climbed.

Bush told news services Wednesday that "both those men are doing fantastic jobs, and I strongly support them," the Associated Press reported. When he was asked whether he wanted them to remain until the end of his term, he said yes.

The president also said he did not anticipate an increase in the approximately 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, saying that U.S. commanders there had assured him that "they've got what they can live with."

In the interview with Limbaugh, Bush said the fundamental issue in the campaign was whether voters would elect a Congress that supported him on national security issues.

"People come up to me all the time and say, 'Thank you for protecting us,' " Bush said. "And my answer in this campaign is, 'I'm going to continue to protect you, but I need a Congress that understands the stakes.' "

In its interview, the Christian Broadcasting Network asked Bush: "What's your prayer for the country?"

"My prayer is that this world be peaceful so that children can grow up understanding the benefits of freedom," the president said.

Bush Works To Solidify Base With A Defense Of Rumsfeld (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 1 — With less than a week before the election, President Bush sought to rally Republican voters on Wednesday with a vigorous defense of the war in Iraq and a vow to keep Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld in office until the end of Mr. Bush's term.

Mr. Bush appeared on Rush Limbaugh's radio program, whose audience is a reservoir of conservative voters, to criticize Democrats as lacking a plan for victory in Iraq.

Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney also spent another day going after Senator John Kerry, the Democratic presidential nominee two years ago, for remarks that Republicans say insulted the intelligence of American troops in Iraq.

"Anybody who is in a position to serve this country ought to understand the consequences of words," Mr. Bush said, "and our troops deserve the full support of people in government."

Mr. Kerry said in a statement issued on Wednesday by his office that his "poorly stated joke at a rally was not about and never intended to refer to any troop."

As Mr. Bush worked to solidify his base, Democratic and Republican Party committees were making some of their final moves on the electoral chessboard. The Republican Senate committee reported spending nearly $1 million on television advertisements in Maryland and more than $800,000 in Michigan. The Senate seats in those states are held by Democrats and have generally been considered safe, but the investments by Republicans suggested a hope of making them competitive.

Democrats sought to expand the contest for the Senate as well by buying air time in Arizona to rattle, if not defeat, Senator Jon Kyl, a Republican thought to be headed for relatively easy re-election. Democratic officials would not disclose how much they were spending.

Mr. Bush, in an interview with wire service reporters on Wednesday, said he intended to keep Mr. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon and Mr. Cheney in the vice presidency until he leaves office in 2009. Both are controversial figures, even among some Republicans, but they are also popular with conservatives who form the foundation of Mr. Bush's political and electoral strategy.

With polls showing a majority of Americans unhappy with the course of the war and many Republican candidates distancing themselves from Mr. Bush on it, the White House was taking a gamble on making Iraq the central subject of discussion in the final week of the campaign. His embrace of Mr. Rumsfeld carried particular risk, since some Republican candidates have joined nearly all Democrats in seeking his dismissal.

Democrats responded to the Republicans' efforts with new advertisements accusing Mr. Bush and Mr. Rumsfeld of botching the war and making the United States less safe. A television spot from the Democratic Congressional committee said, "The White House is in denial as top generals warn that Iraq may be sliding into full-scale civil war."

A veterans group released an advertisement on Wednesday in which Iraq war veterans and Gen. Wesley K. Clark, who is retired and who was a Democratic presidential candidate in 2004, criticize the war. "Because of Iraq, there are more terrorists in the world," one veteran says.

Democrats also criticized Representative John A. Boehner, the No. 2 Republican in the House, as seeming to shift responsibility for problems in Iraq from Secretary Rumsfeld to the uniformed military.

DOJ_NMG_0090133

"Let's not blame what's happening in Iraq on Rumsfeld," Mr. Boehner said in an interview on CNN on Wednesday afternoon. "But the fact is, the generals on the ground are in charge, and he works closely with them and the president."

Seeking to a draw a parallel to the flap over Mr. Kerry's comments, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the minority leader, demanded that Mr. Boehner apologize to the generals.

"John Boehner ought to be ashamed," Mr. Reid said in a statement. "He's blaming our troops for failures in Iraq."

Republican leaders hoped to buck up morale among conservative Christians, a normally reliable source of Republican votes. A sizeable number of such so-called values voters have told pollsters that they are unhappy with Mr. Bush and the Republican-led Congress and might stay home on Election Day or vote for Democrats.

James C. Dobson, founder of Focus on the Family and an influential voice among evangelical Christian voters, said on his radio program this week that Democrats and the news media were trying to suppress the conservative vote by reporting on unhappiness among evangelicals.

Mr. Dobson also warned that a Democratic takeover of Congress would bring "crippling setbacks in the battles against abortion and gay marriage."

In recent days, Mr. Bush and his surrogates have sought to rally Republicans by raising the specter of what they call unreconstructed liberal Democrats leading powerful committees if the Democrats regain control of Congress. Mr. Cheney took aim at one of them, Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York, who is in line to become chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, which writes tax laws.

Mr. Cheney said late last week that Mr. Rangel knew nothing about the American economy and would raise taxes as soon as he took over the committee.

Mr. Rangel responded by using a profanity to question Mr. Cheney's parentage. He said in an interview Wednesday that he was sorry for his choice of words, but not for the thought. He said he hoped that if the Democrats won control of Congress the nasty language on both sides would cease.

"I can take a political shot," Mr. Rangel said. "But my family and friends and constituents deserve better from the vice president of the United States."

Bush Seeks To Minimize Burden Of Iraq On Republican Candidates (BLOOM)

By Richard Keil

Bloomberg, November 2, 2006

Nov. 2 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush sought on several fronts yesterday to minimize what he acknowledged was the political burden of Iraq on Republicans in the Nov. 7 congressional elections.

The president, in an interview at the White House, reiterated his firm support for two of the officials most closely identified with U.S. policies there, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney, and predicted his party would hang on to its majority in Congress.

Bush also took another jab at one of his chief critics, Democratic Senator John Kerry, for remarks that have been interpreted as a criticism of U.S. troops. Kerry last night apologized for what he said was a ``botched" attempt at a joke aimed at Bush.

``It didn't sound like a joke to me," Bush said before Kerry issued his apology. ``More importantly, it didn't sound like a joke to the troops."

With six days until the midterm election, Bush is attempting to rally core Republican voters to counter what polls show is widespread dissatisfaction with Congress and his handling of the presidency. He said he understood why some of his party's candidates are distancing themselves from his administration.

``People will run the race they need to run," Bush said. Still, he said he was confident Republicans would prevail.

``This is not my first campaign," Bush said. ``When people get in that booth, they'll ask two questions: Who best to protect us, and how best to keep the economy going."

In the final days before the election, Bush has been granting interviews with news organizations and stumping for candidates across the country.

Iraq

One of the biggest hurdles for Republicans is growing public sentiment that the war in Iraq was a mistake. A New York Times/CBS News poll released last night found 64 percent of Americans disapprove of the way Bush is handling the war. Other than Bush, Cheney and Rumsfeld are the two officials who draw the most criticism on the war.

Democrats and some Republicans have called for Rumsfeld to resign over the U.S. failure to head off an insurgency and sectarian strife that has increased the level of violence in Iraq. There were 99 U.S. military personnel killed in combat in Iraq during October, the biggest monthly toll since November 2004, when 126 were killed as U.S. forces were driving insurgents from the city of Fallujah. Another six died in accidents and from other causes last month, bringing the total death toll to 105.

DOJ_NMG_0090134

`Fantastic Jobs'

Bush said he values Cheney's counsel and said Rumsfeld has steered the U.S. through wars in Iraq and Afghanistan while also undertaking an effort to transform the military's approach to warfare.

Both men ``are doing fantastic jobs," he said, adding that he wants them to remain in place for the rest of his presidency.

The president's comments about Rumsfeld were immediately seized on by Senator Charles Schumer of New York, who is heading Democratic Senate Campaign Committee.

``The president just doesn't get it," Schumer said in a statement. ``We need a change in the Iraq strategy, but with Rumsfeld running the show we'll never get it."

The furor over Kerry's remarks, made Oct. 30 during a campaign event in California, gave Republicans a rare opportunity to go on the offensive about Iraq. Kerry told his audience that those who fail to study hard ``could end up getting stuck in Iraq."

Regrets

Bush and other Republican demanded an apology for what they said was a slam against U.S. troops. Last night they got it.

``I sincerely regret that my words were misinterpreted to wrongly imply anything negative about those in uniform, and I personally apologize to any service member, family member, or American who was offended," Kerry said in a statement.

Some Republicans suggested Kerry's apology would lay the matter to rest. House Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio said the apology was ``good enough." White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said ``it was the right thing to do."

Still, the Republican National Committee said the party would continue using Kerry's gaffe in campaign material.

``It is getting a significant amount of local coverage," said Danny Diaz, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee in Washington. ``Republicans are on the offensive. Democrats are defensive."

Minimal Effect

Steve Hess, a presidential scholar at the Washington-based Brookings Institution, said any effects weren't likely to carry over to Election Day. ``I can't really imagine anybody going into the voting booth on Tuesday who is going to change their mind or even be there because John Kerry said something stupid," he said.

Bush acknowledged that Iraq hangs over the political landscape and is impeding his efforts to tout the growth of the U.S. economy since he took office and lower income tax rates passed by the Republican-controlled Congress.

``No question about that," he said. ``People ask me, `If the economy is so good, why aren't people celebrating.'" The rising cost of health care and energy are among the reasons, he said. So is Iraq.

``The war has overshadowed a lot," Bush said.

Looking past the election, Bush said he would send Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson to Capitol Hill to solicit ideas from Democrats and Republicans on restructuring entitlement programs such as Medicare and Medicaid, which face funding shortfalls.

`Willing to Listen'

``I am willing to listen to anything," Bush said. ``But I recognize it's going to take a bipartisan approach."

Another initiative the Bush wants to revive is revamping the Social Security program. Bush said that must be done without increasing taxes. Some Democrats, including former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin, have said taxes must be part of the equation in discussions about entitlement programs.

``Everyone knows my position: I believe we can solve this problem without raising taxes," Bush said. ``It's going to be important for people, if they are interested in going forward, not to put any preconditions on it."

Bush To Hit GOP Campaign Trail (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- On voters' minds though not on the ballot, President Bush is defiantly embracing the issue that has made him both unpopular and a possible liability for Republican congressional candidates this year: unyielding support for the war in Iraq.

As he heads out for a campaign-closing tour through the weekend—starting out West on Thursday and carrying him to Iowa and Missouri on Friday—the president is stumping with the fervor of someone whose own office is at stake. And in many ways it is, considering the impact on the remaining two years of his presidency if the Democrats take control of the House and possibly the Senate.

Insisting that this contest is "far from over," Bush has escalated his campaign-trail rhetoric about the war with a warning: "However they put it, the Democrats' approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses."

As Florida Gov. Jeb Bush put it, "My brother loves a fight. He enjoys to be underestimated. He has defied the pundits in the last three election cycles. He will take risks on behalf of his cause."

The risk of putting so much behind support for the war in Iraq in the face of so much distressing news from the battlefront is that public opposition to the war will take the same toll on some of his party's candidates that it has taken on Bush's own public approval ratings. They have been below 40 percent for months.

Yet analysts say the president's resolve for fighting the war against terrorism remains his strongest suit politically and represents his best chance for stirring conservative turnout Tuesday in taut races, such as Missouri's contest between Sen. Jim Talent (R-Mo.) and Democrat Claire McCaskill.

As unpopular as the war in Iraq has become, they say, the president cannot run from it—so he is running with it.

"All other issues are taking second fiddle to Iraq," said Philip Hughes, a communications consultant who served on the National Security Councils of the previous Bush and Reagan administrations. He said flatly that the current Bush administration "has really done a lousy job of communicating its policy" on Iraq.

"There is nothing that seems to be so quite in the minds of Americans—not gay marriage… not taxes. There is nothing that overshadows Iraq," Hughes said. "The president, it seems to me, has no choice but to defend his policy, to defend Iraq. It seems to me this is the only option, the only play."

Playing to the issue that has carried his party through the last two elections, the president is portraying the GOP as the party prepared to protect Americans from terrorism and Democrats as the party ready to "cut and run" from the fight in Iraq.

"You can't win a war unless you're willing to fight the war," Bush said as he campaigned for a Republican House candidate in Sugar Land, Texas, this week. "Retreat from Iraq before the job was done would embolden an enemy and make this country more vulnerable to attack."

Democrats complain that the president is tarring critics of the war in Iraq by waging a campaign of "fear."

The administration is "massively overstating" the threat that terrorism poses to the United States, according to John Mueller, a professor of political science at Ohio State University and author of a new book, "Overblown: How Politicians and the Terrorism Industry Inflate National Security Threats, and Why We Believe Them."

Yet for Bush, Mueller said, campaigning on a perceived threat of terrorism following any failure of the U.S. mission in Iraq remains "his strongest suit. … In politics, what you always do is play to your strong suit."

The Republicans also have found fresh fodder for their argument that Democrats don't understand the stakes in Iraq with Sen. John Kerry's "botched joke" this week. If "you study hard … you can do well," Kerry said. "If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq." Kerry said he botched a prepared line about Bush getting stuck in Iraq, but Bush and fellow Republican leaders accused Kerry of insulting the intelligence of American troops.

"Of course, now Sen. Kerry says he was just making a joke, and he botched it up," Vice President Dick Cheney said at a campaign rally in Montana on Wednesday. "I guess we didn't get the nuance. He was for the joke before he was against it."

Kerry apologized Wednesday to "any service member, family member or American" offended by his comment and said he regretted that his words were "misinterpreted to imply anything negative about those in uniform."

In another pointed effort to turn out conservatives, the president also is campaigning for passage of several state proposals to ban same-sex marriage.

Having failed to win congressional support for a constitutional amendment defining marriage as the union of a man and woman, Bush has raised the issue anew in recent days, since the New Jersey Supreme Court ruled that the state must give gay and lesbian couples the same legal rights as it affords married couples.

"For decades, activist judges have tried to redefine America by court order," Bush said, campaigning in Georgia this week. "Just this last week in New Jersey, another activist court issued a ruling that raises doubt about the institution of marriage."

Twenty states have enacted constitutional amendments banning gay marriage, and voters in another eight states face amendments on Tuesday—including Tennessee and Virginia where Republicans are fighting to turn out the vote in close races that could determine the balance of partisan power in the Senate.

"It's really a base-mobilization argument," said John Green, a political scientist at the University of Akron. "The issue had lost some of its immediacy.… What the New Jersey Supreme Court ruling did was make it possible to talk about the return of that urgency. It may indeed help mobilize conservative Christians."

Campaigning on the war, too, can help mobilize conservatives disenchanted with the president's stance on other issues, such as deficit spending, Green said. "These are people who nonetheless care a great deal about national security," he said.

Keeping the spotlight focused on Iraq is not without risk in elections where many Democrats are trying to frame them as a referendum on Bush in general, and the war in particular.

DOJ_NMG_0090136

This is the case, Green said, "because Iraq is becoming less and less popular—even within his own party. On the other hand, he doesn't have much alternative…. It's a variation on [Secretary of Defense Donald] Rumsfeld's comment that you go to war with the army that you have…. You go into the last week of a campaign with the policies that you have."

IGs Probe Allegations On Global Warming Data (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

Inspectors general at two agencies have begun an investigation into whether the Bush administration has suppressed government scientists' research on global warming, officials at NASA and the Commerce Department confirmed yesterday.

Prompted by a request this fall by 14 Democratic senators, the IGs are examining whether political appointees have prevented climate researchers at NASA and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration from conveying their findings to the public.

The issue of global warming has emerged as one of the most contentious scientific debates within the administration. In the past year, several federal climate scientists, including James Hansen, director of NASA's Goddard Institute for Space Studies, have accused the administration of muzzling them, a charge the White House has denied.

Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.), a member of the Environment and Public Works Committee and author of the Sept. 29 letter to the two inspectors general, said yesterday in an interview that he was pleased about the investigation. "It's extremely important, because the evidence is so obvious that they've tried to block the presentation of information on this in an unbiased fashion," Lautenberg said.

The probe's results should become public early next year, a Lautenberg aide said.

Officials at NASA and the Commerce Department, which oversees NOAA, pledged to cooperate with any inquiry but defended their media policies.

"We support and encourage a process of open, peer-reviewed science, and the role of our public affairs office, like any other organization, is to coordinate and ensure that media get timely, accurate and thorough information," said Richard Mills, spokesman for Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez.

NASA spokesman Dean Acosta, whose agency came under intense media scrutiny once Hansen aired his allegations in January, noted that since then: "NASA clarified its policy ensuring free and open communications of scientific and engineering data with the public and across the agency. The revised policy was widely distributed and widely reported upon. It is working well."

Senate Environment and Public Works Committee Chairman James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.), who has called the idea of human-induced climate change a "hoax," questioned why government officials would be investigating the matter. "This is purely eleventh-hour election-year politics," he said.

Some federal scientists interviewed yesterday said they welcomed the probe because they had encountered problems in speaking to reporters about their work.

Tom Knutson, a climate research scientist at NOAA's Geophysical Fluid Dynamics Laboratory in Princeton, N.J., said he could not speak in his official capacity, "but as a private citizen, I think it's a good idea they're looking into that. There should be open lines of communication between scientists and the media, and some of what I experienced did not meet that standard."

A year ago, Knutson said, Bush administration officials twice blocked him from discussing with television reporters a possible connection between global warming and hurricanes.

An Oct. 19, 2005, e-mail exchange between Commerce Department spokesman Chuck Fuqua and NOAA spokesman Kent Laborde, concerning a possible CNBC interview with Knutson, details Fuqua's concern that Knutson is less willing to discount the connection than two other government researchers. "Why can't we have one of the other guys on then?" Fuqua asked Laborde. The exchange was posted on the Web site of Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.).

Democrats Say Hunger Report Stalled (AP-Y)

By Libby Quaid, Ap Food And Farm Writer

AP, November 2, 2006

Democrats are accusing the Bush administration of holding up a report on the number of people going hungry in the United States.

Since 1999, the number of people struggling with hunger has risen from 31 million to 38 million in 2004. The Agriculture Department report has generally been released in October, a month after annual poverty figures are released by the Census Department.

DOJ_NMG_0090137

Democrats said the delay appears political. Competitive elections across the country will decide next Tuesday whether President Bush's party keeps control of Congress.

USDA officials said the report has long been set for a mid-November release and that the delay is not political.

Rep. Anthony Weiner, D-N.Y., compared the delay to a recent IRS decision to hold off collections of back taxes from last year's hurricane victims.

"It seems like a pattern is emerging where the administration simply tries to bury bad information the closer they get to the election," Weiner said.

"The professionals in these agencies who want to do their work in this administration are being thwarted, because it's all politics, all the time," he said.

Rep. Rosa DeLauro, D-Conn., said the administration "continues to put politics ahead of hunger in America." She is the top Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee's farm spending subcommittee.

Weiner sent a letter about the delay Wednesday to Karl Rove, the president's chief political strategist.

A department spokeswoman, Terri Teuber, said officials decided some time ago to issue the report in mid-November because analysts haven't always been able to finish it by October.

"There has been absolutely no political pressure to hold this report," Teuber said.

Done by the department's Economic Research Service, the report details the number of people with food insecurity, meaning they don't have enough money or resources to get food.

It is possible the report will show the number of hungry people has stopped climbing. That is what the Census Bureau reported on this year's poverty figures. Last year there were 37 million people still living below the poverty line, about the same as 2004.

Regardless of the reason for the delay, anti-hunger advocates just want to see the numbers.

"Our real concern is that so few people are talking about the problem and proposing ways to address that struggle with hunger that 38 million people constantly face," said Jim Weill, president of the Food Research and Action Center.

That goes for the administration, for both parties in Congress and for the private sector, Weill said.

"If we ought to be able to do anything as a country, it's that we ought to be able to get enough adequate, decent food to everybody," Weill said.

OTHER NEWS:

Economy Displays More Signs Of Slowing (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — There is little doubt the economy is slowing. What is unclear is how long the decline will last or how deep it will be.

The latest evidence of a slowing economy came Wednesday in reports showing a dip in the rate of growth in the manufacturing sector and a further decline in housing construction.

Also on Wednesday, Merrill Lynch warned clients that its “recession-risk indicator” is now pointing to a 51% chance of a recession in the next year, the highest such odds since the last recession in 2001.

The indicator has only twice hit the 51% line without being followed by a recession, Merrill Lynch chief North American economist David Rosenberg said in a report titled, “On a Knife's Edge.”

The question of whether there will be a recession is “still a tough call,” he says. But “what the indicator represents is, at a minimum, a significant slowing in growth.”

Joel Naroff of Naroff Economic Advisors says there are still enough factors in the economy's favor to keep it afloat. In particular, job growth is still solid, and wages are rising while interest rates are low, historically speaking. But that doesn't mean the economy is poised for a big takeoff.

“I'm not concerned about a recession at all, but I do think that we could be looking at (subpar) growth … this quarter and the first half of next year,” he says.

But Sue Burnett of Houston-based Burnett Staffing Specialists, says hiring in Texas is still strong, particularly for engineers, accountants and call-center operators.

“We think that the economy is doing fine,” she says. “We see that people are optimistic, that they are hiring people. We haven't seen any layoffs or any cutbacks.”

DOJ_NMG_0090138

Growth in the manufacturing sector in October eased to the slowest pace since June 2003, the Institute for Supply Management said. Measures of orders, production and order backlogs all declined, while employment grew.

Norbert Ore, who heads the ISM factory survey, says one of the “big worries” was that manufacturers on average said their clients' inventories were “too high” last month, the first time that has happened in more than five years. That's significant, because if firms have large inventories on hand, they will not need to order more goods, potentially leading to a drop in manufacturing activity.

AGCO, a farm equipment manufacturer and distributor, said Wednesday that net sales in 2006 are expected to be down 2% to 3% vs. 2005, “based on lower industry demand and planned dealer inventory reductions,” the Duluth, Ga.-based firm said in a statement accompanying its latest earnings report.

In another report, the Commerce Department said construction activity declined for the third-consecutive month in September to the lowest level since January. An increase in non-residential construction was more than offset by a decrease in home building.

Weak U.S. Manufacturing Data Signal Slowdown In Economy (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

The latest data on manufacturing activity offered little support for the idea that the U.S. economy will rebound quickly from a slow third quarter.

The Institute for Supply Management, a purchasing managers' trade group, said its manufacturing index fell to 51.2 in October, from 52.9 a month earlier. The new-orders component of the index, which offers a glimpse of potential manufacturing activity, fell to 52.1 from 54.2. Any number above 50 suggests expansion, but the October readings indicate that the manufacturing sector, which makes up about a fifth of the economy, was losing momentum as it entered the current quarter.

"It's an indication that we've peaked and the rate of growth is slowing or will disappear for the short term," said Norbert Ore, who oversees the manufacturing survey and also serves as procurement director at Georgia-Pacific Corp. One bright spot, he said, was a sharp drop in the "prices paid" portion of the survey -- a sign that inflation pressures are easing along with energy prices.

Economists said the deceleration in manufacturing suggests that slowdowns in both the housing and automobile sectors are spreading to the broader economy, as a drop in home and auto construction translates into fewer orders for factories. Mr. Ore named wood products, appliances, plastics and fabricated metals among the sectors that had seen the sharpest declines in October.

"I think I hear the footsteps of housing construction going up the supply chain," said Jim Meil, chief economist at Eaton Corp. in Cleveland.

The ISM report added to investor concerns about the U.S. economy's ability to recover from a tepid third quarter, during which its annualized, inflation-adjusted growth rate fell to an estimated 1.6% -- the slowest pace since 2003.

Recent data have shown significant declines in housing and housing-related industries. Last week, the government estimated that residential investment fell at an annualized, inflation-adjusted rate of 17% in the third quarter -- the largest quarterly drop since 1991. Yesterday, the Commerce Department reported that overall construction spending fell 0.3% in September from a month earlier, and the National Association of Realtors said its index of pending home sales slipped 1.1% in September from August. Also in September, production in several housing-related sectors -- such as wood products and furniture -- dropped more than 1%, according to the Federal Reserve. All the data are seasonally adjusted.

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

1

WSJ's Jon Hilsenrath explains how today's economic indicators2 fit together to give a big picture of the economy's state, with more indications of a slowdown.

"We're going to be down compared to the recent cycle," said Richard Kelley, operations manager at Knoxville Drywall Inc., which does contracting mainly for residential housing projects in and around Knoxville, Tenn. "It's coming back to a more sustainable level." He said his orders for drywall were about flat in October compared with a year earlier, after rising more than 10% the year before.

Some economists argue that any downturn in manufacturing will be short-lived, because consumer demand remains healthy. Data on September personal income and consumption, for example, suggested people have money and are willing to spend. Drew Matus, an economist at Lehman Brothers in New York, says many company executives are probably holding back not because they can't find customers, but because they're wary of investing in production until they have a better idea of the depth of the downturn in housing.

DOJ_NMG_0090139

Write to Mark Whitehouse at mark.whitehouse@wsj.com3

Catching Breath: Dow Industrials Ease For 4th Day (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

Reports showing surprisingly weak manufacturing and construction activity in the U.S. bumped the Dow Jones Industrial Average lower. The pullback extended the Dow's losing streak to four days, the longest since early August, immediately before the blue-chip indicator began a run to fresh records.

The Dow shed 49.71 points, or 0.4%, to end at 12031.02, up 12.3% on the year. Among the blue-chip indicator's weakest component companies were United Technologies, which fell 2.2%, and Alcoa, which fell 1.5%.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.7%, or 10.13 points, to 1367.81, up 9.6% on the year. The tech-stock-focused Nasdaq Composite Index fell 1.4%, or 32.36 points, to 2334.35, up 5.9% on the year.

The Institute for Supply Management said its index of U.S. manufacturing activity for October fell 1.7 points to 51.2, the lowest level in more than three years and well below analysts' expectations for an October reading of 53.5.

Bond prices rose and the 10-year Treasury yield fell to its lowest level in a month, as traders interpreted the data as a signal inflation remains in check in the U.S. economy.

At the same time, the drop wasn't enough to rekindle investors' fading hopes that the Federal Reserve will cut its key interest-rate target this year to spur economic growth, said Conrad DeQuadros, senior economist at Bear Stearns.

He pointed out that any ISM reading above 50 signals growth, which means that even if the numbers released yesterday were below expectations, they still mean factory activity is rising. By contrast, when the Fed started its last cycle of rate cuts in 2001, the ISM index was below 44, Mr. DeQuadros said.

"The economy is still fairly solid," he said. "If anything, I think this is the type of report that the Fed might welcome."

Separately, the Commerce Department reported U.S. construction spending fell 0.3% in September, worse than the 0.1% decline Wall Street had expected.

Gold rose, as investors flocked to the yellow metal because of its historical role as a haven from economic difficulties. Futures rose $12.50, or 2.1%, to $616.60 a troy ounce, up 19.2% this year.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell; bonds rose. The 10-year note gained 12/32 point, or $3.75 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.565%.

The dollar strengthened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 117.04 yen, compared with 116.96. The euro fell to $1.2755 from $1.2763.

Write to Peter A. McKay at peter.mckay@wsj.com1

Kerry Sorry For 'Stuck In Iraq' Remark (AP-Y)

By David Espo

AP, November 2, 2006

Fearful of damaging his own party in next week's elections, Sen. John Kerry apologized Wednesday to "any service member, family member or American" offended by remarks deemed by Republicans and Democrats to be insulting to U.S. forces in Iraq.

Six days before the election, the Democrats' 2004 presidential nominee said he wanted to avoid becoming a distraction in the final days of the battle for control of Congress. He added he sincerely regretted that his words were "misinterpreted to imply anything negative about those in uniform."

In a brief statement, Kerry attacked President Bush for a "failed security policy." Yet his apology, issued after prominent Democrats had urged him to cancel public appearances, was designed to quell a controversy that party leaders feared would stall their drive for big gains on Nov. 7.

With polls showing the public opposed to the war in Iraq, Democrats have expressed increasing optimism in recent days that they will gain the 15 seats they need to win control of the House. Democrats must pick up six seats to win the Senate, a taller challenge, and both parties made last-minute efforts to increase the number of competitive races.

For the Democratic senatorial committee, that meant pumping about $1 million into an Arizona race long thought out of reach. For the counterpart Republican committee, it meant a foray into Maryland, also viewed as an unlikely state to pick up a seat.

Kerry beat a grudging retreat in his return to the national campaign spotlight. Earlier, on the radio program "Imus in the Morning," the Massachusetts senator said he was "sorry about a botched joke" about Bush. He heaped praise on the troops, adamantly accused Republicans of twisting his words and said it was the commander in chief and his aides who "owe America an apology for this disaster in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0090140

Democrats cringed, though, at the prospect of the Massachusetts senator becoming the face of the party for the second consecutive national campaign. "No one wants to have the 2004 election replayed," said Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., like Kerry, a potential contender for the 2008 nomination.

Congressional candidates in Iowa and Minnesota swiftly made plain that Kerry was no longer welcome to appear at scheduled rallies, and the senator scrapped an appearance in Philadelphia.

"It was a real dumb thing to say. He should say sorry," said Democrat Claire McCaskill, running in a tight Senate campaign in Missouri.

The White House accepted Kerry's statement. "Senator Kerry's apology to the troops for his insulting comments came late but it was the right thing to do," said Dana Perino, deputy press secretary.

With Bush showing the way, Republicans had worked energetically to turn Kerry into an all-purpose target in a campaign that has long loomed as a loser for the GOP — much as they ridiculed him two years ago on their way to electoral gains.

"Anybody who is in a position to serve this country ought to understand the consequences of words. ... We've got incredible people in our military, and they deserve full praise and full support of this government," Bush said in an interview with conservative talk-radio personality Rush Limbaugh.

"Of course, now Senator Kerry says he was just making a joke, and he botched it up," Vice President Dick Cheney said in remarks prepared for a campaign appearance in Montana. "I guess we didn't get the nuance. He was for the joke before he was against it."

The jab was designed to recall Kerry's inartful comment from the last election that he had voted for $87 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan before he voted against it.

Two days ago, Kerry stirred controversy when he told a group of California students that individuals who don't study hard and do their homework would likely "get stuck in Iraq." Aides said the senator had mistakenly dropped one word from his prepared remarks, which was originally written to say "you end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq." In that context, they said, it was clear Kerry was referring to Bush, not to the troops.

The speed with which party leaders and candidates shoved Kerry aside underscored the difficulty he will face running for the nomination after leading the party to defeat in 2004. He also had the misfortune of being disinvited from an appearance in Iowa — the state whose caucuses will begin the delegate selection process for the White House race.

Party leaders were far more focused on the election in six days time, rather than the one two years away.

Democratic officials said the leaders of the party's campaign committees had relayed word to Kerry for him to avoid becoming a distraction. Aides to Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., and Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., chairmen of the Senate and House campaign committees, said they would not comment on any possible telephone conversations that had occurred.

Democrats have privately told outsiders they have locked up 10 of the 15 GOP-held seats they need. Polls indicate several dozen additional races are competitive, far more than appeared possible at the outset of the campaign, and too many for Republican comfort at a time of opposition to the war and low presidential approval ratings at home.

In the Senate, Democrats claim they are on track to defeat four Republican incumbents, including Sens. Mike DeWine in Ohio, Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania, Lincoln Chafee in Rhode Island and Conrad Burns in Montana. Republicans tacitly concede DeWine and Santorum appear headed for defeat, but the party's senatorial committee has launched television commercials in the campaign's final week in an attempt to save Chafee and Burns.

Barring a dramatic shift in opinion in the campaign's final days, that leaves only a handful of races in significant doubt, principally three Republican-held seats in Tennessee, Missouri and Virginia.

Unlike 2004, when Bush rallied the country to his side by asking "who do you trust" in wartime, public opinion polls now show the conflict in Iraq is unpopular. Increasingly, Republican candidates have found it politically necessary to emphasize their differences with Bush on a struggle that has dragged on for nearly four years and cost more than 2,800 American lives.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee unveiled a web video during the day, hoping to turn discontent with the war into opposition to Republican lawmakers who have backed the president. Bill Burton, a spokesman, said it would air on cable television nationally, although he provided no details.

The ad features scenes of carnage and an ominous soundtrack, while the announcer says, "With the White House in denial, while top generals warning that Iraq might be sliding into a full scale civil war, tell Congress it's long past time to put down their rubber stamp and ask the hard questions about Iraq."

Flubbed Joke Makes Kerry A Political Punching Bag, Again (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 1 — He's back.

Senator John Kerry had been carefully and quietly building himself back up after his failed 2004 presidential run, campaigning for Democratic candidates in places where he could forget about his sometimes strained relationships with his peers back in Washington.

But with a single word — or a single word left out of what was supposed to be a laugh line directed at the president — Mr. Kerry has become a punching bag again, for Republicans and for his own party.

"Please stop it," Mr. Kerry's friend, Don Imus, the radio talk show host, urged him on his morning broadcast. "Stop talking. Go home."

But even as Mr. Kerry seemed to follow that advice, retreating to Washington, he was not going away.

For Republicans and the White House, Mr. Kerry's "botched joke" Monday was manna from Massachusetts, that reliable redoubt of liberal caricatures. The White House, which had been struggling for ways to make President Bush less of a liability in the election, seized on Mr. Kerry's comments, with the president, vice president and spokesmen blanketing radio and television to blast him for impugning the troops.

For Democrats, Mr. Kerry became a headache, as Republican candidates in tight races across the country demanded that Democrats return money they had taken from him or call on him to apologize.

Three Democratic challengers announced they had canceled plans to campaign with him — leaving one, Tim Walz in Minnesota, without a prominent surrogate while his opponent campaigned with Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, who called Mr. Kerry unsupportive of the troops.

National leaders calculated that the comments would probably not affect the elections. But Mr. Kerry's sudden center-stage appearance in the last days of the campaign revived grumblings about his putting his own political future ahead of the party's.

Mr. Kerry's advisers were trying to figure out the damage as he considers a 2008 run.

The long-term problem was not so much that he appeared to be insulting the troops — although that did not help, when his message rests so much on his military service and concern for veterans. It was more that his remarks left a segment of his own party, and perhaps the electorate, wondering if he has the agility and political skill to compete at the highest level.

"Do you need to go to joke school?" one reporter asked him.

"Sure," Mr. Kerry replied — a notably concise answer for a senator who typically speaks in paragraphs.

His advisers lamented the senator's inability to get out of his own way, as much as they attacked Mr. Bush and others for trying to raise doubts about Mr. Kerry's patriotism when they had never gone to war.

"It's the skill of the flak machine to make him the target of ridicule when on everything else he's been doing, he has been really tough, he's been really clear, he's been really on," said one of Mr. Kerry's advisers. "You can imagine how frustrating this thing is to all of us. And him in particular."

Mr. Kerry's camp took heart as some bloggers applauded his feisty rebuttal to the president and Mr. McCain on Tuesday night — in comparison to his sluggish response to the attacks by the Swift boat veterans that helped torpedo his 2004 campaign.

"Wow, much to my total shock, yes folks, there IS a live pulse in Senator Kerry's body," wrote Gun Toting Liberal, a blogger. "I think this may just be the first time I have ever listened to the elitist from Massachusetts and felt a compelling interest to lean forward and listen to what the man had to say."

Mr. Kerry's prepared remarks to California students on Monday called for him to say, "Do you know where you end up if you don't study, if you aren't smart, if you're intellectually lazy? You end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq. Just ask President Bush." In his delivery, he dropped the word "us."

Democrats came out strongly against him. Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., who is running for an open Senate seat in Tennessee, said Mr. Kerry was "wrong to say what he did," and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York called Mr. Kerry's remarks inappropriate.

After canceling his appearances, Mr. Kerry called several fellow Democrats to tell them he would apologize, and by the end of the day he issued this statement:

"As a combat veteran, I want to make it clear to anyone in uniform and to their loved ones: my poorly stated joke at a rally was not about, and never intended to refer to any troops. I sincerely regret that my words were misinterpreted to wrongly imply anything negative about those in uniform, and I personally apologize to any service member, family member, or American who was offended."

He blamed Republicans for preferring to "talk about anything but their failed security policy."

"I don't want my verbal slip to be a diversion from the real issues. I will continue to fight for a change of course to provide real security for our country and a winning strategy for our troops."

DOJ_NMG_0090142

Representative Edward J. Markey of Massachusetts, one of the Democrats Mr. Kerry reached out to, said: "The country wants to hear what the president intends to do to correct this disastrous Iraq policy. If the president chooses instead to talk about misinterpreted jokes, shame on him."

Other Democrats insisted the episode revealed little.

"If the issue is whether or not John Kerry can tell a joke and tell it well," Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa, who campaigned for Mr. Kerry in 2004, said in an interview with Radio Iowa, "I could have told you the answer to that question was no a week ago."

Kerry Apologizes For Iraq Remark (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. John Kerry apologized Wednesday for a "botched joke" that suggested U.S. troops in Iraq are uneducated, as Republicans continued to assail him and one Democrat returned a political contribution.

"I personally apologize to any servicemember, family member, or American who was offended," the Massachusetts Democrat said in a statement. Kerry, his party's 2004 presidential nominee, is a decorated Vietnam War veteran.

As the parties argued about Kerry's words, strategists debated how they might affect Tuesday's elections that will determine control of Congress. Republicans such as pollster Frank Luntz said the flap could increase GOP turnout on Nov. 7, while Democrats such as consultant Jenny Backus said any discussion of the Iraq war can only help them.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino called Kerry's apology "late," but "the right thing to do."

Democrats such as Rep. Harold Ford, who is in a Senate race in Tennessee, had called on Kerry to apologize.

Former congressman Baron Hill, a Democrat trying to reclaim a U.S. House seat in Indiana, returned a $1,000 political contribution from Kerry, saying he was "disturbed and disappointed" by the Massachusetts senator's remarks.

The firestorm began Monday when Kerry told a college crowd that if they studied hard and made "an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

Kerry said he meant to refer to President Bush and the administration's handling of the war. He accused the White House of deliberately distorting the statement to distract voters from failures in Iraq.

Kerry's office said he canceled campaign events in Pennsylvania, Minnesota and Iowa because he did not want candidates there to become "proxies" in a "distorted spin war."

In an interview Wednesday with wire service reporters, Bush said the comment "didn't sound like a joke to me. More importantly, it didn't sound like a joke to the troops."

Bush also criticized Kerry on Rush Limbaugh's radio program. The president is spending the last week of the campaign trying to rev up GOP turnout. Party officials said Kerry's joke should help with conservatives who are essential to their efforts to keep Congress.

Republican Party spokeswoman Tracey Schmitt said Kerry's comments should remind all voters that Democratic leaders have "a fundamentally flawed perspective about both the honor of our troops and the importance of their mission."

Luntz said the flap is "not a huge deal, but it does matter." He said it "sets a tone" for voters, including those who are undecided about whether to cast a ballot. "It could boost GOP turnout," he said. "That could make a difference in a tight race."

The flap may end Kerry's hopes for another White House bid in 2008, said New York political consultant Hank Sheinkopf. He added that Kerry may now be seen as someone "who lost once and couldn't control what he said the next time." Kerry has said he will disclose his plans after the Nov. 7 elections.

Sheinkopf said Kerry's comments could hurt Democrats' efforts to attract Americans who respect the military.

Backus said the Republicans may be overplaying their hand with voters worried more about the war than arguments between politicians. "Anytime the battle is fought on the issue of Iraq, the Republicans lose," she said.

Kerry Apologizes For Insulting Troops (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

Sen. John Kerry bowed to bipartisan pressure yesterday and apologized for insulting U.S. troops earlier this week when he suggested that a lack of wits and poor academic performance had landed them on the front lines of Iraq.

"I sincerely regret that my words were misinterpreted to wrongly imply anything negative about those in uniform, and I personally apologize to any service member, family member, or American who was offended," he said in a statement issued yesterday after both Democrats and Republicans rebuked him for the comments.

The apology came after Democratic campaign events with the 2004 presidential nominee were abruptly scrubbed in Philadelphia, Minnesota and Iowa. Democratic legislators Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Robert Menendez of

DOJ_NMG_0090143

New Jersey and Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. of Tennessee also criticized Mr. Kerry. Even Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, no stranger to gaffes, criticized the remark.

"Senator Kerry's remarks were poorly worded and just plain stupid," said Jon Tester, a Democrat running in a tight race against incumbent Sen. Conrad Burns in Montana. "He owes our troops and their families an apology."

Mr. Kerry, who lost in 2004 to President Bush, says he's still considering another run for the White House in 2008 and had been campaigning heavily for Democrats across the country running for Congress. In one sentence, Mr. Kerry managed to change the national conversation from the Republican handling of the war in Iraq to demands that he apologize to the troops.

"You know," Mr. Kerry said Monday at Pasadena City College in California, "education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

Radio host Don Imus, who had Mr. Kerry on his program yesterday morning, implored him to sit out the rest of the election, which most observers predict will be a boon for Democrats.

"Please stop it, stop talking," he said after introducing the junior senator from Massachusetts. "Go home, get on the bike, go windsurfing, anything. Stop it. You're going to ruin this."

Mr. Kerry insisted that the campaign events were canceled at his urging, but at least one candidate -- Bruce Braley in Iowa -- said he asked Mr. Kerry to pull out.

"I'm coming back to Washington today so that I'm not a distraction," Mr. Kerry said. "I don't want to be a distraction to these campaigns.'

No matter whose idea it was for Mr. Kerry to retreat, said one delighted Republican on Capitol Hill, "He's cutting and running from the campaign trail, after learning he was for his comments before he was against them."

Mr. Kerry said the insult was the result of a "botched" joke.

"If that's joking, he needs to work on his punch line," said James H. Webb Jr., the Virginia Democrat running for the Senate.

White House spokesman Tony Snow also was skeptical.

"Senator Kerry's words were pretty straightforward," he said in response to repeated questions from reporters. "If you listen to the tone of voice in which he said them, it's hard to construe them as a joke. He didn't sound like he was trying to make funnies."

In yesterday's apology, Mr. Kerry said he intended to take a swipe at Mr. Bush for getting the U.S. "stuck in Iraq."

But Mr. Kerry's initial response was to attack his attackers as "right wing nut-jobs." At a press conference in Seattle, he angrily said, "I apologize to no one for my criticism of the president and of his broken policy."

When the "right wing nut-jobs" were joined by many Democrats out campaigning, Mr. Kerry switched tacks.

A Kerry spokeswoman said the senator's prepared remarks had called for him to say: "Do you know where you end up if you don't study, if you aren't smart, if you're intellectually lazy? You end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq. Just ask President Bush."

That particular approach is one that he and other Democrats generously employed during the 2004 campaign, portraying Mr. Bush as an intellectual lightweight who didn't belong in the Oval Office.

But academic records obtained last year by the Boston Globe revealed that Mr. Bush actually had a higher grade point average than Mr. Kerry did during their time at Yale. In his freshman year, Mr. Kerry got four D's in the ten courses he took.

·Jerry Seper and Christina Bellantoni contributed to this article, which is based in part on wire service reports.

Analysis: Iraq War Dominates Campaign (AP-Y)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, November 2, 2006

Iraq has dominated the 2006 campaign — and could end up costing Republicans control of Congress.

The GOP once viewed the war as a political asset. Now, Republicans are hastily distancing themselves from President Bush as Democrats fiercely challenge the administration's policies amid signs that voters trust them more than the GOP on Iraq.

"People will run the race they need to run," the president said Wednesday, playing down Republican defections on Iraq. "My attitude is that the way you win is you say to the American people, we have a plan for victory, which we do. And the opponents don't have a plan for victory."

Days before Tuesday's election, however, polls show voters aren't inclined to buy that line.

So, in the final week of the campaign, the White House has sought traction on Iraq by seizing on a remark by Democrat John Kerry — the president's 2004 rival — in which the Massachusetts senator appeared to suggest that those who don't get an education "get stuck in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0090144

Under fire, the senator initially characterized the comment as "a botched joke" about Bush's Iraq policies and then eventually apologized to "any service member, family member or American who was offended" by the remark.

Fellow Democrats, meantime, fought to stay on message, with the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee airing a television ad that lays out the party's closing argument of why voters should fire Republicans now in power: "Tell Congress it's long past time to put down their rubber stamp and ask the hard questions about Iraq."

With the campaign drawing to a close, the GOP faces the stark possibility of losing seats in the House and Senate — and, perhaps, control of Congress — as voters decide whether to send the president and his party a searing message about the conflict. It has cost nearly $380 billion and led to the deaths of more than 2,800 Americans in less than four years.

"Clearly it's a referendum on the president and the war," said Gary Jacobson, a congressional scholar at the University of California at San Diego, who called Iraq "the key problem" for the GOP in this election.

"It's very hard for Republican congressional candidates to say everything's just fine, we stay the course and it's going to work," he added.

How times have changed.

Just two years ago, the president and Republicans used the Iraq war to make their case that the GOP was the party that would best protect the country. Voters agreed, re-electing Bush over Kerry and giving Republicans two more years at the helm of the House and Senate.

At the time, Democrats maneuvered delicately around the war for fear of being called unpatriotic. Kerry and the minority party sought a balance between supporting the troops and assailing the administration's handling of the situation.

Over the past two years, public support for Iraq has slid steadily — and the political tables turned. The war became a liability for Republicans and a potential opportunity for Democrats.

The latest Associated Press-AOL News poll showed Democrats with a clear advantage on Iraq — a 15-percentage-point margin over Republicans — compared with the slight edge Bush had over Kerry at the same point two years ago. Since then, men, young people, those whose highest level of education is high school, and suburbanites have moved to Democrats.

Polls also show that more Americans — now a clear majority — have come to see the war as a mistake and far fewer support how the president has handled the war, shifts that took place all in two years' time.

"When the promises of accomplishment proved empty, than you really began to get a swing in sentiment," said Thomas Mann, a scholar at the Brookings Institution, a Washington-based think tank. "It really has been striking."

Democrats became more emboldened and Republicans more hesitant.

With public support on their side, Democrats have freely hammered Bush on Iraq and now are attacking Republicans with gusto in the campaign homestretch. They hope the intense frustration among voters will usher in an era of Democratic control of Congress.

"George Bush and Mike Fitzpatrick have no idea how to fix this mess," Democrat Patrick Murphy says in a television commercial airing against Fitzpatrick, a Republican congressman from a suburban Philadelphia district.

In a Tennessee Senate race, Democratic Rep. Harold Ford Jr. says in his own ad assailing his Republican opponent: "I support our troops and I voted for the war. But we shouldn't stay the course as Mr. (Bob) Corker wants."

As for Republicans, splinters in the GOP began to show earlier this year and only widened as 2006 dragged on and the election drew closer. Fearing the political consequences of standing with the president, Republicans gradually started backing away from him and many now are staking out their own stances on Iraq.

"President Bush isn't getting our frustrations. It's time to be decisive. Beat the terrorists. Partition the country if we have to, and get our troops home in victory," says Mike McGavick, the Republican trying to unseat Sen. Maria Cantwell in Washington, in a campaign ad.

Two-thirds of the way across the country, GOP Rep. John Hostettler reminds Indiana voters in a commercial that he was one of the few Republicans to vote against the war 2002.

"It wasn't a popular vote, especially with members of my own party," says Hostettler, who is locked in a tight race with Democrat Brad Ellsworth. "In fact, it can get lonely when you take a stand."

Democrats are banking on voters doing just that.

___

EDITOR'S NOTE: Liz Sidoti covers politics for The Associated Press

Bush's Nostalgia (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe And Holly Bailey

Newsweek, November 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090145

Nov. 1, 2006 - There's no fight like an old fight. And this week's emotional exchanges between President George W. Bush and Sen. John Kerry were nothing if not old. Kerry screwed up what he called a "botched joke" about Bush's brainpower when it comes to Iraq; Bush pounced by challenging his ex-rival's commitment to the troops.

Memo to Bush and Kerry: neither of you are on the ballot next week. And while it may be satisfying to rehash the last election, you both run the risk of looking totally out of touch.

The risks for President Bush are greater than they are for Senator Kerry, who may have suffered the deep embarrassment of falling into a familiar self-made trap. But he leads nothing inside his party, sets no strategy and the Democrats can easily disown him—as several candidates have done by canceling events with him this week.

President Bush, on the other hand, enjoys no such luxuries. In fact, the concerted attack on Kerry—complete with White House and Republican National Committee press releases—threatens to undermine a central premise of the party's strategy. For months on the campaign trail, GOP candidates have insisted the election isn't a referendum on Bush or national politics; it's a choice between two local contenders. The president may have diverted attention back onto Democrats, but he also turned the focus back on himself and the war.

Neither subject is a winning issue for GOP candidates—and that is precisely why the Bush-Kerry fracas is so outdated. Bush's approval rating in the most recent NEWSWEEK poll stood at 37 percent—10 points lower than the last poll before the 2004 elections, and fully 33 points lower than 2002.

On the two big issues that Bush wants to debate, the political world looks nothing like 2004, as measured by NEWSWEEK polls. Two years ago, Bush held an 11-point lead over Kerry on Iraq, and an 18-point lead on terrorism. Today, the GOP is trailing the Democrats on Iraq by 12 points and is leading on terrorism by just 1 point.

Based on those numbers, it's easy to see why President Bush is vastly happier campaigning like it's still 2004. His rhetoric on the campaign trail reflects those relatively comfortable days much more than the somber statements he has recently issued from the White House.

Just last week, at his press conference in the East Room, the president told how the violence in Iraq started with a sophisticated insurgency, fueled in part by Al Qaeda. But more recently the killing turned into "sectarian reprisals" and what he called "the cycle of violence."

But on the campaign trail, there is no room for the insurgents or sectarian death squads. There are only terrorists, and their apparent friends, the Democrats. "However they put it, the Democrat approach comes down to this: the terrorists win and America loses," Bush told a rally in Perry, Ga., on Tuesday. "And that's what's at stake in this election. The Democrats want to get us out of Iraq, and the Republican goal is to win in Iraq."

In fact, given the choice between the Democratic and Republican strategies—as described by the president—voters seem to prefer his opponents' approach. According to the most recent NEWSWEEK poll, 61 percent want to see a timetable set for withdrawal from Iraq—and that includes 39 percent of Republicans.

That's not the only stark comparison with elections past. When President Bush goes to Missouri on Friday to stump for GOP Senate candidate Jim Talent, it will be four years—almost to the day—since he did the same thing.

On Nov. 4, 2002, in the final hours of the hotly contested midterm elections, Bush was the star attraction at a rally to drive up voter enthusiasm for Talent's first Senate campaign. The circumstances weren't much different back then: a dead-heat Senate race in an influential swing state and a president fighting to retain his party's majority in Congress.

Recently, Bush has explained his optimism for his party's political chances this year by reminding reporters how many people predicted the GOP's demise in 2002. "A lot of pundits didn't get the election right," Bush said in an interview with Fox News earlier this week. "In 2006, there is a lot of predictors saying that, you know, the Democrats will sweep the House and maybe take the Senate … I just don't see it that way."

Yet 2006 is not like 2002. Four years ago, Bush and the GOP were not weighed down by worries over Iraq or ethical scandals. The White House has worked hard to squelch talk that Bush's low poll numbers have made him politically radioactive on the campaign trail. But the numbers don't lie.

In 2002, Bush hit 17 cities in 15 states in the final five days of the campaign. This year, a tentative schedule released by the White House has Bush working at half that pace: eight cities in seven states between now and Election Day.

In 2002, Bush devoted the final days of the campaign to helping his party's most vulnerable candidates—a list that included four Senate candidates, nearly a dozen House races and a handful of Republican gubernatorial candidates. His itinerary included public rallies in states like Tennessee, Missouri, Minnesota, Illinois, Florida and Iowa.

Today most of those stops are scheduled in what has been traditionally regarded as Bush country, a list that includes Iowa, Kansas, Montana and Texas. This week alone, Bush held rallies in what should be friendly territory—including Tom DeLay's old congressional district in Texas and two straight days of campaigning in Georgia.

Administration officials have said they are keeping Bush's schedule flexible to aid any last-minute political maneuvering, so additions to his itinerary may yet come.

But Missouri is a case in point: a conservative state that has become ground zero in the fight to control the Senate. A series of polls puts Talent in a dead heat with Democrat Claire McCaskill. Yet Bush's visit is hardly a slam dunk for the GOP. Bush has visited the state twice this year to raise money for Talent's campaign, but the Republican candidate has not appeared publicly with the president. On Friday, that will change: Talent is scheduled to travel with Bush to rallies in Springfield and Joplin to, in his words, "get people enthusiastic in the last stretch."

On that basis, the GOP may be writing off independent voters who have fallen out of love with the president. That might also explain the curious decision to campaign back home in Texas the day before the election. On Monday, Bush is scheduled to headline a rally in Dallas for a roster of Lone Star Republicans, including Gov. Rick Perry—who looks safely on his way to a third term.

Two years ago, Bush wound up his re-election campaign with a last rally in Dallas, where thousands of people turned out to cheer the president onto a second term. This time around, the mood is different. Asked about the Perry rally during an interview with the Dallas Morning News last week, Bush seemed to have mixed feelings. "It'll be a nostalgic moment for me," Bush said. "It's the last time I will be at the head of the ticket, and I'm looking forward to it."

Bush may be feeling nostalgic about the campaign. But judging by the polls, voters are ready to move on.

First Lady: World Listening To Iraq Talk (AP-Y)

AP, November 2, 2006

First lady Laura Bush cautioned Wednesday that Americans discussing the war in Iraq — especially politicians — should be careful what they say because other countries are paying attention.

"The right to have these conversations is part of what makes our country great and our democracy strong. We must be mindful that people around the world are listening to these discussions," Laura Bush said at a suburban Columbus recreation center during a campaign appearance with Rep. Deborah Pryce.

"Responsible candidates understand that the men and women of our military are risking their lives for us, and that we must conduct our debate here at home in a way that does not jeopardize our troops in harm's way," she said, calling for "conversations conducted with civility and respect."

Bush did not mention her husband's 2004 election opponent, Sen. John Kerry, but her comments came on the day the Democrat apologized for telling a group of California students that individuals who don't study hard and do their homework would likely "get stuck in Iraq."

Aides said the senator had mistakenly dropped one word from his prepared remarks, which was originally written to say "you end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq." In that context, they said, it was clear Kerry was referring to Bush, not to the troops.

Pryce is in a close fight for her Ohio seat against Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy.

Party Shuns Kerry After Iraq 'Joke' (FT)

By Caroline Danielin Washington

Financial Times, November 2, 2006

Democrats yesterday moved swiftly to distance themselves from John Kerry's "botched joke" that appeared to disparage US troops.

Three candidates have cancelled campaign events with the losing 2004 presidential candidate amid dismay that his verbal gaffe has handed Republicans a chance to paint the Democratic party as weak on national security.

In Iowa, Bruce Braley, a House candidate, cancelled a campaign event. Harold Ford, who faces a tight race for the Senate in Tennessee and has received $100,000 (£53,000, €78,000) from Mr Kerry's leadership political action committee, joined Republican calls for an -apology.

"Whatever the intent, Senator Kerry was wrong to say what he said. He needs to apologise to our troops," he said.

Just as Dennis Hastert's recent handling of a cyber-sex scandal involving Mark Foley, a Republican congressman, rendered the Speaker politically toxic on the campaign trail, Mr Kerry conceded he was becoming a distraction.

He cancelled appearances at rallies in Minnesota and Pennsylvania. "I'm not going to go to some place that a congressman's going to get embroiled in this, because I want them to win," he said.

The furore started on Monday when Mr Kerry told students in Los Angeles that if "you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't you get stuck in Iraq". Yesterday he defended his comment as a joke about President George W. Bush's lack of research. "Look, everybody knows I botched a joke," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0090147

Republicans have seized on the comments, calling the idea that US troops were uneducated "insulting and shameful", and linking it to the wider theme of Democratic spinelessness.

"He is a liberal, a leftist and this is the typical attitude they have toward our military," said John Boehner, House majority leader. "What they want to do in Iraq is they want to give up and pull our troops out."

Despite fears about the immediate electoral fallout, several Democratic strategists said the gaffe could be most damaging to Mr Kerry's ambition to put himself forward again to become the 2008 presidential democratic nominee.

Kerry Issues Apology After Iraq 'joke' (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Washington

Financial Times, November 2, 2006

Senator John Kerry, the losing 2004 presidential candidate, on Wednesday issued a formal apology for what he called "a botched joke" that was mistaken as an attack on the intelligence of US troops.

"As a combat veteran, I want to make it clear to anyone in uniform and to their loved ones: my poorly stated joke at a rally was not about, and never intended to refer to any troop. I sincerely regret that my words were misinterpreted… and I personally apologise to any service member, family member, or American who was offended," he said.

Several Democrats moved swiftly to distance themselves from Mr Kerry after Republicans eagerly exploited his comments to galvanise voters in the last days of the congressional midterm elections.

Three Democratic candidates have cancelled cancel campaign events with Mr Kerry, including Bruce Braley, a House candidate, in Iowa. Harold Ford, who faces a tight race for the Senate in Tennessee and has received $100,000 from Mr Kerry's leadership PAC, had earlier in the day called on him to apologise.

"Whatever the intent, Senator Kerry was wrong to say what he said. He needs to apologise to our troops," Mr Ford said.

Just as Dennis Hastert's recent handling of a cyber-sex scandal involving Mark Foley, a Republican congressman, rendered the Speaker politically toxic on the campaign trail, Mr Kerry conceded he was becoming a distraction.

He cancelled appearances at rallies in Minnesota and Pennsylvania. "I'm not going to go to some place that a congressman's going to get embroiled in this, because I want them to win," he said.

The furore started on Monday when Mr Kerry told students in Los Angeles that if "you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't you get stuck in Iraq". On Wednesday he defended his comment as a joke about President George W. Bush's lack of research. "Look, everybody knows I botched a joke," he said.

Republicans have seized on the comments, calling the idea that US troops were uneducated "insulting and shameful", and linking it to the wider theme of Democratic spinelessness.

"He is a liberal, a leftist and this is the typical attitude they have toward our military," said John Boehner, House majority leader. "What they want to do in Iraq is they want to give up and pull our troops out."

Kerry's Remark Puts Presidential Bid At Risk (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Ever since he came within 118,000 Ohio votes of winning the presidency, Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts has refused to give up the idea that he could try again. He kept much of his 2004 finance team together and campaigned aggressively this year for dozens of fellow Democrats who could turn around and help Kerry make a comeback in 2008.

But with one botched joke this week in Pasadena, Calif., Kerry not only sapped some momentum from his party in the final week of a competitive election, he dealt a damaging blow to his own White House aspirations.

Under pressure from many Democrats, Kerry issued an apology late Wednesday, two days after appearing to tell college students that if they did not get an education, "you get stuck in Iraq." In a written statement, Kerry lamented that his words were "misinterpreted to wrongly imply anything negative about those in uniform, and I personally apologize to any service member, family member, or American who was offended."

Earlier in the day on the Don Imus radio show, Kerry said: "Everybody knows that I botched a joke," explaining that he was trying to say that President Bush did not do his homework and therefore, "got us stuck in Iraq." But for a politician striving to prove that he had become a better candidate than he was when GOP attacks derailed his White House campaign in 2004, the damage was done.

It could not have come at a worse time for Kerry, who has been rebuilding his national campaign structure and hoping to capitalize on the political goodwill he amassed by raising more than $12 million for 2006 candidates and campaigning in 35 states. With the recent decision by former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner not to run for president, Kerry was hoping to position himself as the top challenger to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., for the party's nomination, although early surveys suggested he faced an uphill struggle.

DOJ_NMG_0090148

Fellow Democrats now worry that Kerry's words made their party's candidates vulnerable to accusations of insensitivity toward the troops in the final week of an election in which Democrats seemed to be benefiting from voters' distaste for the Iraq war.

Moreover, the flap allowed the GOP to remind voters why they chose Bush in 2004 over a Democrat who was portrayed as a flip-flopper. It was enough to make some wish that Kerry would just go away for a while.

"Nothing against John Kerry, but this election is not about John Kerry," said Gordon Fischer, chairman of the Democratic Party in Iowa, where one congressional candidate canceled a scheduled appearance this week with the Massachusetts senator.

Fischer, whose home state caucuses play a central role in choosing a presidential nominee, said Kerry's gaffe would "undoubtedly" hurt his chances in two years -- a sentiment echoed Wednesday by several other Democrats.

Burton Cohen, the former New Hampshire state Senate majority leader and a key Kerry backer in 2004, said the botched joke could rival former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean's famous Iowa scream in terms of media exposure and political damage.

"It's getting played over and over again," Cohen said. "You just need one instance that can define a campaign. This may be one of those things, and if that's the case, I hope John Kerry likes staying in the Senate."

Kerry canceled upcoming appearances in Minnesota and Pennsylvania, while his office confirmed that he called off an additional stop this weekend in New Hampshire, home of the first-in-the-nation presidential primary and a state that would be crucial for another run at the nomination.

"I don't want to be a distraction to these campaigns," Kerry told Imus Wednesday morning after calling the show to blast the White House for "disgraceful" tactics.

Republicans were delighted to make Kerry a central theme of the campaign's closing days. Conservatives moved quickly to elevate the controversy in order to further mobilize the core voters that White House strategists believe could help the GOP retain majorities in Congress.

The Drudge Report, the popular conservative Web site that first posted audio and video of Kerry's original comments, hyped the story all day Wednesday, listing Democrats who were disinviting Kerry and displaying a photograph depicting troops in Iraq hoisting a sign -- full of spelling errors -- that said they were stuck "hear in Irak."

The Republican National Committee helped fan the flames, distributing talking points to sympathetic radio hosts and bloggers; Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and his wife, Lynn Cheney, and White House press secretary Tony Snow also addressed the senator's remarks.

Bush, who on Tuesday called Kerry's words "shameful," reiterated criticism Wednesday during interviews with conservative radio host Rush Limbaugh and The Associated Press.

Worse for Kerry, Democrats joined the GOP's demands that the Massachusetts senator apologize.

Clinton called his remarks "inappropriate," while Rep. Harold Ford, Jr., who is in a tight race for Senate in Tennessee, told MSNBC that the comment "offended some people" and that Kerry should apologize and let everyone "move on." Larry Grant, an Idaho congressional candidate, welcomed Kerry's apology but added: "He shouldn't have tried to make a joke about it in the first place."

Kerry's contrition followed two days in which he tried to fight back, ridiculing Snow at one point as a "stuffed suit" and noting that his White House critics had not served in the military. Kerry appeared to be exorcising the ghosts of 2004, when even he acknowledged he did not fight back in time against a group of pro-Bush veterans who accused Kerry of misrepresenting his record as a Vietnam War hero.

"This is swift boat stuff all over again," he told Imus. "The controversy is based on a lie."

But Democrats worried he was only making matters worse.

"He was applying the swift boat lessons of 2004 to the wrong set of facts in 2006," said party strategist Chris Lehane, who once worked for Kerry. "He's not on the ballot this time."

To Kerry supporters, the episode has been frustrating.

"There isn't a soul in America that is either being quoted or privately talking to the press that honestly believes that John Kerry was insulting the troops of this country," said Kirk Wagar, a Miami lawyer and top fundraiser for Kerry's 2004 campaign. "Anybody who questions that out loud is doing nothing but parroting a Republican talking-point lie that they're trying to use to change the subject."

There was some evidence of a possible silver lining for Kerry, with increasingly influential liberal bloggers defending him and bashing the media for enabling the GOP spin machine.

David Wade, a Kerry spokesman, predicted that Democrats would "respect someone who fights like hell against a broken policy in Iraq and has the guts to offer a real change in course that honors our troops."

DOJ_NMG_0090149

To find success in 2008, though, Kerry will need to overcome sentiments like those expressed by Imus, who echoed the feelings of many Democrats when he told the senator repeatedly on Wednesday: "Stop it. Stop talking. Go home . . . . You're going to ruin this."

Job From Hell Dept. (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, November 2, 2006

With his "botched joke" about dumbos serving in Iraq, Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) may have joined Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) in becoming a (part-Jewish) former '08 presidential hopeful. As Republicans pummeled Kerry and Allen aides beat the daylights out of a heckling blogger, we wondered: Who had a worse day Tuesday, Kerry or Allen? And whose job sucked more: that of Allen's press staff, or Kerry's?

We took an informal poll and got some amusing answers, which, as you might have guessed, varied depending on party affiliation. Our survey showed a majority of Republicans staunchly defending Allen and his heavies, while Democrats were generally willing to sail their failed 2004 presidential nominee down the river.

"You expect Allen to surround himself with thugs, and you expect Kerry to trip over his own words," said one senior Senate Democratic aide who, rather than choosing who screwed up more, suggested it was just another day at the office.

Veteran GOP spinmeister Terry Holt, who now has his own public relations firm, said Kerry's flub was definitely more damaging than Allen's latest mishap. "Team Allen might not be able to block, but at least they didn't throw an interception for a touchdown," he said.

Another Senate Democratic leadership staffer who requested anonymity didn't hesitate to choose Allen as having the worst day, while still taking a jab at Kerry. "John Kerry's a moron, but he's not running for anything [in '06]. And there's no way he'd lose his Senate seat."

But as to the question of who had the tougher job, Kerry spokesman David Wade pulled nary a punch.

"Any day working for George Allen is worse because, um, you work for George Allen. Fortunately, no one will be working for him after Nov. 7. John Kerry is a tough son of a bitch and I'd follow him anywhere. He was right about Vietnam and he's right about Iraq. That's more honor than George Felix Allen will ever have."

Wow! Now we know why those other Democratic wusses were scared to go on the record.

Then again, Republican political consultant and blogger Rich Galen countered that Kerry definitely had a worse day because "like every day, he has to wake up and be John Kerry. The Allen campaign is like that old country song: If it weren't for bad news they'd have no news at all." Plus, he said, "Kerry has already lost. Allen will probably win."

The Allen camp was too busy (presumably roughing people up) to respond to our request for comment.

No matter whose day was worse, one Democratic consultant, noting the shared Jewish heritage of Allen and Kerry, noted, "If you put both screw-ups together, you'd have a day of real tsuris." That's Yiddish for "calamity."

Beat-up Blogger Goes On the Air.Speaking of the blocking and tackling display at the Allen event, blogger Mike Stark, the man Allen aides knocked down Tuesday, has been hired by Air America's "The Young Turks" show to be a reporter.

The show's co-host, Cenk Uygur, announced Wednesday afternoon in a posting on HuffingtonPost.com that Stark — who considers himself a "citizen journalist" — is joining the show.

"Mike is smart, tough, well-educated, dedicated and obviously courageous. This country needs more reporters like Mike Stark. ... If the mainstream press won't ask the questions, then we will," Uygur said.

Stark told HOH on Wednesday that he wasn't as black-and-blue as you might imagine considering three Allen aides essentially kicked his butt when he showed up at that Allen event asking the inflammatory question, "Why did you spit on your first wife?"

"Nah, I'm tough," the former Marine and first-year law student at the University of Virginia said. He said Tuesday was the third time he'd shown up at an Allen campaign event, but the first at which he was beaten up. (He filed charges afterward.)

Stark, whose Web site, CallingAll Wingnuts.com, details his many exploits as a heckler, confirmed he was the same guy who showed up at a taping of the Fox News show "Hannity & Colmes" and held up a sign behind host Sean Hannity that read "HANNITY SUCKS ASS."

He also made his start as an activist in politics by dialing into right-wing radio programs and heckling guests, including former Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) and Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.).

Republicans Go GooGoo. Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.) showed some down-home Southern hospitality by shipping out about 300 packages of GooGoo Cluster candies across the country to Republican incumbents and candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0090150

The chocolate-marshmallow-caramel-peanut concoctions are a staple of Blackburn's home state, and like any proper Southern lady, Blackburn included an effusive note in her candy-grams saying how much she was looking forward to working with the recipients in the 110th Congress.

"For years, my campaign team and I have relied on a Tennessee treat to provide the energy boost we all need to complete those last days of phone banking, sign planting, and door knocking," she wrote. "Enjoy these Goo Goos, a Grand Ole Opry tradition, and best of luck for a well deserved victory."

Blackburn added, "Please do not hesitate to contact me or my campaign if we can be of any assistance to you."

It should be noted that the sweet little gesture comes as Blackburn is on the verge of announcing an expected bid for House Republican Conference chairwoman in the 110th Congress. Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) currently has the job, and Blackburn will challenge Pryce, and possibly others, if the Ohio Republican manages to win her own tough re-election bid and return to the House next year.

And yes, Pryce's campaign also received the GooGoos. No word on whether they've asked Blackburn for campaign assistance.

The Great Divider (NYT)

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

As President Bush throws himself into the final days of a particularly nasty campaign season, he's settled into a familiar pattern of ugly behavior. Since he can't defend the real world created by his policies and his decisions, Mr. Bush is inventing a fantasy world in which to campaign on phony issues against fake enemies.

In Mr. Bush's world, America is making real progress in Iraq. In the real world, as Michael Gordon reported in yesterday's Times, the index that generals use to track developments shows an inexorable slide toward chaos. In Mr. Bush's world, his administration is marching arm in arm with Iraqi officials committed to democracy and to staving off civil war. In the real world, the prime minister of Iraq orders the removal of American checkpoints in Baghdad and abets the sectarian militias that are slicing and dicing their country.

In Mr. Bush's world, there are only two kinds of Americans: those who are against terrorism, and those who somehow are all right with it. Some Americans want to win in Iraq and some don't. There are Americans who support the troops and Americans who don't support the troops. And at the root of it all is the hideously damaging fantasy that there is a gulf between Americans who love their country and those who question his leadership.

Mr. Bush has been pushing these divisive themes all over the nation, offering up the ludicrous notion the other day that if Democrats manage to control even one house of Congress, America will lose and the terrorists will win. But he hit a particularly creepy low when he decided to distort a lame joke lamely delivered by Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts. Mr. Kerry warned college students that the punishment for not learning your lessons was to "get stuck in Iraq." In context, it was obviously an attempt to disparage Mr. Bush's intelligence. That's impolitic and impolite, but it's not as bad as Mr. Bush's response. Knowing full well what Mr. Kerry meant, the president and his team cried out that the senator was disparaging the troops. It was a depressing replay of the way the Bush campaign Swift-boated Americans in 2004 into believing that Mr. Kerry, who went to war, was a coward and Mr. Bush, who stayed home, was a hero.

It's not the least bit surprising or objectionable that Mr. Bush would hit the trail hard at this point, trying to salvage his party's control of Congress and, by extension, his last two years in office. And we're not naïve enough to believe that either party has been running a positive campaign that focuses on the issues.

But when candidates for lower office make their opponents out to be friends of Osama bin Laden, or try to turn a minor gaffe into a near felony, that's just depressing. When the president of the United States gleefully bathes in the muck to divide Americans into those who love their country and those who don't, it is destructive to the fabric of the nation he is supposed to be leading.

This is hardly the first time that Mr. Bush has played the politics of fear, anger and division; if he's ever missed a chance to wave the bloody flag of 9/11, we can't think of when. But Mr. Bush's latest outbursts go way beyond that. They leave us wondering whether this president will ever be willing or able to make room for bipartisanship, compromise and statesmanship in the two years he has left in office.

A Taxing Time For The GOP (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090151

NEW BRITAIN, Conn. -- In the waning days before Tuesday's election, Republican leaders are holding the issue of taxes out like a life raft to struggling congressional candidates. Few have grabbed it with greater enthusiasm than Rep. Nancy L. Johnson.

A 24-year incumbent from Connecticut who sits on the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, Johnson has run at least three television ads on fees and taxes, accusing her Democratic challenger, Chris Murphy, of raising "our taxes 27 times." She presses the point in speeches, telling voters that while Murphy was hiking taxes as a state lawmaker in Hartford, she was helping President Bush cut taxes on Capitol Hill.

But it's not clear the tax boat is going to float in this western Connecticut district, where Johnson, like Republicans nationally, is having trouble turning the economy into a winning issue. Murphy, 33, a lawyer and state senator, has opened a narrow margin in the polls by painting Johnson as a pawn of big business and attacking administration policies -- including the tax cuts -- as giveaways to millionaires.

Across the nation, taxes have become a battleground in competitive House races, as Republican candidates charge their Democratic opponents with voting for more taxes, voting against tax cuts or harboring plans to raise taxes. Political analysts say the tactic is designed to turn attention toward tax relief, which Republicans credit with spurring an economic recovery, and away from the Democrats' favorite topic, the unpopular war in Iraq..

President Bush talks about taxes nearly as much as terrorism these days, a message intended to rally the Republican faithful and assuage conservatives upset about the expanding cost of government. On Saturday, he devoted his weekly radio address to the topic. And at a fundraiser Tuesday in Georgia, Bush called taxes "a fundamental issue in this campaign," declaring that "if the Democrats take the House, your taxes are going up."

Ed Patru, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said Republicans are "pounding Democrats all across the country" on taxes because it is "always a winning issue."

"To the extent that there's a sour mood among the electorate because of issues like the war, that sour mood has dampened" the political value of a record Dow Jones industrial average, falling gas prices and low unemployment, Patru said. Focusing on taxes turns the tables and puts Democrats on the defensive, he said, adding, "People do appreciate the good economy, so they're upset when they hear Democrat proposals that threaten economic growth."

Democrats argue that economic growth is not benefiting many ordinary Americans, whose wages are barely keeping pace with the costs of fuel and health care. The Bush tax cuts haven't offered much relief, they contend. The richest 1 percent of Americans are assuming a slightly greater share of the overall tax burden thanks to cuts enacted from 2001 to 2005, but Democrats like to point out that the wealthy are doing far better in absolute dollars under Bush's tax policies than the working class.

A new analysis by the Tax Policy Center, a joint project of the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution, shows that more than 60 percent of savings from the Bush tax cuts are going to families that earn more than $100,000 a year. Put another way, a working-class family earning between $30,000 and $40,000 will save an average of $747 this year thanks to the cuts, while a family earning between $200,000 and $500,000 will save an average of $7,609.

"Financial pressure on the middle class is a big issue," said Stanley Greenberg, a Democratic pollster who has encouraged Democratic candidates to run on the economy. "What you talk about is middle-class squeeze and the fact that Republicans have done nothing for the middle class."

Republicans note that middle-class families are getting more relief in percentage terms. According to the Tax Policy Center, that $747 represents a 12.8 percent tax cut for the working-class family, while $7,609 represents a 9.4 percent cut for the wealthier family. Still, some Republican strategists acknowledge that Democrats are gaining traction on the issue.

"We've been screaming for months that we need to talk about the economy and we need to make it meaningful to the guy who drives the F-150 pickup in Indiana," said Greg Casey, president and chief executive of the Business Industry Political Action Committee, which supports mainly Republican candidates. "Despite the good story Republicans have to tell about the economy, if you look at people's perceptions right now, the Democrats have the upper hand."

In Connecticut, a relatively affluent state where unemployment is running about even with the national average of 4.6 percent, three veteran Republican lawmakers are fighting for their seats. Polls show Rep. Christopher Shays and Rep. Rob Simmons tied with Democratic challengers. This week, a poll by the Hartford Courant and the University of Connecticut found Murphy with 46 percent support and Johnson with 42 percent among likely voters.

As Murphy knocked on doors last week in Cheshire, a prosperous town about 25 miles south of Hartford, no one asked about the 27 tax hikes, a figure Murphy contends is exaggerated. But voters did express frustration with Republicans in Washington, saying the positive economic indicators have meant little in their lives.

DOJ_NMG_0090152

"Good economy for whom? It's a good economy for people who already have a lot of money," said Kathleen Viereg, a family physician who was tending her lawn. Viereg said she has patients who postpone treatment because they can't afford rising deductibles and co-payments -- and those are the ones with insurance.

A political independent and undecided voter, Viereg said talk of tax relief leaves her cold when so many people are struggling financially. "The voodoo economics of these tax cuts doesn't add up," she said.

A block away, Joe Norcross, an assistant school principal, said Murphy has his vote because Republicans "want to take care of the wealthy." As for the tax cuts, Norcross remembered getting a check for $300 a few years ago, but "we sent it right into the credit card company."

Murphy attacks Johnson on a range of economic issues, from Social Security to a new drug benefit for Medicare recipients. If elected, Murphy says he will "absolutely" work to repeal cuts in the dividend and capital gains tax rates, calling them "tax breaks for the richest 1 or 2 percent of Americans."

Johnson seems to sense a shift in public sentiment. At a Rotary Club luncheon last week, she spent most of a 15-minute speech explaining how the tax cuts have created jobs and helped poor people.

"You can increase revenue by increasing taxes, and that gives you more money, at least for a while," she said. "Or you can increase revenue by growing the economy. That gives you more taxpayers."

Johnson said dozens of small businesses in her district hired extra workers thanks to a tax credit for equipment purchases. And she challenged the claim that the cuts benefit only the rich, noting that the rate for the lowest tax bracket was cut from 15 percent to 10 percent.

Many Rotarians said they planned to support Johnson. Several praised her long record of constituent service, saying she had increased government payments to their nursing homes and won money to redevelop New Britain's Polish business district. Rotary president Ken Slater, a Democrat, said he was voting for Johnson because "her heart's in the right place and she works very, very hard."

No one mentioned taxes.

Later, Johnson said there was "some truth" to the notion that she wins support from voters who like her personally, while Murphy wins among voters motivated by broad themes such as the economy.

"People know me, trust me and they're behind me," she said. "I feel very upbeat."

Is GOP Confidence For Real? (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON

"We're going to win," President Bush asserted confidently in his latest press conference, when asked about the midterm elections.

Vice President Dick Cheney tells interviewers he is "optimistic" about the Republican Party's ability to hold on to control of both the House and the Senate.

But the voice that gives Democrats the biggest chills - days before an election that by most public indications favors the Democrats in their quest to win their first House majority in 12 years - is that of Karl Rove, the architect of GOP victories in the past three elections. Mr. Rove has seen the private polls from individual races, he tells interviewers, and the data point "strongly" in one direction: a Republican House and a Republican Senate.

Is this a classic bluff, designed to psych out the opposition and energize demoralized Republicans who might be tempted to sit out the Nov. 7 vote? Or do Rove and his bosses really know something that's not knowable by the rest of us?

"No matter what the polls say or the mood of the country, no president rolls over and plays dead in midterm elections and lays himself open to the charge of surrender to the opposition," says John Gizzi, political editor of the conservative weekly Human Events.

The rock-solid pronouncements of Rove, who cites not just internal polls but also the GOP's advantage in fund-raising and organization, buttress the predictable positive outlook from the president and vice president, and feed into a reputation for success running campaigns built over decades.

"Rove is relying on the Rove mystique," says John Pitney, a political scientist at Claremont-McKenna College in Claremont, Calif. "A lot of Democrats are paranoid about it. ... Conversely, Republicans also have the same belief, and that's what gives them hope and confidence and keeps them working. If they thought they were surely going to lose, they wouldn't work as hard."

The idea that there are polls suggesting an outcome wildly different from what most political analysts - including many Republican strategists - are saying may not be such a big stretch, Mr. Pitney says. The difference may be in interpretation: It's possible, he says, someone looking at the same numbers might come to a different conclusion.

DOJ_NMG_0090153

The answer on who was right, it can be argued, will be known only after the actual votes are cast - but even then, if the Democrats do manage to take over at least the House, Bush's advisers could still say that a week or two earlier, the data pointed in the Republicans' favor.

Among those who make a living looking at each race with as nonpartisan an eye as possible and predicting the outcome, the Democrats do appear on track to retake control of the House, maybe by just a few seats. In the 435-seat House, the Democrats need to make a net gain of just 15 seats. As of Oct. 30, one such prognosticator, Charlie Cook, sees "no ebb in the wave" favoring the Democrats and predicts that, barring a dramatic event, the GOP will lose at least 20 to 35 seats in the House and at least four in the Senate, with "five or six most likely." For the Democrats to retake the 100-seat Senate, a bigger leap than retaking the House, they need a net gain of six seats.

Stuart Rothenberg, another nonpartisan handicapper, projects Democratic gains in the House of 18 to 28 seats - or more. For the Senate, he projects Democratic gains of four to seven seats. Larry Sabato, political scientist at the University of Virginia, Charlottesville, says the Democrats will gain well more than the 15 seats needed for the House and is on the edge of taking over the Senate.

Still, no pundit makes predictions without a caveat. The latest bump for the Democrats came Monday with a comment by John Kerry, the Democrats' 2004 presidential nominee, that was interpreted as a slight against US troops in Iraq. Sen. Kerry said, "Education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. And if you don't, you get stuck in Iraq." Kerry called it a botched joke.

The controversy has put Kerry back in the middle of GOP campaign rhetoric at a time when Democrats would rather be focusing on Republicans vulnerabilities. But at least, some Democrats say, it keeps the focus on Iraq - the No. 1 issue for voters and a net negative for Republican candidates.

Ultimately, Republicans point to several factors that could make the difference on election day: The Democratic "wave" has been a long time in building, and no Republican incumbent can be caught off guard - unlike in 1994, when the Democrats were swept out of power in Congress in a wave they did not see coming. Republicans maintain a funding advantage. At the end of August, in 30 of the most competitive races, Republicans had $33 million cash on hand versus $14 million for the Democrats, says Rove. The Republicans also tout their so-called 72-hour turnout operation. There have been reports of greater early-voting turnout by Republicans than by Democrats.

"Those are all the strengths of a Republican team," says GOP pollster Whit Ayres. "They have not said the climate is favorable or that the odds favor them or that there's not a bigger challenge ahead." But, he adds, if the Democrats don't retake the House next Tuesday, "they should hang it up as a political party. If they can't win in this climate, when can they win?"

Democrats' Foreign Policy Pickle As Iraq And Terror Top Agenda (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Democrats, anticipating a possible victory in Congress, are brimming over with proposed cures in one of the Republicans' main areas of weakness: foreign policy.

But if they triumph Tuesday, Democrats will first have to figure out how to get their ranks to hew to a core foreign-policy theme that both helps the country and positions the party well for the 2008 presidential election.

Republicans have for decades painted the Democrats as soft on national security. That is an image that the Democrats are now eager to shed, especially as they look toward a presidential campaign that is sure to dwell largely on issues of terrorism and the Iraq war.

Democrats see this election -- and 2008, to an even greater degree -- as pivotal to their bid to take on a tougher, but also wiser, foreign-policy husk. Some propose implementing tougher port and border security. Some key voices are also promoting a softer line toward North Korea and Iran, including the need for one-on-one talks.

Yet the challenge the Democrats face is how to take on an image of steeliness while also pushing, as most in the party now are, to get out of Iraq as quickly as possible.

Wresting control of Congress would still leave the party with limited leverage to force change. Party leaders, fearing a potential backlash, may have to scramble to mute some of the party's harshest Bush critics, who could push for impeachment hearings or long investigations into the war. Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry's gaffe on uneducated troops getting "stuck in Iraq," for which he apologized yesterday in a statement, also shows how vulnerable Democrats remain on the issue.

Democrats had hoped to base their congressional campaign largely on deepening unease over the Iraq war but without offering many specifics. Now, they are pushing much more explicitly for a radical shift in Iraq policy.

"The principal argument that Democrats must make is that Bush policies have undermined U.S. national security [by inciting more hatred against America and increasing the terrorist threat], and that we are determined to fix that," said Zbigniew

DOJ_NMG_0090154

Brzezinski, a former national security adviser to President Carter. Mr. Brzezinski has proposed that the U.S. and Iraq jointly announce a date for a U.S. pullout of forces.

The Democrats have scurried in recent months to give cohesion to their many and sometimes contradictory critiques of the current Iraq policy. Last month, 12 top congressional Democrats, including Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California and Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada, sent Mr. Bush a third letter in as many months calling on him "to change course" and "join with us to develop a policy that will work." A September version laid out a five-point plan for quitting Iraq, which included firing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

"This is a very conscious and coordinated effort to come together on a message and stick to it," said John Podesta, President Clinton's former chief of staff and now president of the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank.

New groups and initiatives are being launched almost monthly to give coherence to this push, among them the National Security Network, a brain-trust of Democratic foreign-policy officials and thinkers, and the just-launched "New Direction for Real Security," a package of ideas that Ms. Pelosi has portrayed as the Democrats' "tough and smart national security policy."

Even if most Democrats favor disengagement, plenty of divisions remain. Mr. Biden, who as ranking member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee stands to become its chairman if the Democrats retake the Senate, is pushing for slicing Iraq into three "largely autonomous regions," followed by a pullout by 2008. Mr. Brzezinski calls that approach "suicidal," saying "if we do that, everyone will hate us." Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York has only recently endorsed the Democrats' "redeployment" push, after having taken a less-critical stance toward the war for much of the year.

Another possible hindrance to Democrats' ambitions for changing Iraq policy is President Bush, who so far has been firm that withdrawal from Iraq isn't an option that he would consider. And he told the Associated Press yesterday that he plans to keep on Mr. Rumsfeld until the end of his term. A Democratic majority in Congress would have limited authority on either issue.

Rep. Tom Lantos, a California Democrat who would chair the House International Relations Committee under a Democratic majority, said public opinion could force the president's hand. "If we take one or both houses, then the administration will have to take into account that the mainstream public view is that we are very off course in Iraq," he said.

Democrats may get significant help from congressional Republicans, whose mounting unease over the Iraq war could turn to more open rebellion during Mr. Bush's last two years in office as the party seeks to position itself for 2008.

A Democratic majority could also seek to put more attention back on Afghanistan, which many view as central to the battle against terrorism. They are likely to urge Mr. Bush to devote more effort and money to assuring that early gains there don't wither away.

On other issues, from China to Iran and including Iraq, the Democrats are likely to push for a more multilateral and cooperative approach on the international scene. But they are hardly united. Democrats have turned sharply protectionist in recent years, a stance that could color U.S. ties with China, although most prominent voices within the party don't want to ruffle relations with Beijing.

Mr. Lantos, for his part, said he would use his possible new perch to advocate policies that would be "dramatically more multilateral and dramatically more respectful of other countries' views."

He envisions a series of hearings in the spring that call to Capitol Hill all former secretaries of state and national security advisers to weigh in on "the U.S. national security predicament." He also hopes to travel to North Korea, Iran and Syria.

"I strongly believe in the need for dialogue with people that you strongly disagree with," he said, adding that the Democrats' first stop, postelection, should be the White House.

Cantor Pushes For Reforms (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, November 2, 2006

House Chief Deputy Majority Whip Eric Cantor (Va.) has no interest in discussing his own future ambitions, but he has begun outlining a framework for what he says is much-needed soul-searching on the future of the House Republican Conference and the party's agenda.

"I am committed to the House, and I want us to continue to build and strengthen our majority," Cantor said in an interview Tuesday with Roll Call reporters and editors when asked about his future plans.

Pressed on whether he would run for an elected leadership position if the field opens up after Election Day, he said, "I don't want to answer that."

Cantor maintains that Republicans will retain the House majority next Tuesday and that the current leadership slate will stay largely intact — although as a member of leadership he has little leeway to say otherwise — but he freely offers that Republicans need to start changing the way they do business.

DOJ_NMG_0090155

"We will hold the House, I think obviously it's going to be by a reduced margin," Cantor said. "At that point what I would like to see is for us to take a breather."

Cantor advocates postponing the scheduled Nov. 15 leadership elections for two reasons. First, he said Members need to know the outcome of the ongoing Committee on Standards of Official Conduct investigation into the activities of former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) because current leaders — including Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.), Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) and National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) — as well as several senior leadership aides have been involved in the investigation.

"I don't think [Hastert] knew, I don't think anybody knew about the lewd e-mails," Cantor said. "So the real question is then, what did they know and what did his office know? The Speaker says he doesn't recall having any conversations about it, and I absolutely take that as his word and believe that."

Cantor said he was supportive of how leaders immediately handled the Foley situation when the story first broke Sept. 29 about his sexually explicit communications with minors, but he also noted his own role in calling for an investigation.

"I think I was probably the first Member to go and call for an FBI investigation," he said. "I did it unilaterally without talking to anybody because I think that's what needs to be done, and that's what happened."

But more broadly, Cantor said House Republicans need to meet and discuss the game plan for the 110th Congress.

"We really need to try and address things in a little different way. My desire would be for us to take a few days and meet as a Conference ... to take stock of where we are," he said. "I think at the end of the day the fact that we have not delivered on some of the things we set out to do [means] we need to come out of the gate in the next Congress with a recipe for success. There are plenty of times you can give excuses as to why we don't produce, but the electorate doesn't stand for it."

Cantor said the rash of ethical scandals that dogged Republicans in the 109th Congress is unacceptable and the House needs to take serious action to put mechanisms in place to try to prevent future scenarios.

"Good Lord, you can't just keep doing the things the way we've been doing them," he said. "We've got to have some accountability and we've got to put in place, if at all possible, mechanisms that will pre-empt that from happening."

Cantor cited as an example the use of information technology audits in the private sector and some local governments, in which employees are aware of periodic audits of communications sent from their offices. He said that kind of mechanism may have prevented Foley from using e-mail and Instant Messenger to inappropriately contact pages.

Cantor is mulling introducing his own legislative proposal, which has not been hashed out, that would include what he calls "internal control mechanisms." He said Republicans need to take serious reform actions to address how some Members abused the system for their own gain.

Citing the actions of incarcerated former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) and Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), Cantor said more needs to be done to address earmark reform and oversight of federal dollars.

"We have some divide in our Conference over what the Appropriations Committee ought to be doing and ought to be transparent about," he said. "I fully support transparency on that, to me, that's a little step."

Cantor noted that the increased spotlight on the earmark process caused a 37 percent drop in earmark requests this fiscal year.

"The American public expects us and our base expects us to exercise oversight over how federal dollars are spent and to exercise oversight onto ourselves," he said. "To me, there has to be a way to ensure that we have in place" some new practices.

Echoing a message employed by Boehner in his successful campaign for Majority Leader earlier this year, Cantor said Republicans need to plot a solid legislative agenda for the upcoming Congress and move beyond scandals and internal disputes.

"We have to get off this distraction and get back to the vision," he said, adding that Republicans need to reinforce in the electorate's mind that the GOP is "the party of ideas" and that Republicans should do more to appeal to independent and suburban voters.

While Cantor acknowledges that the party needs some recovery time, he downplayed suggestions that the turmoil in the ranks is signaling the end of the 12-year Republican majority.

Cantor noted that the NRCC's Battleground fundraising program, which he chaired this cycle, is poised to break the $25 million mark and set a new record for the GOP. He said the majority of that money came from individual members opening up their campaign chests to help the party.

"If that isn't an expression of confidence that we are going to stand together and weather this storm, I don't know what is," he said.

Word To The Wise: Don't Ignore Independents This Year (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, November 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090156

While all of us following this year's midterms are spending most of our time talking about the GOP's "base" problems and speculating about whether conservatives and evangelicals will stay home next month, we are missing a story that could turn out to be as big, or even bigger: independents.

Of course, fewer Americans vote in midterm elections than in presidential years, and much of the drop-off can be attributed to independents and weak partisans. Partisan voters historically make up the bulk of the midterm electorate, which is why we all pay so much attention to each party's base voters, whether they are African Americans, conservative evangelicals, liberals or opponents of legalizing abortion.

Obviously, if conservatives and Republicans stay home on Nov. 7, it will be a long, long night for the GOP. Republican candidates in all kinds of districts would be in trouble — even if those districts gave President Bush 65 percent of the vote two years ago.

But even if Republicans turn out, GOP candidates could find themselves in hot water in dozens of districts that they ordinarily should hold. That's because independent voters are not acting the way they normally do.

Independents may not turn out at the same rate as strong partisans in midterm elections, but for dozens of Republicans trying to hold their seats in a potentially strong Democratic wave — particularly those running in marginal districts — independents will be plentiful enough at the polls to separate winners from losers. In Connecticut, for example, independents (unaffiliated voters) constitute a plurality of all state voters.

Normally, independents break roughly evenly between the two parties. In the 2000 presidential election, independents went for then-Texas Gov. Bush over Al Gore, 47 percent to 45 percent. Four years later, Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) bested Bush 49 percent to 48 percent among independents.

This year, that's not close to being the case. "There just aren't any independents this year," joked one Republican strategist I talked with recently. "There are Republicans, Democrats and soft Democrats."

In poll after poll, independents are behaving like Democrats, whether it is in their distaste for Bush and the GOP-run Congress or in their vote choice in dozens of races around the country.

Nationally, a recent Cook Political Report/RT Strategies survey found a mere 33 percent of independents approving of the job Bush is doing. Those same independents favored Democrats, 49 percent to 30 percent, on the generic ballot. A Fox News/Opinion Dynamics poll found Democrats with a 9-point generic advantage among independents.

In a recent Mason-Dixon Polling & Research Inc. survey of Ohio's gubernatorial race, independent voters broke for Democrat Ted Strickland over Republican Ken Blackwell by an astonishing 22 points — 51 percent to 29 percent.

A recent series of Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg surveys in Senate races found the same thing. In the Virginia Senate race, Jim Webb (D) held a 9-point advantage among independents over incumbent Sen. George Allen (R). In Ohio, Rep. Sherrod Brown (D), the challenger, held a 12-point lead over incumbent Sen. Mike DeWine (R). And in Tennessee, Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D) held a 10-point lead over Republican Bob Corker among independents.

A rare exception was in New Jersey, where Republican state Sen. Tom Kean Jr.'s anti-corruption, pro-change message was allowing him to split independents with Democratic Sen. Bob Menendez.

Taking Stock of This Year's Midterms

It's almost over. So it's time to see where we are, and finally to put to rest two of the questions that continue to be asked most often even though they were answered months ago, and a newer question.

Question 1. Have these midterms been nationalized, or are they about local issues?

It has been obvious for months that most voters see the upcoming elections as a referendum on Bush and on the Iraq War, which is why Democratic House candidates across the country are running as well as they are.

Does anyone really think that Democrats Nancy Boyda (Kansas' 2nd district), Paul Hodes (New Hampshire's 2nd) and Jerry McNerney (California's 11th), each of whom lost badly two years ago, suddenly are doing well because of local issues? Would they have any chance of winning were it not for the national mood this time?

Republicans still are trying to localize their races so that voters see those contests less as a referendum on the president and more as a choice between GOP incumbents and the Democratic challengers. But so far that hasn't happened to the extent that Republicans hope and need.

Question 2. Are this year's midterm elections a referendum on President Bush?

If you have to ask, you haven't been paying attention and probably don't even care. Of course they are about the president and his Iraq policy.

Question 3. Did the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) expand the field?

Yes, but not by a lot. Republican seats held by Foley and Reps. Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) and Deborah Pryce (Ohio) certainly were affected by the scandal, and the scandal undoubtedly aided the Democratic message about corruption and change. But the page scandal isn't the reason Republicans are likely to lose the House. It just added to the GOP's pre-existing woes.

DOJ_NMG_0090157

What It's Like Being Caught Up In A Wave: I've Been There (RC)

By Dan Glickman

Roll Call, November 2, 2006

The last time Congress flipped, I was flipped as well. It was 1994. I had been a House Member for 18 years. I thought I had done a good job.

In the year leading up to Election Day, I had been the key sponsor of legislation creating product liability protection for small plane manufacturers — no coincidence for a Member whose Wichita district is home to Beech, Cessna and Learjet. The bill had been passed. The bill had been signed into law.

My opponent was a relative unknown with a substantially smaller campaign war chest. I was 30 points ahead of my opponent on Labor Day. In short, I was in political hog heaven.

Yet in November 1994, I was beaten by Republican Todd Tiahrt.

It was a bellwether of the nation — and it reflected the national conversation and the influence it had on individual races. This year, there are similarities. Predictions and speculation about 2006 being another 1994 are on everyone's minds.

In fact, a few months ago, The Wichita Eagle wrote an article about my loss to Tiahrt, who has served the 4th district now for 12 years, and whether he could be unseated by a Democratic opponent — an underdog not unlike the one he was back in 1994.

As Margaret Thatcher once said, "The wisdom of hindsight, so useful to historians and indeed to authors of memoirs, is sadly denied to practicing politicians."

So I offer a couple of thoughts about what I didn't do in 1994, at the nexus of a national referendum.

For starters, Democrats in 1994 didn't see the wave coming. My loss was a surprise. I was not on any target list. I was not viewed as a Member in trouble.

This year, I think Republicans are more prepared financially and from an organizational standpoint. On the other hand, if the public is sufficiently disenchanted with policy and the times, it is hard for money or organization to fight that.

But there are things candidates can do to help themselves.

First, I didn't work hard enough. I realized too late that I had rested a little bit on my laurels. I was a nine-term Congressman with a long track record of success. I was chairman of the House subcommittee with jurisdiction over most federal farm programs — a huge issue in my state. I was chairman of the Intelligence Committee. I was the incumbent.

But I guessed that people knew about all the great things I'd done. I didn't do a good enough job telling people my story.

Second, I didn't understand until too late what issues were motivating voters and how they were energizing the base of the Republican Party. Politics is important, but you cannot forget the issues. Issues can galvanize and organize the public. They can create zealous constituencies. A financial advantage in politics is not as important as the intensity of how people feel about the issues, your opponent and you.

I will never forget the day when the issues were spelled out for me.

It was 6 a.m. about two weeks before the elections, and I was working the plant gate at Cessna. I was a prodigious worker of plant gates at airplane companies in Wichita.

I was standing outside (cold) with a cup of coffee (hot), when a guy walked straight over to me and said, "Good job on that product liability bill, Glickman. But I'm not voting for you this time."

"Why?" I asked, mildly taken aback.

And he said, "Three reasons: guns, abortion and NAFTA."

In the previous two years, I had voted for the crime bill with gun restrictions, against most restrictions on abortion and for the North American Free Trade Agreement. And because of health care reform and other issues, then-President Bill Clinton was not popular in my district.

My opponent did a good job tying me to him and exploiting my votes on the crime bill and NAFTA in particular. This jeopardized my relationship with my aircraft worker constituency.

It struck me, as my hot coffee turned cold: I didn't realize I had lost my base. He abandoned me because he felt I had abandoned him.

I don't regret my votes on those issues. But I do regret that I didn't work harder to explain them and to motivate my supporters.

Finally, as someone who in 1976 ran against the establishment, I realized I now was perceived as being with the establishment and no longer as someone railing against the system. And that was something the public was looking for.

DOJ_NMG_0090158

Hindsight is good for seeing where you've been, but it can't always tell you where you ought to go. However, take it from this 1994 roadkill: You can learn a lot of lessons from running a winning campaign, but you can learn a lot more from running a losing campaign.

Succeeding in local politics through the storm of a national referendum is possible, particularly if you can see a wave coming. Work hard. Operate as if you're going to lose. Understand what is motivating your constituents. In many cases you can fight the wave. But sometimes you can't, and you just have to accept the inevitable.

It helps to understand that there is always a bright lining. Life after losing a Congressional race can lead to other opportunities — in my case, a Cabinet post, or heading a leading trade organization.

I enjoyed Congress. It is still the greatest job in the world. But life after Congress is pretty good as well.

Dan Glickman, a former Democratic Member of Congress from Kansas, is chairman and CEO of the Motion Picture Association of America.

With Iraq Driving Election, Voters Want New Approach (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And Megan Thee

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 1 — A substantial majority of Americans expect Democrats to reduce or end American military involvement in Iraq if they win control of Congress next Tuesday and say Republicans will maintain or increase troop levels to try to win the war if they hold on to power on Capitol Hill, according to the final New York Times/CBS News poll before the midterm election.

The poll showed that 29 percent of Americans approve of the way President Bush is managing the war, matching the lowest mark of his presidency. Nearly 70 percent said Mr. Bush did not have a plan to end the war, and 80 percent said Mr. Bush's latest effort to rally public support for the conflict amounted to a change in language but not policy.

The poll underlined the extent to which the war has framed the midterm elections. Americans cited Iraq as the most important issue affecting their vote, and majorities of Republicans and Democrats said they wanted a change in approach. Twenty percent said they thought the United States was winning in Iraq, down from a high this year of 36 percent in January.

Even beyond the war, the Times/CBS News poll, like most other polls this fall, contained worrisome indicators for Republicans as they go into the final days of a campaign in which many are bracing for a loss of seats in both the House and the Senate.

In a year when there are many close races, Democrats were more enthusiastic than Republicans about voting and more likely to say they would support their party's candidates, although Republicans were slightly more likely to say they would actually vote.

Fifty percent of independent voters, a closely watched segment of the electorate in such polarized times, said they intended to vote for the Democratic candidate, versus 23 who said they would vote for a Republican.

Among registered voters, 33 percent said they planned to support Republicans, and 52 percent said they would vote for Democrats.

As a rule, generic questions like those, while providing broad insights into the national mood, are often imprecise as a predictor of the outcome of hundreds of Congressional races, where local issues and personalities can shape the result.

Voters said neither Democrats nor Republicans had offered a plan for governing should they win on Tuesday, the poll found.

Yet Americans have some clear notions of how government may change if Democrats win control of Congress.

Beyond a quicker exit from Iraq, respondents said they thought a Democratic-led Congress would be more likely to increase the minimum wage, hold down rapidly rising health and prescription drug costs, improve the economy and — as Republicans have said frequently in these closing days of the campaign — raise taxes.

By a slight margin, more respondents said the threat of terrorism would increase under Republicans than said it would increase under Democrats.

Notwithstanding the clear expectation among members of both parties that a Democratic-led Congress would produce a change in Iraq policy, it was not clear how much influence that might have on Mr. Bush, who as commander in chief would retain the final say.

In addition, while Democrats have coalesced around a general position of finding a way to reduce or end American involvement in Iraq, there is substantial disagreement among Democratic Congressional leaders and candidates about exactly how to accomplish that.

Nearly 75 percent of respondents, including 67 percent of Republicans and 92 percent of Democrats, said they expected that Americans troops would be taken out of Iraq more swiftly under a Democratic-led Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0090159

Forty-one percent of respondents said they expected that troop levels would decrease if Democrats won control, while 40 percent said the party would seek to remove all troops. Forty-one percent said they expected troop levels to remain the same if Republicans won, while 29 percent said they thought the United States would send more troops if the Republicans continued to control Congress.

Those findings cut across party lines, but the poll found that Democrats were more likely to say Republicans would increase American troop strength while Republicans were more likely to say Democrats would remove all troops.

Follow-up interviews found clear expectations about the policies each party would pursue in Iraq, even if there was disagreement about which course was correct.

"If the Republicans continue in power, they would probably just want to keep doing what we're doing and doing it longer and harder because the president is Republican and he's the one who sent the troops there in the first place," said Ashley Robertson, 20, a Democrat from Minnesota. "But right now I think it's a bad thing to bring them all home because it's like we went in there to try to help and we're leaving them high and dry and saying clean up our mess."

Pat Atley, 73, a Republican from Florida, said she expected Republicans to press for more troops in Iraq if they stayed in power, although she said she hoped they would not.

"I've always felt we were never going to do any good over there," Ms. Atley said, adding, "I don't think we should increase our troops because increased troops aren't going to do anything except put more of our men and women in jeopardy."

Mr. Bush's overall approval rating was 34 percent, unchanged from a poll three weeks ago, an anemic rating that explains why many Democrats are featuring him in their final advertisements, as well as why some Republican incumbents do not want him at their side.

That approval rating is 9 points below where former President Bill Clinton's was in October 1994 — the election in which Republicans surprised Democrats by taking control of the House — and 28 points below where Mr. Bush's approval rating was on the eve of the 2002 midterms.

In this latest poll, 56 percent of respondents said Mr. Bush's campaigning on behalf of candidates had generally hurt them, as compared with 26 percent who said a campaign visit by Mr. Bush helped.

There was a slight increase, to 38 percent from 34 percent three weeks ago, in respondents who said they approved of how Mr. Bush was managing the economy. Similarly, there was a slight increase, to 44 percent from 40 percent in July, in respondents who said they approved of how Mr. Bush had managed the situation with North Korea.

In a year marked by corruption scandals, 58 percent of voters said corruption was widespread in Washington; 35 percent said the Republican Party had the most corrupt politicians, compared with 15 percent who said the Democratic Party did.

The poll found that the intensity of Democratic support for Democratic candidates was slightly greater than Republican support for Republican candidates, which could give some solace to Democrats who have been concerned that the Republican Party's formidable get-out-the-vote operation would help them eke out victories in close Congressional races. Ninety percent of Democratic voters are planning to vote Democratic, while 83 percent of Republicans said they would support Republican candidates.

In addition, 50 percent of Democrats said they felt more enthusiastic about voting in this election than in previous ones, compared with 39 percent of Republicans.

But 93 percent of Republicans said they were definitely or probably going to vote next Tuesday, compared with 89 percent of Democrats.

Democratic Leader Put To Work As G.O.P. Campaign Star (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Nov. 1 — Representative Melissa Bean of Illinois, a Democrat, has a Republican opponent in next week's election, but he does not appear in the advertisement that skewers her. Instead, that role is being played by a fellow Democrat, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the minority leader.

Judging by some of the political name-calling in the final days before the elections, Ms. Pelosi seems to be in the thick of campaigns for Congress from Illinois to Georgia and several places in between. She is the unwitting star of at least a half-dozen television spots — and countless radio spots, direct-mail campaigns and candidate debates —warning voters that if they choose their local Democrat for Congress, they are also casting a vote for Ms. Pelosi.

The problem with the tactic, Democrats and some Republican strategists say, is that many voters have no idea who Ms. Pelosi is. That can make the advertisements sound more desperate than menacing, or at the least, confounding.

"It's awful hard to make a boogeyman out of someone no one knows," said Ed Rollins, a Republican political consultant. "The reality is, no one is going to vote for a Republican congressman because they are afraid of Nancy Pelosi."

DOJ_NMG_0090160

A spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee suggested that Ms. Pelosi fell into the same category of unknowns as Representative J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, the Republican speaker.

"We don't run Denny Hastert ads because he is speaker of the House and no one knows who he is," said Sarah Feinberg, the spokeswoman. "People know who the president is, and that is why we have used him in more than 90 ads in 35 districts."

In a New York Times/CBS News poll conducted last week, 55 percent of those polled said they had not heard enough about Ms. Pelosi to form an opinion about her, compared with 10 percent who viewed her favorably and 17 percent who viewed her unfavorably. Other polls released in the last month have yielded similar results.

Still, many Republicans are betting that the prospect of Ms. Pelosi replacing Mr. Hastert as speaker should the Democrats take control of Congress will scare undecided voters into voting Republican.

"Nancy Pelosi is like kryptonite in Republican districts," said Ed Patru, a spokesman for the Republican National Campaign Committee, which is paying for some of the advertisements. "We'd be more than happy to fly Nancy Pelosi in to those districts."

Here she is in one of the group's advertisements against Ms. Bean: "Melissa Bean follows liberal Nancy Pelosi 83 percent of the time," growls the announcer, over images of the Golden Gate Bridge and some not-particularly-flattering snapshots of Ms. Pelosi, who represents San Francisco. "Melissa Bean. Just a Nancy Pelosi wannabe."

Mr. Patru said that the committee is encouraging candidates in "overwhelming red states" to invoke the specter of a Speaker Pelosi in their campaigns. The tactic mirrors one employed by Democrats in 1996, when the speaker, Newt Gingrich, became an antagonist in advertisements attacking Republican candidates.

"She'll reward illegal aliens with welfare, food stamps and free education," warns the announcer in an advertisement for Mac Collins, a Republican who is seeking to unseat Representative Jim Marshall in Georgia.

In one of the most fiercely contested races in Indiana, a Republican incumbent, Representative John Hostettler, has broadcast a commercial linking his Democratic challenger, Brad Ellsworth, to Ms. Pelosi. A radio spot went even further: "Pelosi will then put in motion her radical plan to advance the homosexual agenda, led by Barney Frank," the narrator says.

Representative Charles H. Taylor, the Republican incumbent in North Carolina's 11th District, goes for an even broader approach, linking his Democratic opponent, Heath Shuler, to Ms. Pelosi; Howard Dean, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee; and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton.

The television advertisements tend to share three features: images of Ms. Pelosi looking angry, startled or slightly bug-eyed; the words "liberal" and "San Francisco"; and dire tones reminiscent of the films shown to seventh-graders, warning of the dangers of marijuana.

The Republican National Campaign Committee even has a quiz on the home page of its Web site: "Which Nancy Pelosi quote do you find most disturbing?"

Ms. Pelosi is also used as a bat with which to beat on Democrats in debates and interviews. In Indiana, for example, Chris Chocola, a Republican incumbent, repeated Ms. Pelosi's name throughout a debate with his Democratic challenger, Joe Donnelly. In Utah's Second Congressional District, the Republican challenger, LaVar Christensen, has brought up her name incessantly on the campaign trail.

Among the many issues that surface in the advertisements — abortion, taxes and national security — immigration appears to be the most potent in Republican districts.

For example, an announcer in one advertisement produced by the campaign for Van Taylor, who is challenging a Democratic incumbent in Texas, warns over the sounds of a pounding kettle drum that his opponent, if elected, would pair up with Ms. Pelosi to raise taxes and offer welfare to immigrants. Voters are encouraged to "stop them" by voting for Mr. Taylor, to "protect our conservative values."

Variations of the anti-Pelosi advertisements have appeared in past campaigns, but unlike in this case, the targets had already become speaker.

In addition to the Gingrich advertisements in 1996, the Republicans produced an advertisement in 1980 about Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., then the Democratic speaker, in which Mr. O'Neill refused to yield to warnings that his car was out of gas, intended as a metaphor for his party.

Mr. Gingrich's spokesman, Rick Tyler, answered an e-mail message requesting comments about the anti-Pelosi advertisements with his own e-mail message: "Sorry. No interest here on that topic."

In a recent interview, Ms. Pelosi said she was unconcerned about the advertisements because, she said, they had no traction with voters.

"The American people don't know me," she said.

But some Republicans running in close races are counting on her being wrong.

DOJ_NMG_0090161

"Nancy Pelosi does not represent the values of middle Georgia," said Ted Prill, the campaign manger for Mr. Collins, who is seeking a seat in the Third District. "There is a case to be made that a vote for a Democrat in Georgia is a vote for Nancy Pelosi."

Pelosi's War Blunder (WT)

By Jack Kingston

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

In a stunning performance on "60 Minutes," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi proved again why she cannot be trusted to keep America safe from the threat of global terrorism and Islamic extremists.

Mrs. Pelosi demonstrated that she does not understand the global nature of the threat when she stated flatly "the war on terror is the war in Afghanistan." She may think the war is limited to Afghanistan, but where does al Qaeda believe the war is? Al Qaeda's No. 2 man, Ayman al-Zawahiri, in a letter to the leaders of al Qaeda in Iraq, was clear about the location of the global jihad and the importance of victory in Iraq:

"Victory of Islam will never take place until a Muslim state is established in the manner of the Prophet in the heart of the Islamic world ... As for the battles that are going on in the far flung regions of the Islamic world, such as Chechnya, Afghanistan, Kashmir, and Bosnia, they are just the groundwork and the vanguard for the major battles which have begun in the heart of the Islamic world."

Zawahiri reminds Iraqi terrorists, like Abu Musab Zarqawi, that God has blessed them "with the splendor of the spearhead of Jihad." Translation: Islamic fascists led by al Qaeda are fighting a global jihad to establish a Muslim caliphate from Egypt to Iraq. They will attack anyone, anywhere, with any means, that will further their violent cause.

Tourists in Indonesia, embassy workers in Africa, commuters in Spain and London, schoolchildren in Russia, office workers in New York and Washington, and 40 Americans on a plane over Pennsylvania could all tell Nancy Pelosi where the war on terror is, if their voices had not been silenced.

For Mrs. Pelosi, Iraq is not even part of the war on Islamic terrorism, while for our terrorist enemies Iraq is "the spearhead of jihad." Zawahiri's letter details a four-part strategy for global jihad starting with Iraq; "the first stage: expel the Americans from Iraq." In this first stage at least, Zawahiri seems to have found his "useful idiot" in Mrs. Pelosi.

She acknowledges that there are terrorists in Iraq, but naively submits that "they'll stay as long as we're there. They're there because we're there." What Mrs. Pelosi doesn't say is where she thinks the terrorists will go if we leave Iraq to fall into chaos. According to Mrs. Pelosi, our presence created the terrorists and when we leave they will put down their suicide belts and IEDs. She might want to read the rest of al Qaeda's plan before she is so sure:

"The second stage: Establish an Islamic authority ... over as much territory as you can to spread its power in Iraq ... in order to fill the void stemming from the departure of the Americans ... The third stage: Extend the jihad wave to the secular countries neighboring Iraq ... The fourth stage: It may coincide with what came before: the clash with Israel."

Our actions to liberate Iraq from the butcher of Baghdad did not cause Islamic terrorists, but our premature departure will surely embolden them. Zawahiri's letter exhorts his followers to learn the lessons of history as "things may develop faster than we imagine. The aftermath of the collapse of American power in Vietnam and how they ran and left their agents is noteworthy... we must take the initiative and impose a fait accompli upon our enemies."

While we may not have entered Iraq to defeat al Qaeda, there is no doubt that al Qaeda has entered Iraq to defeat us and begin the defeat of all nations in the region who do not share their extreme view of an Islamic caliphate, under strict Sunni rule, stretching across the entire Middle East. Like Osama bin Laden's fatwas declaring war on the United States and the civilized world, Zawahiri points to American retreat from Vietnam for inspiration. Maybe Mrs. Pelosi can answer how giving al Qaeda what they want in Iraq will keep Americans safe and secure from Islamic terrorism in the future.

Al Qaeda knows that they are in a war with many fronts. Zawahiri concludes that "more than half of this battle is taking place in the battlefield of the media ... we are in a media battle in a race for the hearts and minds of our umma (people)." Part of the battle against terrorism is taking place in our media as well. Last week, Mrs. Pelosi lost one battle for our side. America cannot take the risk that she will lose the war.

Rep. Jack Kingston, Georgia Republican, is vice chairman of of the House Republican Conference and a member of the Defense Appropriations Committee.

Scandals Alone Could Cost Republicans Their House Majority (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090162

Indictments, investigations and allegations of wrongdoing have helped put at least 15 Republican House seats in jeopardy, enough to swing control to the Democrats on Tuesday even before the larger issues of war, economic unease and President Bush are invoked.

With just five days left before Election Day, allegations are springing up like brushfires. Four GOP House seats have been tarred by lobbyist Jack Abramoff's influence-peddling scandal. Five have been adversely affected by then-Rep. Mark Foley's unseemly contacts with teenage male House pages. The remaining half a dozen or so could turn on controversies including offshore tax dodging, sexual misconduct and shady land deals.

Not since the House bank check-kiting scandal of the early 1990s have so many seats been affected by scandals, and not since the Abscam bribery cases of the 1970s have the charges been so serious. But this year's combination of breadth and severity may be unprecedented, suggested Julian E. Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University.

For more than a year, Democrats have tried to gain political advantage from what they called "a culture of corruption" in Republican-controlled Washington. Republican campaign officials insist the theme has not caught on with the public, but even they concede that many individual races have been hit hard.

"So many different kinds of scandals going on at the same time, that's pretty unique," Zelizer said. "There were scandals throughout the '70s, multiple scandals, but the number of stories now are almost overwhelming."

At least nine GOP seats have been affected by scandals and are highly vulnerable to Democratic takeover next week. Foley's abrupt resignation has jeopardized a Florida House district that had been on no one's radar screen. Under indictment and amid a swirl of ethics investigations, former House majority leader Tom DeLay (Tex.) resigned from Congress earlier this year, forcing Republicans to mount a long-shot write-in campaign for their chosen candidate. Rep. Robert W. Ney's guilty plea last month on corruption charges still hangs over the Ohio campaign of his would-be Republican successor, Joy Padgett, especially because Ney still has not resigned from Congress.

The GOP has all but abandoned longtime Rep. Curt Weldon (Pa.), as federal investigators examine charges that he steered lobbying contracts to his daughter. Weldon went on television yesterday with an ad featuring actors pleading, "Would you give a friend the benefit of the doubt? . . . Today, Curt Weldon needs our support."

Republican campaign strategists fear they have also lost the seat of Rep. Don Sherwood (Pa.), who has been dogged by the settlement of a lawsuit filed by a mistress who charged that Sherwood had throttled her.

Congress watchers once saw the swing seat of Rep. Rick Renzi (R-Ariz.) as a missed opportunity for Democrats. But now, as the U.S. attorney's office in Phoenix examines his role in a land deal for a business partner and political benefactor, Renzi's race with political neophyte Ellen Simon (D) has tightened.

Farther west, Rep. Jon Porter (R-Nev.) has had to contend with charges lodged last month by a longtime former aide, Jim Shepard, that the lawmaker made dozens of illegal fundraising calls from his congressional offices. And two reliably Republican districts in California are under assault by Democrats because Reps. Richard W. Pombo and John T. Doolittle have been linked to Abramoff, the lobbyist who pleaded guilty in January to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials.

Beyond those nine jeopardized GOP seats, four other Republicans have been tainted by the Foley page scandal. Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.) chose to issue a public apology after he admitted that he had known about inappropriate contact between Foley and a former page this spring. Democrats have repeatedly hit Rep. Deborah Pryce (Ohio), the House Republican Conference chairman, for inaction on the Foley matter. And Democrats have tried to hold two former members of the Page Board, Reps. Sue W. Kelly (N.Y.) and Heather A. Wilson (N.M.), accountable for Foley's actions.

Meanwhile, new allegations continue to spring up. Vern Buchanan, a Republican running for the Florida seat vacated by Rep. Katherine Harris (R), was the target of local media reports this week detailing his use of business entities in Caribbean tax havens to reduce levies on his auto dealerships. The Albany Times Union published an article yesterday charging that the wife of Rep. John E. Sweeney (R-N.Y.) called police late last year to report that her husband was "knocking her around" during a late-night argument.

And Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.), who made his name pushing campaign finance changes and governance reforms, was confronted with media reports alleging that a 2003 trip to Qatar -- partly funded by a group loosely tied to Abramoff -- had not been properly disclosed.

"The corruption issue plays in two ways: It contributes to the sour mood of the country and to the low job approval of Congress, and it particularly plays in races directly touched by allegations of scandal," said Republican pollster Whit Ayers. "And in those races, it plays a significant role."

House Democrats have had to deal with investigations of their own, involving Reps. William J. Jefferson (La.), Alan B. Mollohan (W.Va.) and Jane Harman (Calif.), but none of those cases have put Democratic seats in jeopardy.

In the Senate, a federal inquiry into Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.) and his ties to a nonprofit community agency that paid him more than $300,000 in rent while receiving millions of dollars in federal assistance has provided his Republican challenger with a strong issue and has kept that race close. But the seat of Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) may be in even more jeopardy, primarily because of Burns's ties to Abramoff.

DOJ_NMG_0090163

Recent polling suggests that the issue of corruption is beginning to stick. A CNN poll last month found that "half of all Americans believe most members of Congress are corrupt" and that "more than a third think their own representative is crooked."

And where the issue has hit directly, Democrats and their allies have been playing up charges to the hilt. Just yesterday, Christine Jennings, the Florida Democrat running for Harris's House seat, held a news conference to attack Buchanan's alleged offshore tax dodges.

Even the most peripheral contact with a scandal has not gone unnoticed. "Those that knew got to go," Albuquerque's Democratic mayor, Martin J. Chavez, thundered at a rally last month against New Mexico's Wilson, citing her role on the Page Board during Foley's misconduct. "Those that didn't know need to explain why they didn't."

Picking Up The Pace (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

In the closing days of campaigns, itineraries can be telling barometers of political strategy. Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, is making 12 stops in Missouri this week, hoping to increase Republican turnout in a too-close-to-call race between Senator Jim Talent, a Republican, and Claire McCaskill.

“We are literally hitting every media market of the state,” Mr. Mehlman said in a telephone interview from Sedalia before flying nearly 300 miles to Cape Girardeau. By week’s end, Mr. Mehlman is scheduled to hit top races in at least 10 states.

The Democratic outlook, however, cannot be as easily divined by studying the travel schedule of its party chairman, Howard Dean, who has been at odds with Congressional leaders throughout the midterm campaign. Mr. Dean held a news conference yesterday in Burlington, Vt., where he was governor, before flying to Chicago for a campus get-out-the-vote rally. Then, he was off to Pennsylvania, Ohio and Michigan.

“Governor Dean is crisscrossing the country raising money and rallying supporters,” a spokeswoman, Stacie Paxton, said.

Not included on his itinerary are many top Senate or House races that Democrats are concentrating on. JEFF ZELENY

Winning Small (NYT)

By Brian Mann

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

Saranac Lake, N.Y.

WITH the midterm election just a few days away, Republicans face a toxic political environment, fouled in large part by growing bitterness over the handling of the war in Iraq. By almost every measure, voter discontent is deeper than it was in 1994, when Democrats lost nine seats in the Senate and 54 in the House.

Surely, the Republican Party is facing an electoral drubbing. And yet, President Bush and Karl Rove baldly assert that Republicans will retain control of Congress. The rationale?

Majorities in Congress aren’t formed by the national zeitgeist, as Mr. Rove cheerfully points out. They are built one race at a time. And in dozens of close contests this fall, the outcome will be determined largely by one often-overlooked minority group: the mostly white and mostly conservative voters who live in America’s small towns.

Residents of rural areas make up only a fifth of the country’s population. That’s a little less than African-Americans and Hispanics combined. But unlike voters in those minority groups, small-town whites are often kingmakers in national politics.

In 2004, they voted for George W. Bush by nearly a 20-point margin. Newspapers ran headlines that baffled their urban readers: “Rural Values Proved Pivotal,” “Conservatives in Rural Ohio Big Key in Bush Victory,” and “G.O.P. Won With Accent on Rural and Traditional.”

This year, those same right-leaning small towns make up a major voting bloc in a half-dozen make-or-break Senate races, like those in Missouri, Montana, Tennessee and Virginia. They also dominate battleground House districts throughout the country, from Idaho to northern New York. If rural America embraces Republicans with the same fervor it did two years ago, Democrats will almost certainly be denied a majority in the Senate and may fall short in the House.

In part, the electoral importance of small towns reflects a profound rural bias hardwired into our political system. The Constitution grants two Senate seats to each state regardless of its population. As a consequence, a majority of senators are elected by voters in 26 sparsely settled states that together contain less than 18 percent of the country’s population.

DOJ_NMG_0090164

A few decades ago, this uneven distribution of power didn't matter, because rural states regularly divided their votes between the two major parties. But in recent years, low-population states like Alaska, Kansas and Wyoming have voted as a conservative bloc, favoring Republican candidates by overwhelming margins.

Today the Republican Party holds an 11-seat Senate majority, but Republican senators represent 4.5 million fewer people than their Democratic colleagues, who tend to come from urban states like California, Illinois and New York. In the 2004 elections, Democratic candidates for the Senate captured nearly 10 percent more votes than Republicans nationwide, thanks to landslide support among urbanites. Yet the Republicans still managed to gain four seats, due to victories in rural states like South Dakota and South Carolina.

A similarly skewed outcome is possible this year. Democrats are widely expected to gain seats in Ohio and Pennsylvania. If they do, Democratic senators will represent some 10 to 20 million more Americans nationwide than Republican senators. But if rural voters in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia swing conservative, the Republicans will cling to the narrow majority Mr. Rove has promised.

In the House, Republican leaders, including Speaker Dennis Hastert and his former deputy, Tom DeLay, have worked to create a similar small-town bias. They redrew district lines to systematically fracture the voting power of urban and suburban neighborhoods in half a dozen states, including Florida, Ohio and Texas.

In 2003, The Washington Post published an analysis of this scheme by a Texas political operative, Joby Fortson: "This has a real national impact that should assure that Republicans keep the House no matter the national mood," Mr. Fortson wrote.

Naturally, the Republicans' rural strategy only works if small towns vote Republican by wide margins. This year, that might not happen. A bipartisan poll conducted last week for the Center for Rural Strategies found that the loyalty of rural voters has been deeply shaken by Iraq and the Mark Foley page scandal.

Since September, rural voters moved from a four-point advantage for Republicans to a four-point advantage for Democrats in Senate races, the Rural Strategies report concluded, and from evenly divided to a 13-point advantage for the Democrats in House races.

Worse yet for Republicans, a growing number of Democrats have awakened to the fact that small towns matter. In Missouri, Claire McCaskill's Senate campaign has focused so intently on small-town voters that The St. Louis Post-Dispatch described it as an "apparent obsession." And nationwide, Democrats are fielding centrist candidates who can compete in rural districts like Idaho's First, Indiana's Second, and New York's 24th.

If Democrats succeed in increasing their rural vote, they could decisively sweep Republicans from power. But as the Center for Rural Strategies has pointed out, most of these races will be decided by razor-thin margins. And the Republicans are working feverishly to mollify and re-energize their rural base with talk about same-sex marriage, abortion, gun rights, public Christianity, terrorism and immigration — all issues that play brilliantly in small towns. The Republican National Committee has cranked up its sophisticated get-out-the-vote machine, combining phone and mail prompts, pastor-and-pulpit networks, conservative talk radio and door-to-door canvassing.

On Election Day, millions of urban Democrats will go to the polls expecting victory and dramatic change in Washington. But beware: Mr. Rove's sunny forecast isn't just spin. He and his party are counting on small towns to send a very different message, and to give the Republicans two more years to get it right.

How Big Will The Democratic Wave Be? Use This Formula (RC)

By Louis Jacobson

Roll Call, November 2, 2006

How big might the Democratic wave on Nov. 7 be? In one sense, there's an easy answer: Just look at the Congressional results, and if there's a Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and maybe a Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) on Nov. 8, that will be evidence enough.

However, to truly measure the intensity of a Democratic wave means probing a little deeper. Does the wave accelerate longer-term trends of geographic realignment? Does it carry Democrats to victory even in "red" areas? Is it strong enough to rescue weak Democratic incumbents? And does it reach down below the Congressional level to governors, legislatures and attorneys general?

Here are some questions that address these issues. We've provided a scoring system for each one that, when aggregated after Nov. 7, should suggest just how far-reaching the Democratic wave of 2006 was.

1. How many New England Republicans — Senators, House Members and governors — will be left standing after Election Day?

Currently, 14 Republicans hold one of these three offices in Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Vermont. Of these, six are either not up for election this year or seem safe bets to win again.

DOJ_NMG_0090165

The races that are in play are the seats held by New Hampshire Reps. Charles Bass and Jeb Bradley; Connecticut Reps. Nancy Johnson, Christopher Shays and Rob Simmons; Rhode Island Sen. Lincoln Chafee; Rhode Island Gov. Don Carcieri and the seat being vacated by Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

Scoring:

Seven or fewer Republicans survive: 8 points

Eight or nine survive: 6 points

10 or 11: 3 points

12 to 14: 1 point

2. Is there a correlation between Democratic Senate candidates and Democratic gubernatorial candidates in the same state winning, or are voters willing to ticket-split?

This question only concerns states where both races are considered competitive: Ohio, Rhode Island, Maryland and Minnesota.

For any seat where Democrats win both contests: Add 2 points.

For any seat where each party wins one seat: Add zero points.

For any seat where Republicans win both: Subtract 2 points.

3. How many Democratic-held House seats can the GOP flip on Election Day?

No seats: 8 points

One or two seats: 6 points

Three or four seats: 3 points

Five or more seats: 0 points

4. How many Republican-held House districts that voted for Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) in the 2004 presidential race will still be held by Republicans after Election Day?

There are 18 such districts. Of those, four Republicans are likely to hold their seats — Reps. Mike Castle (Del.), Charlie Dent (Pa.), Mark Kirk (Ill.) and Jim Leach (Iowa).

The other 14 are considered competitive. The seats are held by Bass; Johnson; Simmons; Shays; Michael Fitzpatrick (Pa.); Jim Gerlach (Pa.); Anne Northup (Ky.); Dave Reichert (Wash.); Clay Shaw (Fla.); Jim Walsh (N.Y.); Curt Weldon (Pa.); Heather Wilson (N.M.); and the seats being vacated by Reps. Bob Beauprez (Colo.) and Jim Nussle (Iowa).

Four or fewer seats: 8 points

Five to eight seats: 6 points

Nine to 11 seats: 4 points

12 to 14 seats: 3 points

15 to 18 seats: 1 point

5. How far ahead of Bush's 2004 vote percentages will Republicans run in blue-state Senate races?

There are seven competitive races in this category. The Republicans running are Mike Bouchard in Michigan, where Bush won 48 percent; Chafee in Rhode Island, where Bush won 39 percent; Tom Kean Jr. in New Jersey, where Bush won 46 percent; Rep. Mark Kennedy in Minnesota, where Bush won 48 percent; Mike McGavick in Washington, where Bush won 46 percent; Sen. Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania, where Bush won 48 percent; and Michael Steele in Maryland, where Bush won 43 percent.

39 or more aggregate percentage points ahead of Bush: 0 points

30 to 38 aggregate points ahead: 2 points

20 to 29 points: 3 points

10 to 19 points: 5 points

1 to 9 points: 7 points

0 or fewer points: 8 points

6. How far ahead of Kerry's 2004 vote percentages will Democrats run in red-state Senate races?

There are six competitive races in this category. The Democrats running are Rep. Sherrod Brown in Ohio, where Kerry won 49 percent; Rep. Harold Ford Jr. in Tennessee, where Kerry won 43 percent; Claire McCaskill in Missouri, where Kerry won 46 percent; Jim Pederson in Arizona, where Kerry won 44 percent; Jon Tester in Montana, where Kerry won 39 percent; and Jim Webb in Virginia, where Kerry won 45 percent.

40 or more aggregate percentage points ahead of Kerry: 8 points

30 to 39 aggregate points ahead: 7 points

20 to 29 points: 5 points

10 to 19 points: 3 points

DOJ_NMG_0090166

1 to 9 points: 2 points
0 or fewer points: 0 points

7. Will voters in blue states elect weakened Democratic candidates who have relatively low approval ratings, just to prevent the GOP from gaining ground?

The candidates in this category are Maine Gov. John Baldacci, Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich, Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle, Michigan Gov. Jennifer Granholm, Rep. William Jefferson (La.), Oregon Gov. Ted Kulongoski; Sen. Bob Menendez (N.J.) and Rep. Alan Mollohan (W.Va.).

Seven or eight of these candidates win: 8 points
Five or six of them win: 6 points
Three or four win: 2 points
Two or fewer win: 0 points

8. Which ballot initiatives have better success, those that would raise the minimum wage or those that would ban same-sex marriage?

Minimum-wage hikes are on the ballot in Arizona, Colorado, Missouri, Montana, Nevada and Ohio. Same-sex marriage bans are on the ballot in Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin. And one measure in Colorado would establish domestic partnerships.

Any same-sex marriage measure is defeated: 2 points per measure
Colorado's domestic partnership measure passes: 2 points
All minimum-wage measures pass: 2 points
Any minimum-wage measure loses: Subtract 2 points per measure.

9. How many in-play legislative chambers do the Democrats control after Election Day?

This year, 21 legislatures are rated as competitive by the Rothenberg Political Report. The 10 Democratic-held chambers that are in play are the Colorado House and Senate; the Maine House and Senate; the Montana Senate; the North Carolina House; the Oklahoma Senate; the Tennessee House; and the Washington House and Senate.

The nine Republican-held chambers that are in play are the Indiana House; the Iowa House; the Minnesota House; the Nevada Senate; the Ohio House; the Oregon House; the Pennsylvania House; the Tennessee Senate and the Wisconsin Senate. The two tied chambers are the Iowa Senate and the Montana House.

The Democrats end up controlling 18 to 20 of these competitive chambers: 8 points
The Democrats control 14 to 17: 6 points
Nine to 13: 4 points
Five to eight: 2 points
Four or fewer: 0 points

10. How many strong Republican candidates in competitive races for state attorney general win this year?

The candidates are: Chuck Poochigian in California; Ferris Wharton in Delaware; Bill McCollum in Florida; Phill Kline in Kansas; Scott Rolle in Maryland; Jeff Johnson in Minnesota; Jim Bibb in New Mexico; Jeanine Pirro in New York; Betty Montgomery in Ohio; and J.B. Van Hollen in Wisconsin.

No Republicans on this list win: 8 points
One to three win: 6 points
Four or five: 4 points
Six or seven: 2 points
Eight to 10: 0 points

Now, for the final ratings, add up the points from each question and use the scale below to gauge how strong the Democratic wave was.

70-80 points: Massive Democratic wave
55-69 points: Strong Democratic wave
45-54 points: It'll do
30-44 points: Underwhelming
11-29 points: Big disappointment
0-10 points: Democrats, find another line of work.

Behind The Gridlock (WP)

By David S. Broder
The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090167

On the eve of another national election, the terms "gridlock" and "polarization" have become staples of the political vocabulary -- so much so that the reality behind them often goes unexamined.

Remedying that oversight is what motivates the unusual collaboration of two think tanks, the Hoover Institution at Stanford University and the Brookings Institution in Washington, in a forthcoming volume titled "Red and Blue Nation? Characteristics and Causes of America's Polarized Politics."

I have not read all the essays that more than 15 scholars have contributed to the volume, but the lead piece by William Galston and Pietro Nivola, both of Brookings, offers a modest bit of cheer to those who despair of our democracy in this season when we are swamped by nasty, negative campaign ads.

They acknowledge that polarization is real -- certainly in Congress and in some respects in the country as well. The parties are more sharply defined and constituencies are more distinct -- philosophically and to some extent geographically.

But when it comes to weighing the consequences of these divisions, Galston and Nivola offer some useful counters to the prevailing pessimism.

In one powerful paragraph they set forth their refutation of the notion that polarization produces gridlock. "Whatever else the overall legislative record of recent years may show, sclerosis has not been a distinguishing characteristic," they write.

"Reform of the welfare system, substantial tax reductions, big trade agreements, a great expansion of federal intervention in local public education, important course corrections in foreign policy, reorganization of the intelligence bureaus, a significant campaign finance law, new rules governing bankruptcy and class-action litigation, a huge new Cabinet department, massive enlargement of Medicare -- for better or worse, all these milestones, and others, were achieved despite polarized politics."

Beyond these specific measures, they find signs of convergence between the parties -- at least in some ways. Republicans, they note, have become far more comfortable with "big government" programs such as Medicare drug benefits. And Democrats have swallowed tax cuts and trade agreements they originally opposed -- and now make no noises about repealing them.

"There has been enough partisan convergence (albeit selective, tenuous, opportunistic or episodic) to secure pieces of legislation," they write. The implication I draw from this is that despite the failures on Social Security, immigration and other issues, the possibility exists that the new Congress can accomplish some things.

But even these relatively upbeat scholars acknowledge certain dangers in the degree of polarization we are seeing. First, it makes it far harder to address long-term challenges such as the underfinanced condition of our Social Security and Medicare systems and the needs of the retiring baby boomers.

Second, because the divisions no longer stop at the water's edge, it becomes far more difficult to maintain a steady course in foreign policy. The partisan nature of the Iraq debate underlines that risk.

Third, the polarization is particularly hard on the third branch of government, the judiciary. Hearings on judgeships -- especially the Supreme Court -- have become full-scale political campaigns, with all the nastiness we have come to expect in those races. And some Republicans have made whipping boys of sitting judges.

Finally, there is the damage that polarization does to the whole structure of trust on which any system of representative government must rest.

The authors write: "If polarized parties are what can get 120.3 million Americans to cast ballots -- the largest number in U.S. history -- why worry? Because a healthy civic culture ought to do more than bestir voters; it should build their trust in the nation's political institutions. It is in this respect that, alas, querulous partisanship can become corrosive."

As we come to the end of another down-and-dirty campaign, that is the damage we must contemplate. It matters little which party controls Congress if the people think Congress is made up of knaves and rascals, or even of well-intentioned men and women corrupted by special interests and the constant pursuit of campaign cash.

Nothing that comes out of such a Congress will be accepted as genuine or worthwhile by the citizenry. That is a lesson that campaign consultants and candidates who indulge in relentlessly negative campaigns forget.

In the end they not only demean their opponents, they also damage the very institution in which they hope to serve. What kind of victory is that?

Republican Seems To Rally In Run For Seat Foley Quit (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

STUART, Fla., Nov. 1 — When Mark Foley resigned from Congress in disgrace five weeks ago, his Democratic challenger seemed headed for one of the easiest victories of the election season.

But in this least predictable of states, Joe Negron, the Republican choice to run as Mr. Foley's replacement, is getting powerful help as the clock runs down, and now appears to be running almost neck and neck with Tim Mahoney, the Democrat.

DOJ_NMG_0090168

With the National Republican Congressional Committee pouring nearly $2 million into the race and Gov. Jeb Bush campaigning at his side, Mr. Negron, a member of the Florida House, is hoping that even the misfortune of having Mr. Foley's name on the ballot instead of his own — a consequence of the last-minute nature of the change — can be turned to his advantage. Republicans are posting signs urging voters to "Punch Foley for Joe," a reminder that a vote in the Foley column is actually a vote for Mr. Negron.

"I know this district, and we are not going to allow ourselves to be defined by the disgraceful actions of our former congressman," Mr. Negron said in an interview Wednesday. "I feel this tremendous momentum and energy among Republicans and conservative Democrats to keep this district in the Republican column."

The numbers are on his side: 42 percent of voters here in the 16th Congressional District, which spans the state from Palm Beach to Charlotte County, are Republicans, and 36 percent Democrats. President Bush won here comfortably in 2000 and 2004, and most of the district (its boundaries were redrawn in 2002) has not sent a Democrat to Congress since the 1970's.

Nationally, the chief political benefit of the Foley furor to Democrats was that it knocked Republicans off their tax and terrorism message in the crucial weeks after Congress adjourned at the end of September. It also ensnared several leading Republicans associated with Mr. Foley, while limiting Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's political drawing power.

But in a reflection of the race in Mr. Foley's own district, his lewd e-mail messages to House pages seem to have had little lasting effect on Congressional races around the country. One Democratic strategist said the party had never expected more than a few races to be influenced significantly by Mr. Foley's conduct.

Yet Mr. Mahoney has made a strong showing, especially given that he is a newcomer to politics who was virtually unknown before the Foley scandal drew spotlights to the race. A financier recruited by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee to run against Mr. Foley, he is more conservative than many of his party's other newcomers, a self-described fundamentalist Christian who opposes same-sex marriage and tighter gun control. He has painted himself as an outsider who would act independently in Congress, and Mr. Negron, a state lawmaker since 2000, as an ineffective partisan.

"I find myself running against Dennis Hastert, Karl Rove and the Republican leadership in Washington," Mr. Mahoney said after rallying campaign volunteers here. "They picked somebody to run for this seat that is publicly on record as supporting the failed policy of this administration for the last six years."

A poll conducted in mid-October for The South Florida Sun-Sentinel showed Mr. Mahoney leading Mr. Negron by 48 percent to 41 percent, with 11 percent undecided. But this week two nonpartisan Congressional handicappers, Stuart Rothenberg and Charlie Cook, changed their assessments of the race from "leans Democrat" to "tossup."

Mr. Rothenberg said voters seemed to have gotten past any confusion about the ballot, perhaps because news organizations had closely covered the race since Mr. Foley quit on Sept. 29. He also noted that Mr. Mahoney had begun attacking Mr. Negron by name in television advertisements — a sign, he said, that Mr. Mahoney is worried.

Mr. Mahoney said a new internal poll showed not only that he was still ahead, but that the margin was widening.

"What's going to put me over the top," he said, "is I'm getting virtually all the Democrats, the vast majority of independents and about 20 percent of the Republicans to vote for me."

Mr. Mahoney entered the race about a year ago and says he has been traveling the vast district ever since. It includes a few wealthy Palm Beach County towns, the growing exurbs of Martin and St. Lucie Counties, rural interior regions of cattle and citrus farms, and Punta Gorda and Port Charlotte on the Gulf Coast. He owns a ranch in Highlands County, the backdrop for advertisements in which he shoots a gun, saddles a horse and barbecues slabs of meat.

Mr. Negron, a lawyer from Stuart, heads the powerful budget committee in the Florida House. He ran for attorney general this year, but was lagging and dropped out of the primary.

On Wednesday he issued a news release criticizing Mr. Mahoney for planning to attend a fund-raiser in New York with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, accusing him of taking his marching orders from her. Asked about the fund-raiser, Mr. Mahoney said he needed to "reach out to Democrats on a nationwide basis."

But his spokeswoman, Jessica Santillo, said later that he had never planned to attend. He will participate by teleconference from Florida, she said.

Luring Lapsed Democrats In Kentucky (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

BARDSTOWN, Ky., Oct. 27 — When Ron Lewis, a Republican, won an upset in a special election here in the spring of 1994, he replaced a Democrat who had represented the district in Congress for four decades before he died. Mr. Lewis's victory in an overwhelmingly Democratic area came to be seen as a harbinger of the Republican sweep that followed that fall.

DOJ_NMG_0090169

Now, Democrats are hoping that Mr. Lewis's first tight race in a decade could be a bellwether of a Democratic tide this year.

His opponent, Mike Weaver, has come increasingly close to Mr. Lewis in the polls by running as a conservative Democrat on a slogan of "Faith, Family, Freedom." He has emphasized his military background in signs urging people to vote for "Colonel Mike Weaver." And if the Democrats win a majority, he says he will not vote for Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader whom Republicans have caricatured as the symbol of all things California and liberal, for House speaker.

With widespread unease about the war in Iraq, even in a region that includes the Fort Knox Army base, many Democrats who have supported Mr. Lewis are now saying that Mr. Weaver seems like the kind of Democrat who could bring them back to the party.

"What I hear when I go out in the district is, 'Thank goodness we have a Democrat we can vote for,' " Mr. Weaver said.

The race here in the Second District is one of three Congressional contests in Kentucky that have become unexpectedly competitive in the last days of a campaign where Democrats are hoping to win the 15 seats they need to gain a majority in the House.

Signs here say, "Had enough? Vote Democratic!" and it seems many people are willing to do just that.

At a luncheon for retired teachers here, Mr. Weaver, a state legislator, fielded questions about taxes and Social Security. But most of the questions focused on abortion, stem cell research and religion. He reassured the audience, "I am pro-life." And he repeatedly mentioned his family, the lessons of his humble upbringing on a farm and what he calls moral values.

"The Mark Foley scandal just kind of shattered the attitude that in order to stand for faith and freedom and family that you had to be of one political party," he told the teachers. "My faith and family values are as strong as anyone's. They were taught and nurtured at home and in a school system, and earned in a foxhole. I think you elect people based on their own individual values, family values, moral values, not on their political party."

But, one woman pressed him nervously, wouldn't he have to vote with Ms. Pelosi?

"I don't think she has truly looked at the Democratic Party to see what the Democratic Party stands for," Mr. Weaver replied. He opened his arms wide to describe what he sees as the party's philosophy. "It incorporates all of the United States, all of Kentucky, all of the Second Congressional District," he said. "There's room for everybody there."

He told the crowd that he had already joined the Blue Dog Democrats, a group of about 40 conservatives in Congress, as well as the anti-abortion group Democrats for Life, with about 29 lawmakers.

"That's 69 of us who won't necessarily agree" with the liberal wing of the party, he said.

Mr. Lewis, a former Christian bookstore owner who has risen in Congress to become a member of the powerful Ways and Means Committee, was seen as a long shot when he won in 1994.

But in 12 years, the state and the district have increasingly leaned Republican, even if many people retain their registration as Democrats. And Mr. Lewis doubts that Mr. Weaver will be able to persuade enough voters to elect a Democrat.

"Voters are concerned, no matter if it is a conservative Democrat, what the party will look like in D.C., with Nancy Pelosi in charge," he said. "They see the Democrat Party as being controlled by very strong liberal leadership, and that makes people here in the Second District very nervous, no matter who is their nominee."

Still, he acknowledges that this will be much tighter race than his last, when he won by about 30 points. To prepare, he raised more money than he ever has before.

Mr. Lewis said he expected to win by 15 points. Republicans declined to release polling data, but Democratic surveys have shown the two pulling about even.

Mr. Lewis put up an advertisement this month attacking Mr. Weaver as displaying "disgraceful conduct" as a member of the state's National Guard Retention Board in the early 1990's, when the board fired 24 officers. Many of the officers later said they had been fired for refusing to contribute to the Democratic governor.

Investigations cleared Mr. Weaver of any wrongdoing. Factcheck.org, a nonpartisan organization that assesses political advertising, concluded, "The only 'disgraceful conduct' we see here is the ad itself."

Mr. Weaver called it the move of a "desperate individual." But Scott Lasley, an assistant professor of political science at Western Kentucky University, said it signaled the threat to Mr. Lewis, and a sharp departure from previous races, when he could not recall Mr. Lewis even putting up a Web site.

Mr. Lewis has declined to appear at several debates with Mr. Weaver, or to appear with him at any forum that might look like a debate. Some debate organizers left an empty chair to signify his absence.

"When you're the incumbent and you have a good lead, a lot of people don't debate," Mr. Lewis said, "because you're letting your opponent have some exposure on your time."

But the move has cost him some voters.

DOJ_NMG_0090170

"I think he is running scared," said Margaret Sims, who had organized the teachers' luncheon and said she was disappointed when Mr. Lewis's office declined several pleas for him to attend. "And he needs to. I think this is going to be the year of the Democrat."

Ms. Sims is a registered Democrat who has repeatedly supported Mr. Lewis, but says she will vote for Mr. Weaver. Peggy Horton, another retired teacher, was once a Democrat but is now a registered Republican.

"The Democrats left a lot of the values I put a lot of stock in," Ms. Horton said.

She is still undecided. But after asking Mr. Weaver questions about taxes and religion, she said this might be the year that she votes for a Democrat again.

Politics That Go Against The Grain (WP)

By Lynne Duke

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

DUBUQUE, Iowa -- On Main Street in this Mississippi River town, the bar at Mario's Italian Restaurant is a hothouse of politics these days, a place where folks such as Cheryl Walser Kramer, a Republican, and Frank Frost, a Democrat, hurl sharp-tongued barbs across party lines.

"She's probably packing heat," Frost, 71, jokes when Kramer says she's a member of the National Rifle Association.

Kramer teases back, "I'm gonna get a bumper sticker: 'I only shoot Democrats.' "

Debbie Gau, the bartender, glides through the friendly fire, filling Frost's glass with whiskey, Kramer's with beer, and letting them carry on the rhetorical war here in Iowa's 1st Congressional District. It is one of the super-close races that could decide whether the Republicans lose control of the House of Representatives -- and Gau, it turns out, could be part of the reason why.

Though she keeps quiet about her politics when her regulars are revved up, she's got some distinct views of her own.

Gau, 52, a Democrat, supported the war. She thought Iraq had attacked the United States, and she thought it right that the United States should hit back. But then the war dragged on. The death toll rose. She's got a brother working as a civilian contractor over there and worries about him every day.

"I just don't think we should be over there," she says. "We should just leave."

The war looms large in this year's midterm elections, so the pollsters say, and sentiments such as Gau's are the reason why: the drift of support away from war, the struggle to find a rationale for continuing a war in which U.S. troop deaths mount and the chaos deepens.

In Iowa's 1st, which has sent only Republicans to the House since 1978, the open-seat race pits Democrat Bruce Braley against Republican Mike Whalen. But in several interviews on Main Streets around this district, it becomes clear that people are focused less on the candidates and far more on the big issues of the day: corruption, scandal and polarized politics; the cost of health care, the quality of education, the economy and the war above all.

People are cynical about politics, at least about the other party's politics, and so Democrats especially believe that things have gone off the rails in Washington.

Gau, for one, is not even sure she'll vote. She's disaffected from politics altogether.

"I just think politics is crooked," she says. "The rich pay to get what they want from the people in office. . . . It's like the Mafia, with laws. They get to run what they want, when they want. They don't mean nothing that they say."

* * *

Over in the tiny town of Anamosa, about 60 miles southwest of Dubuque, Sue Postel, 61, watches the comings and goings of Main Street from her perch at the cash register of the National Motorcycle Museum, which features bikes dating back to 1910. It's the main draw of an otherwise sleepy town.

Ask what's eating her these days about politics and Postel lets loose not about the war, but about her monthly health-care premium. It's risen from $25 a month to $394 a month in the five years since she retired.

She's a Bushie -- voted for him twice -- though she's a registered Democrat and also voted for Bill Clinton. A bona fide ticket-splitter, she is not sure which candidate will get her vote, though she definitely will vote, she says, because "that gives me my chance to bitch."

"This war is another thing," she says, shaking her head. "But there's nothing you can do about it. We're stuck, honey. How are we going to get our troops home?"

Her angst about the war is related to her distaste about politics and the direction of the country -- a solid mound of discontent with many component parts.

Politics, she says, "is dirty, it's nasty. I don't like to watch it. I switch [the TV] when ads come on. I can't take the slammin'."

DOJ_NMG_0090171

Of late, the ad that's had blood boiling among Democrats in the district was one in which the Whalen campaign tried to suggest that Braley would defund the troops in Iraq. The ad depicted a soldier removing his armor, helmet and weapon and standing defenseless in a T-shirt.

* * *

Down in Maquoketa, 35 miles south of Dubuque, cigarette smoke clouds the air as Peter Carlson talks politics in the Main Street Cafe, as he does most Saturday mornings in this spot-on-a-map town.

His muscular arms on the table, Carlson leans in close, lowers his voice and says matter-of-factly, "I hate Bush with a passion."

Carlson, 27, wears a Harley jacket and heavy boots. His fingernails are dirty, for he's a man who works with his hands on a machine shop floor, who lives on 28 acres of timberland with his wife and toddling son.

Carlson can cite chapter and verse of what's wrong with American politics. The war; the corruption of influence and power; the creation of wedge issues to polarize people, "making issues out of non-issues," such as stem cell research.

"I have no belief that that's important whatsoever," Carlson says of the stem cell debate.

He's sick of it. Sick of accusations that folks who criticize the war are undermining the troops.

"I do support soldiers," he says. "They're employees. They do their jobs. But it's obvious that Iraq was not the place we should have gone into. . . . They had nothing to do with 9/11."

So he'll vote for Braley. But really, Carlson will be voting against Bush, against the Republicans.

"Now is kind of the time to put all your cards in," he says. "I'd like to see us win back the House."

* * *

Sometimes it is something quite personal that sparks political activism. Something such as watching your father suffer with Parkinson's disease and then hearing a public figure mock the disease's symptoms.

And so it was, back in Dubuque, that Stratis Giannakouros was overheard at a Braley campaign office one night last week offering to volunteer.

Giannakouros, 27, says he was deeply offended when he heard Rush Limbaugh ridicule the actor Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease, for shaking so wildly in a campaign ad supporting federal funding for stem cell research. Seeing his father suffer in the same way, Giannakouros says, he was outraged at the mockery.

Though already a Democrat, he had not been active. Limbaugh was his spark. Giannakouros volunteered to canvass Democratic voters, "to make sure that this state doesn't go Republican," because he believes that Limbaugh wasn't just speaking for himself.

"He is the Republican mouthpiece," says Giannakouros. "He represents that party."

But it's more than Parkinson's. Something more, he says, is wrong. In politics, he hears the rhetoric of compassion, but he doesn't see it in policy, he says, citing cuts in education funding and the Mark Foley scandal.

He is reluctant to opine on the war, saying he doesn't feel he has enough facts.

"I'm against the misinformation" is all he'll say, adding that the misinformation comes from both sides in the political debate.

* * *

Back at Mario's, they're throwing down the spirits and talking terrorism and the war and politics.

"I think the president has his [eye] on the ball," says Kramer, the Republican, who works in health-care administration. "I think he totally understands that the people who came here on 9/11 plan to come back."

"There are evil people in the world," says James Darling, her companion, an optometrist and a Republican who describes himself as a libertarian.

He adds, "If you don't appear strong, you appear weak and people will take advantage of you."

Frost, the Democrat, agrees. Though he is against tax cuts for the rich and believes the country is better off with Democratic leadership, he offers, "I have a little more hawkish opinion than most Democrats."

In fact, he calls himself "a bit of a warmonger." Rather than pull troops out of Iraq, he'd like to see more troops sent in. He's a Korean War vet who sat on the demilitarized zone more than 50 years ago and is aghast that the United States still is dealing with the North Korean threat after all these years.

"If Truman had let MacArthur A-bomb Korea, we wouldn't be here," he says.

When it comes to enemies, his philosophy is: "We've got to stomp somebody's [butt]." He believes the Democrats know this, too -- that all the talk about pulling troops out of Iraq is just politics.

"I think the Democrats are trying to use it against [Bush] to get elected, but it don't mean nothing," says Frost, who will vote Democratic and who last voted Republican in 1968.

Frost describes himself as "very liberal."

"I don't think you're very liberal at all," Kramer interjects.

DOJ_NMG_0090172

There is a quiet confidence about her, some might call it smugness. All this talk in the media about Republicans being in trouble? On the way out of power? Reaping what they've sown? She's not so sure.

"No vote's been cast, and they're already predicting the demise of the Republican Party," she scoffs.

She nods her head crisply, warning, "Republicans will turn out."

Republicans In Uphill Slog In Colorado (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, November 2, 2006

WHEAT RIDGE, COLO.

In an unmarked suite around the corner from Rick O'Donnell's campaign headquarters here in suburban Denver, the Republican National Committee has had its get-out-the vote "victory office" in operation since March. Volunteers man phone banks. The foyer showcases a wall of unflattering photos of Democrats in line to head key congressional committees should that party take back the House. A banner reads: "In case you need another reason to volunteer!"

In a normal year, the fabled GOP operation might be enough to tip the balance in a congressional race that, until September, was billed as one of the nation's most competitive. But with an unpopular war, an unpopular president, and corruption scandals, the GOP has seen Mr. O'Donnell's Democratic opponent take a double-digit lead in the polls.

So last week, the national party confirmed that it had shifted resources from this race in Colorado's Seventh District to help shore up Republicans in two other districts once considered safe: incumbent Rep. Marilyn Musgrave in Colorado's Fourth and conservative Doug Lamborn in the Fifth, where Republicans have an advantage of up to 14 percentage points in voter registration. Cautiously optimistic, Democrats now aim to pick up in Colorado as many as three of the 15 seats they need to take back the House.

"Colorado is more Republican than the nation but tends to follow national politics closely," says Bob Loevy, a political scientist at Colorado College in Colorado Springs. "If the national Democratic tide continues to run right through Election Day, it will affect Colorado and should put both the Fourth and Fifth districts in play."

The shift of resources means more money for TV ad buys and a get-out-the-vote drive in a fast-breaking political environment.

"From the vantage point of today, it looks good for the Democrats, but the situation is very fluid," says pollster John Zogby.

Democrats, too, are shifting resources to take advantage of new opportunities. After a Denver Post poll showed Musgrave leading by 10 points last month, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) pulled some $630,000 it had reserved for her Democratic rival, Angie Paccione, although it still includes her in a program for its most competitive candidates. A political-issue group picked up the slack.

Both Republicans are getting high- profile help from the top. On Friday, Vice President Cheney flies into Colorado Springs to stump for state Senator Lamborn. On Saturday, President Bush will be in Greeley, Colo., with two-term Representative Musgrave as well as GOP gubernatorial candidate Bob Beauprez.

Best known nationally as the lead sponsor on the constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage in 2003, Musgrave faces strong competition from Democratic state Representative Paccione. A former professional basketball player and teacher, she says that Musgrave is out of the mainstream and too conservative for the district.

In a race driven by negative ads from both camps, Paccione got a recent boost from some $750,000 in issue ads by Coloradans for Life, a nonprofit political-issue group (known as a "527" because of its tax-code category). The group is funded largely by Fort Collins heiress and Democratic activist Pat Stryker. The Musgrave campaign calls the ads "malicious," and the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) has already spent some $1.7 million to counter them.

"The liberal 527s went after Marilyn in 2004, and they're doing it again. When you have outside groups spending literally millions of dollars trying to knock out a Republican member, then the committee has to step in to level the playing field," says NRCC spokesman Jonathan Collegio.

Democrats are bringing in their own heavy hitters like former President Clinton and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois.

It's time to "knock off bedroom slippers and put on marching shoes," the senator told a fist-pumping crowd in Aurora, Colo., last week. Not that Democrats need much firing up in the Seventh District.

Early on, this race in the inner Denver suburbs was considered wide open because the incumbent, Mr. Beauprez, opted to run for governor. Now, former state Sen. Ed Perlmutter (D) has built a strong lead in the polls. "Sometimes it's better to be lucky than to be smart, and we're at a time when people want a change," Mr. Perlmutter told the crowd in Aurora.

His GOP rival, O'Donnell, makes a similar point in an interview. "I picked a hell of a year to run as a Republican," says the former higher education commissioner.

DOJ_NMG_0090173

While it's rarely clear how much big names like Obama or Mr. Bush actually contribute to turnout, it is a sign that unlike most midterm elections, this one is being slugged out on national themes.

"The fact that these national figures are going around the country shows that it's a nationalized race," says Rhodes Cook, a political analyst in Annandale, Va. "There are some 80 [congressional] races still on the radar screen, that's double or triple the number we had two and four years ago, and races had to be nationalized to produce that great an expansion of the field."

O'Donnell says his biggest liability is the perception that he walks in lock step with Bush and the national Republican Party. "I made a strategic mistake: I flew back [to Denver] on Air Force One," he adds. That photo was Exhibit A for a flood of negative ads, "all of the president getting off the plane with me and waving." An ad sponsored by the DCCC uses that scene for an ad that ends with the line: "Rick O'Donnell: Radical ideas and another vote for George Bush's agenda." The DCCC has spent more than $1.3 million for Perlmutter in this race.

In fact, O'Donnell says there's a lot he doesn't like about Republican politics in Washington, such as big spending and all those pork projects added to bills in the dead of the night. A policy wonk who wrote his own platform, O'Donnell says that he also disagrees with the president on immigration and thinks the House GOP is "out to lunch" on healthcare. "It's not enough to beat up on trial lawyers or create new health savings accounts. That in itself doesn't tackle our problems," he says.

Mr. Collegio, the NRCC spokesman, says that the transfer of get-out-the-vote resources to other districts does not mean that the GOP has given up on the Seventh District. But analysts say that this fabled micro-targeting operation may be swamped by a national Democratic tide in this election. A recent Zogby poll gives the Democrat Perlmutter a 14-point lead. Another puts it at 6.

"In a year when you had a motivated base on each side and the race is one or two points either way, that [ground game] matters a lot. But that's not what the Colorado 7 race is about now," says Amy Walter, who handicaps House races for the Cook Political Report. "There's a less motivated Republican base, a more motivated Democratic base, and independents are increasingly negative [toward the GOP]," she adds.

Why Economy Is Key In Indiana Election (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, November 2, 2006

SOUTH BEND, IND.

Evelyn Salyer is the kind of voter Republicans desperately need to hang onto this fall.

In 2004, her vote helped push a Republican House member toward a narrow reelection win in this northern Indiana district. Now, with a new election just days away, she hasn't made up her mind.

The candidates are the same two men who ran last time. Their battle for blue-collar voters is lug-wrench tight. And Ms. Salyer cites economic concerns among the mix of issues that make her reluctant to commit her vote.

Although Iraq comes first, immigration and her own cost of living are close behind.

"We should be taking care of our people here" rather than spending abroad, says Salyer, who worked for years at a local bank and lives mostly on Social Security.

It's a refrain echoed by many voters in this region where bedrock jobs in heavy industry are being shaken anew by the current downsizing of US automakers.

"People who live in the Midwest are more negative about the economy" than voters in other regions are, says Scott Keeter, who directs voter surveys at the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press in Washington. Tight races in the region "could certainly be affected by this."

Nationwide, voters who are concerned about the economy are likely to vote Democratic in this election, says Mr. Keeter.

Their ranks are sizable. In a late-October Pew survey, 20 percent of registered voters said the economy is the most important issue in their vote for Congress, second only to the 27 percent who cited the situation in Iraq.

Indiana's Second Congressional District, anchored by the city of South Bend, exemplifies how economic concerns have emerged as significant in some races. It is among a relative handful of contests on which control of the House of Representatives could hinge. Democrats need a gain of 15 seats, out of 435 total, for control.

In the Second District, Democratic challenger Joe Donnelly is leading GOP Rep. Chris Chocola 48 percent to 45 percent, according to a poll from RT Strategies released last week.

"Bad and getting worse," is how Juli Tate, who works as an administrative assistant University of Notre Dame, describes the local economy. "We're losing jobs," she says. "Young people are dropping out of school."

As she walks near the campus's gold dome, she says she'll vote for Mr. Donnelly. Representative Chocola is "not doing anything for Indiana as far as I can see," she says.

DOJ_NMG_0090174

South Bend has more than its share of boarded-up storefronts, and the city's jobless rate is 5.1 percent, above the national rate of 4.6 percent. The city has been adapting to the loss of automotive jobs since the 1960s, when Studebaker closed an assembly line here.

But conditions aren't all bleak. Several medical centers, and Notre Dame just north of the city, have provided service sector jobs.

Indiana's automotive sector is doing better than Michigan's. The state has had success luring foreign manufacturers such as Honda. The AM General plant next door to South Bend, in Mishawaka, continues to crank out Humvees for the US military, even though $2-a-gallon gasoline has crimped demand for the civilian Hummer.

Still, this area feels the pressure of pocketbook issues. People complain about a spike in property taxes. And at a time of concern about global competition, they're angry that the state recently moved to lease a key toll road to a foreign consortium. Mr. Chocola had no direct say on either of those matters, but that doesn't mean he can escape voter frustration.

In the nearby city of Kokomo, at the southern edge of this district, auto-parts giant Delphi plans to shed hundreds of workers soon. To emerge from bankruptcy, the company says it will have to cut worker pay.

Such challenges make the economy a big issue for Dale Cooper, who retired from a union job at Bendix, a brake manufacturer, which was once one of South Bend's biggest employers.

"You have many people working, but they're making less money," he says. "It's almost a necessity for both [spouses] to work."

Similar worries are common in industrial centers throughout the Midwest. The economy isn't the only issue, or even the main issue but every bit of pessimism weighs against Republicans. "It's a sour mood that is driven in part by Iraq, that's driven in part by economic anxiety," says Robert Schmuhl, a political analyst at Notre Dame.

In Ohio, these concerns are helping Democrat Sherrod Brown in his challenge to Sen. Mike DeWine (R). In Michigan, Republican Dick DeVos has tried to use it in his bid to unseat Gov. Jennifer Granholm (D), but still trails in polls.

In this election, the economy provides fodder for both parties. The GOP record on tax cuts appeals to many here. "I'm a big anti-liberal.... I vote Chocola," says Travis Hessey, who runs his own plumbing business in town.

He says times are pretty tight. His gasoline bill has soared even as local customers can't afford to pay big fees. But to him, the best way to keep the economy going is to keep taxes low and for US workers to keep boosting their skills. "I don't look for ways that the government can help," he says.

Nationwide, many Republican candidates hope to reap some tailwind from a good job market, low taxes, and a recent dip in gasoline prices. But a housing slowdown and rising personal debt weigh against those positives.

"It's hard for voters to make sense of the economy," says Elizabeth Bennion, a political scientist at Indiana University's branch campus here.

Only 35 percent of Americans rate the current economy as "excellent" or "good," according to the Pew survey, and just 25 percent of Midwesterners feel that way.

Concentration Of Competitive Races Puts Ohio At Center Of Midterm Battle (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Oct. 31 — Mary Jo Kilroy is an awkward, stumbling speaker. John Cranley is a baby-faced 32-year-old whose campaign biography still highlights his election as student body president in college. Dr. Victoria Wulsin has never held elected office.

But, reflecting the political drift of this bellwether state a week before the midterm elections, all three of these Democrats are in competitive races to unseat once-safe Republican members of Congress. With polls showing Democrats running well ahead in Ohio races for senator and governor, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has recently begun spending money to help Dr. Wulsin unseat her opponent, Representative Jean Schmidt, adding Ms. Schmidt to its list of three other Republican targets in the state.

Republicans, meanwhile, are scaling back their support for State Senator Joy Padgett in her fight against Zack Space, a Democrat who is the city attorney in Dover, for the Congressional seat being vacated by Representative Bob Ney, a Republican who pleaded guilty to corruption charges.

That puts four Republican seats in play. Strategists for both sides say Mr. Ney's seat is the Democrats' best chance while Ms. Schmidt is the least vulnerable of the four Republicans.

Ohio has been a central battleground of the midterm elections because of the unusual concentration of competitive races. The Senate seat, now held by Senator Mike DeWine, is one of a half-dozen or so that will determine control of the chamber. The 4 House seats are among about 40 that will decide control of that body. And winning the governorship of Ohio can give a party a big assist in carrying the state in a presidential election.

DOJ_NMG_0090175

Discontent with the war in Iraq, the limping regional economy and a corruption scandal in the Republican-controlled statehouse tilted the table in favor of the Democrats from the start of the campaign. But in the final days before the election, Republicans are fighting hard to hold on.

"It's not over yet — it's too early to wrap things up!" Representative Deborah Pryce said in a telephone interview Monday on her way back from an event in Maryville.

Ms. Pryce, the fourth-ranking member of the House Republican leadership and a moderate on many social issues, is facing her first competitive contest in a decade against Ms. Kilroy, a local county commissioner. Ms. Pryce is closing the race by reminding voters, in television commercials and campaign appearances, of the federally financed projects she has helped bring to the area.

"We have to do something pro-active and not just bad-mouth and be negative," Ms. Pryce said in an interview Tuesday on a Columbus public radio station, WOSU. "My solid record of bringing jobs to this community is exactly what we need to do."

Still, Ms. Pryce's anxiety is showing. In a reversal of the customary ritual between incumbent and challenger, Ms. Pryce recently stood with a bullhorn outside Ms. Kilroy's office demanding that Ms. Kilroy participate in another debate. Ms. Kilroy has refused.

"She has come up with any excuse not to," Ms. Pryce said in the interview.

"Every time she says the president's name she says mine too," she added with frustration, saying she believed voters would see through the efforts to tie her to President Bush.

Ms. Kilroy, in turn, is criticizing Ms. Pryce for describing the current national economy as "storybook," arguing that she is out of touch with Ohio voters affected by the region's doldrums.

"Two hundred and twenty thousand jobs were lost in a six-year period here in Ohio," Ms. Kilroy said Tuesday, also in an interview with WOSU. Like Republican candidates a decade ago, she called for reducing the federal deficit by requiring offsets for any new spending or tax cuts.

In Cincinnati, Representative Steve Chabot is a staunch conservative first elected in the Republican landslide of 1994. Mr. Chabot's campaign is running commercials stating: "Some people want you to think that I've changed. I've lived in the same house for 21 years, with my wife of 33 years. I still cut our grass, and drive the same old '93 Buick. More important, I've never wavered in our fight to cut spending, stand up to the special interests and protect Social Security."

The advertisement is a response to a refrain of his opponent, Mr. Cranley, that "Washington changed Steve Chabot." Mr. Cranley, a city councilman, is running as a fiscal conservative, pledging not to accept a raise until the federal budget is balanced. Accusing Mr. Chabot of having abandoned his commitments to a balanced budget, Mr. Cranley recently won the endorsement of The Cincinnati Enquirer, which picked Republicans for most other races.

Mr. Cranley is also attacking Mr. Chabot over his support for the Iraq war, reminding voters that Mr. Chabot recommended making Saddam Hussein "a principal target" shortly after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11 and that he once praised Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's job performance as "exemplary." (Mr. Chabot says he, too, has some criticisms of the conduct of the war.)

In the governor's race, polls show that Representative Ted Strickland, the Democratic candidate, has a commanding lead over J. Kenneth Blackwell, the Republican who is Ohio's secretary of state. Representative Sherrod Brown, the Democrat who is running for Senate, is also ahead of the Republican incumbent, Mr. DeWine, and the National Republican Senatorial Committee has stopped spending to support Mr. DeWine.

The Democrats received an additional boost this week when the actor Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease, campaigned with Mr. Brown to highlight Mr. DeWine's opposition to embryonic stem cell research. Mr. Fox became famous playing the conservative son of liberal parents in a television show set in Columbus, and his appearance dominated television news coverage around the state that day.

Reverse Swiftboating (WT)

By Brendan Conway

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

MORGANTOWN, W.Va. -- Can you call what backers of West Virginia Democratic Rep. Alan Mollohan are doing to Republican challenger Chris Wakim "swiftboating?" Here's the evidence. The media, the ethics-challenged Mr. Mollohan and his supporters are questioning whether Mr. Wakim can justifiably call himself a Persian Gulf War veteran when he never served in that military theater. This Swiftee-reminiscent move knocked a previously surging Mr. Wakim off message, at which time deep-pocketed Swiftboat-funder Bob Perry intervened, this time on behalf of the targeted.

DOJ_NMG_0090176

At minimum, this is an echo of the scrutiny John Kerry's military service received in the last presidential election. Except now, Democrats are doing the scrutinizing. Merits aside, this should raise hope that Democrats now can agree that a candidate who claims military accomplishments on the stump should be challenged if the claims don't tell the whole story.

Whether you think a fact-check is warranted in this case depends on your definition of "Gulf War veteran." It all started earlier this year when Mr. Wakim -- a West Point graduate, 11-year Army officer and disabled vet -- characterized himself that way on the stump. His opponents pounced. Mr. Wakim, who sustained back, elbow and knee injuries while serving, spent the war on active duty at Ft. Devens, Mass., 35 miles outside Boston. This paralleled a controversy over whether Mr. Wakim had trumped up a Harvard master's degree by calling it a credential in "public policy" (It was actually in liberal arts).

It didn't take Mollohan backers long to start touting Swiftee-like local vets who accused Mr. Wakim of stretching his military resume. "He led soldiers to the bus, but never made it to the Gulf War," one anti-Wakim vet says in a particularly nasty commercial from a 527 group. (Last week the Wakim campaign filed a Federal Election Commission complaint against the group, West Virginia Values, alleging illegal coordination with Mr. Mollohan.)

No wonder Mr. Mollohan's supporters went negative: A strong-campaigning Mr. Wakim had been gaining quickly in a conservative-trending district and Mr. Mollohan's swirling ethics questions were threatening to make this year his last in the House. He is currently under investigation in connection with $202 million in earmarks to nonprofits he helped found which employ some of his campaign donors. Earlier this year he stepped down as ranking member of the House Ethics Committee.

The anti-Wakim line of attack literally boils down to which medals the Republican has -- and it infuriates him. "The crux of the issue is pretty simple," Mr. Wakim told me recently. "Alan Mollohan is trying to discredit the fact that I am a West Point graduate, that I am a Gulf War veteran, that I served in the infantry for over 11 years, that I am a disabled vet. He doesn't understand how the Army works...What happens in one end of the front is the same thing -- is all related to what happens on the other."

So, who's right? Technically speaking, the law is on Mr. Wakim's side. The U.S. Code defines a veteran of a given conflict as "any veteran who served in the active military, naval, or air service during a period of war." If you served, you helped the war effort, and according to 38 U.S.C. 101(12) you can call yourself a veteran of that conflict.

But perception is a different matter. The man on the street can be forgiven for thinking that a Gulf War vet -- just like a Vietnam vet in Vietnam -- would need to have spent time in Iraq or Kuwait or another Middle Eastern country to earn that designation. It's also true that the Veterans of Foreign Wars stipulates that members must hold one or more foreign-theater campaign medals or badges to join. That's more than enough ammunition for Mollohan backers.

Of course, the fact that the issue is even being discussed means that the Mollohan camp has used some variant of "swiftboating" to cut down a challenger. It was probably quite effective: Election handicappers have started calling the race a likely Democratic retention.

This should quiet some of the more histrionic Democratic indignation over the questioning of Mr. Kerry's military service. Last month at Washington's Phoenix Park Hotel, for instance, I listened to a visibly angry Paul Bucha, board chairman of the liberal veterans' group VETPAC, vow: "Let no person think that they have been anointed in such a way as to question the validity of service and patriotism of anybody who has had the courage to don the uniform of this great country." The context was the effort to question Mr. Kerry's Purple Hearts.

This gets things precisely backward. If a candidate wants to use his military biography to seek high office, why shouldn't people be allowed to corroborate his self-portrayal for the voting public? In a democracy, elections are one of the few things more hallowed than Mr. Kerry's or anyone else's service. There are no free passes.

Brendan Conway is an editorial writer at the Washington Times and a 2006 Phillips Foundation journalism fellow.

GOP Closing Gaps In A Couple Of Key Races (USAT)

USA Today, November 2, 2006

In a campaign in which they have often been on the defensive, Republicans got some good news in a pair of state polls Wednesday and learned that an effort to register Hispanic voters in Democratic-leaning districts fell well short of its goal.

The news comes as President Bush and first lady Laura Bush continued to push hard to help Republicans keep control of Congress in Tuesday's elections.

“We'll win this election,” President Bush said in a radio interview Wednesday.

Democrats have assailed Republicans for weeks for not doing enough to curb violence in Iraq or to investigate charges of improper contact between Republican Rep. Mark Foley and congressional pages.

House Democratic Whip Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland said Republican missteps will make his party a winner Tuesday.

“Democrats believe that we must take our nation in a new direction. And we believe that it is long past time that the United States Congress conduct meaningful, bipartisan oversight of the Bush administration rather than serve as a rubber stamp for it.”

DOJ_NMG_0090177

Bush's upbeat tone in an interview with conservative radio talk show host Rush Limbaugh coincided with polls showing gains for the GOP in Tennessee and Maryland.

In Tennessee, an Opinion Research Corp. survey found Republican Senate candidate Bob Corker, a former Chattanooga mayor, leading Democratic Rep. Harold Ford, 52%-44%. The margin of error was +/-4 percentage points. Earlier polls had found the race closer.

Tennessee is one of several states where Democrats hope to win seats in order to take the Senate from GOP control.

In Maryland, a poll by The (Baltimore) Sun found a virtual tie in the governor's race. Democrat Martin O'Malley, the mayor of Baltimore, leads Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich 47%-46%. A Washington Post poll published three days earlier showed Ehrlich trailing by 10 percentage points.

Meanwhile, a drive to register Hispanic voters, who tend to vote Democratic, has fallen short of expectations. The campaign to register 1 million foreign-born voters signed up 146,000 people, said Germonique Jones of the Center for Community Change. The registration drive followed large protests by Latinos this summer angered by proposed House legislation to stem illegal immigration.

"People were waving signs, 'Today we march, tomorrow we vote,' but that may not be something that's literally tomorrow," said Lionel Sosa, a Republican political strategist who heads Mexicans & Americans Thinking Together, a Web-based group.

As first lady Laura Bush campaigned in Kentucky and Ohio for Republicans, President Bush voiced optimism about the elections in an interview with Limbaugh. Limbaugh asked about the consequences if Democrats win House or Senate majorities.

"I really don't think about the idea of having a Democrat-led House and Senate because I don't think it's going to happen," Bush said.

"I believe if our candidates continue to talk about the strong economy, based upon low taxes, and an administration and a Congress that was willing to give professionals the tools necessary to protect (citizens from terrorism), we'll win this election," he said.

When asked about Democratic critics of the Iraq war, Bush said: "My answer to them is listen to Osama bin Laden who says, 'Our objective is to defeat America,' which will embolden the terrorists, which will then enable (al-Qaeda) to have safe haven, just like they had in Afghanistan. And we're not going to let them do it."

Parochial Issues Come To The Fore In Tennessee Senate Race (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, November 2, 2006

NASHVILLE, Tenn. - The Iraq war and racism form the raw bookends of the tight U.S. Senate race in Tennessee, which could be historically significant and could make or break the Democrats' campaign to take over the upper chamber of Congress.

Iraq is the dominant issue, voters told a recent McClatchy-MSNBC poll. And the Democratic candidate, Rep. Harold Ford Jr., 36, would be the first black U.S. senator from the South since Reconstruction. He says U.S. policy in Iraq isn't working and endorses splitting the nation into three semi-autonomous regions - for Sunni Muslim Arabs, Shiite Muslims and Sunni Kurds - with a weak central government.

Republican Bob Corker, 54, is a white businessman and former Chattanooga, Tenn., mayor. He favors staying the course in Iraq until the mission is complete.

Ford couldn't have gotten so close without a public backlash against the war and President Bush, political analysts here say. But if Corker wins, several voters said, they'll blame latent, if not overt, racism for Ford's defeat.

Still, it's not that simple. If the voting next Tuesday is as close as polls suggest, parochial issues below the headline topics of war and race could spell the difference. The candidates' personal weaknesses, their parties' records on gay rights, health care and taxes, and the changing makeup of voters in the state could tip the outcome.

Many voters said this week in interviews in and around Nashville that they were turned off by Ford's large and politically influential Memphis family, which has been dogged for years by corruption investigations. An uncle who was a state senator is awaiting trial on bribery charges even now.

"I just don't think the acorn falls far from the tree," said Mike Shackleford, 47, a businessman who voted early for Corker. Ford "may be a fine person, but I don't know enough about him."

Ford's more charismatic than Corker, but the congressman, who's single, has a reputation as a Casanova and somewhat of a policy lightweight. Flanked by screen actress Ashley Judd and Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., at a "Women for Ford" event this week, he meandered through several policy questions and frequently deferred to Landrieu.

When Judd championed monogamy, saying, "It's useless, by the way, if only one partner is being faithful," Ford perked up. "Let me write that down," he quipped. Asked about his faith, he said he renewed his commitment to prayer after his uncle's indictment.

DOJ_NMG_0090178

Both candidates tout their Christianity and applaud traditional family values.

The Republican Party has had a big statewide advantage in Tennessee since the 1990s, when white conservative Democrats switched parties. Retiring Sen. Bill Frist won his last election, in 2000, with 65 percent of the vote. And a proposed gay-marriage ban for the state on this year's ballot could help Corker by boosting Republican turnout.

If Ford wins, factors beyond Iraq that could help him include voters' desire for more affordable health care, on which Democrats are regarded as more sympathetic. Charlie Miller, 69, a retired salesman, said he prefers Corker on other issues, but that "it'll be close . . . everybody needs insurance."

Ford can appeal to moderates by citing his 2002 race against liberal Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., to become House Democratic leader, his support for school prayer and his devotion to his faith. He's never positioned himself as a liberal.

His candidacy is likely to prompt high turnout among blacks, who compose 16 percent of the state's population. A McClatchy-MSNBC poll earlier this month showed that blacks split for Ford by 86-4 percent, but that whites tilt to Corker by 53-36 percent. Women split about evenly between Ford and Corker, while men tilted toward the Republican by a 5-point margin.

Although analysts here suggest that it may not be happening fast enough to help Ford, Tennessee's favorable business climate is gradually changing the population by bringing in voters from traditionally more liberal states. Nissan moved its California headquarters to a suburb south of Nashville last summer, for example.

Kristi Weiner, 40, a consultant whose husband works for Nissan, can't vote because she's still registered in Los Angeles. If she could, she said, "I'd probably vote for Ford."

Voters also debate the effect of a television ad that was paid for by the Republican National Committee and pulled down after cries of race-baiting. In it, a bare-shouldered white woman flirts, "Harold, call me."

Some black voters, such as Wanda Graham, 53, a retired Army lieutenant colonel and local Democratic activist, worry that the ad could hurt Ford by recalling traditional Southern cultural taboos against interracial sexuality. But some younger white voters who want to distance themselves from stereotypes said it could hurt Corker.

Rachel Deering, 28, said she and her husband usually voted Republican, but that this time - because of the ad - they planned to stay home in protest.

Clinton Campaigns For Ford In Memphis (USAT)

USA Today, November 2, 2006

Former president Bill Clinton told a Memphis church congregation Wednesday that if Democratic Rep. Harold Ford wins next week's Senate election, it will represent a “victory of going beyond race.” Clinton spoke in Ford's hometown at the predominantly black Temple of Deliverance Church of God in Christ. “You know what it will mean if Harold gets elected on Tuesday,” Clinton said at the 4,500-seat church. “It won't mean that it's a victory of race; it will be a victory of going beyond race.”

Ford, 36, hopes to become the first black senator elected from the South since Reconstruction. Ford, a five-term congressman, and Republican Bob Corker, a former Chattanooga mayor, are vying to replace Sen. Bill Frist, who is retiring.

McCaskill: Bush's Mo. visit won't help Talent

Democratic Senate challenger Claire McCaskill dismissed President Bush's visit to Missouri on Friday in support of GOP Sen. Jim Talent as an example of Talent's too-close ties to Washington. Bush and Talent will appear at stops in Springfield and Joplin.

Bush's appearance will mark his first public campaign event with Talent this year, although the president has helped raise money for Talent. Bush spokesman Tony Snow headlined a Talent fundraiser Monday, and Talent campaigned Tuesday with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist. “The last week of Sen. Talent's campaign is about Washington, D.C.,” McCaskill said. “The last week of my campaign is about Missouri.”

Talent spokesman Rich Chrismer said, “We're doing what successful campaigns do in the final week, which is energize our supporters and get out the vote.”

Strayhorn: Gov. Perry's ad is sexist

Independent gubernatorial candidate Carole Keeton Strayhorn claimed Wednesday that Republican Texas Gov. Rick Perry's radio ad is sexist because it suggests a woman is incapable of holding the office. “The implication is certainly … that a woman is not tough enough to be governor,” Strayhorn, the state comptroller, told about 40 supporters in Waco. The ad, which began airing Tuesday, calls Strayhorn “Mrs. Corrupt Comptroller Politician Woman,” much like another Perry ad calls Democrat Chris Bell “Mr. Way Too Liberal For Texas Guy.” Strayhorn said the ad is “sad. I thought that was gone decades ago, and here he is talking ‘politician woman.' ” Perry campaign spokesman Ted Royer said he found it curious that Strayhorn was complaining about the word “woman” and not “corrupt.”

Settlement reached on Ohio voter-ID law

DOJ_NMG_0090179

Lawyers for the state and groups that opposed Ohio's voter identification rules reached a settlement that suspends the law for absentee voters and clarifies and expands it for voting in person. The plaintiffs had argued that county elections boards were disenfranchising voters by inconsistently applying the law.

The settlement stopped short of declaring any aspect of the law unconstitutional, preventing further court wrangling from disrupting the election, said Mark Anthony, spokesman for the state attorney general. The settlement allows voters without ID to use Social Security numbers, and it expands the definition of government documents that can be used as ID to include those from local and county governments, state universities and public community colleges.

Coulter may face charge of voter fraud

Conservative columnist Ann Coulter has refused to cooperate in an investigation into whether she voted in the wrong Florida precinct and may be prosecuted for voter fraud, Palm Beach County Elections Supervisor Arthur Anderson said. He said that his office has been looking into the matter since the Feb. 7 Palm Beach Town Council election and that he would turn over the case to the state attorney's office by Friday.

Knowingly voting in the wrong precinct is a felony. Anderson, a Democrat, said a letter was sent to Coulter on March 27 requesting that she clarify her address for the voting records "or face the possibility of her voter registration being rescinded." She and her lawyer have yet to respond to several inquiries, he said.

Beating Around The Bush (WSJ)

By Brendan Miniter

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

CLINTON, Mo. -- If Democrat Claire McCaskill wins her Senate race in Missouri next week, her victory won't rest, for the most part, on any policy proposal or characteristic particular to her -- precisely as she intended from the start of her campaign. Nor has she made the focus of the race Jim Talent, the incumbent Republican she is trying to unseat. Instead, she's running against George W. Bush.

Ms. McCaskill's strategy, like that of Democrats across the country, has been to "nationalize" the election by making it a referendum on the president. She spends a considerable amount of time blurring the boundaries between the unpopular Republican in the White House and a Republican-controlled Senate. Along the way she's even displayed a little wit: "Talent votes with President Bush more often than I agree with my husband," she quipped at a recent campaign rally in this small town, four hours west of St. Louis.

She's run a credible, competitive campaign, and is now deadlocked in a virtual tie -- all polling differences within the margin of error -- for a post that has changed party hands twice in the past six years. Give her credit, at least, for rallying the flagging morale of the state party and raising the hopes of Democrats nationwide. Depending on what happens in Ohio, Montana, Rhode Island, Tennessee and Virginia next week, she may hand her party the sixth seat it needs to take control of the Senate.

Sen. Talent, for his part, has not been caught up in scandal or made gaffes. He has been attentive to home-state voters. He has championed laws on apple-pie issues such as curbing the use of methamphetamines and supporting research into sickle-cell anemia, a disease that afflicts African-Americans acutely. He promotes breast cancer awareness by having St. Louis's 630-foot-tall Gateway Arch lit pink one night each year.

By taking care of smallish issues, and not screwing up, Mr. Talent has ensured that the race will focus on larger, more controversial topics. Thus the Missouri race is a relatively pure expression of the Democratic attempt to make the election a referendum on the Bush administration. And it may illustrate the flaws in the strategy of putting few substantive ideas on the table and instead counting on discontent with the Republican Party. Voters clearly aren't happy with the status quo, but neither do they seem convinced that the alternative is any better.

Here, Mr. Talent enjoys the advantage of clarity. On national security, he wants to isolate North Korea and preserve a "credible" deterrent to Iran's nuclear ambitions, which in his view includes the possibility of air strikes. Asked if he wants to "stay the course" in Iraq, the senator responded emphatically. "I don't want to stay anything," he told me on a recent blustery afternoon in St. Louis. "I want to win. And Missourians want to win."

Ms. McCaskill's positions are more carefully hedged. Currently the state auditor, she's a former prosecutor who promises to be tough on terrorists and voices unequivocal support for building missile defenses. "Absolutely," she told us before noting the weapon system her party has spent more than two decades deriding as a waste of money "will work." Yesterday, she called on Sen. John Kerry to apologize for disparaging those who serve in the military.

When it comes to elaboration, however, the positions she takes don't so much straddle the political divide on national security as occupy both sides of it. On Iraq, she doesn't support a timetable for withdrawal, but told us that the Bush administration should "privately" tell the Iraqi government the U.S. will pull out, eventually. On North Korea, she opposes rewarding Kim Jong Il with bilateral talks, but blasts the president for a general "aversion" to direct talks. On terrorist surveillance, she supports wiretapping international calls of suspected terrorists, just not the way President Bush has gone about it. And so on.

DOJ_NMG_0090180

Keeping the focus off Ms. McCaskill, Missouri Democrats have also taken a page out of the conservative playbook to depend on two hot-button issues on the ballot increasing liberal turnout. The first would create a $6.50 state minimum wage, more than a dollar higher than the federal mandate. The second is a contentious amendment to the state constitution regarding embryonic stem-cell research, drafted as a rebuke of the president's federal funding policy. Ms. McCaskill supports the amendment, has run ads on it, and welcomed actor Michael J. Fox to the state to campaign for its passage.

The irony, though, is the amendment may also increase turnout for the Republicans. Sen. Talent, social conservatives and other opponents fear the 2,000-word document will legalize human cloning at taxpayer expense. To ensure that that doesn't happen, Marjorie Dannensfelser, head of the Susan B. Anthony List, a national right-to-life organization, has identified some 200,000 "casual voters" in the state and says she's working double time to convince as many of them as possible to vote.

Mr. Talent won his seat in 2002 in a special election by a razor-thin margin of just 21,000 votes, so just a fraction of Ms. Dannensfelser's list could tip the scales in his favor. Ms. McCaskill is likewise dependent on turnout. In the governor's race two years ago, she lost 90 out of 97 counties to now-Gov. Matt Blunt, but the outcome was quite close, 51% to 48%.

The partisan divide in Missouri, then, is close to even. The state has a nearly unblemished electoral history -- stretching back to Teddy Roosevelt -- of siding with winning presidential candidates, breaking in the last two elections for President Bush. The unknown aspect here is intellectual. Ms. McCaskill doesn't want this election to be about her ideas. But next week's outcome will depend on whether those who head to the polls will see her as running on almost the same campaign platform on which the Democrats lost in 2002 and 2004. Will voters make this election in part about Ms. McCaskill?

Virginia's Tight Senate Campaign Turns On Personal Attacks (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, November 2, 2006

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. - In its final week, the U.S. Senate campaign in Virginia came down to this:

A liberal blogger tried to ask Republican Sen. George Allen about the most urgent issue he could think of - whether Allen had spit on his first wife. Then Allen's aides put the man in a chokehold and threw him on the floor.

That episode Tuesday, captured on video by a local news crew, summed up how one of the races that could determine which party controls the Senate has degenerated into bitter name-calling and personal attacks instead of a debate over the issues that matter most to voters.

It started very differently, as a clash over the Iraq war between Allen and Democrat James Webb, a former secretary of the Navy under Ronald Reagan. Allen supports the war; Webb's vehement opposition prompted him to switch parties from Republican to Democratic and to challenge Allen.

The campaign changed when Allen unleashed a firestorm over the summer by calling a dark-skinned Webb volunteer a "macaca," which Democrats labeled a racial slur. Allen soon was inundated with stories accusing him of using racial slurs as a college student.

He was losing support fast when he pleaded to change the subject.

"Virginians expect to hear us address the real issues you care about," the Virginia Republican said in a primetime TV appearance in early October. "Over the past several weeks, that hasn't been the case. Some of this I brought on myself. But the negative personal attacks and baseless allegations have also pulled us away from what you expect and deserve."

Yet Allen responded by launching counterattacks on Webb for including sex scenes in his best-selling war novels, attacks that have continued into the final week of the campaign. National Republicans also launched ads ripping Webb for criticizing women in the military 25 years ago and calling a 1991 investigation of Navy pilots for abusing women a "witch hunt."

On a recent campaign swing through Portsmouth, Va., Allen insisted that all the dirt has come from Webb and that his attacks on sex scenes in Webb's novels are the kind of serious issue he wanted the campaign to address.

"My opponent does say he's proud of being an author and a novelist. Those passages, people have found demeaning to women," Allen said during a stop at the Virginia Sports Hall of Fame, standing beside a display case featuring the short shorts and sequined halter top of a Washington Redskins cheerleader. Allen's father coached the Redskins in the 1970s.

Allen also brushed aside demands from Democrats that he explain why his name is listed without any detail in a 1974 Virginia court docket. Aides have said he was cited for unpaid parking tickets and for fishing without a license. National Democrats suggest that his name could be listed for anything ranging from parking tickets to assault, but they offer no evidence of any crime.

Webb, too, insisted that he's refused to participate in the name-calling and character attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0090181

"We haven't done that. . . I have declined to go after George Allen when he was in trouble," he told supporters at a University of Virginia rally.

"I don't think you'll find an attack ad with my name on it," he said afterward. "I've been talking about the issues every day."

In his rally, Webb did talk at length about the Iraq war, praising the soldiers fighting there and criticizing Allen for not asking hard questions before supporting the war.

But it was Webb's campaign that set off the "macaca" brouhaha by releasing the video of Allen and the Webb aide. And it's been liberals and national Democrats talking about Allen's divorce or his court record from 32 years ago.

Voters said they didn't like the nasty campaign and wished it would return to more substantive issues. But many saw that through partisan lenses: The attacks on their candidate are nasty and trivial; the attacks on the other side are deserved.

"All the negative ads turn me off," said Bev Graeber, a Republican who singled out anti-Republican ads from the liberal group Moveon.org as particularly offensive. "They make me sad. I wish it was back on the issues."

Barbara Barton, a Democrat, said the criticisms of Allen were justified. "The macaca stuff really irritated me," she said. "Allen picked on the only dark face in a crowd of white faces. That IS substantive."

Polls show the Allen-Webb race is a toss-up. Voters decide Tuesday.

For more on the campaigns, go to www.georgeallen.com and www.webbforsenate.com

Allen Suggests Webb Behind Heckler Incident (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

Sen. George Allen yesterday suggested that his Democratic opponent, James H. Webb Jr., has a connection to a heckler who accosted him Tuesday, while Mr. Webb said the incident exemplifies what is wrong with politics.

Mr. Allen referenced the incident during which liberal blogger Mike Stark confronted him in Charlottesville, prompting the Republican's supporters to tackle him.

"What the people of Virginia deserve in the last few days of the campaign is my opponent to say to these allies and people associated with him that this is not appropriate," Mr. Allen said during a campaign stop at a business park in Fairfax.

The Webb campaign says it has no link to Mr. Stark.

Mr. Webb, who was campaigning in Richmond yesterday, said the incident shows that the two parties are at each other's throats because of the "emotional" election.

"It's one of the frustrations in dealing with the political process right now -- we've become so antagonistic," Mr. Webb said as he began a discussion with Virginia Commonwealth University (VCU) students in Richmond.

"For the good of the country, I don't think we should be engaging in that sort of conduct," he said. "We can have healthy debate and we can talk about differences without having to have the kind of confrontation that happened [Tuesday]. We don't need that."

Mr. Webb did not specify whether he was talking about Mr. Stark's behavior or the assault. Mr. Stark, a University of Virginia student, said Tuesday that he planned to file charges, although no charges were filed as of yesterday.

Mr. Stark told Washington Post Radio yesterday that he was "baiting" Mr. Allen, who has been known to lose his cool on the campaign trail.

In August, Mr. Allen singled out a Webb volunteer taping his campaign event in Southwest Virginia, calling the Indian-American man "macaca," a term considered derogatory in some cultures.

Since then, Mr. Allen has faced accusations that he used the "N-word" in the 1970s. He also has struggled through questions about his Jewish heritage.

Mr. Webb has said he could have used such incidents against Mr. Allen, but chose not to because they are "not relevant to what I'm trying to do."

Mr. Allen, standing beside Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, said the election on Tuesday should be focused on issues that affect voters "rather than encouraging this sort of disruptive, provocative behavior."

"This is typical of what my opponent has done, and his allies, trying to provoke incidents," Mr. Allen said. "I wish he would try to rein that in."

Both men have said the other is engaging in "vicious" personal attacks, while polls show that voters are irritated by negative campaigning.

Mr. Webb, who spent the day with Richmond Mayor L. Douglas Wilder, told VCU students that he "never really wanted to run for public office," but was forced to act out of frustration over the handling of the war in Iraq and Hurricane Katrina, among other issues.

"Looking at all those things, I just said, 'Well, I either have to shoot my TV or try to do something about this,' " he said.

In Northern Virginia, Mr. Allen discussed taxes. "I think we should give the death penalty to the death tax," he said.

On Tuesday, Mr. Stark loudly asked Mr. Allen whether he ever spit on his first wife, alluding to a rumor that has been floating on liberal blogs.

Mr. Allen, who was campaigning with Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, who is serving as chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee, ignored Mr. Stark as an Allen campaign volunteer blocked him.

"You're going to need to leave now. Get out the door," the Allen volunteer said as another man held Mr. Stark in a headlock.

Other Allen supporters tackled Mr. Stark, saying: "Now you're getting personal."

Mrs. Dole called the incident disturbing and asked Mr. Webb to apologize. "An ally of James Webb's campaign shouted diatribes in a sleazy attempt to create a political incident," she said.

When told about Mrs. Dole's request yesterday, Mr. Webb said: "I don't even know what happened [Tuesday]. I certainly regret the conduct of certain people there."

Meanwhile, most jurisdictions in Virginia are reporting slight to sizable increases in the number of requests for absentee ballots. Most officials attribute the increase to an aggressive campaign to encourage voters to use such ballots.

James Alcorn, a policy adviser with the state elections board, said yesterday that 101,852 requests for absentee ballots had been made as of last week, slightly higher than normal during congressional election years. The number of requests is comparable to that of 1994, he said.

Some local elections officials attribute the increase to the Senate race and the constitutional marriage amendment proposal.

Steele Gains Key Support Beneath The Surface In PG (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

Prince George's County Democrats say they expect Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, a Republican running for the U.S. Senate, to receive a surprising number of votes in the majority black, heavily Democratic county.

"A lot of people don't want to disclose who they're voting for," said state Sen. Leo E. Green, who is retiring in January. "A lot of my African-American friends are voting for Steele. I know that, but quietly, not publicly."

Mount Rainier Mayor Malinda Miles, a lifelong Democrat, said that many of her friends "are really supporting Steele, and it doesn't matter that they're Democrats."

"I'm not talking about what's in the newspapers. I'm talking about where people are at," Miss Miles said. "I think Prince George's is probably going to go Steele."

Anngelique Carroll, 27, a legal secretary from Upper Marlboro, said she and many of her friends are voting for Mr. Steele.

"He's for small business. He is for minorities," said Ms. Carroll, a black Democrat. "Throughout his political career with Governor [Robert L.] Ehrlich, his progress has been good."

Throughout the campaign season, most polls have shown Mr. Steele, the first black to win a statewide office in Maryland, trailing Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, the Democratic nominee. But SurveyUSA and other recent polls have pegged the Senate contest a dead heat.

Prince George's County, which has the state's largest concentration of Democratic voters, has become a battleground.

Race has become a key issue. Black Democrats, especially in Prince George's, have complained that party leaders have been neglecting them for years.

On Monday, former Prince George's County Executive Wayne K. Curry, five fellow black Democrats on the County Council and several other black Democratic leaders endorsed Mr. Steele and criticized their party.

"I think it's a close race," said County Council member David Harrington, one of those who endorsed Mr. Steele. "Turnout is key. If it's low turnout, then he's not going to do well."

The election outcome is uncertain, especially in Prince George's, because of blacks' longtime loyalty to the Democratic Party.

"It's so close. So many people, among African-Americans, there's things they like about Steele, but there's some things where he agreed with President Bush," said J. Aaron Warren, 38, a county police officer and co-founder of Minority Building Industry Association Inc. in Upper Marlboro.

"But with Ben Cardin, the only really negative thing I hear is that people didn't really know him because he's from Baltimore," Officer Warren said.

Damiean Williams, 31, a technician, travel agent and real estate agent in Prince George's, said he has heard too many negative things about Mr. Steele to vote for him.

DOJ_NMG_0090183

"If I do vote, it would probably be for Cardin. ... I've heard [Mr. Steele is] a 'yes man,' " Mr. Williams said. "A lot of his ads look phony."

Cherelle Gray, 38, of Fort Washington, who works as a manager at Linens-n-Things, is undecided.

"I'm not getting [Mr. Steele's] explanations for anything. He hasn't convinced me yet. But I'm open," Mrs. Gray said.

Winning Prince George's is essential for Mr. Cardin. He has scheduled a press conference for today with Rep. Albert R. Wynn and County Executive Jack B. Johnson, black Democrats who are supporting his campaign.

Maryland has about 900,000 registered Republicans and 1.7 million registered Democrats, of which an estimated 700,000 are black. Blacks represent more than 65 percent of the population in Prince George's, which has more than 320,000 registered Democrats.

Although Mr. Cardin won the statewide primary, he was trounced in Prince George's by Kweisi Mfume, former president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Mr. Mfume received 74,637 votes to Mr. Cardin's 19,824 in the county.

The tight Steele-Cardin contest is no surprise to Delegate Marvin E. Holmes Jr., Prince George's Democrat.

On primary day in September, Mr. Holmes said that "if Ben Cardin wins [the primary], Steele wins [the general election]."

A black Democrat in the state Senate, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said more recently: "It would have been probably better for the Democratic Party to come around Mfume. They would have had a better chance ... if they were serious about the black vote."

Arizona, Maryland Senate Races Targeted (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, November 2, 2006

The national parties sought to shake up Senate races in two states Wednesday, with Democrats pumping about $1 million into Arizona and Republicans spending about the same in Maryland.

Less than a week before the election, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee is spending money to help defeat Republican Sen. Jon Kyl, once considered a favorite to win re-election in Arizona, officials from both parties said.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee put its money on Maryland's Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele to win the Senate seat held by retiring Democrat Paul Sarbanes, the longest-serving senator in the history of the state.

Until this week, the parties had narrowed their primary battlegrounds, with both spending millions on ads in New Jersey, Tennessee, Missouri and Virginia. The DSCC already was spending money in Maryland, as well as Montana and Rhode Island. The NRSC this week also bought more than $880,000 in ads in Michigan in an effort to defeat incumbent Democrat Debbie Stabenow.

The moves and countermoves by the two party organizations reflect the fluid nature of the closing days of the midterm election campaign. Both parties have money to spend, but it was unclear Wednesday whether the commitments in Arizona and Maryland were based on perceived opportunities or a desire to force the opposition to spend money where it hadn't planned.

Kyl, a 12-year veteran of the Senate, is being challenged by millionaire Jim Pederson, a former state Democratic chairman who had spent millions of his own money on the campaign. The state has long leaned Republican, but in this election Democratic challengers are in close contests in three of the state's eight congressional districts.

"This contribution is a small return on the millions Pederson has contributed to the Democrat party," Kyl spokesman Andy Chasin said. "We're surprised they didn't pay him back earlier. Now they're doing it at a point when it won't do much good."

In Maryland, most polls show Steele behind Democratic Rep. Ben Cardin. But Steele, who is black, has been winning the support of some Democratic African-American elected officials in the state.

Meanwhile, in Tennessee, Republican Bob Corker gave his campaign $2 million of his own money for the final week of the race. It was the second time the millionaire and former construction company executive has put $2 million toward his election effort.

The loan would trigger the so-called "millionaire's amendment," and campaign finance law provision that allows his opponent, Democratic Rep. Harold Ford Jr., to raise more money from individual donors.

Ohio Voters Unmoved By Incumbent's Bipartisan Reputation (FT)

By Edward Luce In Toledo, Ohio

Financial Times, November 2, 2006

Mike DeWine, a Republican senator for Ohio, may be an unfortunate victim of what some pundits predict will be a "tsunami" against his party in the US mid-term congressional elections next Tuesday. Whether or not that wave of votes materialises at the national level for the Democrats (many Republicans remain confident their "get-out-the-vote" machine can reproduce past magic), Mr DeWine's prospects still look bleak.

DOJ_NMG_0090184

A moderate Republican, Mr DeWine's breed of politics does not fit the bitterly partisan narrative of America's 2006 election campaign. But in Toledo, a small industrial town that borders the auto-state of Michigan, few voters are paying much attention to Mr DeWine's plea for the politics of the centre-ground.

Once a thriving hub of America's industrial mid-west, Toledo is now a symbol of the country's expanding rustbelt. "Every year my revenues fall by about 25 per cent," says Rida Hazimah, the Lebanon-born proprietor of Dennis Market, a blue collar café that serves beer and steak. "If you listen to the customers at lunch time all they talk about is job losses. I am not sure how much longer I can keep this place open. Maybe another year or two."

Opinion polls give Sherrod Brown, Mr DeWine's Democratic challenger, a lead of between 10 and 12 percentage points. Last month the Republican National Committee, which raised almost $200m (€157m, £105m) for the final weeks of the campaign, withdrew funds from Mr DeWine's race in order to target resources on closer senatorial races in Tennessee, Virginia and New -Jersey.

But Mr DeWine can still tap the loyalty of the few wealthy Republicans who live in Toledo as well as their more numerous counterparts in more conservative parts of the state. He can also draw on the star attraction of John McCain, his fellow Republican senator, whose probable presidential bid for 2008 would almost certainly be built on his own reputation for bipartisanship.

"I am here because Mr DeWine is a friend and also somebody for whom I have the greatest respect," said Mr McCain, having flown in on a private jet to Toledo's small airport. "It is no secret that the Republican party is facing a very tough election because of our record on spending [which has risen sharply] and on ethics [several Republican lawmakers are either on trial for corruption or facing investigation]. At times like this we should appreciate the value and public service of people like Mike DeWine."

Mr McCain's words clearly had an impact on the small group of donors that had gathered at the home of a wealthy Republican in Toledo. Altogether they donated enough for Mr DeWine to air another bout of state-wide television advertisements contrasting his bipartisan reputation with what he bills as the "far left" record of Mr Brown.

But even if Mr DeWine could afford to blitz all the channels in the few remaining days of campaigning, the state of Ohio seems almost certain to go Democrat by embracing Mr Brown as well as Ted Strickland, the Democratic candidate for governor. With an unemployment rate of 7 per cent - way above the national average of 4.6 per cent - and the certainty of more lay-offs in the pipeline, Ohio's voters are disaffected.

Even Republicans wonder what the future holds. "What Ohio needs is some kind of jump start to get the economy going again," said Stephen Taylor, general manager of the Kia showroom in Toledo's outskirts, whose business is booming partly because the South Korean vehicles are so much cheaper than their US counterparts. "Although I am a Republican, I can tell this isn't a very good year for my party."

Meanwhile, Mr McCain, whose senate seat is not up for contest in this election, is unlikely to be damaged by a poor Republican performance. Unlike George W. Bush, whose low approval ratings have largely meant he has had to stay away from the hustings during the campaign, Mr McCain's ability to appeal to middle ground might be in greater demand if one or both houses of Congress turn Democrat next week.

"If you look at the problems America faces - for example our system of Social Security, which is going bust - these problems can only be fixed if both parties work together," said Mr McCain. "It is that kind of co-operation that most Americans are looking for."

Clawing For Votes, Chafee Steers Race Toward Gutter (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

CRANSTON, R.I. -- Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R-R.I.) always sounds so polite and sincere, even when he's wrapping his hands around his opponent's throat.

"Eight years as a top law enforcement official in Rhode Island and not a single successful conviction of a public official," Chafee said during a debate Monday night with his Democratic challenger, Sheldon Whitehouse. "He's always looking after the power brokers and his own political career."

The attack left the former state attorney general seething. Chafee is "just making this stuff up entirely out of whole cloth," Whitehouse shot back. A similar onslaught knocked Stephen Laffey off course in the final weeks before the GOP primary, forcing the Cranston mayor to deny that he had taunted firefighters and doctored his rÃ©sumÃ©. Robert A. Weygand got a dose of nice-guy negativism in 2000, when Chafee accused the Democratic former congressman of "embroidering the truth" about the age of his dog.

DOJ_NMG_0090185

What happened to the affable fellow who drives a hybrid and studied classics at Brown University? Well, his political career is on the line, and the gutter seems the best hope for salvation. Chafee has slogged through two tough campaigns this year, against a conservative primary opponent and now in the general election against Whitehouse. He survived the first round. Next week, polls suggest, he may not be so lucky.

Whitehouse led Chafee in every poll published in October. Many political observers say that despite the vaunted Chafee name, the national climate has become too hostile for a Republican to survive in one of the most Democratic states. President Bush's approval rating here is 22 percent.

"He's very much the underdog and has been forced into an attack strategy," said Darrell West, a Brown political science professor and pollster. "I can't imagine he's happy about it, but he has to do it. He's being bogged down by Bush's high negatives, and unless he can raise the negatives of his opponent, then he loses."

The candidates agree on just about every major issue: expanded federal support for embryonic stem cell research, gun control, legalizing marijuana use for medical purposes. Both are well-born, with deep roots in this tiny state. Their children attend the same school. Their fathers were roommates at Yale. Without the trash talk, this race would be a snoozer, a battle of the bores.

Whitehouse's message is a simple one: Chafee may be the Senate's most moderate Republican, but he's still a Republican. "To change Washington, we have to change the Senate," reads the tagline of one Whitehouse ad. In another, an image of Chafee fades into a grainy photo of Bush, Vice President Cheney and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). "Think about it," the announcer warns.

For a while this summer, it wasn't clear whether Chafee would survive the primary, and he needed extensive help from national Republicans. After seven years of bucking his party on major issues, Chafee drew close to the GOP at exactly the wrong time. Whitehouse, who faced a nominal primary challenge, was waiting in the wings, saving his money and savoring the political reverberations of Chafee's survival strategy.

Chafee was appointed to the Senate in 1999 upon the death of his father, the immensely popular senator John H. Chafee, and is known as a cautious and stubbornly independent lawmaker. Despite his pedigree, he is low-key. Barry O'Brien, a wastewater operator, has worked for every Chafee campaign since 1990, when Chafee lost his first run for Warwick mayor, and speaks of the senator as a family member. "He got elected because he was a good guy, an honest guy," O'Brien said. "That means something in Rhode Island."

Although Chafee rarely seeks out the spotlight, he doesn't mince words when it finds him. In 2004, he confessed that he had written in the name of George H.W. Bush as a protest vote against the former president's son. But when asked during the debate Monday whether he was proud of the current president, Chafee declined to say. "I'm opposed to much of his agenda," he responded carefully.

"All the time people tell me, 'Linc, I really like you, but I want to send Bush a message,' " Chafee says in his most recent ad. Seated in front of a model sailboat, he reminds viewers that he was the only Senate Republican to vote against the Iraq war. "I've always stood for principle," Chafee asserts, "even if it meant standing alone."

But to win, Chafee must woo Democrats and left-leaning independents away from Whitehouse. And if he has to bring the former attorney general down a notch, so be it.

Chafee's accusations against Whitehouse revolve around the Democrat's tenure as a crime fighter, a sensitive post in a state with a history of widespread institutional corruption. In one ad, Chafee accuses Whitehouse of failing to investigate corruption allegations at a Providence medical center because of possible ties to Democratic power brokers. Two hospital executives were later convicted in the case. "When corruption in Providence was out of control, Sheldon Whitehouse did nothing," the announcer rumbles. "He put his ambition over duty."

The attacks have infuriated Whitehouse, a 20-year public servant in Rhode Island who has been attorney general and a U.S. attorney. He noted in the debate that the Chafee family has been in Rhode Island public life for 30 years and "has never been involved in conduct like this." Whitehouse described Chafee's tactics as "straight out of the Karl Rove playbook. Pretty soon a candidate like me is playing follow the falsehood."

"I always look at my opponent's record," Chafee responded mildly. "When I see shortcomings, I bring them to the voters' attention."

Republican Is A Political Force, Despite Party Baggage (WP)

By Michael Grunwald

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090186

WINTER PARK, Fla. -- At a recent fundraiser in this ritzy Orlando suburb, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D) was handicapping governor's races with the air of a gambler who liked his odds: "No matter where you go, there's good news for Democrats."

Colorado, Maryland, Massachusetts, New York and Ohio all looked like pickups, with strong Democratic threats in Minnesota and even Arkansas.

And then there was Florida, where Vilsack had traveled to help Rep. Jim Davis, the Democratic nominee to succeed term-limited Gov. Jeb Bush (R). In a supposedly Democratic year, in a supposedly bellwether state, polls showed Davis 15 points behind his GOP opponent, Charlie Crist, the state attorney general.

"Well, Florida will get competitive," Vilsack said.

It has, but Crist is still the front-runner, with an 11-point lead in two statewide polls and single-digit leads in the others. Along with California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, he is hoping to show Republicans across the country how to survive a Democratic wave.

Crist is an exuberant retail politician who puts the "glad" into glad-handing, a Reagan-style optimist with a made-for-TV tan, a made-for-TV shock of white hair and a made-for-radio baritone. He is a genial moderate who is nevertheless known as "Chain Gang Charlie" for his hard line on crime. He is a close ally of the governor, who is far more popular in Florida than President Bush, but he has shown an independent streak by supporting stem cell research and same-sex civil unions and by refusing to intervene in the Terri Schiavo case.

He is also a relentless fundraiser who has outdistanced Davis by more than $12 million, which seemed to discourage many of the Democrats at developer Jim Pugh's Winter Park estate. "Charlie's raising an ungodly amount of money, and he's a terrific campaigner," Pugh said. "It's going to be tough to overcome all that."

Crist has cut into the Democratic base by focusing on civil rights and the environment, choosing a trial lawyer as his running mate, and saturating the airwaves before Davis could respond.

Now that Davis is airing a few ads, some independents seem to be tilting his way. In recent weeks, Crist has changed his positions on property insurance, testing in schools and voting rights for felons, moving left every time, but his Republican label still seems to be a drag. Even though Republicans enjoy comfortable majorities in both houses of the state legislature, GOP leaders are nervous about losing three congressional seats here, including the one vacated by Mark Foley, and incumbent Bill Nelson (D) is dominating Rep. Katherine Harris (R) in the Senate race.

And Davis is happy to have a D after his name this year. "The Republican Party is a money machine in this state -- fueled by the insurance industry and the special interests -- but there's an awful lot of discontent out there," he said.

Ever since the 2000 recount, Florida has been known as the ultimate swing state, but it is really a unique mix of voting blocs, with a slightly Republican trend that swept President Bush to victory in 2004. North Florida is like a small Southern state, with fast-growing Republican exurbs. The southwest part of the state is booming with GOP-leaning snowbirds from Midwestern Kiwanis clubs. Southeast Florida is still jammed with Democratic-leaning retirees from Northeastern states, but many of its residents are dying or moving to the Carolinas to escape the crowds.

The Republican tilt also has a lot to do with the governor, who is almost universally admired for his leadership during hurricanes and is widely respected as a principled conservative -- even by many Floridians who have disagreed with his strong stands on testing schoolchildren, revamping Medicaid and having the government intervene in the Schiavo case. Crist has highlighted his alliance with him, while the Davis campaign has mostly attacked the president and spotlighted issues on which the governor has disagreed with Crist.

"I don't think Jeb's popularity rubs off on Charlie," said Van Church, a political coordinator for the Service Employees International Union. "He's just a politician."

To watch Crist on the campaign trail is to see that he is not just a politician; he's a natural politician. On a recent visit to a printing company in a Miami suburb, Crist bounded out of his car with the joy of a child who had just arrived at Disney World. He hugged his host, Manuel Fernandez, as if he were a long-lost brother: "It's so wonderful to see you!" The two men had never met.

Fernandez then told Crist his story: He arrived from Cuba in 1961 and started working at the company as a $2-an-hour janitor in 1965, when it had only six employees. Now he is the owner, and the firm has 50 employees, including his three children.

"That's America!" Crist shouted with delight. He told Fernandez about his grandfather, Adam Christodoulos, a Greek immigrant who shined shoes when he arrived in the United States and eventually opened his own shoeshine parlor: "It's the same story: the power of the American dream!"

Crist then introduced himself to Fernandez's 90-year-old mother: "Mamacita! You can't possibly be 90 years old!" Next, he kissed Fernandez's 7-month-old grandson: "You're Florida's future!" He praised the rest of the Fernandez clan with a playful slap at Davis, who missed a lot of congressional votes during the campaign: "Such a wonderful work ethic. You know, my opponent doesn't always show up to work."

DOJ_NMG_0090187

"I thrive on this," Crist said in an interview. "I love people. And I love Florida. It's got such great weather, such tremendous diversity. Wonderful fishing. What's not to like?"

Florida has a history of boosterism -- not just shady speculators selling swampland, but visionary leaders seeking tourism, immigration and development. Crist fits into that tradition; when it comes to Florida real estate, for example, he sees nothing but smooth sailing ahead. "I'm telling you, it's not just going to be a boom -- it's going to be a sonic boom!" he said.

The Davis campaign has tried to portray Crist as a lightweight who floats with the political winds. But the charges seem not to have stuck. Crist may be swimming against a Democratic tide, but even his opponents think he is a powerful swimmer.

"I think Charlie's fabulous, just a great guy," said Jimmy Goff, a Democratic businessman at the Davis fundraiser. "I think this race will turn around, but it won't be easy."

On Election Night, Networks Plan To Proceed With Caution (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

"Mathematically," CBS Senior Vice President Linda Mason says of the election coverage, "you could know by 10 for the House and 11 for the Senate." But, she says, "it could go on until all hours of the early morning."

"We have learned from past mistakes," says NBC anchor Brian Williams. "I start from the assumption I will wake up with a sore back on my couch" after an all-nighter.

"There's likely to be a lot of hedging," says ABC's George Stephanopoulos. "You may know it, but you can't say it."

If the Democrats capture the House, television anchors won't be able to project that until they are sure the party has locked in a 15-seat gain. Fortunately for them, 35 of the 53 closest races, as handicapped by analyst Charlie Cook, are in states where polls close by 8 p.m. Eastern time.

In the Senate, with fewer seats in play, the math is simpler. If one or two of the most vulnerable Republicans -- in Virginia, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Tennessee and Missouri -- win decisively, the networks will know fairly early that the Democrats won't be able to reach their magic number of six needed to take control. But even if the Democrats sweep those races -- and hold New Jersey, which is in doubt -- the networks still won't be able to forecast a Democratic takeover until enough votes are counted in Montana, where polls close at 10 p.m. Eastern. The Democrats would have to unseat Montana's embattled GOP senator, Conrad Burns, to gain control.

The biggest behind-the-scenes change in network coverage involves what has been dubbed the Quarantine Room. Determined to avoid a rerun of recent years, when its exit polls leaked out by early afternoon to the Drudge Report, Slate and other Web sites, a media consortium is allowing two people from each of the networks and the Associated Press entree to a windowless room in New York. All cellphones, laptops and BlackBerrys will be confiscated. The designated staffers will pore over the exit polls but will not be allowed to communicate with their offices until 5 p.m.

The consortium, called the National Election Pool, is conducting no surveys for House races. The exit polling will take place for Senate and gubernatorial contests in 32 states with competitive races.

The recent track record with such polling has been pockmarked with failure. There was, of course, the debacle of election night 2000, when the networks used polling data from Florida to prematurely award the presidency, twice, within hours. In 2002, the network consortium's predecessor, Voter News Service, suffered a computer meltdown and pulled the plug on its exit polls. Two years ago, its sample was so skewed that the group's surveys showed Sen. John Kerry beating President Bush well into the night.

Williams is acutely aware of that history. "I called Florida for Al Gore, too," he says, recalling his anchoring role on MSNBC. "It was a horrible moment." Now, he says, "we have all kinds of fail-safes built into the system."

All the networks are using what are called "precinct models" -- taking into account such factors as a district's voting history and level of absentee ballots -- in gauging whether it is safe to make projections based on partial vote counts.

Much of the action will be on cable news. The broadcast networks are limiting themselves to hour-long specials at 10 p.m. (plus ABC's "Nightline" at 11:30 p.m.), along with news cut-ins and updated specials (mainly for West Coast audiences) at 1 a.m. "It's going to be a long night," says Marty Ryan, executive producer at Fox News, which is doing some exit polling to supplement the network pool surveys. "House races are notoriously difficult to call. How do you call 50 House races? The fact of the matter is, you don't. You have to wait until a lot of returns are in."

"Frankly," says Sam Feist, CNN's political director, "we're not in any rush to call individual House races. Our mantra is simple: It's better to be right than to be first. We're going to be extremely cautious."

DOJ_NMG_0090188

As always, the networks will be looking for early bellwethers. Three Republican House members are considered in jeopardy in Indiana, where polls close at 7 p.m. If one or more go down, that will affect the tone of the coverage.

If the dominoes aren't falling the Republicans' way, there may be broad hints about how it's "shaping up to be a big Democratic night" well before any network makes an official projection.

But if the races are tight, network analysts say, the outcome in the House might not be known until Thursday -- or days after that if recounts are involved. Another complicating factor would be delayed counting in Oregon and Washington state, which rely almost entirely on mail ballots.

A big political wave can wash away much of the drama. During the Republican sweep of 1994, the networks began talking of a GOP takeover of the House as early as 8:45 but made no official predictions until hours later.

With the level of public interest -- and the volume of television coverage -- much greater than in a typical midterm election, the networks are turning to some of their veterans. At CBS, former anchor Bob Schieffer will join Katie Couric, who will be headlining election night for the first time. At NBC, longtime anchor Tom Brokaw will join Williams on the set.

"This won't have the moment of a presidential night," says Williams. "But it's a little more than Olympic trials."

Howard Kurtz hosts CNN's weekly media program, "Reliable Sources."

Elections Rake In Big Bucks For Media Outlets (USAT)

By David Lieberman

USA Today, November 2, 2006

NEW YORK — There's a bonanza for media companies in this year's unusually large array of hotly contested election campaigns: Candidates and activists will end up spending a record $3.1 billion getting their messages out, according to research firm PQ Media.

The total is 14.5% higher than 2004, even though that year included more than $1 billion for the presidential race.

“The presidential election was very focused in 17 battleground states, and there weren't that many contentious House and Senate races,” says PQ Media Vice President Leo Kivijarv.

But this year political spending is up in 90% of the USA's 210 media markets. Those seeing the biggest percentage increases are Cedar Rapids, Davenport, Ottumwa and Sioux City — Iowa communities with contentious House races — and Lansing, Mich.

About half of the total dollars go to broadcast TV, followed by direct mail, which accounts for 23%.

The most noticeable change is in gubernatorial races, where spending will exceed $1 billion for the first time. With 36 contests, many considered close, campaigns are on pace to spend $1.1 billion — up 757% vs. 2004, when there were just 11 races.

House candidates will spend $744 million, up 38%, while Senate contenders are spending $705 million, up 40%.

The Senate race in New Jersey, where Democrat Robert Menendez faces Republican Thomas Kean Jr., may end up being the most costly. To reach all of the state's voters, the candidates must buy airtime on TV stations in New York City as well as Philadelphia.

Yet the media seeing the biggest sales jumps from 2004 are radio stations, newspapers and billboards — all of which target local voters. That local focus kept Web services from growing as much as they did 2002 to 2004.

“You don't have local search, and online isn't known as a local medium,” Kivijarv says. He notes, though, that some of the dollars attributed to newspapers may be for ads on their websites.

There's also less targeting this year of specific groups, such as Hispanics. Only two states, Arizona and Colorado, have ballot initiatives about immigration.

PQ Media says the focus on local races should help companies such as CBS, Fox, MediaNews and Clear Channel.

The 2006 dollar record may not last long. “Somebody's got to replace President Bush in 2008, and if the Democrats take both houses of Congress, then the Republicans will put a lot of money in” to retake key seats, Kivijarv says. “It will probably break $3 billion again.”

Stem-cell Issue Gains Momentum In Homestretch (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, November 2, 2006

The debate over embryonic stem-cell research surged onto the scene in several political races in the final weeks before the election, spurred in part by actor Michael J. Fox's ads on behalf of some Democratic candidates.

But Democrats say they've been chipping away at the issue for more than a year, betting it will make a difference with voters in middle America.

DOJ_NMG_0090189

"Stem-cell research has been an issue that we have focused a lot of attention on -- ads, e-mails, mail, Web ads -- for a good 18 months. We have always believed this would be an important issue, particularly in suburban districts," said Sarah Feinberg, a spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

"Democrats see this as their 'marriage' issue, their wedge," said Tom McClusky, vice president for governmental affairs at the Family Research Council. The fight is on "to prove them wrong," he said.

In July, President Bush issued his first veto to block a bill, approved overwhelmingly by both chambers, that would have overturned his limits on federal support for embryonic stem-cell research. Democratic candidates subsequently have accused Republican opponents of standing in the way of life-saving cures from such research.

Mr. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease, recorded ads for Democratic Senate candidates Claire McCaskill in Missouri and Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin in Maryland, as well as Wisconsin Gov. James E. Doyle, who is running for re-election. The ads caused more ruckus when conservative talk-show host Rush Limbaugh said Mr. Fox had stopped taking medication to worsen his symptoms for the camera's benefit. Mr. Limbaugh has since apologized.

Republican candidates nationwide have said that their position is being distorted and that they support research that uses adult stem cells but does not require the destruction of embryos.

"The false impression that's trying to be made is that Republicans don't support stem-cell research or are looking to somehow outlaw it. It's simply not the case," said Dan Ronayne of the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

In a recent "Meet the Press" debate, Maryland Republican Senate candidate Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele said Mr. Cardin's ad makes it seem that Mr. Steele doesn't support stem-cell research. "I do," he said. "Where I have drawn the line is federal funding for research that destroys an embryo."

Mr. Steele, like other Republicans, fought back with his own ad on the issue.

The issue likely will have the biggest effect in Missouri, which will vote on a ballot initiative to create a state constitutional right to engage in embryonic stem-cell research. Democrats also have raised the issue in House races in Illinois, Florida, Ohio, Colorado and Pennsylvania. It has emerged in the Maryland governor's race and New Jersey Senate race.

Democrat Patrick Murphy in Pennsylvania has accused Republican Rep. Michael G. Fitzpatrick of flip-flopping by backing Mr. Bush "in opposition to this life-saving research." Mr. Fitzpatrick's chief of staff said he has mailed explanations that he has strongly supported research on adult stem cells and cord blood.

Similar attacks have come from House Democratic candidates in Iowa and Illinois.

Maryland's Republican governor, Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., is running an ad saying that he has made the state a national leader in stem-cell research, though the ad did not specify which kind.

Republican pollster Whit Ayres said this "can be a very effective issue" for Democrats. A Republican operative said it "hasn't moved numbers" as Democrats had hoped.

But Sean Tipton, president of the Coalition for the Advancement of Medical Research, said it's clear that Republicans who side with Mr. Bush know they're in trouble because most Americans favor the bill he vetoed. "They know it's a political loser" to support Mr. Bush's policy, he said of Republicans. "I see no one running ads saying, 'I stood with Bush.' "

In a Newsweek poll last week by Princeton Survey Research Associates, 50 percent said they favor using tax dollars to fund research using stem cells obtained from human embryos and 37 percent said they oppose it. At the same time, the issue ranked low among voters' priorities, trailing matters such as Iraq, the economy, health care and terrorism.

Local Issues Mirror National Ones, But The Special Effects Occasionally Stand Alone (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

The election season is getting punchier in places far from the national political spotlight — even in Eden, N.C., where 16 candidates are slugging it out for the five available seats on the Rockingham County School Board.

One of them produced a television advertisement suggesting that the school system turned children into automatons. It is shot against a backdrop of a Pink Floyd video showing children coursing through an assembly line to the lyrics: “We don’t need no education. We don’t need no thought control.”

Another candidate shows himself brandishing a light saber as a “Star Wars” Death Star blows up a little red schoolhouse. The message: the federal government, a “cosmic bully,” meddles too much in education.

The advertisement of a third contender, riffing on a “new sheriff in town” theme, shows a sheriff being killed in “The Terror of Tiny Town,” the 1938 all-dwarf musical Western.

Not every local race is quite as entertaining, but the Rockingham County election shows how national issues like education, the economy, crime and ethics have been localized.

DOJ_NMG_0090190

And the effort invested in contests for school board, city council, sheriff and state legislatures is emblematic of how much stock voters, interest groups and political parties are placing on local elections.

"I sort of argue it's the hidden election," Tim Storey, an election analyst with the National Conference of State Legislatures, said of the local races. "It's very localized, but in a strange way it's more important. It's how good your school is, how good your road is, how good the hospitals are."

Some of the races, especially those for state legislatures, have attracted the national political parties. Partisan interest groups have also paid for advertisements in some races.

In Colorado, for example, immigration issues have been highlighted in advertisements in the State Senate contest in Jefferson County between Betty Boyd, the Democratic incumbent, and Matt Knoedler, a Republican state representative, and in the State House race between the incumbent, James L. Riesberg, a Democrat, and his challenger, David T. Owen, a Republican state senator.

"Special interests have discovered that if you want to get something done, you're going to have to work with legislatures and governors, because you're not going to get anything done in Congress," Mr. Storey said. "They are doing television, doing very targeted walk-the-precinct strategies. State legislative groups are able to raise more money than ever before."

Some issues mirror national ones writ smaller. Take ethics. Several races have local parallels with national scandals. In San Jose, Calif., the mayor's race is being run against the background of the indictment of the current mayor, Ron Gonzales, on corruption charges.

Mr. Gonzales is not seeking re-election, but the two candidates running to succeed him have cast aspersions about ethics against each other.

In Alaska, an F.B.I. investigation into ties between lawmakers and a major oil field services company could influence several legislative races. Only one of the six legislators whose offices were searched by federal investigators is running for re-election, but some polls suggest that the investigation has created a wave of n anti-incumbent sentiment.

In North Carolina, Speaker Jim Black, a Democrat, is seeking re-election amid a federal and state investigation of people connected with his office. Mr. Black has not been charged, but three people have been convicted, including Mr. Black's first appointee to the state lottery commission, his former political director, and a former state representative who said he took $50,000 from a Democrat to support Mr. Black.

The investigation is being used as political fodder, not only by Mr. Black's Republican opponent, Hal Jordan, but also by Republicans in other statehouse races who are trying to link their opponents to Mr. Black or to paint Democrats as ethically questionable.

In other elections, crime has taken local permutations. The mayor's race in Little Rock, Ark., is a four-way contest over ways to deal with a surge in violent crime and the overflowing Pulaski County Jail.

In South Carolina, Sheriff Steve McCaskill of Kershaw County, a Republican, has been criticized by his opponent, Sammie Tucker Jr., a Democrat and former highway patrolman, for not issuing an Amber Alert in the case of a 14-year-old girl who was kidnapped and held in an underground bunker for 10 days. Sheriff McCaskill has said the girl's case did not meet Amber Alert criteria because law enforcement officials did not have a suspect, a description of a car, or even a clear idea that the girl had been abducted.

In the Massachusetts governor's race, the Republican candidate, Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, has made an issue of the fact that her Democratic opponent, Deval Patrick, had advocated the release of Benjamin LaGuer, who Mr. Patrick believed had been wrongly convicted of rape. Mr. Patrick withdrew his support of Mr. LaGuer when a DNA test linked Mr. LaGuer to the crime.

Ms. Healey has repeatedly raised the rape issue, producing an advertisement showing a woman walking in a dark parking garage and Mr. Patrick in a television interview describing Mr. LaGuer as "eloquent" and "thoughtful."

The advertisement says: "If anyone you knew actually praised a convicted rapist, what would you think?" and concludes, "Deval Patrick. He should be ashamed, not governor."

Polls, however, suggest that the advertisement has not drawn voters to Ms. Healey, and Mr. Patrick is considered comfortably ahead.

Not every state or local election is turning on a larger national issue. In Pennsylvania, voters are angry over a raise approved last year by state legislators. It was retracted, and 17 lawmakers were defeated in the May primary. But the issue could still reverberate.

Indiana has two issues found nowhere else. One is the decision to lease the Indiana Toll Road to a private Spanish-Australian group, and the other is daylight saving time, which the state imposed last year on Indiana's patchwork of time zones.

Both issues have resulted in anger at Gov. Mitch Daniels, a Republican, and the Republican-controlled legislature.

Although some Indianans welcome the money from the lease, others are rankled that a state highway is being controlled by foreign investors.

DOJ_NMG_0090191

And as Indianans turned their clocks back one hour on Sunday for the first time in 30 years, many business owners are grateful to be in step with other parts of the country, but some are angered by a new pattern of confusion.

A public employees union paid George Schricker $150 to write a song about the controversy:

I'm losing track of time.
Yes, I'm losing track of time.
I'm living in two time zones.
I think I've lost my mind.
I'm late for my appointments,
like a clock that's full of grime.
I come from Indiana, where we're losing track of time.

Voting For Judicial Independence (NYT)

The New York Times, November 2, 2006

Nearly obscured by the struggle for control of Congress, there is another important battle in a handful of states over measures aimed at punishing judges for their official rulings and making them more captive to prevailing political winds. These measures all hide behind the superficially appealing but profoundly misleading banner of judicial accountability. And, taken together, they add up to an assault on a fair and independent judiciary.

In Colorado, voters will decide the fate of a far-reaching state constitutional amendment designed to kick a huge percentage of top sitting judges off the bench by setting a term limit of 10 years and applying the cap retroactively. A measure on the ballot in Oregon would create new geographic districts from which appellate judges could run, as a backdoor way to oust judges from the Portland area.

In Montana, conservative groups tried to force voters to confront Constitutional Initiative 98, an attempt to "rein in" judges by establishing new recall elections and making it easier to remove judges for specific rulings. Fortunately, the state's high court ruled this misbegotten initiative invalid because of what it called "pervasive fraud" by out-of-state paid gatherers of signatures.

But the wackiest and potentially most far-reaching of the judge-bashing schemes is still on the ballot, South Dakota's Jail 4 Judges initiative. The brainchild of Ronald Branson, an antigovernment activist from California operating at the political fringe, this reckless exercise seeks to keep judges in line by amending the state Constitution to eliminate judicial immunity from lawsuits by disgruntled plaintiffs and others. Immunity is a time-honored way of preserving an independent judiciary.

This radical measure would create a special grand jury with a rotating membership and loose rules — in effect, a fourth branch of government. This new entity would be vested with the power to punish judges for their decisions, or, for that matter, school board members or any other local public official who had the bad luck to fit under the amendment's broad definition of judicial power. Writing in The Wall Street Journal, the former Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor correctly blasted the initiative as a bald attempt at judicial intimidation.

By rejecting Jail 4 Judges, South Dakota voters can send a message of support for a strong and independent judicial system — without which democracy cannot function — that will resound nationwide.

Life, Liberty And Property Rights (USAT)

By Mary Zeiss Stange

USA Today, November 2, 2006

"They paved paradise, and put up a parking lot."

The refrain of Joni Mitchell's old hit might as well be the theme song of a steam-rolling property rights movement in the West. Initiatives have made their way onto this November's ballot in six Western states — Arizona, California, Idaho, Montana, Nevada and Washington — that would sharply limit the concept of eminent domain and bar government seizure of private property without just compensation. Until recently, these initiatives have drawn little attention, but planners and policymakers around the country are beginning to take note of them, and for good reason.

On the face of things, this "anti-takings" movement makes sense. Supporters cite last year's U.S. Supreme Court ruling in Kelo v. New London (Conn.), in which by a 5-4 vote the court upheld the seizure of a handful of private homes standing in the way of a large development project on the grounds that it would serve the larger "public purpose" of creating jobs and generating tax revenue.

In a vigorous dissent, then-justice Sandra Day O'Connor objected that "nothing is to prevent the State from replacing any Motel 6 with a Ritz-Carlton, any home with a shopping mall, or any farm with a factory." This argument strikes a chord with voters, especially when coupled with images of Susette Kelo displaced from the only home she had ever known. Surveys suggest that as many as 90% of Americans disapprove of the seizures allowed by the Kelo ruling. Polls also point toward substantial public support for the anti-takings initiatives.

DOJ_NMG_0090192

With such strong public sentiment in favor of these measures, what is not to like about them?

Actually, a lot. The property-rights movement is just the latest incarnation of the "wise-use" movement of the 1990s — except without the pretense of being wise. On their face, these initiatives are about preventing government from the "physical takings" allowed by the Kelo ruling. Hence their innocuously worded titles: "Protect Our Homes," "The Home Owners Protection Effort," the "People's Initiative to Stop the Taking of Our Land," and so on. But they actually amount to "Kelo-plus."

Their goal is to block "regulatory takings," says Leonard Gilroy, a senior policy analyst at the public policy research group Reason Foundation, based in Los Angeles.

Translation: These initiatives would gut local and state abilities to enact or enforce virtually any regulations affecting private land use and development.

And more: They would require government to compensate property owners for the worth, in the form of lost property value and/or lost potential income, of any restrictions imposed upon them. The cost to municipalities of enforcing commercial and residential zoning regulations, environmental quality laws, and so on would be devastating. The Washington State Green Party rightly calls that state's anti-takings initiative a "Trojan horse" in terms both of its environmental and economic consequences.

Like the original Trojan horse, this one comes from outside. Despite a concerted effort to portray the property rights movement as a grassroots phenomenon, all six initiatives made it onto the ballot thanks to large infusions of out-of-state cash — lots of it from one man, New York real estate developer Howard Rich.

Rich's two advocacy groups, the Fund for Democracy and Americans for Limited Government, alone have funneled about $4 million into the petition process of getting these initiatives onto state ballots. Much of the money has gone to professional signature-gatherers, most of whom travel from state to state pushing innocuously worded petitions and are paid by the signature. Prices range from $1 a pop in California to $3 for every name collected in Arizona.

The High Country News, a non-profit news magazine covering issues in the West, quoted one such signature-gatherer, Eric Dondero: "This is a statewide petition to protect our property rights. To keep that new eminent domain law from coming to Montana and taking our homes away." Spoken by an itinerant professional petition-pusher from Texas, this hardly amounts to prairie populism. On the contrary, it represents a calculated effort to deceive voters about the likely consequences of property rights initiatives.

In Montana, the strategy might not have worked. In September, a Montana District Court judge invalidated the petitions gathered in support of Interstate 154, on the grounds that there was clear evidence of fraud in the way signatures were obtained. The state supreme court has upheld the ruling.

Voters in the other five states, however, will in a few days confront an issue of devastating simplicity. Vote "No" and you are, supposedly, giving up your rights to life, liberty and property. Vote "Yes" and the backyard in which the next "in-fill" housing development or Wal-Mart breaks ground could well be your own.

Mary Zeiss Stange teaches at Skidmore College and ranches in Montana. She is a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

Loose Change Lawmakers Tap PAC Money To Pay Wide Array Of Bills Funds For Candidates At Risk Also Cover Hotels, Meals And Gifts For Big Donors $5,000 For A Texas Funeral By BRODY MULLINS (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 2, 2006

Harry Reid, the Senate's top Democrat, makes frequent trips to his home state of Nevada. Over the past four years, his bills at Caesars Palace, Mandalay Bay and other Las Vegas establishments have totaled more than $125,000, according to PoliticalMoneyLine, a nonpartisan organization that tracks money in politics.

Mr. Reid charged these expenses to a special campaign account called a leadership political-action committee, or leadership PAC. The primary purpose of such accounts is to funnel money to other congressional candidates in need of campaign cash, especially those in close races.

But in recent years, leadership PACs on both sides of the political aisle have spent an increasing portion of their money for things other than contributions to candidates, the records show. Those expenses ranged from hotels and meals for the lawmakers who set up the PACs to flowers and jewelry for political supporters, the records indicate.

This shift in spending is notable in an election cycle that features so many closely contested races. With only a few days remaining before next week's elections, many candidates have run short of funding for all-important television advertising, and every additional dollar contributed by leadership PACs is important.

DOJ_NMG_0090193

On average, the leadership PACs of Republicans and Democrats in the House contribute 40 cents to candidates for every dollar they raise, an analysis of the spending data shows. In the Senate, Republicans contribute about 30 cents for every dollar they raise, and Democrats contribute about 20 cents.

Leadership PACs aren't subject to the same campaign-finance rules as the re-election accounts of individual congressmen. Election law, for example, bars politicians from using their own campaign funds to cover personal expenses. Those rules don't apply to leadership PACs, campaign-finance lawyers say.

Lawyers say there are few limits on what leadership PACs can pay for. "If a lawmaker wanted to pay his or her mortgage out of their PAC, they could do it," says Jan Baran, a campaign-finance lawyer with Wiley Rein & Fielding in Washington.

A spokesman for Mr. Reid says all expenses the senator charged to his leadership PAC were appropriate and were related to campaign or fund-raising business, including meals in Las Vegas with political supporters. Lawmakers with leadership PACs contend that, regulations aside, donors would never tolerate the use of money for personal expenses.

But critics say the rules that apply to PACs, which chiefly govern the size of contributions, aren't rigid enough, and give the lawmakers too much latitude over how money is spent.

"My impression is that a lot of people use leadership PACs as a slush fund," says Rep. Joel Hefley, a Colorado Republican and former chairman of the House Ethics Committee, who is retiring at year's end. Lawmakers use their accounts, he says, to pay for "all kinds of things that can be justified, but certainly are questionable." Mr. Hefley, who says he believes congressmen spend too much time raising money, introduced a bill this year to outlaw leadership PACs. So far, no other lawmakers have endorsed it.

Nearly half of the 535 members of Congress, in both parties, have leadership PACs. Through Aug. 30 of this election cycle, 260 leadership PACs have raised about $100 million and have disbursed about $33 million to colleagues' election campaigns, analysis of the PoliticalMoneyLine data shows.

Both the number of leadership PACs and the money they have contributed to candidates have increased by 20% since 2002. But their operational costs -- the money spent on staff salaries, fund raising, flights, meals, everything other than campaign contributions -- have doubled to $53.3 million over that period, analysis of the data shows.

Leadership PACs have been around for a couple of decades, but until recently, only a few congressional leaders operated them. In the mid-1990s, Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas, who left Congress this year, founded a leadership PAC and began encouraging other Republicans to do the same. He urged his colleagues to use the PACs to funnel political contributions into competitive elections their party needed to win to retain their congressional majority.

Lawmakers who want to give money to a vulnerable colleague are barred by law, under most circumstances, from sending more than $4,000 from their own re-election accounts per two-year election cycle. By setting up a leadership PAC, lawmakers can dole out as much as $10,000 per cycle to a candidate. Corporations can donate up to $10,000 per election to the PACs. Those limits are more than twice the legal limits for conventional re-election accounts.

GROWING EXPENSES

LPAC data show sharp rises in some expenses.

*Through Aug. 30, 2006

Note: Does not include PACs run by lawmakers who are considering running for president.

Source: PoliticalMoneyLine

Lawmakers in safe seats often direct money to colleagues who are struggling. In many cases, the grateful recipients support these donors in subsequent congressional votes on leadership posts.

For example, when House Republicans voted to replace Mr. DeLay as majority leader earlier this year, most backed the candidate who had given them the most leadership-PAC money, records indicate. Republican Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, who was voted the new majority leader, had donated more money to his Republican colleagues than did his opponent, Missouri Rep. Roy Blunt, according to a study by the Campaign for a Cleaner Congress, a congressional watchdog group.

This year, with only a few days remaining before the elections, some candidates on each side of the aisle don't have the money they need for the final push, and they aren't getting as much as hoped for from leadership PACs.

Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, the Senate's third-ranking Republican, spent nearly $1,500 over the past six years at fast-food restaurants, according to PoliticalMoneyLine, which analyzes Federal Election Commission records. Records show his PAC paid $22 at a Burger King in Virginia, $6 at a Boston Chicken in West Chester, Pa., and $15 at a Subway in Pittsburgh. In addition, it paid for $600 of Starbucks coffee.

"I'll be on a trip for a candidate and I'll stop in to buy a cup of coffee or a sandwich," he said in an interview yesterday. "I don't eat at fancy restaurants, so when I'm traveling I just eat at cheap places. We don't have $500 restaurant bills at Charlie Palmer's.... That's not how you spend donors' money."

DOJ_NMG_0090194

Mr. Santorum has handed out to other candidates 20 cents of every dollar his leadership PAC has raised over the past four years. The account, called Fight PAC, raised $3.5 million and distributed $700,000 to Republican candidates and causes.

Records show that over the past six years, Mr. Santorum's PAC has paid $1,900 for limousines, $3,000 for flowers, $4,100 for art and framing.

Robert Traynham, the senator's spokesman, says the PAC's goal is to elect more Republicans to Congress, and that it is permissible for Mr. Santorum to bill the PAC for "reasonable administrative expenses."

Rep. Tom Reynolds, who is in charge of organizing the Republican party's effort to retain a House majority, has dipped into his leadership account to pay $650 for stationery design and $447 for a dinner meeting for his staff at an Irish bar on Capitol Hill.

Steny Hoyer of Maryland, the House Democratic whip, spent $2,315 on L.L. Bean shaving kits for political supporters, staff and other politicians, and $405 on flower arrangements for several funerals, according to PoliticalMoneyLine. A spokeswoman for Mr. Hoyer says his PAC is one of the most efficient, having given away $1.1 million of the $1.9 million it has raised so far this year.

Sen. Bob Menendez, the New Jersey Democrat facing a tough re-election battle, dined a dozen times over the past two years at Morton's. The bills, which totaled $3,197, were paid by his PAC. A spokesman for Mr. Menendez says the bills were either "fund-raisers for the PAC or donor prospecting."

The leadership PAC of Rep. Joe Barton, a Texas Republican, paid $5,000 to the Blessing Funeral Home in Mansfield, Texas, for a funeral in June 2004. Larry Neal, an aide to Mr. Barton, said the funeral expense was for "the burial of a young staff assistant in Texas who left behind a devastated widow and their one-year-old child after committing suicide at home one awful summer night."

Republican Rep. Mike Oxley of Ohio, who is retiring, paid for $30,000 worth of going-away parties for himself from his leadership PAC. His spokeswoman declines to comment.

Several lawmakers have family members on the payrolls of their leadership PACs. Mr. DeLay's wife, Christine, was paid more than $170,000 by his PAC over the last four years for fund raising and political consulting. His lawyer says the payments were appropriate. The wife of California Republican Rep. John Doolittle worked as a fund-raiser for his PAC, keeping 15% of the contributions she brought in as payment. And California Democratic Sen. Barbara Boxer's PAC is run by her son, a lawyer, who has been paid $80,000 so far this election cycle.

The PACs can remain in place even after lawmakers retire. In September 2004, New York Rep. Jack Quinn started a leadership PAC a few months before his planned retirement from the House. Mr. Quinn said the account would allow him to donate leftover campaign funds to other Republican candidates. Since then, he has donated about $100,000 to candidates and has used another $115,000 to pay for expenses ranging from liquor for a Christmas party with political allies to insurance on a 2004 Ford Taurus he once used as a campaign vehicle.

Mr. Reid, the Senate minority leader, travels frequently to Las Vegas to raise money and meet with political supporters. Many of his bills there are paid by his Searchlight Leadership PAC, named after his hometown in Nevada. In June, for example, his PAC paid $3,800 for hotels and fund-raisers at Caesars, Mandalay Bay and the MGM Grand. In August, it paid another $660 for meals and hotels during a pair of Las Vegas trips.

Jim Manley, a spokesman for Mr. Reid, says the expenditures are legal and appropriate. Some of them, he says, cover costs incurred by the minority leader's staffers, since Mr. Reid often stays at his home about 50 miles outside the city. "These expenditures are not especially large by Las Vegas standards," he says.

The Searchlight PAC was set up to support Democratic candidates, he says, and all its expenses "are directly related to fund raising, donor prospecting and donor maintenance, activities that are the core of the fund's permissible activities."

During the 2006 election cycle, Mr. Reid's PAC raised $2.2 million and distributed $447,000 to Democratic candidates and political parties, or about 21 cents of every $1 it raised, according to PoliticalMoneyLine. For the 2002 election, it raised $1.1 million and contributed $350,000 to candidates. During that election cycle, it spent about $14,000 on salaries, overhead and other expenses. Through Oct. 18 of this cycle, it has spent $1.2 million.

"There's no mystery about why the leadership fund is spending more money," Mr. Manley says. "It is the right way for a Senate leader to help elect other Democrats consistent with federal election law." He added that Mr. Reid also has contributed $845,000 to Democratic candidates and political parties from his separate re-election account.

Between December 2005 and March 2006, Mr. Reid's PAC paid $3,367 to cover stays by his guests at the Ritz-Carlton in Georgetown, where Mr. Reid has a condominium. Over the past two years, it paid another $3,000 for meals and to set up meetings at the hotel. Mr. Manley says the expenditures in Washington were for fund-raising events or for feeding and lodging "special guests" who attend them.

The PAC also spent $21,000 on gifts for political supporters, including $3,082 for bracelets and cuff links, $1,000 for art, $1,592 for chocolates, $803 for a pair of iPods, and hundreds of dollars for merchandise at Barnes & Noble and Amazon.com.

DOJ_NMG_0090195

"These types of expenses are a normal part of every fund-raising operation," says Mr. Manley. "They are designed to thank donors for their past efforts and to strengthen their future commitment to helping to elect Democrats."

Stinging From Scandal, Tribes Trim Donations (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, November 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — Indian tribes have cut back this year on political contributions to congressional candidates after a lobbying scandal that ensnared some tribes.

Contributions from 216 tribes are nearly 30% lower so far in the 2005-06 election cycle than they were at this point in 2003-04, ending six years of sharp increases, according to PoliticalMoneyLine and the Center for Responsive Politics, non-partisan groups that track campaign money.

The decline reflects caution by tribes after the January guilty plea of Jack Abramoff, a lobbyist who admitted directing tribal clients to give lawmakers millions to sway legislation and policy. The tribes were not implicated in the criminal probe but were stung by the scrutiny of their politicking.

"Tribes are saying, 'We're going to stay away from this; everybody is focusing on how much we're contributing,' " said Ron Allen of the National Congress of American Indians, an advocacy group.

For example, the Grand Traverse Band of Ottawa and Chippewa Indians in Michigan ceased giving any money to federal candidates and political parties after Abramoff's plea, even though the tribe had no dealings with Abramoff.

"This election we're just sitting it out," said George Bennett, vice chairman of the tribe, which gave $108,000 in 2003-04. "The (tribal) council took a position that we're sick and tired of getting a black eye over that issue."

Several lawmakers, including Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., and Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., returned thousands in campaign contributions from six tribes. The business dealings of Abramoff, his associate Michael Scanlon and those six tribes were the subject of a Senate Indian Affairs Committee probe this year.

The returned political contributions — $159,000— account for part of the overall decline in tribal giving.

The six Abramoff clients had been leading Indian political donors. They gave $3.9 million from 2001 to 2004, or about 20% of all tribal donations, according to PoliticalMoneyLine. They've given nearly $900,000 for next week's elections.

"Members of Congress are less willing to accept contributions from tribes," said Scott Dacey, a Washington lobbyist who represents several tribes. Tribes, in turn, are more careful about making donations.

"Tribes have become smarter political givers, focusing on supporters of tribal issues and not simply candidates who happen to call or fax a request," said Wilson Pipestem, a lobbyist for 11 tribes.

Charles Bunnell, chief of staff of the Mohegan Tribe of Connecticut, said tribes have curtailed large donations to political party organizations. Instead, they are directing money to home-state lawmakers and those who oversee Indian-related issues. "Tribes are continuing to give, but it's far more targeted," Bunnell said.

Tribes gave little money — just $4,400 in 1989-90 — until the mid-1990s, when Indian gambling flourished, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Abramoff admitted bilking tribes out of millions of dollars as he purported to be defending their gambling interests. Tribes also lobby for federal grants for education, bridges, housing and other things.

Abramoff was sentenced in March to five years and 10 months in prison for the fraud and conspiracy conviction, which stems from a deal to buy a fleet of casino ships in Florida.

He awaits sentencing on separate charges in a federal probe of corruption in Congress and federal agencies. Under a plea deal, Abramoff admitted giving lawmakers and government officials meals, trips and campaign donations in exchange for favors. He is cooperating in the investigation.

Tribal leaders said they don't expect to lose influence as their political contributions decline. "We're probably stronger than we've ever been because of the contact we keep with folks in both the House and the Senate," said Michell Hicks, principal chief of the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians of North Carolina, whose contributions are down this year. "We have good relationships, and we try to maintain those."

PodestaMattoon Said To Be Ready To Split Up (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, November 2, 2006

PodestaMattoon, the bipartisan K Street powerhouse, is splitting up, according to several sources close to the firm.

The two name partners, Republican Dan Mattoon and Democrat Tony Podesta, have agreed to separate while retaining a strategic partnership, the sources said. The break is set to become effective by Jan. 1.

DOJ_NMG_0090196

Further details of the split were unavailable because principals at the firm did not answer several requests for comment. Several clients of the firm contacted for this article said they were unaware of the impending change.

At a time when the influence industry is bracing for the outcome of the midterm elections, the news adds another question mark to a pair of K Street's heaviest hitters.

Podesta, who's currently chairing the re-election campaign of Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell (D), is widely regarded as one of the best-connected Democratic strategists inside the Beltway. Mattoon, likewise, is known for his reach in House Republican leadership circles, due in particular to his longtime friendship with Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.).

The firm has maintained healthy growth over the past few years, hovering around the 15th spot in Roll Call's semiannual rankings of top lobbying firms by revenue. For the first half of this year, PodestaMattoon brought in $6 million in revenues, an 11 percent bump, even as some other large firms struggled to sign up new business.

In addition to nonprofit and appropriations-related clients, the firm's roster includes corporate titans such as Google, BellSouth, Tyco and the National Association of Broadcasters.

Podesta founded Podesta Associates in 1988 with his brother John, who later became White House chief of staff for President Bill Clinton. Through the 1990s, Podesta operated under the tech-friendly banner of podesta.com. But the name changed in 2001, when Mattoon agreed to come aboard after 15 years of in-house work for BellSouth.

Both men have held key positions of power in the party. Podesta headed the Pennsylvania campaigns of both President Clinton in 1996 and Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) in 2004. At Hastert's request, Mattoon headed up the House Republican's campaign arm for the 2000 cycle, and he led the outside coalition whipping a major trade bill in 2001.

When Mattoon joined the firm, the move marked a union of two outsized personalities, and those close to the situation said it was not always a happy marriage.

"Personality issues were part of it," said one source with knowledge of the firm, with some observers pointing to Podesta's jet-setting and focus with his wife on collecting contemporary art as one clear point of contrast with the more low-key Mattoon.

But others said the two name partners maintained a solid professional front.

"Maybe over time it drove a wedge, but I just never saw it," said another source close to the firm. Nevertheless, several sources said at various times over the past two years, they heard rumors that a split was imminent.

The firm has had some success inking new contracts and most recently it signed up Alcatel North America and Novartis Vaccines and Diagnostics, as well as the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, a group for whom PodestaMattoon already has done some work.

Besides the name partners, the firm has roughly a dozen lobbyists on staff, including Hastert's son, Josh, plus several more associates who work for its public affairs arm.

An Election On Drugs (WP)

The Washington Post, November 2, 2006

ONE OF the Democrats' election talking points is a promise to revamp the Medicare prescription drug benefit. They paint the 2003 legislation as a sellout to pharmaceutical firms: Rather than having Medicare officials use the government's bargaining power to keep drug prices down, the law left the job of negotiating prices to private insurers. The Medicare drug benefit has actually turned out to be cheaper than projected, and most beneficiaries say they are satisfied with it. But the House Democratic leader, Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), nonetheless accuses Republicans of "putting pharmaceutical companies and HMOs first at the expense of America's seniors."

The Democrats rightly point out that the federal health program for veterans uses its purchasing power to secure drugs at prices lower than the average obtained by the private insurers that administer the Medicare benefit. But this is not a fair comparison. The veterans program keeps prices down partly by maintaining a sparse network of pharmacies and delivering three-quarters of its prescriptions by mail, a policy that might not appeal to retirees who want a local pharmacist. Moreover, the program for veterans is in a position to negotiate hard with drugmakers because it can credibly threaten not to buy from them: Its plan excludes many new medicines. More than a third of retired veterans have signed up for Medicare drug coverage, suggesting that while the veterans program is cheaper, its restricted pharmacy network and formulary render it less attractive.

Setting the veterans comparison aside, could Medicare officials save money by negotiating directly with drug companies? In theory, yes: Once a drug has been invented, the cost of manufacturing pills is low, so a huge purchaser such as Medicare could demand large discounts and still find willing sellers. This is what governments do in most other rich countries. But lower prices might reduce drug companies' incentive to invest in research, and although it is infuriating that Canadians and Europeans get discounts while Americans finance pharmaceutical advances, slowing that advance may not make the world better. Moreover, having the government set drug prices is a sure way of flooding the political system with yet more pharmaceutical lobbyists and campaign spending.

DOJ_NMG_0090197

